Universal HISTORY,

FROM THE

Earliest Account of Time to the Present:

COMPILED from

ORIGINAL AUTHORS;

And ILLUSTRATED with

Maps, Cuts, Notes, Chronological and Other Tables.

VOL. VI.

Ίς ορίας αι χαίας εξέρχεδιαι μη κατανόει, εν αὐταῖς ηθ ευρήσεις ακόπως, απερ ετεροι συνήξαν εγκόπως.

Βαίιι. Imp. ad Leon. fil.

LONDON:

Printed for T. OSBORNE, in Gray's-Im; J. OSBORN, in Pater-noster Row; A. MILLAR, over-against St. Clement's Church in the Strand; and J. CROKATT, near Fleet-bridge.

M.DCC.XLII.

PROMERME

Earliest Account of Time to the Profess

Programme Control

Hops, Curs, Mores, Chromissisch and Other Talifice

and the profession of the second seco

G E O R G E

Earl of CHOLMONDELEY,

Viscount Malpas and Kells, &c. &c.

Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, One of the Lords of His Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, and Knight of the Most Honourable Order of the Bath.

My LORD,

HE avowed Defign of HISTORY being to commemorate the Actions of Those, who have rendered themselves famous both in the Field and Cabinet, To whom can the Authors of an Universal History more properly apply for Protection, than to a Nobleman descended from a Race of Heroes, and who has eminently distinguished himself in the most Venerable and August Senate in the World?

It would be the highest Presumption to presix Your Lordship's Name to this Volume, if we had not been honoured with the Patronage of Some of the most elevated Rank and Character; which, we humbly hope, will justify this Liberty, and, in some Degree, intitle us to Your Lordship's Pardon.

When

When we reflect, that we are addressing ourselves to a Genius confessedly allowed to be refined in every Branch of Literature, and whose delicate Taste in the Belles Lettres is universally acknowledged, we are fearful of offending; therefore shall only subjoin,

That His Majesty and the Kingdom may long enjoy the Benefit of Your Lordship's Counsels, and future Ages the Happiness of having Your Personal Virtues, and great Abilities, transmitted to Your latest Posterity, are the sincere and ardent Wishes of,

My Lord,

Your LORDSHIP'S

Most Humble and

Most Obedient Servants,

The Authors.

The many ILLUSTRIOUS PERSONS, and other

Gentlemen of Learning, who have given Encouragement to this Work by their purchasing of it, oblige us to acknowledge our Gratitude, in publishing so many of their Names as are come to our Hands, since it must reslect not a little Honour upon the Undertaking.

IS Grace the Duke of Athol. Her Grace the Duchess Dowager of St. Albans. The Right Reverend the Lord Bishop of St. Asaph. Monsieur Alt, Minister from the Prince of Hesse. Joseph Wyndham Ash, Esq; The Honourable Barton Ashburnham; Thomas Archer, Esq. Groom-Porter to his Majesty. Abraham Atkins, jun, of Clapham, Efq; Henry Alford, Efq; 2 Setts. Payton Altham, Esq; - Arundell, Efq; Thomas Ashton, Esq; The Reverend Mr. Altham. Mr. George Armstrong. Andrews, Attorney. Thomas Aftby. Stephen Austen, Bookseller. Mrs. Archer, of Sohoe.

IS Grace the Duke of Bedford. The Right Honourable the Earl of The Right Honourable the Lord Bruce. The Right Honourable and Reverend the Lord James Beauclerk. The Right Hon. the Lord Bathurst. Sir Edmund Bacon, Bart. Sir Henry Blunt, Bart. Peter Burrell, Eiq; Sub-Governor of the South-Sea Company. John Bristow, Esq; Deputy-Governor of the South-Sea Company. The Reverend Dr. Bland, Dean of Durham, and Provost of Eton College. Edward Barradel, Attorney-General of Virginia. Mun. Bull, Eiq; - Barnard, Esq;

Papilion Ball, Efq; Andrew Backmanson, Esq; Merchant at Stockholm. The Reverend Dr. Bateman, Archdeacon of Lewes. The Reverend - Brook, M. A. Fellow of Christ-Manchester, Capt. John Barker. Capt. Thomas Brown. Mr. Sylvanus Bevan. Peter Bearsley. Archibald Bower. Boise, Apothecary. Silas Bradbury. Belli, Merchant. Robert Birch, of Manchester. Samuel Bennet. Burton. Brook, of Wallingford, Berkshire. Boehm, of London, Merchant. Brotherton, Bookseller. Brindley, Bookseller. Bathurst, Bookseller. Bell, Bookseller, at Stockton, 3 Setts. Baker, Bookfeller.

C.

IS Grace the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury.
The Right Hon. the Earl of Carlisle.
The Right Hon. the Earl of Chestersield.
The Right Hon. the Lord Cornbury.
The Right Hon. the Earl of Cholmondeley.
The Right Hon. the Lord Cornwallis.
Sir John Hynd Cotton, Bart.
The Colleges in the University of Cambridge; viz.

Peter-House.
Pembroke.
Bennet.

Pembroke.
Bennet.
Queen's.
Trinity.
Trinity-Hall.
St. John's.
King's.
Jefus.

[b]

Èma-

NAMES of the Encouragers.

Emanuel. Clare-Hall. Caius. The Dean and Chapter of Canterbury, for the Cathedral Library. The Reverend Dr. Conybear, Dean of Christ-Church. The Reverend Mr. Bartholomew Castalio, Chaplain to the Empress of Russia. Sir John Chefter, Bart. Sir Clement Cotterell, Master of the Ceremonies. . Crammond, Efq; The Honourable John Chichester, Esq; Bartholomew Clark, Elqs Richard Clift, Elq; The Reverend Mr. Coke, Fellow of King's-College, Cambridge. Byam Crump, of the Inner-Temple, Efq; John Cholwell, Esq; James Crokatt, of Beanston near Haddington, in Scotland, Esq; Captain David Crokatt. The Reverend Mr. Chapman, late Fellow of King's-College, Cambridge. - Clayton, of the Middle-Temple, Elq; The Reverend Mr. Colson. Mr. Martin Clare, of the Academy, So-John Campbell. Martin Carter, of Witham in Essex. Clarke, of Cable. Ifac Clason, Merchant, at Stockholm John Clason, of London, Merchant. Cholmondeley. Creed, of Canterbury. Lewin Cholmley. Cole, Goldsmith. Thomas Cole. BenjaminCox, of Bartlet's-Buildings. Creed. Clark, Bookfeller, 2 Setts.

THE Right Honourable the Lord Viscount Duplin.
The Dean and Chapter of Durham, for the Cathedral Library.
The Library of the Civilians at Doctors-Commons.
Sir Matthew Decker, Bart.
Sir James Dashwood, Bart.
Peter Delmé, Esq;
Charles Delafay, Esq;
Thomas Dundas, of Edinburgh, Esq;

Francis Cogan, Bookseller.

Creighton, Bookfeller at Ipswich,

WilliamCosley, Bookseller, at Briftol.

William Draycot, Esq; Francis Dickenson, Esq;
James Deacon, Esq;
The Reverend Mr. Denton.
Thomas Deacon, M. D. of Manchester.
The Reverend Mr. Hugh Deans, of Maryland.
Capt, Dumont, of Plymouth.
Joseph Dussield, Esq.
Mr. Dew, of Hereford.
Richard Drakeford, of Gosport.
Dutton, Attorney, in Salisbury-Court.
Day.
Adam Denn.
Davis, Bookseller.

E.

SIR John Eyles, Bart. joint PostmasterGeneral.

The Dean and Chapter of Ely, for the Cathedral Library.

The Provost and Fellows of the College at Eton.

Sir Joseph Eyles, Kt. and Alderman.

The Hop. George Evans, Esq;

James Eckersell, Esq;

Charles Eckling, Esq;

Mr. Edmunds, of Clifford's-Inn.

Joseph Eamonson, of Queen-street,

London, Apothecary.

Edward Easton, Bookseller, in Sarum.

HE Honourable Edward Finch, his Majesty's Embassador and Plenipotentiary at the Court of Prussia. Colonel Henry Fitzhugh, of Virginia. The Rev. Dr. Freind, Canon of Christ-Church. Henry Fermor, Esq; William Faukner, Esq. George Furnese, Esq; George Fash, Esq; Richard Freeman, Efq; - Fellows, Efq; John Farringdon, Efq; Mrs. Fountain. Mr. Daniel Flexney, of London, Merch'. Frame, Banker, in Lombard-street.

Frame, Banker, in Lombard-street.
Filenius, Professor of the University of Abo, in Finland.
Fitzgerald.
James Fern, Surgeon.
James Frushard.
De Flines, of Throgmorton-street.
Fisher, Bookseller, 2 Setts.
Richard Franklyn, Bookseller, 2
Setts.
William Flackton, Bookseller, in Canterbury.

NAMES of the Bucouragers.

THE Right Hon. the Lord Gower. Count Charles Gyllenborg, Senator in Sweden. Baron Von Gedda, Secretary of State to his Swedish Majesty. Sir James Grey, Bart. The Honourable William Gooche, Efq; Governor of Virginia. The Dean and Chapter of Gloucester, for the Cathedral Library. James Gambier, Esq; Mrs. Gould. Alexander Gould, Efq; William Gape, Esq; Gilbert, Efq. Samuel Godfrey, Efq; Richard Gough, Efq; Charles Gray, Esq; William Gregory, of Woolhope, Efqs The Rev. Mr. Goodwin, of Clapham. The Rev. Mr. Grant. Mr. Thomas Granger, of Lyon's-Inn. Garlick, of St. Mary-Hill, London. Gardner, Mercer. Gill, Apothecary, at Chelfea. Giles, Bookseller, in Holborn.

HE Right Hon. the Lord Hervey, Lord Privy-Seal. Philip Harcourt, of the Inner-Temple, George Heathcore, Efq; and Alderman. Samuel Hill, of Shelftone near Litchfield, Jacob Harvey, Esq. Thomas Hanmer, Esq. James Herringman, Esq; James Horn, Esq; John Howes, Esq; Richard Hopton, of Cannon Frome, Efq; The Rev. Dr. Hudson, of Canons, Mid-The Rev. Dr. Harbin. The Rev. Mr. Hodgson, Master of the School at Hadley, Middlefex. The Rev. Mr. Michael Hardib. Cape. Hollinworth. Mr. Harris of the Mint Office. Hicks, Merchant, at Hamburg. Hulfe, of London, Merchant. Hope, of Charter-House-Square, London.

Street, London.

Erasmus Hopster, of London, Mer-

Nathanael Hillier, of Friday-Street,

William Hunter.

London.

Henshaw, Attorney, of Aidersgate-

Mr. John Houghton. John Heaton. Hitch, Bookfeller, 66 Setts. Hawkins, Bookfeller. Hinchliff, Bookfeller. Hildyard, Bookseller, at York, 12 Higginson, Bookseller, in Warring. ton, 2 Setts. Hopkins, Bookseller, in Warwick. Hopkins, Bookfeller, in Preston. Haxby, Bookseller, at Sheffield. Mest. Hamilton and Balfour, Booksellers, in Edinburgh. HE Right Honourable the Earl of Inchiquin. Sir Theodore Janssen, Bart. - Jennings, Efq. Theodore Jacobson, Esq; Meff. Innys and Manby, 12 Setts. Mr. James, of Landbillo. Samuel Johnson, of Jamaica. Jackson, Bookseller, 4 Setts.

HIS Grace the Duke of Kent. Benjamin Keene, Esq; Charles King, Esq. - King, of Hackney, Efq; Mr. Randolph Knipe. Mess. Knapton, Booksellers, 12 Setts. Mr. Alexander Kincaid, Bookseller, in Edinburgh, 6 Setts.

THE Right Honourable the Earl of Loudoun. The Right Honourable the Lord Lovel. The Right Reverend the Lord Bishop of Limerick. The Society of Lincoln's Inn, for the Library. Sir Darcy Lever, Knr. LL. D. of Ackrington in Lancashire. The Honourable Colonel Lee. The Reverend Doctor Life, Archdeacon of Canterbury Lancelor Lee, Esq. Thomas Lister, Esq; James Lamb, Efq; Henry Lee, Esq; Philip Ludwell, of Virginia, Efq. Charles Legh, of Adlington, in Cheshire, Eſq; Robert Lefly, Esq; The Reverend Dr. Larondel. Capt. Robert Lovel. Mrs. Laws, of Jamaica. Mr. James Leman.

Mr.

NAMES of the ENCOURAGERS.

Mr. Lemman, Weaver, in Bishopsgate-Street. Longman, Bookseller, 25 Setts. Lovel, Bookseller, at Whitchurch, Shropshire.

M.

HIS Grace the Duke of Marlborough.
His Grace the Duke of Montagu.
Sir Henry Maynard, Bart, of Walthamstow, deceased.
The Honourable Thomas Maynard, Esq;
Charles Monson, Esq;
William Monson, Esq;
William Monley, Esq;
Richard Manley, Esq;
William Manley, Esq;
William Manley, Esq;
The Warden and Feosses of Manchester College.
Dr. William Millar, of St. Kitts.

The Reverend Mr. Muysson, 2 Setts. Mess. Mills and Jacomb. Mrs. Meux, of Gambey, in Lincolnshire.

Medina, of Hyde-Park-Corner. Mr. John Mason, of Maidstone, in Kent,

3 Setts.

Moody, of the Pay-Office, Horse-Guards.

Richard Martin, of St. Swithin's-Lane, London.

Montage, of the Excise-Office.
Meadows, Bookseller, 4 Setts.
Millar, Bookseller, 8 Setts.

N.

HIS Grace the Duke of Norfolk.

The Dean and Chapter of Norwich,
for the Cathedral Library.

The Reverend Dr. Newton, Principal of Hertford College, Oxford.

Robert Nettleton, Efq; John Nicholls, Efq;
Mr. Newell, of Gray's-Inn.
Gabriel Neve.

O.

THE Right Honourable the Earl of Oxford.

The Right Reverend the Lord Bishop of Oxford.

The Colleges in the University of Oxford, viz.

St. John's.
Trinity.
Baliol.
Jefus.
Exeter.
Queen's.
Oriel.
Merton.

Corpus Christi.
Pembroke.
Wadham.
Hertford.
Ord, of Lincoln's-Inn, E

Ord, of Lincoln's-Inn, Esq; Capt. Opy, at Petersburg. Mr. Okeess.

P.
COunt Charles Frederick Piper, of the Kingdom of Sweden.
The Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's for the Cathedral Library.
Sir Gregory Page, Bart.
Sir Erasmus Philips, Bart.
The Society of Learning at Peterborough.
The Reverend Dr. Pierce, Dean of Winchester.
The Right Honourable William Pulteney, Esq;
George Proctor, Esq;
William Penny, Esq;
Thomas Pawlet, Esq; 2 Setts.
Charles Peers. Esq;

Thomas Pawlet, Efq; 2 Setts. Charles Peers, Efq; Richard Plummer, Efq; George Putland, Efq; Humphrey Pudner, Efq; Robert Paul, Efq; Christopher Pack, M. D.

Dr. Plumptree.
The Reverend Mr. Poole, of Stretton.
Mr. Joseph Parker, at the Royal Exchange, Accomptant.

Thomas Plumsted.
Benjamin Pomfret, of NewportPagnall.
Pinny.

Henry Potts.
Andrew Plomgree, of Gottenburg, Merchant.
George Psalmanazar.

Partridge.
Joseph Parsons.
Parvish, of Guilford.
William Powell.
Palairet.

Pemberton, Bookseller, in Fleet-Street. Pote, Bookseller, at Eton, 2 Setts.

Payn, Bookseller. Samuel Parsons, Bookseller, in Newcastle, Staffordshire.

Pilborough, Bookseller, at Colchester.

Mrs. Purcell.

HIS Grace the Duke of Queensbury and Dover.

NAMES of the Encouragers.

HIS Grace the Duke of Richmond. His Excellency Thomas Robinson, his Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary at Sir John Rushout, Bart.

John Rush, Esq;

Churchil Rose, Esq;

George Rook, Efq;

Henry Roll, Esq;

Thomas Rouse, of College Hill, Esq; Francis Reynolds, Esq; of Strange-

The Reverend Mr. Rothery, of Chelsea.

The Reverend Mr. Rawlins.

Don Pedro Rahmeyer, Merchant, at the Hague.

Miss Read, of Hackney.

Mr. Giles Rook.

Henry Ryall, of Shad-Thames. Benjamin Rosewell, Attorney, in Ironmonger-Lane.

Stephen Riou.

Herman Rindtorff, of Hamburg.

Samuel Richardson, Printer.

Rivington, Bookseller, 25 Setts. Redwood, Bookseller, at Norwich,

2 Setts.

THE Right Honourable the Earl Stanhope.

The Right Reverend the Lord Bishop of Salisbury.

The Right Honourable the Lord Noell Somerset.

Sir Brownlow Sherrard, Bart.

Sir Robert Smith, Bart.

Sir Miles Stapleton, Bart.

Joshua Smith, of Battersea, Esq;

Allen Smith, of Battersea, Esq;

Samuel Smith, Esq;

George Speke, Efq;

Sitwell, Esq;

- Sturton, Esq;

Theophilus Salway, Esq; · Sydenham, Efq;

Andrew Stone, Esq;

The Reverend Dr. Skerrit.

The Reverend Mr. Swinton, Fellow of Wadham College.

Mr. William Snell, Attorney.

James Scott, Merchant, of London.

John Shipston.

John Serocold.

Lister Selman.

Swale, of Staples-Inn.

Thomas Simmons.

Strahan, Bookfeller.

John Stagg, Bookfeller.

Sare, Bookseller, 3 Setts.

Mr. Shugburgh, Bookseller, in Fleet-Street.

Swale, Bookseller, in Leeds.

Mrs. Spidell, junior.

HE Right Honourable the Earl of Thanet.

The Right Honourable the Lord Talbot.

Sir Thomas Trollop, Bart.

The Society of the Inner-Temple, for the Library.

The Society of the Middle-Temple, for the Library.

Dr. Teffier, Physician to his Majesty.

Christopher Towers, Esq.

Henry Termor, Esq;

William Tully, Esq; John Tourton, Esq;

The Reverend Herbert Taylor, A. M.

The Reverend Mr. Henry Turner.

The Reverend Mr. Thomas.

Mr. Templeman, of Dorchester.

Robert Turner.

Thurlbourn, Bookseller, at Cambridge, 4 Setts.

Taylor, Bookseller, at Nantwich.

Mrs. Trenchard, of Lytchett Maltravers, Dorsetshire.

MR. Veal, of Leghorn, Merchant. Mr. Paul Vaillant, Bookseller.

THE Right Honourable the Lord

Chief Justice Willes.

Sir William Wyndham, Bart. Sir Thomas Webster, Bart.

Sir George Wynn, Bart.

The Dean and Chapter of Winchester, for

the Cathedral Library.

The Dean and Canons of the Royal Collegiate Chapel of St. George, at Wind-

for.

The Dean and Chapter of Worcester, for

the Cathedral Library

Monf. Charles M. Wassenbergh, his Swedish Majesty's Secretary at the Court of Great Britain.

The Reverend Dr. Waterland, late

Archdeacon of Middlesex.

Samuel Windor, Esq;

Josiah Wordsworth, Esq;

Houton Wooley, of Clapham, Eiq; Mr. Secretary Weston. John Ward, Esq;

Walpole, Esq;

James West, of the Inner-Temple, Esq.
The Reverend Dr. Wright, 2 Setts.

NAMES of the Encouragers.

The Reverend Dr. Wilcox, Rector of Mr. Walthoe, Bookseller, in Cornhill. Kensington.

The Reverend Dr. Webster.

The Reverend Mr. Watts, Preacher of Lincoln's-Inn.

The Reverend Mr. Thomas Woodward.

The Reverend Mr. Webber.

The Reverend Mr. Samuel Wesley, Master of the School at Tiverton.

The Reverend Mr. Webb.

Mr. Whitehall, of Furnival's-Inn. Abraham Wells.

Weft.

James Wallis, Stationer.

Whitridge, Bookseller, in Cornhill.

4 Setts.

Wicksted, Bookseller, in Newgate-Street.

Wilcox, Bookfeller, in the Strand.

Wellington, Bookseller, without Temple-Bar.

Mrs. Elizabeth Wild, Bookseller, at Hereford, 5 Setts.

Edmund Yarborough, Esq;

N.B. Those Gentlemen, whose Names are omitted, are desired to send them to any of the Booksellers mentioned at the Bottom of the Title, and they shall be inserted in the next Volume.

CONTENTS.

THE Roman history, from the death of Domitian, the last	of the twelve Cæsars, to the death of Trajan, who brought to	be empire to its utmost grandeur and extent Page
From the death of Trajan, to the death of Marcus Aurelius, who	en 30
From the death of M. Aurelius, to the death of Alexander, who	en
the empire was first transferred without the consent of the sena	te 35
From the death of Alexander Severus, to the captivity of Valeria	n,
when the empire was usurped by thirty persons at once, common	ly
called the thirty tyrants	0
From the captivity of Valerian, to the resignation of Dioclesian 17
From the resignation of Dioclesian, to the removal of the imperi	al
feat to Constantinople, by Constantine the Great 22	-
From the removal of the imperial feat to Constantinople, to t	_
	4
From the death of Julian, to the death of Valens 34
From the death of Valens, to the division of the empire 38
From the death of Theodosius the Great, to the taking of Ron	ne
the first time by the Goths
From the taking of the city by the Goths, to the death of The	_
doing II.	25
From the death of Theodosius II. to the total failure of the wester	rn empire in Augustulus	2
From the dissolution of the western empire, to the death of Just nian the Great
From the death of Justinian the Great, to the deposing of Iren
	3 I
From the promotion of Nicephorus, to the death of Basilius II. 56
From the death of Basilius II. to the taking of Constantinople
the Latins 59
From the expulsion of the Greeks, to the taking of Constantinople of the Turks, and the utter destruction of the Roman empire 62	-
7.	Ъе

CONTENTS.

The history of the Carthaginians	Page 657
Sect. I. A description of Carthage, and some account of	the origin of that city	ibid.
Sect. II. A description of Africa Propria, or the te	erritory of
Carthage	664
Sect. III. The antiquity, government, laws, religion,	language, customs, arts, learning, and trade, of the Carthaginia
Sect. IV. The chronology of the Carthaginians	712
Sect V. The hiftory of the Carthaginians, from the four	ndation of their city, to the first Punic war	719
Sect. VI. From the first to the second Punic war	819

A TABLE of the Maps and Curs.

A general map of the Roman empire. She its provinces, and the seats of the barb	harous nations on their frontiers	Page 1
The historical pillar, the serpentine pillar,	the porphyry pillar, the pillar of the emperor Marcian; and the Thebean obelisk and engines, by which it	t was erected 299
The Thracian Bosporus, with Constantino
the outside prospect, and the whole view,	of the church of Sancta
Sophia	316
A map shewing the antient situation of C	arthage, Utica, Tunes, and the Carthaginian bay; with a bird' 661, 662, 665
Two Siculo-Punic medals; the fashion of	_ Carthage; and the monstrous serpent k	illed by the Romans on the banks of the Bagrada	703, 704, 837

. . .

UNIVERSAL HISTORY,

FROM THE

Earliest Account of Time to the Present.

The ROMAN History.

C H A P. XX.

From the death of Domitian, the last of the twelve Cæsars, to the death of Trajan, who brought the empire to its utmost grandeur and extent.

a AVING delivered in the foregoing volumes, pursuant to our plan, the history of Rome, from Romulus to the commonwealth, from the commonwealth to the empire, and continued it to the death of Domitian, the twelfth emperor, and the last of those princes, who are commonly styled the twelve Casars; we shall now proceed to the history of the other emperors, from the reign of Domitian, to the removal of the imperial seat to Constantinople, thence to the division of the empire, and from the division to the history of both empires; of the western, to the taking of Rome by Odoacer, when with Augustulus sell the very name of an empire in the west; of the eastern, to the taking of Constantinople by the Latins, to its recovery by the Greeks; and finally, to its utter destruction by the Turks, whose history, from the first notice we find of them to the present time, will follow, as in its proper place. These are the subjects which we design to pursue in the present volume, not doubting but this will prove as useful and entertaining as any of the preceding volumes, notwithstanding the extraordinary success which they have met with both at home and abroad, and which we had not vanity enough to have promised ourselves in so difficult an undertaking. The foregoing volume we closed with the death of Domitian, who was succeeded by Nerva, as was Nerva by Trajan. The reigns of these two excellent princes will supply us with matter for the present chapter.

The death of Domitian was no sooner divulged, than the senate assembled, and M. Cocceius with one voice declared M. Cocceius Nerva emperor. He was a native of Narnia in Nerva emperor. Umbria; but his family came originally from the island of Crete, so that he was nei-ror. ther by birth a Roman, nor descended from an Italian samily. However, his sather, His samily. grandsather and great-grandsather had been honoured in Rome with the consular dignity. His grandsather, M. Cocceius Nerva, one of the most learned civilians in Rome, was consul in the eighth year of Tiberius's reign, and twenty-second of the chistian Vol. VI. No 1.

æra, accompanied that prince in his retirement, and, affected with the fadness of the a times, chose, when in perfect health, a voluntary death 2. His father, who bore

His preferments.

Narrowly escapes death under Domi-

Is acknowledged emperor by the fenate and soldiery.

the same name, was consul in the fourth year of the reign of Claudius, and fortieth of the christian æra b. His mother, by name Plautilla, was descended from an illustrious family, being the daughter of one Lanas a confular . The emperor was born, according to Dion Cassius a, on the seventeenth of March, in the eighteenth year of Tiberius's reign, and thirty-second of the christian æra, and was by Nero, in the twelfth year of his reign, honoured with the prætorship, and a statue in the palace , having by his elegant poems (for he was one of the best poets of his time) gained the affection of that prince, who even inscribed to him some of his poetical pieces f. Pliny speaks of his epigrams, and commends them g. He was conful with Vespasian b His humanity, in the year 71, and with Domitian in 90 h. He is commended by all the ancients as generosity, &c. a prince of a most sweet and humane temper, of great moderation and generosity, and one who looked upon himself as raised to the empire, not for his own advantage, but for that of his people; and truly the happiness and welfare of those who lived under him were, during the short time he reigned, his only end and pursuit. He seems to have been naturally timorous; and some writers charge both him and Trajan with excessive drinking . Apollonius Tyaneus was the first, if Philostratus is to be credited, who folicited him to assume the sovereignty, or at least to deliver Rome from the tyranny of Domitian. Nerva hearkened to him; but his courage failed him when the defign was to be put in execution. Apollonius however did not scruple denying c the whole to Domitian, affuring him, that Nerva, tho' equal to the greatest honours, was fo far from procuring them by unlawful means, that he would not accept them, if offered, dreading nothing fo much on account of his infirmities, and his love of retirement, as being any-ways concerned in the administration of public affairs m. However, Domitian, either acquainted with Nerva's design, or giving credit to the aftrologers, who advised him to beware of Nerva, since his nativity seemed to promise him the empire, confined him to Tarentum in the year 94; and would have put him to death, had not a more kind astrologer assured the emperor, that Nerva, who was of a weak constitution, and subject to many infirmities, would die in a few days ". Aurelius Victor writes, that Nerva, dreading the cruelty of Domitian, had retired to d Gaul, and was there when he received the news of the tyrant's death, and his own assumption to the empire o. On the other hand, Dion Cassius takes no notice of his banishment; but supposes him to have been at Rome when Domitian was murdered: for he tells us, that Parthenius, and the other conspirators, offered the empire, before the affaffination of Domitian, to feveral perfons; who looking upon fuch an offer as a fnare laid for their destruction, declined it; but that at length Nerva, who daily expected to be facrificed to the jealoufy of the emperor, was prompted, by his own fear, to accept the fovereign power, as the only means of preferving his life P. Domitian therefore being killed on the eighteenth of September of the year 96, Nerva was the same day declared emperor by the senate, and, as such, acknowledged by the e prætorian guards, notwithstanding their concern for the death of the late emperorywhich they would have revenged, had they not been restrained by Petronius Secundus, one of their captains, and by Parthenius, Domitian's chief chamberlain 4. Nerva had scarce assumed the sovereignty, when a salse report was spread, that Domitian was still alive, and the news of his death only an artifice to discover the designs of such as he sufpected: hence dread seized all, and the concourse about the new emperor dispersed in a moment. Nerva himself, naturally wary and timorous, was struck speechless, betrayed great difmay in his countenance, and fallen from the highest hopes, waited for present death, till Parthenius assured him, that the report was quite groundless. Hereupon recovering his former temper, he went first to the camp of the prætorian f guards, and thence, after he had fecured them by a promise of the usual donative, to the senate, where he was received with the greatest marks imaginable of esteem and affection. Many congratulatory speeches were made to him on this occasion; but that of Arrius Antoninus, grandfather to the emperor T. Antoninus by his mother, a was of a different nature from the rest; for embracing the new emperor, with whom he had long lived in great intimacy, I am come, faid he, with the rest, to congratulate the senate, the people of Rome, and the provinces of the empire, upon your advancement to this high post; but cannot pay the same compliment to you, who, after having, by your wisdom and virtue, happily escaped the rage of so many wicked princes, plunge yourself into new dangers and troubles, being exposed to the censure and hatred both of your friends and foes, especially of the former, who will not fail, if any of their fuits are denied, to become your most implacable enemies r. Nerva, now confirmed in the fovereignty both by the fenate and foldiery, blended together two things, fays Tacitus s, once thought irreconcileable; public liberty, and fovereign The Romans b power: for under him the Romans enjoyed all the former, and felt none of the evil happy under effects of the latter '. He immediately delivered from their fears, and fet at liberty, him. all those who had been, under the late emperor, arraigned of treason, and recalled fuch as had been banished under colour of the same crime a, causing their lands and inheritances to be restored to them, without the least deduction. Pliny mentions many illustrious persons, who returned from banishment on this occasion w; and a medal struck the following year, which has reached us, bears the following legend; exules Romæ redditi, that is, the exiles restored to Rome x. However, he would not fuffer Licinianus, who had been banished for debauching a vestal, to return to Italy; but gave him leave to pass the remainder of his life in Sicily y. He enacted more Punishes all inc severe laws against informers, than Titus had done, who abhorred that race of men; formers. and caused all the slaves and freed-men to be put to death, who had informed against their masters and patrons. Besides these, many other informers were publicly executed, and among them a philosopher, by name Seras. At the same time he published an edict, forbidding, agreeable to the ancient laws of Rome, a slave or freed-man to appear against his master in any accusation whatsoever; and ordering, that no person should, for the future, be accused of violated majesty, or prosecuted Abolisher the for living after the manner of the Jews 2, by which words Dion, without all doubt, law of majefly. meant the Christians. He solemnly swore, that no senator should ever by his orders be put to death; and religiously observed his oath, tho' some of that body conspired d against him, as we shall relate anon. All the goods and effects belonging to particulars, which he found in the palace, he ordered to be immediately restored to the pro-Redresserprietors; lessened the taxes; delivered the Jews from the cruelties and oppressions ances. of the collectors of the public revenues; and, to the great fatisfaction of the Romans, annulled the law of Augustus, ordering the twentieth part of each inheritance and legacy to be paid into the exchequer. He allowed no gold or filver statues to be erected to him, retrenched all superfluous expences, abolishing for that purpose divers facrifices, and public shews; and as he still wanted money wherewithal to relieve the necessitious citizens, and reward his friends, he at last sold great part of the gold and His generosity e filver plate, and rich furniture, both of his own house, and of the imperial palace, with towards the feveral houses and estates. In selling them, he was not difficult as to the price; but people. feemed overjoyed to have so favourable an opportunity of obliging many. He laid out a vast sum upon a purchase of land, to be divided amongst the poor of Rome, appointing some senators of known integrity, and among the rest one Corellus, highly esteemed by Pliny a, to divide it amongst the most indigent b. From several medals of this year it appears, that he twice divided confiderable fums among the people, besides the lands, and moreover a large quantity of corn c. The children of such as were poor he caused to be brought up, in all the cities of Italy, at the public expence. He eased not only Italy, but all the provinces, of the heavy impositions with which f they had been burdened by Vespasian and Domitian; and utterly abolished the tribute upon all carriages, which was generally looked upon as an infufferable grievance: hence the senate caused several medals to be struck, to perpetuate by that means the remembrance of so great a favour d. Of the many instances of his disinterestedness His disinterest. taken notice of by the ancients, we shall only relate the following: Atticus, a citizen edness. of Athens, father to the famous Herodes Atticus, of whom we shall speak in the reign of T. Antoninus, having discovered in his house a large treasure, wrote to Nerva, desiring to know how he should dispose of it. The emperor, who had no biass to avarice.

* Тасіт. annal. iv. с. 8. Aur. Vіст. epit. Eutrop. Dio, l. lxvii. p. 767. Front. aquæduc. p. 119. в Онирн. ibid. Gruter. p. 246. в Оно, l. lxviii. p. 771. ONUPH. in fast. p. 198. f Martial. l. viii. epigr. 70. & l. ix. epigr. 27. & Pi Aur. Vict. in vit. Trajin. k Idem ibid. m Idem ibid. c. 14. & l. viii. c. 3. n Dio, l. lxviii. p. 1 lxvii. p. 767. 9 Plin. panegyr. Dio, l. lxviii. p. 769, B PLIN. I. iii. cpift. 8. TACIT. annal. xv. C. 7. h FRONT. 2quæd. p. 219. n Dio, l. lxviii. p. 769. 1 PHILOST. in vit. Apoll. Tyan. l. vii. c. 3. P Dio, l. lxvii. p. 767. Vicr. in opit.

Some of his laws.

His too great lenity and indulgence.

avarice, answered, Utere, Use it; but Atticus, not thinking himself yet secure, wrote a to him a fecond letter, acquainting him, that the treasure was too great for a private person, and that he was thence afraid to use it. To this the generous prince replied in two words, Ergo abutere, Then abuse it, signifying thereby, that the treasure was his without reserve, and that he might dispose of it as he thought fit d. Nerva renewed the law of Domitian, forbidding the castration of children e; and by one edict confirmed all the grants of that prince. He published a law, forbidding any one to marry his niece, which was first allowed in the reign of Claudius f; applied himself with great care to the reformation of manners; was affiduous in the administration of justice; and, in short, behaved in such manner towards all, that he used to say, He believed he might refign the empire, and return with fafety to a private life, not being b conscious to himself of having done the least thing that could give any man just motive of offence 8. He was perhaps too kind to fuch as were altogether unworthy of his favours; which gave occasion to some persons to complain of his lenity and indulgence. Having one day invited to his table, befides many other persons of distinction, Junius Mauricus, who had been banished by Domitian, and Fabricius Veiento, a confular, who, with his fecret informations, had occasioned the ruin of many illustrious citizens in the preceding reign, one of the guests happened to mention Catullus Meffalinus, a noted informer under Domitian, when the emperor, hearing him named, What would Catullus do, faid he, were be alive now? If he were alive now, replied Mauricus with great freedom, he would be at table with us; which was a gentle reflec- c tion on the emperor's lenity and kindness to Veiento, and others, whom he ought rather to have punished than caressed b. As soon as by the death of Domitian, and assumption of Nerva, public liberty was restored, to use the expression of Pliny', all who had fuffered by false accusations, flocked to the senate, demanding, that condign punishment might be forthwith inflicted on such as had informed against them. The senate hearkened to their request, and punished some with death, others with banishment; but not without great partiality, sparing those of their own body. Hereupon Pliny boldly undertook the accusation of Publicus Certus, who was not only of the fenatorial order, but had been by Domitian named to the confulfhip with Vestius Proculus. The fenate, having first attempted in vain to persuade Pliny to drop the prose-d cution, referred in the end the whole affair to the emperor, who contented himself with confirming the confulfhip to Vellius, and naming another to that dignity in the room of Certus, who died soon after of grief k. Nerva did not think it adviseable to condemn him, as was then commonly believed, because he lived in great friendship with the governor of Syria, who was at the head of a powerful army; which gave no small umbrage to Nerva. Besides, in the heat of the first prosecutions, some perfons, among the rest the philosopher Seras, had been punished with death as informers, and afterwards found innocent; which gave the good-natured emperor great uneafiness m. On the calends of January, Nerva entered upon his third consulship, which was the first after his accession to the empire, and chose for his collegue L. Virginius Rusus, to whom the foldiers had often offered the empire. As Virginius was rifing, after he had assumed the sasces, to pronounce a speech in praise of the emperor, according to the custom which then obtained, he let a book drop out of his hand, and as he stooped to take it up, fell himself, and had the missortune to break his leg; which, as he Virginius Ru- was then in the eighty-third year of his age, occasioned his death. He was, by the emperor's orders, buried with the utmost pomp and magnificence, and Cornelius Tacitus, the historian, whom Nerva named to the consulate in his room, pronounced his funeral oration n. Pliny wrote another panegyric upon him in a letter which he fent to one of his friends, acquainting him with the death of that illustrious citizen °. This f year Calpurnius Crassus, descended from the ancient and illustrious family of the Crassi, conspired with some others against Nerva; who, being immediately informed of their wicked defigns, fent for them, and carrying them with him to the public theatre, placed them next to himself, and presented to them, as Titus had done on the like occasion, the swords of the gladiators, which were always brought to, and viewed by the emperor P. We are not told what effect this instance of generosity had upon the conspirators. All we know is, that Crassus, having owned his crime, was, with his fus dies.

Calpurnius Craffus conspires against Nerva.

d Philost. in vit. fophist. p. 546.

* Vict. epit. Plin. l. iv. epist. 22.

1 Plin. l. ix. epist. 13.

* Idem ibid. Bidem ibid. Dio, p. 769.

1 Plin. l. ix. epist. 13.

* Idem ibid. Dio, p. 769.

1 Plin. l. ii. epist. 1.

* Idem ibid. Dio, p. 770. Vict. ibid.

a wife, banished to Tarentum. The senate were for condemning both him and his accomplices to death; but the emperor, alledging the oath he had taken not to spill Who pardons the blood of any senator, checked their zeal. Whereupon Fronto, to whom Nerva bim. had refigned the fasces, offended at the prince's unseasonable clemency, as he styled it, said boldly, that it was a great missortune to have a prince, under whom all things were criminal and forbidden; but a still greater to be governed by one, under whom all things were allowed 9. The emperor was so far from refenting this freedom, that thenceforth he acted with somewhat more severity, taking for his counsellors such of the fenators as were persons of great experience, and known integrity, and dispatching, with their advice, all matters of confequence. The fame year the prætorian The pratorian b guards, headed by Ælianus Casperius their commander, occasioned disturbances in the guards raise a city, under colour of revenging the death of Domitian; flew to the palace, and there besieged Nerva, demanding with great boldness, that all those who had been anyways concerned in the affaffination of the late emperor, might be forthwith delivered up to them, or publicly executed. Nerva, the naturally timorous, behaved on this occasion with incredible firmness; for, offering his bare neck to the incensed foldiery, he begged they would be fatisfied with his life, and spare those, to whom he was indebted for the empire, and whom, on that account, he could not in honour abandon. But his resolution was to no effect; he was in the end constrained, as Pliny writes r, to condemn those, whom he studied to preserve at the expence of c his own life; for the foldiers, without being in the least awed or moved by him, cut in pieces Petronius Secundus, Parthenius, and the other conspirators, as we read in Victor the younger, or, as he is by some styled, Victorinus. Neither did the mutinous foldiery stop here, but obliged the emperor to return them public thanks be- Nerva is obfore the people for putting to death the worst and most wicked of ment. This liged to comply with their suninsolence and boldness of the soldiery proved in the end very advantageous to the just demands. empire; for Nerva, finding himself despised on account of his infirmities and old age, resolved to name some person for his successor, who should be able, both to support him, and to govern with equity and moderation after his death. He was not without many relations and friends of his own; but as he had more at heart d the welfare of the empire, than the grandeur of his family, he overlooked them, and chose Ulpius Trajan, the greatest and most deserving person of that age, for his successor, and at the same time adopted him in the capitol, declaring his adoption with a loud voice thus: With my hearty wishes for the prosperity of the senate He adopts Uland people of Rome, and that what I do may prove fortunate to them and myself, I pius Trajan. declare Marcus Ulpius Trajan my son. He afterwards gave him the title of Casar, with that of Germanicus, which he himself seems to have assumed about this time, invested him with the tribunitial power, and even honoured him with the title of emperor; fo that he created him not only his successor, but his partner in the empire: at the same time he named him conful for the ensuing year ". The adoption e of Trajan, which was received with great joy both by the senate and people, put a stop to the disorders committed by the soldiery, who immediately returned to their duty. As Trajan was then at the head of a powerful army in Lower Germany, Nerva fent him a diamond of great value, and wrote to him with his own hand, acquainting him with his preferment, and leaving to him the revenging of the affront put upon him by the prætorian guards and their commander. Some time after, Trajan sent for Casperius, and those of his party, under colour of employing them in some expedition; but instead of making use of them, discharged them all with ignominy w, or, as some write, put them to death. Towards the close of this year, Nerva took upon him the title of imperator on account of a ticulars. THE following year he entered upon his fourth confulship, having Ulpius Trajan, now the second time consul, for his collegue; but died soon after, according to The death of some, on the twenty-first, according to others, on the twenty-seventh of January. Nerva. For having heated himself in chiding with great acrimony the celebrated informer Aquilius Regulus, he was seized with a sever, which, as he was weak, and stricken

f victory gained over the Germans in Pannonia x, of which we know not the par-

9 Dio, p. 769.

F PLIN. pangyr.

Vict. in epit.

SID. car. vii. ver. 114.

PLIN. panegyr.

Dio, l. lxix. p. 770. 1 Vict. in epit. t Idem ibid. VICT. ibid. w Dio, ibid. * PLIN. panegyr. Birog. numifin. p. 145.

Is ranked amongst the in years, foon put an end to his life, after he had reigned fixteen months, and eight, or, at most, nine days. He had lived, according to Dion Cassius, sixty-five years, ten months, and as many days; according to Eutropius, seventy-one; and according to St. Jerom, seventy-three years. He died in the Salustian gardens, whence his body was carried by the senate to the tomb of Augustus. He was ranked amongst the gods, and Trajan out of gratitude caused several temples to be erected to him both in Rome and the provinces. He was, no doubt, a prince of great wisdom, generosity and moderation; but some of the provinces were more grievously oppressed in his reign than in that of Domitian, the governors, who dreaded Domitian, presuming upon the lenity and goodness of his successor, to inrich themselves at the expence of the unhappy people committed to their care. b These grievances Nerva would not have failed to redress, had he lived long enough to know them.

Trajan was a Spaniard both by birth and extraction, descended rather of an ancient than an illustrious family, born in Italica, near Seville, now known, according to fome, by the name of Old Seville, according to others, by that of Alcala del

Trajan.

His family, ancestors and preferments. Rio b. His father, named also Trajan, had been honoured with the consulship, distinguished with triumphal ornaments, and raised, no doubt, by Vespasian, to the rank of a patrician c. Trajan, commander of the tenth legion, who signalized himself at the taking of Japha, as we read in Josephus d, was, we conjecture, father to the present emperor, who was born, according to most writers, in the twelsth c year of the reign of Claudius, and fifty-second of the christian æra c. He followed the prosession of arms from his early youth, and served ten years in quality of tribune s. He checked the pride of the Parthians, says his panegyrist, while he was yet very young, and deteated their measures with the bare same of his name s. But he then commanded, in all likelihood, under his father, to whom he gave, when emperor, the title of Parthicus, as appears from various medals b. He was prætor in the year 86, and conful in 91, with Acilius Glabrio. Soon after his confulsion, he with drew to Spain, dreading the cruelty of Domitian, and there led a prætor in the year 86. and consul in 91. with Acilius Glabrio. Soon after his consulship, he withdrew to Spain, dreading the cruelty of Domitian, and there led a retired life, till he was by that prince recalled, and appointed governor of Lower Germany; which must have been after the revolt and deseat of Antoninus in 88. d for had he had any share in that victory, Pliny would have mentioned it in his panegyric. While he was governor of Germany, he performed nothing which his panegyrist thought worth mentioning, since he only says, that while he governed Germany, he gained the affections of the soldiery; but notwithstanding their inviolable attachment, never entertained the least thought of revolting from the worst of princes, to whom he had sworn allegiance, and seizing, as he might, the empire for himself k. He was still governor of Germany, when Nerva adopted him for his son, appointed him his successor, and took him for his partner in the empire, as we have related above. To this choice Nerva was directed by the extraordinary merit of Trajan, and a fincere desire of continuing to all the nations subject to the e empire that happiness which they enjoyed in his reign. And truly Trajan possessed in an eminent degree all those qualities which form a great, an excellent prince. He was, when preferred to the empire, in the forty-second, or as some will have it, the forty-sisten year of his age, and consequently neither subject to the vices of youth, rashness and precipitation, nor to the weakness and indolence attending old age. His body was robust, and inured to satigue; his countenance comely and age. His body was robult, and inured to fatigue; his countenance comely and majestic; his stature regular and tall; and his behaviour extremely engaging. He was not himself a man of learning, having from his childhood been brought up in the camp; but savoured the learned, and encouraged in others what he himself wanted. As to military affairs, he was, without dispute, the best commander of f his age, and equal to the greatest generals of antiquity. In every duty of war he was indefatigable; he marched always on foot at the head of the army, even after he was emperor, and crossed immense countries without ever once mounting on horse-back, or suffering himself to be carried, as other emperors had done, in a chariot or litter. His diet was such as chance presented. In his garb and general dress he little varied from a common soldier. Upon consultations and dispatches cellent commander.

Is adopted by Nerva.

* Dio, ibid. F Euseb. chron. Vict. epit. Plin. panegyr. Eutrop. Sid. car. vii. ver. 113. Vide Baudr. p. 394. Plin. pan. Eutrop. Goltz. Gruter. &c. f Plin. pan. Ldem ibid. Spanil. l. vii. p. 851. Dio, l. lxvii. p. 765. Spartian. p. 1, 8. Plin. pan. R Idem ibid. Plin. ibid.

a he bestowed nights and days. He never retired to his tent till he had visited the whole camp, and was always the first in the field when the usual exercises were to be performed. He was acquainted with all the old foldiers, called them by their names, remembered their exploits, and familiarly conversed with them; but at the fame time knew how to keep them to their duty m. He was great in war, and equally great in peace. When he first assumed the sovereign power, he publicly professed, that he did not think himself in that high station more exempt from the observance of the laws, than the meanest of the populace; and accordingly took an oath to obey them, which he religiously observed; and thence Pliny says, that all the emperors before him had made the fame professions, but their professions b were not believed. What they had promised to be, Trajan was; for he possessed His moderathe place of a lawful prince, only to prevent the exercise of lawless power n. He tion, affability, delighted to fee his people happy, and had nothing fo much at heart as to make other virtues. them so. To accomplish this, he chearfully lessened his revenue, lessened his authority, and restrained his prerogative, where it seemed in the least to interfere with the interest and happiness of his people. He was aware, that over-bearing pride was not the means to win affection or esteem, and that condescension in a prince is not irreconcileable with his dignity, but rather a fure way to raife it: he therefore lived with his people rather like a father with his children, than a prince with his subjects. He advanced none but the most virtuous and worthy; and c fuch as were otherwise, he chose to reform and reclaim rather with gentleness and clemency, than with rigour and severity. On his taking upon him the empire, he declared in full fenate, that no good man should ever be put to death by his orders, which he confirmed by a folemn oath, and religiously observed it. He suffered but few statues to be erected to him, checked such as offered to flatter him, and would not allow any extraordinary honours to be conferred upon him. His palace was constantly open to persons of all ranks, whom he received with extraordinary kindness, heard with great patience, and strove, as far as in him lay, to dismiss none from his presence diffatisfied; looking upon himself as raised to that high post, not for his own advantage, but for that of others. To his other great d qualities, he added that of veracity, acting in council, in public negotiations, and with private men, without those little artifices which wise men despise, and none but the apes of wife men practife. He would never fuffer any one to be condemned upon sufpicions, however strong and well-grounded, faying, it was better a thoufand criminals should escape unpunished, than one innocent person be condemned P. When he appointed Suburanus captain of his guards, in prefenting him, according to custom, with a drawn sword, the badge of his office, he used these memorable words; Pro me; si merear, in me: Employ this sword for me; but turn it, if I deserve it, against me q. He allowed none of his freed-men any share in the administration, telling them, that he, and not they, was invested with the sovereign power, and e therefore warning them not to assume any authority inconsistent with their rank. Some persons having a suit with one of them, by name Eurythmus, and seeming to fear the imperial freed-man, Trajan affured them, that the cause should be heard, discussed and decided according to the strictest laws of justice; adding, For neither is be Polycletus, nor I Nero. Polycletus, of whom we spoke in the reign of Noro, was that prince's favourite freed-man. Trajan is faid to have excelled even Nerve himself in generosity, and all the preceding princes in the largesses with which he relieved, not only the citizens of Rome, but the indigent people in all the provinces of the empire: whence he was by all nations looked upon as a common father, and as such loved and revered. However, he was not without some faults: he was His faults. f addicted to wine. This fault Dion Cassius owns, but adds, that he never drank to excess. On the other hand, Aurelius Victor affures us, that he injoined all his officers not to put in execution such orders as he should give at or after his banquets; and Julian, surnamed the apostate, writes, that Trajan had a talent for eloquence, and would have applied himfelf with success to that study, had he not by immoderate drinking impaired his natural capacity ". Pliny extols his chaftity w, but Dion

O Idem ibid. Dio, p. 773. Vict. in epit.

B. Aur. Victor. P. Dio, & Plin. ibid. PLIN. ibid. O Idem ibid. Dio, Q Dio, p. 778. Aur. Victor. m PLIN. ibid. Dio, I. Ixviii. p. 772. P PLIN. pan. Vict. epit. Dio, p. 771.

Q Dio, p. 772.

t Aur. Vict. in Adrian. p. 2. Dio, p. 772. t p. 36. * Dio, ibid. " JULIAN. CÆSAR, p. 39. w PLIN. path.

owns, that he abandoned himself to the most infamous and unnatural practices 1 and agrees therein both with Spartiany, and the emperor Julian 2, who likewise a charges him with laziness for suffering Sura to write most of his letters 2. He loved gay amusements and diversions; but from hence arose no neglect or relaxation in his conducting public affairs. He was somewhat ambitious, and more desirous of extending the confines of the empire, than was confistent with justice. When he affirmed any thing for certain, he used to add; So may I see Dacia reduced to a province, and pass the Euphrates and the Danube on bridges built by myself'. He suffered his name to be placed on the buildings, which he had only repaired, as if they had been founded by him. Whence he was nick-named parietarius, which name is common to all plants growing on walls. How his lenity, mildness and good-nature so much cried up by all the ancients, were consistent with his persecut- b ing the christians, is what we cannot easily conceive. He suffered himself to be styled lord, as appears from Pliny's epistles to him; a title, which other good emperors, and Augustus himself, had constantly refused, and he seems at first to have declined d. He likewife allowed facrifices to be offered to his statues, and people to swear by his life and eternity, as most facred things. We shall now pursue

Trajan commanded, as we have related above, a powerful army in Lower Germany, when he was adopted by Nerva, and declared his successor, which happened

the history of his reign, according to the order of time.

about the latter end of the year 97. He declined at first accepting that high post, but was foon prevailed upon by the officers of his own army, and the deputies c dispatched to him from the armies in Upper Germany, and in Masia, to yield, and He accepts the assume the title of Casar. He did not seem in the least elated with his new dignity, title of Casar, chusing rather to be looked upon by his soldiers as their general, than their empeand the empire. ror f. Nerva dying foon after, that is, on the twenty-first or twenty-seventh of January of the following year, tidings of his death were first brought to him by Adrian his cousin: Hereupon Trajan, who was then at Cologn, immediately assumed the title of Augustus, and was acknowledged as such by the armies in Germany and Masia, who with great joy swore allegiance to him s. He had no sooner taken possession of the empire, than he wrote to the senate, assuring them upon his oath, that no man of probity should ever by his orders be either put to death, or injured d in his fortune h. He did not immediately leave Germany, but continued there all this and part of the following year; for the time of his consulship was expired, as Pliny informs us , before he fet out for Rome. All the German nations fent deputies to him, congratulating him upon his accession to the empire; and the barbarians, who dwelt beyond the Danube, and used, during the winter, to pass that river on the ice, and commit great devastations on the Roman territories, hearing that Tra-The barbarians jan was created emperor, refrained from all hostilities, not daring to provoke so great a commander, now at liberty to chastise them k. Tacitus the historian, in his book of the customs of the Germans, marks the years to the second consulate of awed by his presence.

The Bructeri-

Trajan; whence some have concluded, that the said book was composed this year, e Trajan being now conful the second time. He speaks there of the expulsion of the Brusterians by the Chamavians and Angrivarians, as a thing lately happened; and ans driven out adds, that the gods vouchfafed to gratify the Romans with the fight of a battle by other German nations. fought by the barbarians, in which, says our historian, there fell above fixty thoufand fouls, without a blow struck by us; and, what is a circumstance still more glorious, they fell to furnish us with a spectacle of joy and recreation. May the gods, concludes Tacitus, perpetuate amongst these nations, if not love for us, yet by all means hatred towards each other, since they cannot more signally befriend us, than by fowing divisions amongst our foes! The Brueterians, who were thus expulsed, and, as Tacitus writes, utterly extirpated, are thought to have inhabited f the country about Rees and Emmerik in the dutchy of Cleves m. However, the Bructerians were not utterly exterminated, as Tacitus seems to suppose; but being driven with great flaughter from their ancient habitations, they fettled in the present county of Nassau, where they gave the Romans no small trouble, as we shall relate in the sequel of this history. Pliny tells us, that Trajan caused a statue to be erected to Vestricius Spuriuna for having constrained the Brusterians, notwithstanding their

Y SPART, in Adrian.

Idem, l. xxvii.

Idem, l. x. epift. 53.

Julian, ibid. p. 12.

PLIN. panegyr. p. 4, & 106.

Dio, l. lxviii. p. 771. e Idem, l. xxvii. F Idem, l. x. epift. 53.

Buch. Belg. l. v. c. 1.

Idem, p. 38. b Ammian. I. xxiv. e PLIN. l. x. epist. 102, & 89. f PLIN. pan. 1 TACIT. i Pein. pan. k Idem ibid.

a fierceness and arrogance, to receive their king ", whom, it seems, they had driven out. But this must have happened before the battle and defeat mentioned by Tacitus.

THE next consuls were Aulus Cornelius Palma, and Caius Sosius Senecio, to whom Plutarch inscribed several of the lives he wrote, and some of his moral works. The fenate had offered the confulate to Trajan; but he declining it, tho' all the emperors, ever fince the time of Claudius, had assumed that dignity the year after their accession to the empire, Palma and Senecio, his two chief favourites, were appointed in his room. This year Trajan left Germany, and fet out for Rome: his march Trajan fees out proved no-ways burdensome to the provinces through which he passed, no man being for Rome. b injured either in his person or fortune by the emperor, or his numerous attendance, He caused the expences of his march, and that of Domitian when he went into Gaul, to be computed, and inferted in the public registers, that his successors might thence learn how to conduct themselves on the like occasion P. He entered Rome on foot, and was there received by persons of all ranks with the greatest demonstrations of How received joy imaginable, the people of Rome promising themselves complete happiness under there. fo good and so great a prince. He tenderly embraced his old friends, who came to meet him, and would not be treated by them as their sovereign, but as a friend, affuring them, that fuch they should find him on all occasions. He went strait to the capitol, attended by the senate and the whole city, and thence to the palace 4:

c His wife Pompeia Plotina, who accompanied him, turning to the people as the His wife Pome mounted the steps of the palace, I bope, said she, to come out the same as I go in: peia Plotina. and truly, during the whole time of her husband's reign, her conduct was without reproach; nay, she acquainted the emperor with several disorders, occasioned by his too great indulgence; and by that means put a stop to them. She is mightily cried up by Pliny on account of her modest behaviour, and extraordinary kindness to the emperor's fifter , by name Marciana, as appears from several ancient inscriptions. The senate offered to both the title of Augusta, which they declined so long as Trajan refused that of the father of his country, which he seems to have accepted towards the end of this year, the second of his reign. Plotina proved ald ways very favourable to Adrian; for by her means, and at her recommendation, he was adopted by Trajan . In an inscription of the year 116, which was the nineteenth of Trajan's reign, Marciana is styled goddess; whence it is evident, that the was then dead . From her the metropolis of Lower Mafia took the name of Marcianopolis. She had a daughter, named Matidies, mother to another Matidies, and to Julia Sabina, the wife of the emperor Adrian, Pliny observes, that Silius Italicus, who had withdrawn into Campania, did not quit his retirement to come to Rome, and congratulate the emperor upon his arrival; which, fays that writer, greatly redounded to the glory of both, of Trajan for granting him that liberty, of Silius for daring to demand it. The fenate decreed the emperor foon after his The sitle of arrival the title of Optimus, which he willingly accepted, and feemed to value above Optimus del all those which were afterwards conferred upon him on account of his victories y. emperor. However, we do not find it in any inscription amongst his other titles till the year 110. the thirteenth of his reign z. This year he paid part of the donative, which he had promised, according to custom, to the soldiery, and made large distributions both of money and corn amongst the Roman people, extending his generosity to such as were absent, and even to children, who had been hitherto excluded from any share in such largesses till eleven years old a. By means of these largesses, which His largesses. he frequently renewed, he is faid to have supported near two millions of souls b.

f He did not confine the effects of his good-nature to Rome alone, but appointed very confiderable fums to be paid yearly out of the exchequer for the maintenance of children, whom their indigent parents could not without great difficulty bring up and support. To this unbounded generosity allude, no doubt, several medals struck this or the following year, which represent Trajan distributing corn to children with the following legend, He nourishes Italy . He took great care that Rome should be

BIRAG. numism. p. 166.

BIRAG. p. 38, 39. * Dio, t Birag. numism. p. 166. * PLIN. l. iii. epist. 7. - SPART. in pan. p. 44. Birag. p. 149. SPART. p. 16. numilm. p. 202, 205. b Vide Spart. not. Cafanbon. p. 122. F Occonis

t

b

m

0

m

 $D_0$

ho

the

tog

D: Va] hor

bo!

ing

bat

200

 $t_{i'}^{i_{i}}$

27

D:.

Ċ.

ţ

e jes

Is an enemy to informers.

His modesty.

Binds himself

by a solemn

all the laws.

demned.

The trial of

Classicus.

supplied with plenty of provisions, especially with corn, which, during the whole a time of his reign, was fold at a very low rate: he exhibited feveral shews, and a combat of gladiators, to fatisfy the populace, fond of fuch diversions; but drove out of Rome the players, who had been banished by Domitian, but, at the request of the people, recalled by Nerva. He published several laws against informers, and confined to the island such of that tribe as had been spared by Nerva, utterly abolishing the so much hated law of majesty. He repaired, at a vast charge, several old buildings, and inlarged the circus; but would not suffer the people to return him thanks for his public works; nay, he issued an edict, forbidding his name to be mentioned either in the circus or the theatre, which, till then, had refounded, fays Pliny, with the praises of wicked princes. All these things are related by b Pliny as happening in the second year of Trajan's reign, before the time appointed for the electing of consuls. The people had, it seems, recovered their ancient privilege of creating magistrates; for Trajan, whom the senate had pressed to accept a third consulship, appeared amongst the other candidates, begging like a private citizen the suffrages of the tribes. He chose for his collegue Fronto, according to some; Frontinus, according to others; for both M. Julius Fronto, and Sextus Juhius Frontinus, who wrote a treatise on aqueducts, lived at this time. In the same affembly, Pliny, and Tertullus Cornutus, were appointed to succeed Trajan and Fronto or Frontinus, and others to succeed them; for at this time few consuls held that dignity above three months. In the beginning of the year, Trajan had no fooner c affumed the fasces, than he ascended the rostra, and, in the presence of the people, bound himself by a solemn oath to observe the laws, declaring, that what was forbidden to private citizens was equally forbidden to good princes, who, as they are oath to observe not above the laws, are no less bound than the meanest of the populace, to conform to them: hence to the public vows, which were in the beginning of each year offered for the health and prosperity of the emperor, he added these conditions; If be observes the laws; if he governs the republic as he ought; if he procures the happiness of bis people e. Before Trajan resigned the sasces, the cause of Marius Priscus, accused by a city of Africa, and by several particular persons, of extortion during his proconsulate, was heard by the emperor and senate. Pliny, and Tacitus the d Marius Priscus historian, pleaded for the Africans; and the trial lasted three days, the emperor hearkening the whole time with great attention to the reasons alledged on both sides, without ever betraying the least biass to either. In the end, Priscus was degraded from the rank of senator, and banished Italy: at the same time Hostilius Firminus, his lieutenant and accomplice, was declared incapable of holding any employment in the empire f. This is, no doubt, the Marius, who, in spite of the angry gods, enjoyed, as we read in Juvenal's, even in exile, the immense wealth which he had accumulated by the most wicked means; while Africa bewailed, without redress, the losses it had sustained by his avarice: hence the poet calls his condemnation an empty judgment. The condemnation of Marius Priscus was followed by that of Classic C cus, proconful of Batica, or rather of his accomplices; for Classicus, finding himself accused of extortion by the whole province, laid violent hands on himself before the time appointed for his trial. However, the province pursued their action against his accomplices, who had shared in his rapines, and they were, by means of Pliny, who pleaded in behalf of the province, all condemned. The estate, which Classicus possessed before he was sent into Spain, was adjudged to his daughter; but the rest was distributed amongst those whom he had plundered during his administration: Bæbius Probus and Fabius Hispanus, the ministers of his rapines, were banished for five years, tho' they alledged in their defence, that they were obliged blindly to obey the orders of the proconful. Stillonius Priscus, who had commanded a cohort f under Classicus, was banished Italy for two years: the daughter of Classicus was likewise accused by the province; but Pliny, judging her innocent, declined pleading against her; whence the profecution was dropped h. Norbanus Licinianus, who had been lieutenant to Classicus, but his declared enemy, was at the same time condemned for other crimes, not mentioned by historians, and confined to one of the islands in the Archipelago.

d PLIN. ibid. p. 120. e PLIN. ep. 9. g Juvenal. fat. 1. e Plin. pan. p. 74. & l. x. epist. 83. Dio in excerpt. Val. p. 709. d Plin ibid. p. 134. f Plin. l. x. epist. 4. l. ii. ep. 11. l. vi. ep. 29. l. iii. ep. 9. ver. 49. & fat. 10. ver. 120. h Plin. l. iii. epist. 4, & 9. i Idem, l e PLIN. 1 Idem, l. iii. epift. 9.

For what we have hitherto related of Trajan's administration, we are chiefly indebted to Pliny, from whose panegyric on that prince we have copied it. Pliny pro-Pliny pronouns nounced his speech in the senate when he entered upon his consulship, having composed ces his panegyit before at the request of the senators. After he had delivered it in full senate, he ric in the senate, he nate. added, as he himself informs us, many things to it, that it might serve as a model for other princes. Before he published it, he rehearsed it before some of his friends, who for three days together heard him with great attention; which he ascribes, not to the elegance or beauties of his performance, but to their being persuaded, that the praises which he bestowed on Trajan, were a sincere encomium on that prince, and altogether free from flattery. Pliny himself assures us, that such passages in his discourse as b were the least studied, pleased most; which gave him no small satisfaction: for thence he began to entertain hopes of feeing the true taste revive, and the masculine eloquence of the ancients again admired. He sent his discourse, which he styles a book, to one of his friends, begging him to mark what he disliked in it, that he might by that means be fure he approved of the rest k. About this time Largius Macedo, Largius Macedo who, for his extraordinary parts, had been raised from a very mean condition (for he do murdered was the fon of a freed-man) to the prætorian dignity, was inhumanly murdered by by his flaves. his slaves, whom, forgetful of his origin, he treated with the utmost severity. They fell upon him while he was bathing at one of his country-houses, and left him for dead; but he afterwards returned to himself, and lived a few days, during which he e had the satisfaction of seeing all those crucified, who had been any-ways concerned in the attempt 1. Towards the end of this year Julia Sabina, grand-daughter to Mar-Adrian marciana the emperor's fister, was married to Adrian, the son of Elius Adrian Afer, cousin ries Julia Sabito Trajan. This match, which in the end proved unhappy to both, was concluded na. by the empress Plotina, who had a particular kindness for Adrian, the emperor himfelf rather consenting to it, than approving it ". THE following year Trajan, at the earnest request of the senate, entered upon his fourth consulship, having for his collegue, according to some n, Sextus Articuleius Patus, according to others o, P. Orsitus. The same year Babius Macer, Capio Hispo, Valerius Paulinus, and Caius Cacilius Strabo, were honoured with the confular dignity P. d Adrian was this year quæstor, and charged with the care of the registers of the senate q; which employment he foon refigned, to attend the emperor in the war he undertook against the Dacians. Decebalus, king of the Dacians, obliged Domitian, as we have Trajan's first related in the foregoing volume, to purchase a peace with a large sum; which he en- war with the gaged to pay yearly to Decebalus. To this tribute Trajan would not submit, alledg- Dacians. ing, that he had not been conquered by Decebalus. Besides, the Dacians grew daily more formidable, and their king maintained a good understanding with Pacorus king of the Parthians, whom Decebalus had presented with one Callidromus, who had been made prisoner in Masia by Suzagues, one of his lieutenants, during the war with Domitian. The good understanding between these two powers gave Trajan no small jealousy. Whereupon the Dacians, having passed the Danube, and committed some hostilities in the Roman territories, he was glad of that pretence to make war upon them, and humble an enemy, whose power he began to fear. Having therefore drawn together a mighty army, he marched with incredible expedition to the banks of the Danube, passed that river without opposition, Decebalus not being apprised of his arrival, and entered Dacia, committing every-where dreadful devastations. Decebalus however was not in the least difmayed; he armed all the youth of the country, and boldly advanced to meet the Romans, pitching his camp at a small distance from their intrenchments. Trajan immediately drew out his men, in order to offer the enemy battle. As he advanced to the place where they lay, a large mushroom was found, and brought to him, with the following words in Latin cut upon it: Your allies, especially the Byrrhi, advise you to conclude a peace with the Dacians, and to retire. Trajan, despising that advice, continued advancing in order of battle, till he discovered Decebalus, at the head of a powerful army, coming full march to meet him. He then halted to encourage his men, which he did in a few words, and then ordered the trumpets to found the charge. All we know of this action is, that great numbers of The Dacians the enemy fell, and that the Romans gained the victory; which however cost them defeated. dear, the wounded on their fide being fo numerous, that they wanted linen to bind up their wounds; whereupon Trajan tore his own robes, to supply that want. Such Trajan's hu-D IDAT. in fast. wounded.

1 Idem ibid. epist. 14. k Idem, l. iii. epist. 13, 18. m Spart. in Adrian. ONUPH. in fast. P PLIN. l. iv. epift. 3. 12. 17. 9 SPART. in Adrian.

as fell in the battle he caused to be interred with great solemnity, and ordered an altar a of the Dacians sues for peace,

ed him upon hard terms.

who triumphed over the Dacians.

Licinius Sura

to be built on the spot, and sacrifices to be yearly offered in honour of the deceased. Trajan, pursuing the advantage of his victory, followed the enemy close; and without giving them time to levy new forces, harasted them without intermission to such a degree, that Decebalus, reduced almost to despair, sent some of the chief lords of his court with proposals of peace. Trajan appointed Licinius Sura, and Claudius Libianus, captain of the prætorian guards, to treat with them; but the deputies not agreeing, Trajan continued his ravages, advancing from one hill to another, not without great danger, till he arrived in the neighbourhood of Zermizegethusa, the metropolis of Dacia. On the other side, Maximus, one of the Roman generals, made himself master of several strong-holds, in one of which he took the sister of Decebalus prisoner, b and recovered a Roman standard, which had been lost when Fuscus was defeated and Decebalusking killed in the reign of Domitian. At length Decebalus, no longer able to withstand the Romans, and dreading the destruction of his capital, which would be attended with the loss of his whole kingdom, dispatched anew embassadors to Trajan, offering Whichis grant- to accept fuch conditions as he should think fit to impose. Accordingly Trajan granted him a peace upon the following terms: 1. That he should surrender the territories which he had unjustly taken from the neighbouring nations. 2. That he should deliver up his arms, his warlike engines, and the artificers who made them, with all the Roman deserters. 3. That, for the future, he should entertain no deserters, nor take into his service the natives of any country subject to Rome. 4. That he c should dismantle all his fortresses, castles and strong-holds. And, lastly, That he should have the same friends and soes with the people of Rome. With these articles Decebalus complied, tho' much against his will; and having sworn to observe them, he was introduced to Trajan, before whom he threw himself on the ground, acknowledging himself his vassal. Trajan commanded him to send deputies to the senate for the ratification of the peace; which he did accordingly. The war being thus ended, Trajan, having placed garifons in most of the cities of Dacia, returned to Rome; which he entered in triumph, either in the end of this, or the beginning of the follow-Trajan the first ing year, and took the surname of Dacicus, being the first Roman who had ever triumphed over that nation'. His triumph was followed by a combat of gladiators, d and the diversions of the stage, in which one Pylades gained the applause of the people. and the emperor's favour. Trajan had but two years before driven all the players out of Rome; but as he took great pleafure in such entertainments, he recalled them on this occasion, tho' he did not abandon himself to these amusements in such manner, as to neglect the dispatch of business; for he discharged with great care and application all the duties of a prince, was assiduous in the administration of justice, and affisted in person at all the causes of any importance, that were pleaded either in the senate or the forum . This year Julius Bassus, who had been accused under Trajan, and, after a long trial, declared innocent, was again accused of extortion by the Bithynians; for he had been by Nerva appointed proconful of Bithynia. Pliny, who pleaded e in his behalf, owns, that he failed rather through imprudence than avarice, in accepting some presents, which was, by some late laws, forbidden to all governors of provinces, under severe penalties. However, Pliny prevailed upon the senate, inclined to condemn him as guilty of extortion, to be satisfied with obliging him to restore the value of the prefents to those, of whom he had imprudently accepted them ".

The following year one Suranus, of whom we find no farther mention in history, and L. Licinius Sura, or, as some style him, Suras, were chosen consuls. Sura was chieffavourire. Trajan's chief favourite, and had employed all his interest with Nerva in his behalf; whence to him chiefly, after Nerva, Trajan acknowledged himself indebted for his adoption and preferment w. He was, as Gruter conjectures from several ancient f inscriptions x, a native of Spain, born either in Tarragon or Barcelona, extremely rich, and thence envied by many even of Trajan's friends, who, by false insinuations, strove to estrange the prince's mind from him, as if he harboured evil designs. But Trajan, who reposed an intire confidence in him, instead of hearkening to his enemies, went one night to sup with him, without being invited; and dismissing his guards. ordered Sura's surgeon to apply a remedy to his eyes; trusted himself to his barber. who shaved him; then bathed, and supped with Sura, without ever betraying the

DIO, p. 710. SPART. in Adrian. GOLTZ. p. 646. EUSEB. in " PLIN. L iv. epist. 9, 1. vi. epist. 29. & l. x. epist. 14. chron. p. 341.
w Vict. in epit. * GRUTER. P. 249.

a least diffidence or fear. The next morning, he told those about him, who were always suggesting something against Sura, It he entertained any evil designs against me, he would have put them in execution last night y. Sura was still alive in the year 109, the twelfth of Trajan's reign, when Adrian, whom he had always favoured, was consul; but died soon after, having assured Adrian before he died, that Trajan would in the end adopt him 2. Trajan caused his funerals to be performed with the utmost magnificence, erected a statue to him, and called certain splendid baths, which he built, after his name. This year Trajan, at the request of the senate, and at the motion of Nigrinus, tribune of the people, published an edict, subjecting such pleaders as received fees from their clients, to the penalties of the law against extor-Pleaders forb tion; and Licinius Nepos prætor, upon his taking possession of that office, procured a bidden to redecree from the senate, commanding the parties, before their cause began to be tried, to swear, that they had neither given nor promised any see, present or reward to those who were to plead in their behalf. Pliny takes notice of this law, and deelares, that he was pleased to see that forbidden to others, which he had never practised himself . Towards the end of the year Trajan assumed twice the title of emperor b, for victories which were gained by some of his lieutenants, (for he himself continued the whole year at Rome) but are not mentioned by any historian.

THE next confuls were Trajan the fifth time; and Lucius Appius Maximus, who had fignalized himself in the Dacian war. This year Trajan began, and finished two years c after, a magnificent and convenient harbour at Centumcella, now Civita Vecchia; The port of which he called after his own name, the barbour of Trajan. It is mentioned by Ptolemy, and described by Rutilius in his poem d. Pliny was this year sent to govern Pliny appointed Pontus and Bithynia, not in quality of proconsul, as others had been, but of lieute- Pontus and nant and proprætor, with confular authority; that is, he was not appointed gover-Bithynia. nor of that province by the fenate, but by the emperor, tho' the province of Pontus and Bitbynia belonged to the fenate. As there were many abuses in that province to reform, the emperor fent Pliny thither with an extraordinary authority as his lieutenant; but afterwards allowed the senate to appoint the governors as formerly, Adrian being the first who took the province of Pontus and Bitbynia from the fenate, and gave d them Pamphylia in the room of it. Pliny was particularly commissioned to examine the revenues and expences of the cities within his jurisdiction, and to retrench all unnecessary charges 1, but the emperor would not impower him to recal such as had been banished by other governors 8, nor even those whom he himself should think fit to banish b. Pliny wrote an account of his journey to the emperor, whence it appears, that he arrived in Bithynia on the seventeenth of September, and Servilius Pudens his lieutenant on the twenty-fourth of November i.

THE following year L. Licinius Sura and M. Marcellus being confuls, Sauromates, king of Bostorus, sent a solemn embassy to Trajan, and entered into an alliance with him and the Roman people k. Soon after, Decebalus king of the Dacians, not Decebalus vioe able to live in subjection and servitude, (for so he called the peace which Trajan had lates the artigranted him) began, contrary to the late treaty, to raise men, provide arms, enter-cles of the treattain deferters, fortify his castles, and invite the neighbouring nations to join him against the Romans as a common enemy. The Seythians hearkened to his solicitations; but the lazyges refusing to bear arms against Rome, he invaded their country, and seized that part of it which bordered on the Danube. Hereupon Decebalus was by the senate declared an enemy; and Trajan, not caring to commit the management of the war to another, marched against him in person. Decebalus, not finding himself in a condition to withstand him by open force, had recourse to deceit and Histreachery. treachery, sending assassins, under the name of deserters, to murder him; but one f of these being apprehended upon suspicion, and put to the torture, discovered the whole plot, and named his accomplices, who were immediately feized, and executed. Decebalus, failing in this attempt, invited Longinus, one of Trajan's favourites and chief commanders, to a conference, as if he deligned to put an end to the war, by fubmitting to the articles of the former treaty, with some small alteration. Longinus, not suspecting any treachery, complied with the invitation. But Decebalus immediately seized him; and after having attempted in vain to make him discover the designs

PEIN. 1. v. epist. 14. GOLTZ. P. CALLELL. P. 132. C Dio, in excerpt. Valesii.

Trajan builds

a bridge over the Danube.

of the emperor, he wrote to Trajan, offering to fet Longinus at liberty, upon condi- a tion that he would grant him an honourable peace, reffore the country bordering on the Danube, and detray all the charges of the war; adding, that if these conditions were not complied with, he would instantly put Longinus to death. Trajun returned him a judicious answer, neither seeming to undervalue the life of his favourite, nor yet make such account of it, as to purchase it at too high a rate. But while Decebalus was deliberating with himself, and in suspense about the measures he should pursue, Longinus, by a dose of poison, which was privately conveyed to him by a freed-man, put an end to his life. Decebalus immediately dispatched to Trajan a centurion taken with Longinus, offering him the body of the deceased general, with ten captives, provided he would deliver up the freed-man, whom Longinus had fent, before he took the b poison, to the emperor, under colour of negotiating a treaty; but Trajan would neither hearken to the proposal, nor even suffer the centurion to return. In the mean time Trajan, that his troops might with more ease pass the Danube, built a bridge over that spacious river, which, by the ancients, is styled the most magnificent and wonderful of all his works, and the most stately fabric of that nature in the universe. It was all of square-stone, and contained twenty arches, each of them one hundred and fifty feet above the foundation, and fixty feet in breadth, all distant from each other one hundred and seventy feet. It was built where the river was narrowest, and confequently where the stream was strongest and most rapid; which renders the fabric still more stupendous and amazing, on account of the almost unsurmountable c difficulties they must have met with in laying so large a soundation. The architect employed on this occasion was one Apollodorus of Damascus, who, it seems, left a description of this great work m. Trajan ordered two castles to be built to guard the bridge, one on the Roman, the other on the Dacian fide of the river. Pliny mentions this bridge in the short account he gives us of the Dacian war "; and several medals representing it have reached our times o. It was built in the Upper Masia, which, in the time of Aurelian, began to be called Dacia P. We are told, that some remains of it are still to be seen near Zeverin in Lower Hungary 9. Trajan built it, that the Roman forces might with ease and readiness pass the Danube, and fall upon the barbarians in their own country; but Adrian, fearing the barbarians might make use of d it to invade the Roman territories, broke down the arches; but the piers were still standing in Dion Cassius's time; that is, one hundred and twenty years after, tho they ferved then only to shew, says that writer, the utmost extent of human power. When they were by time intirely demolished, the river was so choaked with the ruins, that it was not navigable till turned into another chanel s. This stupendous fabric was begun and ended this fummer; but Trajan, not thinking it adviseable to enter Dacia upon the approach of winter, contented himself with making the necessary preparations for vigorously attacking the enemy early in the spring.

Dacians.

to great dangers.

In the mean time the following consuls were chosen at Rome, Tiberius Julius Candidus, and Aulus Julius Quadratus, both the second time. This year, the eighth of e Trajan's reign, a dreadful earthquake overturned in Asia the cities of Elea, Myrine, Pitame and Cuma; and in Greece the cities of Opus and Oritat. Adrian discharged for some time the office of tribune of the people, and then went to attend Trajan in the Trajan mar- war against the Dacians. The emperor early in the spring passed the Danube on the this against the bridge he had built, and entering the enemy's country, pursued the war with more prudence than expedition, not caring to expose his men to unnecessary dangers . He often incamped, fays Pliny w, on steep and barren mountains; was obliged to Exposes himself nor well accorded mould from the and perform things, which, were they not well attested, would seem altogether fabulous. He gave many signal instances of his personal courage, and the soldiers, animated by his example, chearfully underwent all the hardships of a laborious warfare *. Among the rest, one of his horsemen being wounded in an engagement, and carried to the camp to have his wound dreffed, when he there understood, that his life was despaired of, and the wound incurable, he returned to the combat before his spirits failed him, performed great feats, and expired fighting with incredible bravery!. Several inferiptions are still to be met with, mentioning persons whom Trajan rewarded on account of their gallant conduct in the war with fe

1, cit e no:  $T_{I}$ fro

he:

the

req

C.J. i)ę

H-

I. IL.

the 100

.J0;

 $V_{i,n}^{*}$

Ľ.

n PLIN. l. viii. c. 4. Occo, p. m Procop. de ædificiis Justin. l. iv. c. 6. 1 Dio, l. lxviii. p. 776. co, p. 204. BARON. annal. ad ann. 105. FABRETTI de colum. Trajan. c. 301. 204. Dro, ibid. Procop. ibid. Euseb. chron. Dro, ibid. epift. 9. Dro, p. 776. Idem, p. 777. w Plin. I. viii.

a with the Dacians 1. In this war Adrian commanded a legion, and, in the many battles that were fought, distinguished himself in a very eminent manner; whence the emperor, highly pleafed with his gallant behaviour, prefented him with the diamond, which Nerva had fent him, as we have related above, when he adopted and named him his fuccesfor. This present Adrian looked upon as a pledge of his future adoption a. Some infcriptions have reached our times, in which Dacia is faid to have been added to the empire by the courage and valour of Adrian b. At length Make: himself Trajan made himself matter of the capital of Dacia, and almost of the whole master of the capital of Dacountry; infomuch that Decebalus, feeing himself stripped of his dominions, and cia, which is dreading to fall into the hands of the conqueror, chose rather to put an end to his reduced to a b life, than to live in subjection, or acknowledge himself overcome. His head was im-Roman promediately brought to Trajan, and by himsent to Rome. He had concealed his treafures in a deep pit, which he caused to be dug in the bed of the river Sargetia, now Istrig, having for that purpose turned the stream into another chanel, and asterwards brought it to its former course. As for his rich moveables, he secured them in deep caves, which he caused to be dug by captives, whom he immediately after put to death, that they might not discover the fecret; but Bacilis, one of his chief favourites and confidents, being taken in this war, discovered the whole to Trajan, who feized both the treasure and precious moveables of the deceased prince . We are told, that notwithstanding this discovery, great riches were found in those places c many ages after, which had escaped Trajan a. The famous column of Trajan, of which we shall speak anon, is thought to have been raised for a lasting monument of the victories gained by that prince over the Dacians and their king; at least, many of the remarkable events of this war are expressed, as Ciacconius and Fabretti inform us, in the baffo-relievo of that pillar. Dacia being thus intirely subdued, Trajan reduced it to a Roman province, which was, according to Eutropius, a thousand miles in compass. The Romans held it, as Festus Rusus informs use, to the reign of the emperor Gallienus; during which time it was governed by a Roman magistrate, with the title of proprætor, as appears from some ancient inscriptions . Trajan built seve- Many colonies ral castles in the country, and placed garisons in them, to keep the inhabitants in cia. d awe. He likewise planted a great number of colonies, distributing lands among the poor citizens of Rome, and of the other towns of Italy, who were willing to settle in Dacia. The Hungarian writers mention several cities in their country, which were on this occasion built or peopled by the Romans; but the most celebrated of all was Zermizegethusa, which, in several ancient inscriptions, is styled Colonia Ulpia Trajana Augusta Dacia Sarmiz. It was established by M. Scaurianus proprætor of Dacia, and continued subject to the Romans at least to the death of the emperor Severus. At prefent it is but a poor village in Transylvania, known by the name of Gradisch k. In Masia and Thrace several cities borrowed their names from Trajan; for we find the city of Trajanopolis in Thrace mentioned by the ancients; that of Ulpia in Upper Massia, e now Servia; the cities of Plotinopolis, which, no doubt, was so called from Plotina, Trajan's wife, and Marcianopolis, the capital of Lower Masia, which took its name from Marciana, the emperor's fifter, and was, according to Jornandes, built by Trajan. The same writer adds, that upon the banks of the river later, or latrus, he founded another city, which he called Nicopolis, or the city of victory, to perpetuate the memory of his victories over the Sarmatians, or rather Dacians; for Jornandes frequently confounds these two nations ". This city is by Ammianus Marcellinus called fometimes Nicopolis, fometimes Ulpia, and placed, not on the latrus, but on the Neffus or Neftus; and truly, from several inscriptions produced by the learned Holstenius", it appears to have stood near the conflux of the Nestus and the Danube. f We must not confound, as some writers have done, Nicopolis in Dacia with another of the same name upon mount Hamus in Thrace. Trajan, upon his return to Rome, Trajan's second triumphed over the Dacians a second time; caused several medals to be coined in me-triumph over mory of his victories, many of which are still to be seen o, entertained the people the Dacians. with public banquets, with shews, in which ten thousand gladiators entered the lists; with combats of wild beafts, of which above ten thousand were killed, and all kinds

Spart, in Adrian. Dio, I. lxix. p. 787. FAB.

Idem ibid. FEUTROP, p. 236. Ruf.
BAUDR. p. 348. FABR. colum. Trajan. c. 8. p. 238, 241. 18, 241.

d FAB. ibid.

ldem ibid.

ldem, p. 63.

Dio, l. lxviii. p. 1040.

k
ldem ibid. c. 18.

n Holst. ad Steph. p. 225. ibid. p. 242. 6 Dio, 1014.

h Gruter, p. 354.

1 Lieni, p.
1 L Dio, ibid. JORN. de reb. Goth. c. 16.

b

ŝ

Ŀ

0 1

0 fi:

ſο

ÿ

p

f(t)

tri

25

W

20.

Fre

die

him

to:

DOL

cf ?

plac

100 0; (

t<sub>ug</sub>

3,1

1.

17 ě,

€ 17:

of diversions, which lasted one hundred and twenty-three days P. Canius, at the a request of Pliny, described this war in verse q; and Trajan himself is said to have written an account of it in several books. This war broke out in the beginning of the preceding year, but was not ended till the latter end of this; for we are told, that he took for the fifth time the title of imperator about the latter end of the ninth year of Arabia Petrza his tribunitial power, which was the eighth of his reign. The same year is remarkable for the intire reduction of Arabia Petraa by Aulus Cornelius Palma, governor of Syria, after it had been long governed by its own kings. The inhabitants of Petra and Bostra reckon their time from this year, in which their country was first annexed to the Roman empire v. Trajan reduced, together with the Dacians, several nations in alliance with them; so that the same of his conquests reaching the most distant b countries, and even India, embassadors were sent from thence to congratulate him upon the success which had attended his arms w. THE next confuls were Cerealis and L. Ceionius Commodus Verus, the father of L. Ælius Verus, as is commonly supposed, who was by Adrian created Casar. During their administration, the capitoline sports, established by Domitian, were exhibited the fixth time, when the prize in poetry was won by a child thirteen years old, named L. Valerius Pudens Y. This year Trajan made, at a vast charge, a road through the Palus Pontina, or Pontine Marshes, whereof the remains are still to be seen 2; and this, no doubt, is the Via Trajana, or Trajan's Highway, mentioned in several ancient inscriptions produced by Occo and Gruter b. Dion Cassius adds, that he ordered all c the diminished coin to be melted down, and mentions several magnificent buildings, with which he embellished Rome: but of these we shall speak hereaster; for Trajan must have only begun them this year, since he left Rome in the month of Ostober, and A conspiracy a- was at Antiocb in the very beginning of the ensuing year c. However, before he set sainst Trajan. Out for the east, a conspiracy was formed against him by Crassus, and several other His moderation persons of the first quality; but seasonably discovered. The conspirators were tried, on that occasion not by him, (for he declined being judge, and at the same time a party) but by the fenate, who, it feems, condemned them to banishment; for, upon the emperor's death, one Crassus Frugi endeavoured to make his escape from an island, to which he is said to have been confined for aspiring at the empire; but was killed by one of Adrian's d officers, without the emperor's knowledge, as if he had attempted his escape with a design to raise new disturbances d. The true motive of Trajan's journey into the east, Designs to make war upen the Parthians.

the east.

was a defire of glory, as Dion Cassius informs us e, which he hoped to reap from a war with the Parthians, who, we may say, rivalled the Romans themselves in power, and had given them several great overthrows. The pretence he alledged for quarrelling with that nation, was, that the king of Armenia, by name Exedures, had received his crown at the hands of the king of Parthia; whereas the Roman emperors claimed a right of disposing of that crown ever since the reign of Nero, who, in the year fixty-fix, the twelfth of his empire, had crowned at Rome Tiridates king of Armenia. What happened after that time in Armenia, we find no-where recorded; c we only know, that Tiridates was still on the throne in seventy-two, the third of Vespasian's reign. As for the affairs of the Parthians, Vologeses, brother to Tiridates, was in the year eighty succeeded by Artabanes, and he by Pacorus the friend of Decebalus f, who reigned while Pliny governed Bithynia 8. Pacorus was father to Parthamasiris, and probably to Costhoes, who reigned at this time in Parthia b. Aurelius Victor calls him Cosdroes, and Dion Cassius, Hosroes. Trajan, who wanted only a pretence to make war upon the Parthians, pretended to be highly affronted at the Parthian king's giving the crown and royal enfigns to Exedures, and demanded satisfaction, threatening him with war, if he refused to comply with his just demands. Costoboes And sets out for despised his menaces; whereupon Trajan, who had already made the necessary preparations for this expedition, immediately left Rome, and crossed over into Greece. When Cosrboes found he was in earnest, he began to abate of his pride, and sent deputies to him with rich presents, begging that he would not, upon such sight motives, engage the two empires in a bloody and destructive war; at the same time he acquainted him, that Exedures, finding himself neither acceptable to the Romans nor

P Dio, ibid, p. 777. PLIN. l. viii. ep. 14. P Voss. hist. Lat. c. 30. Vide Noris. epist. consu'. p. 47, 48. Dio, l. lxviii. p. 777. Euseb. in chron. p. 206. W Dio, ibid. Noris. epist. Idat. in fast. Spart. in Ælii vit. Y Onuph. in fast. p. 216. Dio, ibid. Occo, p. 209. Grut. p. 199. Grat. acta, p. 2, 3. Usser. notæ, p. 35. Dio, ibid. p. 778. Idem ibid. Zonar. in vit. Tit. Plin. l. x. epist. 8. Dio, p. 779.

a to the Parthians, had abdicated the crown, and befought Trajan to dispose of it in favour of Parthamasiris. The embassadors met Trajan at Athens, and there deli- Embassadors vered their message; to which the emperor replied, that friendship was shewn by sent to him by actions, and not by words; that he was going into Syria, and that there he should the king of the take such resolutions as he should think proper. He then dismissed the embassadors, without deigning to accept any of their presents. He then pursued his journey through Afia Minor, Cilicia, and the other provinces, to Seleucia in Syria, and from thence to Antioch, the capital of that province, which he entered crowned with a Arrives at branch of an olive-tree on a Thursday, which, that year and the following, happened, Antioch.

and never more during his reign, to be the seventh of January k.

THE following year's confuls were Lucius Licinius Sura the third time, and Caius Sosius Senecio the second, who refigned the fasces to Suranus and Servianus!, in whose confulfhip Adrian was prætor, and exhibited most magnificent shews ; for he did not attend Trajan into the east. When the time of his prætorship expired, he was Adrian comfent to command the armies in Lower Pannonia, where he maintained with great mands in Lowfeverity the military discipline, and kept in awe the Sarmatians, whom Eusebius and er Pannonia. St. Jerom count among the nations subdued by Trajan v. Servianus, who was conful with Suranus, is called in feveral ancient inscriptions Julius Servilius Ursus Servianus, the same, no doubt, who married Paulina, sister to Adrian, and the emperor's cousin o. Pliny wrote some letters to him as an intimate friend, and by his means obtained seve-

c ral favours of the emperor P. When he speaks of him to others, he calls him a person of great accomplishments a. He was governor of Upper Germany in the year 98, the first of Trajan's reign, and from thence was sent into Pannonia r. Trajan entertained a mighty opinion of his talents, and used to say, that among the great men who might aspire at the empire, he was the most capable of discharging that high trust with reputation. He was no friend to Adrian, and is supposed to have opposed his adoption; for that prince, a little before he died, in the year 138, ordered Servianus, then ninety years old, to be put to death, that he might not furvive him, tho' he had, during the whole course of his reign, treated him in a very friendly manner, and preserred him to the first employments. He is often called by the Greek writers Severianus

d instead of Servianus: But to return to Trajan: he made his entry into Antioch on the seventh of January, as we have related above. During his stay in that city, Abgarus, or, as some call him, Augarus, prince of Edessa in Mesos otamia, sent him Abgarus king presents, and, by his embassadors, declared his sincere desire of living in friendship of Edess, and with him and the people of Rome; but as he equally seared the Romans and Parthians, other princes, send presents to and was defirous to please both, he declined waiting upon him in person. The other Trajan. petty princes in that neighbourhood came personally to offer their service to the emperor of Rome, and brought with them, according to the custom of the eastern countries, rich presents. One among the rest presented him with a stately courser, who, as he was brought before the emperor, kneeled down, bowed his head to the ground, e and adored him, as he had been taught before-hand. Trajan received all the princes who came to attend him, with great demonstrations of kindness, accepted their presents, and pretended to repose an intire confidence in them. Having made the necessary preparations for his intended expedition, he left Antioch, bending his march towards Armenia, when Parthamasiris, who had wrote to him before, and in his letter styled The king of Arhimself king of Armenia, sent him a second letter, (for Trajan had returned no answer menia writes to the first) wherein he omitted the title of king, and desired, that M. Junius, gover-who seizes senor of Cappadocia, might be appointed to treat with him. Trajan fent only the fon veral places in of Junius, and in the mean time pursued his march, making himself master of several that kingdom. places, without meeting with the least resistance. At Sata, or rather Satala, a city f in Armenia Minor, the emperor was met by Anquialus king of the Heniochi, a people of Circassia on the Euxine sea, and of the Mabeloni, of whom we find no further mention in history. Trajan received him with all possible demonstrations of kindness, and made him rich presents, in order to attach him to his interest. Upon his arrival at Elegia in the Greater Armenia, Parthamasiris came to wait upon him, and beg of The king of Arhim the crown of Armenia. Trajan received him feated upon a throne or tribunal, and menia waits attended by the chief officers of his army. As Parthamasiris approached the throne, uson him in ferson.

* Usser, not, in act. Ignat. p. 35. Lond. ann. 1647.

Spart. in Adrian.

Hier. in chron.

Spart. in Adrian. p. 1, 2.

Idem, l. viii. epift. 23.

Spart. in Adrian. p. 1.

Idem 1 Idem, p. 778. m Spart, in Adrian.

1 Hier, in chron, 27.

2 Idem, L viii. epift. 23.

7 Vide Spart, cum not. Cafiubon. ONUPH. in fast. P PLIN. I. iii. epift. 26, 27. ibid. & Dio, I. lxix. p. 795. Vol. VI. No 1. he

Cha

1 ha

bu

W

in

Ó!

w

рз

t'l

m £n:

ac. b out

> #C th:

ob

is :

N

hi

C.T

c thi

no

137

d:ft

file!

11/1

hif

05

CO

th

n

Ċ

th.

left

ferv

him

by n

Rem

this

the !

In th

him

of P

Min

from:

Prefer

देशका है

! effects Mi Sta

152:5

±± :0

ويزو

tri.

ķ;

) p,

2.4

C. 1

e grad

d ev

Trajan refuses him the crown of Armenia.

he took off his crown, and laid it at the emperor's feet, without uttering a fingle a word, not doubting but he would immediately return it to him. In the mean time the foldiers, pleased to see the king of Armenia, tho' supported by the whole power of the Parthian empire, obliged to submit, and resign his crown to their general, congratulated him upon it with loud shouts of joy; which so terrified Parthamasiris, that he attempted to withdraw, and return to his metropolis; but finding himfelf furrounded on all sides, he desired to speak to Trajan in private. Hereupon he was carried into the emperor's tent; but Trajan not liking his propofals, and refuling to comply with them, he left the tent in a great passion, and endeavoured to make his escape out of the camp. But Trajan having ordered him to be stopped, and brought back, ascended his tribunal anew, and desired the prince to repeat in the hearing of b all, the proposals he had made to him in private, and his answers, that persons who were ignorant of what had paffed between them, might not give false accounts of it, and missepresent it to the world. Upon this Parthamasiris, no longer able to contain himself, told Trajan, that he had neither been conquered, nor taken prisoner; that he came thither voluntarily, believing no injury would have been offered him, and that he should réceive his kingdom of Trajan, as Tiridates had done of Nero. Trajan replied, that Armenia belonged to the Romans, and that it should receive a Roman governor, and be no longer a kingdom; that as for Parthamasiris, he gave him liberty to retire whither he pleased. Accordingly he dismissed him, and the Parthians who came with him, and appointed them a guard, that they might not be infulted c by the foldiery, or raise disturbances; the Armenians he detained, as subjects of the Roman empire, and ordered them to return to their respective dwellings. Parthamasiris endeavoured to maintain himself in his kingdom by force of arms; but lost his life in the attempt, so that Trajan made himself master of Armenia, which he reduced duced to a Ro- to a Roman province. As to the other particulars of this war, we find them no-Several kings where recorded. Upon the reduction of Armenia, several princes submitted of their submit to Tra- own accord to Trajan, amongst whom are mentioned the kings of Iberia, Sarmatia, Bosporus, and Colchis w. He named a king to rule over the Albanians, and appointed one Julianus prince of the Apfiles, whose country bordered on the Euxine sea, having for its metropolis the city of Dioscuris, afterwards called Sebastopolis. Arrian, who d wrote under Adrian, speaks of a camp in the neighbourhood of this city, which he calls the boundary of the Roman empire x. The Romans had, before Trajan's time, a garison in Melitene or Melitine, a castle of Lesser Armenia, which Trajan made a city, and appointed to be the metropolis of the whole country; whence in process of time it became one of the most populous and wealthy cities in the east v. The emperor, having left garifons in all the strong-holds of Armenia, advanced to the city of Edeffa in Mejopotamia, where he was received in a very friendly manner by Abgarus king of that diffrict. Abgarus had before fent him feveral prefents; but put off, under various pretences, waiting upon him in person. However Trajan, by the mediation of Abgarus's fon, by name Arbandes, a very comely youth, received his excuses, and e admitted him to his friendship. Abgarus made a great entertainment for the emperor, and the chief officers of his army, at which Arbandes, who was perhaps too much beloved by Trajan, diverted him with dancing after the manner of his country z. Manes, the chief of one of the Arabian nations, Sporaces, prince of Anthemusia, a province of Mesopotamia, Mebarsapes, king of Adiabene, and Manisares, king of some district in that neighbourhood, declared, that they were ready to join Trajan; but in the mean time delayed meeting him, to that the emperor began to distrust them, especially after the treachery of Mebarsapes; who having demanded and obtained a body of troops to protect his dominions, as he pretended, against the Parthians, put most of them to the sword, and kept the rest in captivity. Amongst the latter was a centurion, f named Sentius, who, as Trajan, highly provoked at this treachery, approached a place of great strength, called Ademystres, where he was kept, found means to break his chains, and, with the affistance of his fellow captives, killed the governor of the fort, and opened the gates to the Romans. Trajan, now master of so strong and important a place, advanced boldly into Mesopotamia, and reduced great part of it by the bare fame of his name. As the greatest part of Adiabene lay beyond the Tigris,

Enters Mclopotamia.

The treachery of the king of Adiabene.

Trajan builds a bridge over the Tigris.

Trajan built a bridge over that river, which is represented on several medals that

&lt;sup>4</sup> Dio,l. lxviii. p. 779. Arrian. in perip. pont. Euxin. p. 7. Eutrop. in vit. Trajan. id. * Arrian. ibid. * Procop. de ædific. Justin. l. iii. c. 4. * Dio, ibid. p. * Dio, ibid. p. 780. ibid. a Idem. p. 781.

a have reached our times b. The cities of Nisibe and Batue made a vigorous desence; but in the end were obliged to yield. If the city of Nisibe belonged, as Josephus writes, to the king of Adiabene, it was at this time, as is manifest from Dion Califus ", in the hands of the Parthians. As for Cofrhoes, we know not what measures he took, or what attempts he made to stop the progress of Trajan's conquests. In Dion Cassius we read, that Manifares offered to yield to the Romans for ever all Armenia, and that part of Melopotamia, which they had already conquered. Whence we conjecture, that the name of Manifares has crept into the text initead of Cofrhoes, who alone could make fuch an offer, and between whom and Trajan a treaty was, it seems, concluded, Atreaty befince Aurelius Victor Writes, that the emperor obliged him to deliver hostages. What treem Trajan and the king of treaty this was, or on what occasion, or by whom it was violated, (for the war broke the Parthians. b out anew) we are no-where told. To this treaty perhaps allude the medals, which were struck about this time, with the following legend, Peace established; the king of the Parthians restored ". The power of the Parthians was, as Dion Cassius informs us greatly weakened at this time by their intestine wars; so that Costboes was perhaps obliged to recur to Trajan, and implore his protection against his own subjects. This is all we know of Trajan's wars in the east, till the year 115, the eighteenth of his reign. We should be able to give a better account of all these transactions, if the Parthian history, composed by Arrian, who flourished at this time, on purpose to fet forth the exploits of Trajan, and by him divided into seventeen books, had reached us P; but c that history being long since lost, and many other histories of these times, (for under no prince there flourished a greater number of celebrated historians than under Trajan) we are with no prince's exploits less acquainted than with Trajan's. Not to mention the many historians who have described the Parthian war, in which Trajan distinguished himself in a very eminent manner, both as a soldier and a general, Marius Maximus, Fabius Marcellinus, Aurelius Verus, Statius Valens, Ammianus Marcellimus, and Dion Cassius, wrote his life, either by itself, or in the body of the Roman history. But none of the works of these authors are now remaining; so that we are obliged to recur to the abridgment of Dion Cassius by Xipbilin, and to the still more compendious and undigested writings of Aurelius Victor and Eutropius. We cannot d even learn of any writer, whether Trajan ever returned to Rome after he set out from thence to conquer Armenia. However, we cannot persuade ourselves that he continued in the east, without once visiting the metropolis of the empire, for the space of eleven or twelve years; the more, because from some medals it appears pretty plain, that he returned to Rome before the year 112, the fifteenth of his reign, and that he left it the same or the following year 4; which gives a great light to history, and may ferve to justify the acts of the glorious martyr St. Ignatius. Lusius Quietus distinguished Lusius Quietus himself above all the commanders employed by Trajan in this war. He was a Moor distinguishes by nation, and born in a country not subject to Rome; but nevertheless served in the himself in this and Trajan's Roman cavalry, till he was either by Domitian or Nerva for some misdemeanour de-other wars. e graded and difmiffed. Trajan, wanting Moors in his wars with the Dacians, took this prince again into the fervice, with a body of his countrymen and dependents, at the head of whom he performed wonders, both in the first and second Dacian war. In the Parthian war he ferved with fuch courage and fuccess, that Trajan honoured him with the confulate, and, towards the end of his reign, appointed him governor of Palestine, by way of reward for a signal victory which he gained over the Jews of Mesopotamia. His reducing the Mardi, a people of Asia near Armenia, and not far from the Caspian sea, is mentioned as what most of all contributed to his glory and preferment . Ammianus Marcellinus extols him as one of the greatest captains that ever bore arms for the Romans ". We are told, that Trajan had such a kindness and esteem for him, that he had some thoughts of naming him for his successor, tho' he was not even born a subject of the empire w. We shall have occasion to mention him again in the following reign. In the fix following years we find nothing recorded by the compilers of the ancients, (for the works of the ancients themselves have been longfince loft, as we hinted above) except the names of the confuls, the making of the high-way by Trajan from Beneventum to Brundusium; the burning of the pantheon by lightning; the overturning of some cities in Galatia by an earthquake; and dedi-

<sup>1</sup> Occo. p. 205. Birag. p. 157.

Dio, ibid. Vide Occon. p. 201.

Dio, p. 783.

Phot. c. 58. 9 Vide Birag. p. 158. PDio, in excerpt. Valef. p. 710. l. lxviii. p. 773. Spart. in Aur. Themist. orat. xvi. Mauric. tactic. l. ix. c. 2. Dio in excerpt. p. 710. Euseb. l. iv. c. 1. Euseb. ibid. Ammian. l. xxix. WEUSEB. & Themist. ibid.

1 13

₩. 10

W.:

¢Π  $P_{J}$

W. ſτ

hi

b P.

hc

thi

910 ш

3.

12

to ā1,

 $T_{i}$

10

m.

tor

thai

in l

d sca

 $R_0$

Ced

the

01

Cr.

los luch

huc

c Would dars

Confu

mod

I went

throu

Was 1

the hi

dillin

that ( f being

01 1 1

lbc 🐺

is :e:

017 turi...q

۲.

c th

cating of the great square at Rome, which took its name from Trajan. The consuls a (for of these magistrates we have never yet omitted the names) were Aps ins Annius Trebonianus Gallus, and Marcus Attilius Metellus Bradua; Aulus Cornelius Palma, the second time, and L. Tullus; Priscinus, or Priscianus, and Orfitus; Caius Calpurnius Piso, and M. Vettius Bolanus; Trajan, the fixth time, and Titus Sextius Bolanus; Lucius Publius Celsus, the second time, and Caius Clodius Crispinus; Quintus Ninnius Hosta, and Publius Manilius Vopiscus. These were consuls from the eleventh to the seventeenth year of Trajan's reign inclusively; that is, from the 108th to the 114th of the christian æra. On some medals, that were coined during Trajan's sixth consulship, Train returns is marked the departure of that prince from Rome *, no doubt, to return to the east: which we may suppose to have happened the year he was conful, the fifteenth b to the eaft.

of his reign; for in that year Adrian, who commanded under him in the second Partbian war, was created archon, or chief magistrate of Athens; which honour was probably conferred upon him, as he passed through that city with Trajany. THE eighteenth year of Trajan's reign, and 115th of the Christian æra, was remarkable for the victories gained by that great warrior over the Parthians, and for which he affumed the title of emperor the feventh, eighth and ninth times?. Whatopolis.

He passes the Tigris on a

Reduces Allyria.

And arrives

at Ballylon.

ever give occasion to this war, (for history is filent upon this head) Trajan, before He consults the he left Syria, sent, at the request of his friends, some persons to consult the oracle oracle of He.t. of Heliopolis in Phanicia, to know whether he should return from this war to Rome. The oracle returned an answer, as usual, in ambiguous terms, which might be interpreted either way. Trajan putting the best construction upon the dark words of the oracle, early in the spring left Syria, and marched against the Parthians encamped on the other fide of the Tigris. As the river was not fordable, and the enemy posfessed with a numerous army the opposite bank, he secretly caused a great number of boats to be built in the woods of Nisibis, which being conveyed upon carriages to the river-fide, a bridge was fuddenly formed with them over the river, which Trajan passed in spite of the utmost efforts of the enemy, who greatly annoyed him with showers of arrows, till he fent several boats against them manned with bridge of boats, archers and flingers, and ordered others to move up and down the river, as if they were trying to land in other places. This so distracted the Parthians, already dis- d mayed and surprised at the light of so many vessels in a country quite destitute of wood, that they gave way, and fuffered the Roman army to pass the river without further molestation. Trajan made himself master of the kingdom of Adiabene, which he had reduced in the former war, but perhaps restored upon the conclusion of the peace. He likewise subdued the country, which at that time still retained the name of Affyria, and in which stood the city of Ninos or Ninive, and Arbela and Gaugamela, two places famous in history on account of the victories of Alexander the Great. As the Parthians were greatly weakened by their domestic wars, and still divided among themselves, Trajan advanced, without opposition, to the celebrated city of Babylon, of the power and greatness of which we have read such wonders. He entered it, no one offering to withstand him; and reduced its large territory, where the Foman standards had never before been displayed. By this acquisition, he became master of those rich and noble countries, Assyria and Chaldaa. There he was led by his curiofity, fays Dion Caffius, to vifit the lake of bitumen, which was made use of in building the famous walls of Babylon. But that lake is by Rutilius, and others, placed in Mesopotamia. Afterwards he began a canal between the Euphrates canal between and the Tigris, in order to convey his vessels out of the former river into the latter, the Euphrates and with them lay a bridge over the Tigris, being resolved to besiege Ctesiphon, and the Tigris, and with them lay a bridge over the Tigris, being resolved to besiege Ctesiphon, but drops that which stood on that river: but being informed, that the bed of the Euphrates was undertaking. much higher than that of the Tigris, he abandoned the design, searing the stream f > would become too rapid, and confequently unnavigable b. However, Ammianus Marcellinus affures us, that the emperor Julian, having removed the stones, with which the mouth of the canal was stopt, conveyed his vessels through that cut from the Euphrates into the Tigris, a little above Ctesiphon . This canal was called Naarmalca, that is, the river of kings. Trajan, fearing the above-mentioned inconvenience, did not think it adviseable to make use of the canal; but ordered his vessels to be brought upon land-carriages from the Euphrates to the Tigris, these two rivers being

Norts. epist. consul. p. 72. y Vide Norts. ibid. 2 GRUTER. p. 218. GOLTZ. p. 65, 66. <sup>4</sup> Rut. itiner. p. 32. c Ammian. l. xxiv.

in

a in some places at a small distance from each other; and having formed a bridge with them, passed his army over the Tigris, and made himself matter of Seleucia, Makes himself and likewise of the great city of Ctesiphon, the metropolis of the Parthian, and after-master of Sewards of the Persian empire. Upon his entering that city, he was proclaimed Ctesiphon, the emperor by the army, who with loud shouts of joy confirmed to him the title of mesropolis of Parthicus, which he had first gained by the reduction of Nisibis. At Ctesiphon he the Parthian took the daughter of Cosrboes, and seized the throne of the Parthian kings, which empire. was of maffy gold 1. Costboes himself made his escape, and was still living in the reign of Adrian. Trajan acquainted the senate with the success that had attended him in this expedition: whereupon a decree passed, allowing the conqueror of the b Parthians to enter Rome in triumph as often as he pleased. The taking of Ctesiphon put him in possession of all the neighbouring countries. Eutropius tells us, that he reduced the Marcomades, the Cardueni, Anthemisia, a large province of Persia, says Reduces several that writer, and all the countries lying between Babylon and India. At Babylon he countries. visited the house in which Alexander the Great died, and there performed some ceremonies in honour of that famous conqueror f. Ammianus Marcellinus writes, that in his time Trajan's tribunal was still to be feen at a city in the neighbourhood of Babylon, which he calls Ozogardene 8. Trajan reduced Affyria to a Roman province, Affyria made as he had before done Armenia and Mejopotamia; fo that the empire now extended a Roman proto the Tigris, and even beyond that river. How he disposed of the country of vince. c the Parthians, we shall relate anon. He obliged the inhabitants of Mejopotamia, and, no doubt, those likewise of the other provinces, to pay him a yearly tribute . The dialogue between Triepho and Critias, which is falfly ascribed to Lucian, seems to have been written about this time; for it ends with the news of the taking of Susa, formerly the metropolis of Persia. Mention is likewise there made of inroads made by the Scythians, as if they committed great devastations in the Roman territories. Towards the end of the autumn, Trajan returned to Antioch, which was that winter almost intirely ruined by one of the most dreadful earthquakes mentioned A dreadful in history. That city was then crouded with troops, and strangers come from all earthquake at Antioch. quarters, either out of curiofity, or upon business, and embassies; so that there was d scarce a nation or province, but what had a share in the calamity; and all the Roman world, says Dion Cassius k, suffered in one city. The earthquake was preceded by violent claps of thunder, unufual winds, and a dreadful noise under ground: then followed so terrible a shock, that the earth all trembled, several houses were overturned, and others toffed to and fro, like a ship in the sea: the noise of the cracking and bursting of the timber, of the falling of the houses, and a dismal and loud roaring under ground, drowned the cries of the difmayed people. Those who happened to be in their houses, were, for the most part, buried under their ruins; fuch as were walking in the streets, and in the squares, were, by the violence of the shock, dashed against one another, and most of them either killed, or dangerously e wounded. As the earthquake continued, with some small intermission, for many days and nights together, many thousands perished by it, and among the rest the conful Marcus Pedo Vergilianus, with many other persons of great distinction. The most violent shock of all was, as we read in the acts of St. Ignatius, on a Sunday, the twenty-third of December. Trajan himself was much hurt, but nevertheless escaped Trajan himself through a window out of the house where he was. Dion Cassius pretends, that he is hart. was taken out of the window, and carried away by one, who in tallness exceeded the human fize. The same writer adds, that mount Lison, which stood at a small distance from Antioch, bowed with its top, and threatened to fall down upon the city; that other mountains fell; that new rivers appeared; and others, that had flowed f before, forfook their course, and vanished. When the earthquake ceased, the voice of a woman was heard crying under the ruins; which being immediately removed, she was found with a sucking child in her arms, whom she had kept alive, as well as herself, with her milk. Search was made for others; but no one besides was found alive, except a child, that was still sucking its dead mother 1. This dreadful earthquake is mentioned by Eusebius, Aurelius Victor, and Evagrius, who all speak * Dio, ibid. Eutrop. in Trajan.

Spart. in Adr.

Dio, ibid.

Ammian. I. xxiv. p. 265.

Eutrop. ibid. Fest. Ruf. breviar. p. 553. Spart. ibid.

philopatride. dia:090. Et Baron. ad ann. 114.

E Dio, p. 781.

Dio, l.1 f Dio, p. 785. 6 AMMIAN. 1. XXIV. p. 265. in philopatride, dia ogo. Et Baron. ad ann. 114. 1 Dio, l. lxviii. p. 781. Vol. VI. Nº 1. m Eusen. chron. p. 208. & l. i. c. 12. THE

of it as the greatest calamity recorded in history m.

Chap.

a tien,

2 (7)

qu.ft

นเสม of hi

the g

into.

riole :

b Krms

L:

cali G

Which

125, th

the inf

first or

1:20,

A.x.

Who d

Were,

afEitani

(for the

Where !

accord:

Caffage

that be,

and out

inhuma

them(e)

to wild

Put the

died 1

and in fund : j

in athes,

murdered

e mailacres

quite uni

CO.OC. 25 F.

thole imp According and foot,

land with in a pitche

the loss o

battle by

I cifive; for the elevent

Congresed

understand that Turbo, Jezi, #35

ato the Ro the Jewi W

3.

d Aonted

c end o

The port of Ancona.

Trajan fails down the Tiris into the Persian gulf.

He reduces Arabia Felix.

THE next consuls were L. Ælius Lamia and Ælianus Verus. From an inscription a of this year, the nineteenth of Trajan's reign, we learn, that the senate and people of Rome returned the emperor folemn thanks for having facilitated the entry into Italy on the fide of the Adriatic sea, by a port made by his orders at Ancona, as he had some years before made one on the Mediterranean, at or near Centumcella, now Civita-Vecchia. Upon the return of the spring, Trajan leaving Antioch, visited the conquered countries; and finding them all in a state of tranquillity, he made various regulations; and then imbarquing on board his fleet, failed down the Tigris, being defirous to view the Persian gulf, which Dion Cassius calls the Red Sea, or Mare Erythraum, supposing it to have taken that name from Erythrus, a prince once very powerful in those parts ". The storms, the rapidity of the river, and the tides, b rendered his navigation both troublesome and dangerous. However, he made himfelf master of Melene, an island formed by the Tigris, and obliged Athambylus, who reigned there, to pay him tribute. He was well received by the inhabitants of Charax Spasinæ, the metropolis of Athambylus's dominions, which most geographers place at the mouth of the Tigris. Dion Cassius tells us, that Trajan sailed into the Ocean, meaning perhaps the Perfian gulf; for it is not probable that, with the ill-built boats, of which his fleet confifted, he pursued his course beyond Ormuz, where the gulf ends. It was, we conjecture, on this occasion, that he reduced Arabia Felix. Cornelius Palma, governor of Syria, had some years before subdued Arabia Petræa, as we have observed above, and reduced it to a Roman province. c But now Trajan made himself master, it seems, of Arabia Felix; for Arrian, in his book on the navigation of the Red Sea, observes, that in the reign of Trajan, there were at Leuca, a borough upon that sea, a centurion, and some troops, with a receiver, who claimed the fourth part of all the goods that were landed there o. The fame writer places upon the fouth coast of Arabia, beyond the streights of Bebel Mander, a city called Arabia, and furnamed Eudamon, or the Happy, from its having been formerly enriched by means of the trade that was carried on there; but adds, "A little before our time it was destroyed by Cafar, and is at present only "a village P." As he places it in the country of the Homeritæ 4, some writers take it to have stood where the present city of Aden stands. Besides, it appears from several d medals, or pieces of money, coined after the year 111, the fourteenth of Trajan's reign, that he reduced Arabia, not by his lieutenants, but in person'. Festus too mentions the conquest of Arabia; and Eutropius seems to reckon the reducing of that country to a Roman province amongst the last actions of Trajan ". A writer, who is supposed to have flourished about this time, after having said, that the power of the Persians and Parthians had yielded, adds, that Susa itself was taken, and that all Arabia would foon submit to the victorious and invincible prince w. This must, without all doubt, be understood of Arabia Felix, which it is thence plain he did not subdue, till after the conquest of Assyria, that is, before this year, the nineteenth of his reign, and the 116th of the Christian æra. Some read in e Festus, that he conquered the country of the Saracens; but as no mention is made of that people by any other writer of those times, we readily fall in with those who, instead of Saraceni, read Ofrhoeni, who inhabited one of the provinces of Me-fopotamia, called Ofrhoene, from a king of the country named Ofrhoes. Trajan having reached the ocean, as we read in Dion Cassius, and there discovering a ship bound to India, wished he was young, that he might extend, as Alexander had done, his conquests to that country z. Eutropius tells us, that he had a fleet ready equipped in the Red Sea, with a defign to invade India; that he informed himself of the customs, strength and manner of fighting of the Indians; and that he envied the happiness of Alexander, who had subdued them, and extended his conquests far beyond f the bounds of the Roman empire. The Romans had even the vanity to brag, that they had brought India under subjection, as Eusebius observes a; but by India they perhaps meant Arabia Felix. Trajan wrote to the fenate, acquainting them with the fuccess of his arms, and naming the several nations, which he had conquered, and Extraordinary which were utterly unknown. They decreed him extraordinary honours; among honours decreed the rest, that he should, upon his return to Rome, triumph over each particular nation,

Alexander, who conquered India.

P Idem, p. 8. 10cm, p. 10cm, p. 10cm, p. 10cm, p. 10cm, p. 784. • Arrian. in peripl. Erythr. p. 6. P Idem, p. 8.
• Occo. p. 215.

* Fest. in breviar. p. 551.

* Fest. p. 551.

* Procop. l. i. Pers. c. 18. BIRAG. p. 116.
w Lucian. philop. * Dio, p. 784. <sup>2</sup> Euses. chron. p. 206.

a tion, which he had subdued; which was decreeing him, not one, but many triumphs: a triumphal arch was built in his own forum, to perpetuate the memory of his conquests; and the people of Rome made great preparations to receive him with the utmost pomp upon his return. But to Rome he never returned; nor was the and of his actions answerable to the beginning. For most of the nations, which he had conquered, revolted and shook off the yoke, after having driven out or massacred the garisons that had been left amongst them. The Jews, who had been dispersed The Jews reinto all parts of the world, fell into a dreadful rebellion in all the provinces of the west in several empire, being prompted thereunto by the absence of the emperor, and the late terrible earthquake, which, as they imagined, portended the ruin and downfal of the b Roman empire. They rose at the same time in Alexandria, all over Egypt, and in Libya Cyrenaica, against the other inhabitants of those countries, whom historians call Greeks, and against the Romans, who were very numerous in those provinces, which had been long subject to Rome. In Egypt, which was then governed by Lupus, they affembled in vaft crouds, committed dreadful diforders, and falling upon the inhabitants, who endeavoured to suppress the tumult, defeated them at the very first onset with great slaughter. But this advantage cost them dear; for the Egyptians, who had the good luck to escape the general carnage, sheltering themselves in Alexandria, seized and massacred, without distinction of sex or age, all the Jews who dwelt in that city b. The Jews indeed fold their lives dear, but were in the c end overpowered, and all to a man cut in pieces c. The Jews of Cyrene, who were, it seems, the ringleaders of the revolt, finding they could not receive the assistance which they had promised themselves from their brethren in Alexandria, (for they had formed a design of seizing that city) entered Egypt, committing everywhere most dreadful devastations, and unheard-of cruelties. They were headed, And commit according to Eusebius d, by one Lucua, whom he styles king; but, according to Dion unbeard-of Cassiuse, by one named Andrew, whom they had chosen for their leader. However that be, their rage and fury was fo great and boundless, their barbarities so heinous and outrageous, that they are scarce to be matched in history. For not satisfied with inhumanly massacring Greeks and Romans of all ranks, ages and degrees, they ded voured their flesh, washed themselves in their blood, wore their skins, and made themselves garlands with their intrails: some they sawed asunder; others they threw to wild beafts, or obliged them to fight till they killed one another, after they had put them to all kinds of torments. Thus they destroyed in Libya above two hundred thousand persons; an incredible number in Egypt, not specified by historians; and in the island of Cyprus, where they likewise rose, two hundred and fifty thoufand: Salamis, one of the chief and most populous cities of that island, they laid in ashes, after having, with that cruelty which was ever peculiar to the Jewish nation, murdered all the inhabitants, without sparing either women or children f. By these e massacres, the province of Libya was so dispeopled, that it would have been left quite uninhabited, had not the emperor Adrian sent thither a few years after several colonies 8. Trajan, informed of these barbarities, resolved in a great rage to pursue those impious wretches, not as rebels, but monsters, and enemies to mankind. Accordingly he dispatched into Libya, Marcius Turbo, with a strong body of horse and foot, and a confiderable fleet, injoining him to pursue them both by sea and land with revenge answerable to the enormity of their crimes. Turbo defeated them They are dein a pitched battle, and put great numbers of them to the fword, but not without feated in Afrithe loss of many of his best men, the Jews of Cyrene having been joined before the ca by Turbo, battle by those of Egypt h. Neither was the victory complete, nor the battle def cisive; for the war coutinued till the reign of Adrian, who succeeded Trajan on the eleventh of August of the year 117. That prince is said by St. Jerom to have conquered the Jews, who had revolted a fecond time; which Scaliger and others understand with respect to their first revolt under Nero. Besides, Spartian tells us, that Turbo, having, in the very beginning of Adrian's reign, ended the war with the Jews, was sent by that prince against the Moors, who had begun to make incursions into the Roman territories before the death of Trajank. In the island of Cyprus, And all cut to the Jews were, by the Romans and inhabitants, all cut off to a man; and those of to pieces in the island of Cy-

e Dio, l. lxviii. p. 786. prus. b Euseb. l. iv. c. 2. c Oros. I. vii. c. 12. Dio, ibid, & Oros. l. vii. c. 12. Euseb. in chron. d Eusen. ibid. b Eusen. 1. iv. c. > * Spart. in Adr. p. 3.

i

Sie

Ĉ)

fo

tic

k:

the

b un

Up

jan

lite. mo

Ar

upo

hin

fron

e it ap

(0 ()

Scale

atteff

P.:::

Were

which been more

PLIC

he 0th6

Powe

read i person

Train

CUS, W

in the e Nerati

though

and to

in the c favour tho' the

his niec

shew ar

Trisan

troducer

the vok

tells as

δir w

TO the CL. W

Cic. W

(b)

10x. 1 ro. T. ( Spie ¥37.0 Ι, (

d days Tra

Most of the countries conian revolt;

But are again

reduced.

Trajan gives a king to the Parthians.

He besteges Atra.

siege.

that cruel and treacherous nation forbidden, upon pain of death, ever to fet foot a upon that island; which prohibition the inhabitants extended even to such as were driven thither by stress of weather, and whom consequently they put immediately to death k. They revolted likewise in Mejopotamia, but were there soon quelled by the brave Lusius Quietus, who deseated them in a pitched battle, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and drove the rest out of the country 1. The example of the Jews was followed by most of the countries which Trajan had conquered by Tra- out the Parent of the inhabitants rifing every-where up in arms, and murdering or driving out the Roman garisons. Against them the emperor dispatched Lusius Quietus, and L. Appius Maximus, who were attended with very different success; for Maximus was defeated and killed; by whom, history does not inform us: but Lufius distin- b guished himself as usual, gained great advantages over the enemy, recovered the city of Nisibis, besieged, stormed, and laid in ashes the city of Edessa. On the other hand, Erucius Clarus, and Julius Alexander, two other commanders of the emperor, retook the city of Seleucia upon the Tigris, and several others, which had shaken off the yoke. Lusius was, for his gallant conduct, rewarded with the government of Palestine m, no doubt, to keep that province in awe, which was chiefly inhabited by Jews, and seemed inclined, as Spartian informs us ", to revolt, and raise new disturbances in the empire. For these advantages, and the recovery of his conquests, Trajan took the tenth and last time the title of emperor. During these disturbances, Sambelus, king of Mesene, continued faithful to Trajan. Neither did c the Parthians make any attempts towards the recovery of their liberty, or rather of their former condition. But Trajan, fearing they would foon shake off the yoke, thought it adviseable to oblige them, by giving them, instead of a Roman governor, a king of their own nation. With this design he repaired to Ctesiphon; and having there assembled in a large plain the Romans and Parthians, he ascended a high throne, and declared one Parthamaspates king of the Parthians, putting, with great pomp and folemnity, the crown upon his head. Parthamaspates, whom Spartian calls Pfamatesfiris, continued faithful to the Romans; but was despised by the Parthians as a flave to Rome, and had scarce any authority over them P. In several coins, which have reached our times, is represented a king prostrate before Trajan, d with this legend on some, He gives a king to the Parthians; and on others the following, He distributes kingdoms 4.

THE following year, the twentieth and last of Trajan's reign, Niger and Apronianus being consuls, the emperor marched into Arabia, and there made war upon the Hagareni, or Agareni, who had likewise revolted. What part of Arabia they inhabited, we cannot determine, fince we find no farther mention made of them till the times of the Constantinopolitan empire, when the name of Hagareni became common to the Saracens and Arabians in general. The emperor laid siege to their city, which by Xipbilin is called Atra. It was neither great nor beautiful, fays Dion Cassius, but thought to be very rich, by reason the sun was worshipped e there, which drew crouds of people thither with rich presents from the neighbouring countries'. It was situated on the top of a high and steep mountain, well peopled, and surrounded with strong walls ". But its chief strength consisted in the barrenness of the neighbouring country, destitute, to a great distance, of grass, wood, and even of water; so that a great army could not long subsist before it; hence it was neither taken now by Trajan, nor afterwards by Severus, tho' they had both made a breach in the wall. Trajan narrowly escaped being killed in one of the attacks; for having laid aside the ensigns of his dignity, that he might not be known, he headed his men in person: but the enemy, knowing him, notwithstanding that disguise, by his grey hairs, and majestic air, aimed chiesly at him, wounded his horse, f and killed a horseman by his side. Besides, as often as the Romans advanced to the attack, they were driven back by violent storms of wind, rain and hail, and dreadful flashes of lightning. At the same time, they were in a strange manner insested But raises the in their camp by swarms of sies: so that Trajan was in the end obliged to raise the fiege, and retire. Soon after, as he was stricken in years, and worn out with fo many long marches, he was seized with a dropsy and palsy, which he ascribed > k Dio, l. lxviii. p. 785. 1 Dio, p. 786. Ammian. l. xxix. Euseb. l. iv. c. 2.

> al. p. 720. n Spart. in Adr. p. 6. Goltz p. 86. P Dio, p. 786.
> irag. p. 163. r Idat. & Cassiodor. in Faft. Dio, l. lxviii. p. 785. m Dio, in excerpt. Val. p. 720. P Dio, p. 786. 9 Occo, p. 213. BIRAG. P. 163. F IDAT. O. CALLER BIRAG. P. 163. BERODIAN. I. iii. p. 528, Idem, l. lxxv.

to

a to poison, but others thought natural. However, he was still for returning into Mejopotamia, to reduce some places, which had revolted there. But his distemper Is taken ill, increasing, he left the command of the army to Adrian, whom he had appointed and sets sail governor of Syria, and imbarqued for Italy. It was no sooner known, that he had for Italy set sail, than all the countries, which he had conquered at a vast charge, and by exposing himself to innumerable dangers, shook off the yoke, and recovered their former condition, in spite of the troops which he had left to keep them in subjection. The Parthians drove out Parthamaspates; the Armenians chose themselves a The Parthians king; and the greatest part of Mesopotamia revolted from Rome, and submitted to drive out their the king of the Parthians. Thus all the pains he had taken, all the toils he had king. b undergone, and the immense sums he had expended, proved in the end to no effect. Upon his arrival at Selinus in Cilicia, which was afterwards from him called Trajanopolis, he was seized with a flux, which in a very short time put an end to his life. He died in the beginning of August, after having reigned nineteen years, fix Trajan dies at months, and fifteen days, counting from the death of Nerva to the eleventh of Selinus in August, (for we know not the precise day on which he died) when Adrian received at Antiocb the news of his death, which had been concealed for some time, and thereupon caused himself to be proclaimed emperor w. Eutropius, and such as have copied him, tell us, that Trajan died at Seleucia in Isauria. But Seleucia is at a great distance from the sea; and most writers agree, that he was going to Rome by sea. Besides, e it appears from several inscriptions x, from the author of the verses commonly ascribed to the Sibyls, and from the chronicle of Alexandria, that he died at Selinus. Hence Scaliger and Casaubon wonder how any one can call in question a thing so well attested y. His body was burnt at Selinus, and his ashes carried by his wife His ashes are Plotina, and his niece Matidies, or Matidia, in a golden urn, to Rome, where they conveyed to Rome, and deposited under the startly solvens. Rome, and were received with extraordinary pomp, and deposited under the stately column, deposited under which he had erected, tho' it flood within the walls, where no one before him had his column. been buried 2. Sports, called Parthic Sports, were for many years celebrated in memory of his victories in the east a. From an ancient inscription, we learn, that Phidemion, his freedman, his chamberlain, cup-bearer, and secretary, died a sew d days after him, on the twelsth of August, of grief for the loss of so good a master b. Trajan lest no children c; nor are we told that he ever had any. Some write, that he defigned, in imitation of Alexander the Great, to die without naming a successor; others tell us, that he intended to name ten persons to the senate, leaving it in their power to chuse which of them they judged best qualified for the sovereignty d. We read in Dion Cassiuse, that once at a banquet he desired his friends to name ten persons, whom they thought capable of, and equal to, the supreme power. Both Trajan himself and his friends seemed, according to Spartian, to judge Neratius Priscus, who was the greatest civilian of his time, the best qualified for succeeding him in the empire f. That writer adds, that one day he addressed him thus: To you, e Neratius, I recommend the provinces, in case I should die. He had likewise some thoughts of leaving the empire to Servianus 8, whose daughter Adrian had married; and to Lusius Quietus, of whom he deservedly entertained a mighty opinion ". But in the end, Adrian was preferred to all the rest; which was rather owing to the favour of Plotina, than to any extraordinary kindness of Trajan towards him. For tho' the emperor was nearly related to him, had been his guardian, and given him his niece in marriage, yet he never took great notice of him; nor did Adrian ever shew any particular affection for Trajan. Hence it was commonly believed, that Trajan did not adopt him; but that Plotina, who was a great friend to Adrian, introduced, after the death of her husband, a supposititious person, who, counterfeiting the voice of the dying emperor, declared, that he adopted Adrian. Dion Cassius Whether he f tells us in express terms, that Trajan never adopted Adrian; but that the whole adopted Adrian. affair was managed by Plotina and Atianus, or rather Tatianus, who had been, jointly with the emperor, Adrian's guardian; and adds, that for this reason the emperor's death was for fome days concealed. This Dion Cassius learnt of his father Apronianus, who, as he had been governor of Cilicia, where the emperor died, had thence

w Dio, p. 786. Aurel. epit. Julian. Cæsar, p. 39. * Vide P. Pagi a Bon. in Spart. not. C. p. 10. & Scaliger. in Euseb. chron. p. 341. *

Dio, ibid. b Euseb. chron. p. 208. * Vide P. Pagi ad ann. 117. 7 Vide CASAU-Dio, L. lxix. p. 788. CIACCON.
8. THEMISTIUS, OFAL. 16. col. Traj. Vicr. epit. a Dio, ibid. b Euse d Spart. in Adri. p. 3. e Dio, l. lxix. p. 795.

MIST. orat. 16. l Dio, p. 795, 788. Spart. ibid. E Dio, p. 795.

Ch

th

k

th

bс

W

CT t!

Pá

m

 $\mathfrak{T}_{t}$

ch

ch

31

to 20 c on

> ٥r jud

> CC fin

tρ

to nı:

for 10

W

7 tio

200

WC

or d

his

and

b Ter

f PLIN

tui, p<sub>ij</sub> Cer: Sezia

B7'11

Bo

iaz w ta∵o. Se

* * *

4 %

1

7

e rage

d G

b 13 hu C

certain intelligence of what had passed at his death. Besides, the letters written to a the senate concerning this adoption were not signed by Trajan, but by Plotina, who had never before signed any of her husband's dispatches k. A modern writer, of no mean character, looks upon what Dion Cassius relates of the supposititious adoption of Adrian as an arrant fable; and pretends, that he was adopted by the emperor a whole year before his death; which, if true, would have left no room even for such a sable. What induced him to embrace this opinion is, that Adrian, as we read in most authors, and as appears from several ancient inscriptions, reigned twenty-two years: on the other hand, it is certain, that he died on the tenth of July in 138. He must therefore have begun to count the years of his reign from the ninth of August of the year 116. that is, a year before Trajan's death; for that b prince died in the beginning of August in 117. he thence concludes, that Adrian must have been adopted a year before; and from the time of his adoption, reckoned the years of his reign. This objection, which we shall endeavour to answer at the end of Adrian's reign, as in a more proper place, is not of such weight with us as to make us look upon the account, which Dion Cassius gives of Adrian's adoption, as an arrant fable. We shall close the history of this great emperor's reign with a fuccinet account of his noble and useful works. Aurelius Vistor will have him to have first introduced the use of post-chaises; but that invention is generally ascribed to Augustus m, and was probably only improved by Trajan, as it was after his time by several other emperors, as appears from Gothofredus, who treats of this subject c at length in his comments upon the Theodofian code ". He made, at an immense charge, a large and convenient road, leading through many barbarous nations, from the most distant coasts of the Euxine sea, to those of the Ocean in Gaul. He built several magnificent libraries in Rome, and a stately theatre in the field of Mars P. He adorned the city with many magnificent edifices, inlarged the circus, repaired a great number of ancient buildings, and supplied with plenty of water those quarters of the city, which by other princes had been neglected. But the most magni-His square and ficent of all his works was the great square, which he made at Rome, and called from his own name, having for that purpose levelled a hill a hundred and sortyfour foot high. In the midst of the square, he erected the famous column, which d is still to be seen, to serve him for a tomb, and at the same time to shew the height of the hill, which he levelled, as appears from the inscription on the basis, dated the seventeenth year of his tribunitial power, which was the 114th of the christian The emperor Constantius, when he came to Rome in 357. found nothing in that stately metropolis which he admired so much as Trajan's square 4. The architect employed by Trajan in this inimitable work, as Constantius styled it, was one Apollodorus. Ciacconius tells us, that on the top of the column, which stood in the midst of the square, was placed Trajan's statue, holding a golden apple in its right hand; and adds, that in this apple were deposited the ashes of the deceased prince s. But Eutropius and Victorinus, whom we have followed, tell us, that he was buried e under the column. During this prince's reign, most of the provinces of the empire fuffered greatly by earthquakes, and were grievoully afflicted with a dreadful plague, with famine, and frequent conflagrations'. At Rome the Tiber overflowed its banks with incredible violence, laid great part of the city under water, overturned many houses, and greatly damaged the fields; tho' Trajan caused a great canal to be dug, in order to drain them, and to convey the water into its natural chanel ". Phlegon tells us, that in Trajan's time a woman was delivered at Alexandria of five children the same day, three males, and two semales, who were brought up with great care by the emperor. The next year the same woman was delivered of three children w. We read in Plutarch, that in Trajan's reign a vestal, f named Helvetia, going on horse back, was struck dead with a slash of lightning, and thrown quite naked on one fide, and her horse on the other; which the soothfayers looked upon as presaging something highly dishonourable to the vestals, and the Roman knights. Accordingly, not long after, the flave of a knight, named Buteces, came of his own accord, and deposed, that his master, and several others performed by

Trajan.

* Dio, l. lxix. p. 787, 788.

* Vide Cod. Theodof. tom. ii. p. 510, 511.

* Aur. Vict.

* Plin. paneg. p. 96.

Dio, l. lxviii. p. 778.

p. 789.

* Claccon. de col. Trajan. c. 14.

* Vict. epit.

m.r. c. 29.

* Plut. quant. Rom. Dodwell in append. ad differtat. Cyprianic. Oxon. 1684. p. 67.
511.

Goth. in cod. Theodol tom. ii. p. 506, &c.
96. Dio, l. xviii. p. 778.

Ammian. l. xvi. p. 71.

Dio, * Prin. I. viii. ep. 17.

a of the equestrian order, had for a long time carried on a criminal conversation with three veitals, Emilia, Licinia and Marsia, who were immediately punished, and the Three vestals knights too their accomplices. But the pontiffs, having first consulted the books of punished. the Sibyls, declared, that the crime was to be expiated by burying alive in the forum boarium, or the ox-market, two men and two women, natives of Greece and Gaul; Two men and which was done accordingly, the they had not long before condemned the fame two women buried alive at crime in others. For the Britons having immolated a human victim to their gods, Rome, their magistrates had been ordered to punish them; though they were afterwards pardoned upon their pleading an ancient custom, but at the same time commanded, under the severest penalties, to forbear such facrifices for the suture x. Trab jan, notwithstanding his humanity and good-nature, suffered the christians to be in-Trajan suffers humanly persecuted in most provinces of the empire. As he published no new the christians edicts against the christian religion, he is not, as Baronius observes y, reckoned by to be perse-Tertullian among the persecutors of the church. But that he was an enemy to the christians, and highly prejudiced against them, is manifest from Pliny's letter to him 2, and his answer to Pliny 2. This may be ascribed to his looking upon the christians, who were already very numerous, and multiplied daily, with a jealous and suspicious eye, as the underminers of the religion of the empire, and enemies to the gods adored at Rome, and in all the Roman provinces. Besides, he perhaps accounted them establishers of beteria, or illegal societies, which usually breed factic ons and feditions; whence all focieties, or colleges, not fettled by an imperial edict, or a decree of the senate, were forbidden, and the persons frequenting them adjudged guilty of treason. But after he had been informed by Pliny of their innocence, he could not, nor indeed did he, as appears from his answer, entertain any finister opinion of them. But nevertheless, instead of putting an immediate stop to the persecution, he sent directions into Bithynia, where it chiefly raged, repugnant to good sense, and altogether inconsistent with his so much boasted justice, humanity and good-nature. For he commanded, that no inquisition should be made His unjust profor the christians, but that such as were accused should be punished; which was, as ceedings against Tertullian observes in his excellent apology b, declaring them innocent, and at the them.

d fame time ordering them to be treated as criminals. If they are guilty, says that writer, addressing himself to the emperor, why do you forbid any search to be made after them? If they are innocent, why do you command them to be punished? This ordinance, however iniquitous and absurd, continued in vigour till the persecution of Severus, that is, for almost a whole century. But for a more particular account of the unjust proceedings, even of the best emperors, against the christians, we refer our readers to Tertulian and Eusebius , where they will find, that by fome emperors it was forbidden, upon pain of death, to accuse the christians, who nevertheless were, by a strange inconsistency, to be capitally punished, when accused or discovered e. As Irajan was, what every prince ought to be, a generous encoue rager of learning, under him the efforts of genius and study began to revive is and his reign became famous for a great number of eminent historians, poets, orators, and philosophers, of whom we shall speak in our notes (A).

Idem ibid. y Baron, ad ann. 100. b TERTULL apol. C. 2. C TERTULE. in apol. f PLIN. pan. p. 84. TACIT. vit. Agr. c. 2, 3.

* PLIN. 1. x. ep. 102. 4 Euseb. l. v. c. 21.

* Idem ibid. ep. 102. * TERTULL. apol. c. 5.

(A) These were Julius Frontinus, Cornelius Tacisus, Pliny the younger, Pompeius Saturninus, Tisinius Capito, Claudius Pollio, Verginius Romanus, &c. Sextus Julius Frontinus was prætor in the first year of Vespasian's reign, but yielded that dignity to Domitian, after having held it but one day, or two at most (1). Some years after, he commanded in Brisain with great reputation and fuccess, till the ninth year of Velpasian's reign, when he was succeeded by the celebrated Agricola. As that command was given to such only as had been consuls, Frontinus, no doubt, had been honoured with the confulfhip before he was sent into Britain. He is thought to have been consul a second time under Nerva, and a third under Trajan (2). He was likewise augur, and succeeded in that dignity by Pliny the younger; in the fourth year of Adrian's reign (3); whence conclude, that he died that year, the 100th of the christian zra, the augurate being an employment for life. He was a great civilian, and highly effected by all the men of learning who flourished in his time, especially by Marrial, who mentions and commends him in his epigrams. In his last will he defired, that no tomb might be erected to him, faying, that without fuch monuments the world would remember him, if his life had deserved it (4). Ta-citus, speaking of Frontinus, says, that he was a man as great and able as he found scope and safety to be 5). He was one of the greatest commanders of his time (6), and gave figual proofs both of his bra-

(1) Tacit. l. iv. c. 39. (2) Noris epift. conful. p. 61, 62. (3) Plin. l. iv. epift. 8. vit. Agr. c. 17. (6) Ælian. tall. p. 3. (4) Plin. l. xix. epift. 19. (5) Tacit. vit. Agr. c. 17.

Ch

1

ti

2

I.

F th

71 ti

ţ

2)

Ti

le:

us: ha:

tur

bu:

b

H

in k

bo

em

ot 1

Cum

to ,:

DOW

tow

all a

P.rt

W.Ju

Chi.

the re

D:J

tu.

n v

72: c

Malan

E LANGE

rain matai fir to He w

17

very and conduct, in utterly subduing the powerful and warlike nation of the Silures, tho', besides the courage of the enemy, he was likewise obliged to flruggle with the difficulties of places and fitua-tion (7). He wrote four books of firatagems, which have reached our times, and are supposed to have been inscribed to Trajan. As he flatters Domitian in feveral places of his work, we may thence con-clude, that it was composed in his reign. In the preface, which he prefixed to this work, he tells us, that he had studied the military art with great application; and, besides the book of stratagems, written some others upon the same subject. We read likewife in Vegetius, that what Frontinus compendioully wrote on military discipline, and copied in great part from Cato the censor, was greatly esteemed by Trajan (8). Ælian quotes another work done by him, in which he seems to have collected whatever he found in Homer upon the subject of war (9). Nerva committed to him the care of the fountains and aqueducts of Rome; on which occasion he wrote the treatise of aqueducts, which has reached us; as have done fome other small pieces of his, and are to be found in the collection which Scriverius has made of the ancients, who have treated of the mi-litary art, and published at Antwerp in 1607. From these pieces it appears, that they were written during the war with the Dacians; which some understand of Domitian's war with that people; others of Trajan's (10). As for the treatise of colonies, which Scriverius ascribes to Frontinus, it either was not done by him, or has been fince altered; for mention is there made of Adrian, Severus, Antoninus, Commodus, and other emperors, who reigned long after Frontinus's time.

Cornelius Tacitus, the greatest orator, statesman, and historian of his time, was, as is commonly supposed, the son of Cornelius Tacitus, a Roman knight, and procurator of Belgic Gaul. His promotion in the state was begun, as he himself informs us (11), by Vespasian, augmented by Titus, and by Domitian advanced yet higher. He was prætor under Domitian in the year of the Christian æra 88, the seventh of that prince's reign, and consul under Nerva in 97, being substituted to Verginius Rusus, whose panegyric, or funeral oration, he composed and pronounced (12). He married in 77. or 78. the daughter of the celebrated Cneius Julius Agricola (13). Lipsius is of opinion, that he lett children by her, fince the emperor Tacitus pretended to be descended from him, or to be of the same family; for he called the historian, as Vopiscus informs us (14), his kinsman; and Sidonius counts him among the ancestors of Polemus, prefect of Gaul (15). He had been four years absent from Rome, when Agricola died (16); which has given occasion to some writers to suppole, without any foundation, that he was banished by Domitian. He pleaded at the bar, even after he had been conful; and, by his eloquent speeches, gained the reputation of the greatest orator of his time (17). He was much admired by Pliny, who lived in close friendship with him, and by all men lived in close friendship with him, and by all men of learning, who reckoned it a great honour to be acquainted with a person of his extraordinary accomplishments (18). He seems to have published some speeches, and likewise verses (19), which have been long since lost. One of his letters has been conveyed to us amongst those of Pliny. Tho' he was the greatest orator of his time, he is now known only by his historical works, which can never be sufficiently admired and commended. He seems to have written his description of Germany feems to have written his description of Germany during the second consulate of Trajan, that is, in 98.

His life of Agricola, which Lipfius thinks one of the finest pieces in the Latin tongue, was, as we conjecture from the preface, one of the first pieces he composed, and probably published in the very be-ginning of Trajan's reign. The work which com-prises the lives of the emperors, from the death of Galba to that of Domitian, ought to be placed next; for in his annals he refers the reader to his account of the reign of Domitian (20). That work which is by Tertullian (21), and other ancients, called the history of Tacitus, comprised the transactions of the Romans, both at home and abroad, from the year 69. to the year 96. of the christian æra; but only his account of the year 69. and part of the year 70. have reached our times. Having ended his history, he began his annals, (for so he himself styles them) from the death of Augustus to the reign of Galba, in which there are many lamentable chasms, as we have observed in the preceding volume. He had referved, as he himfelf tells us (22), for the study and employment of his old age, the reigns of Nerva and Trajan; but that work, it feems, he never undertook, no mention being made of it by any of the ancients. He likewise proposed writing the history of Augustus's reign; but St. Jerom knew of no other historical works of Tacitus, except his history and annals, which were in all thirty books (23). Of these are now remaining, not without many chasms, only fixteen books of his annals, and five of his history. As to his style, it is sublime and expressive; his thoughts are great, his phrase elevated, and his words sew. He shews himself, throughout his whole work, an upright patriot, zealous for public liberty, and the welfare of his country; a declared enemy to tyrants, and to the tools of tyranny; a lover of human kind, a man of virtue, who adores liberty and truth, and every-where recommends them. As no man had seen more, and few thought so much, he draws events from their first sources, takes off every disguise, and penetrates every artifice. He faw every thing in a true and uncommon light; whence his reflections are mafterly and profound, like mirrors, where human nature and government are exhibited in their proper fize and colours. His ftyle is a kind of language peculiar to himself, weighty, grave, and well-adapted to his subject. The older he grew, the more he curtailed his style; for his history is much more copious and flowing than his annals; so that what has by some been reckoned a fault, was in him the effect of his judgment. His Latin is pure and classical; he has few or no words which had not been used by approved writers; nor does he often give new ideas to old words. However, as he is sparing of his words, and after having started the idea, leaves the reader to pursue it, he is thence charged by the moderns with obscurity. The emperor Tacitus directed his books to be placed in all the libraries; and, for their better preservation, ordered ten copies of them to be transcribed every year at the public expence (24). But notwithstanding this care, many of them have been long fince loft, as we have observed above. As for the dialogue on the decay of eloquence, which is by some ascribed to Tacitus, by others to Quintilian, and was written in the fixth year of the reign of Vespasian, Lipsius, from the style, is more inclined to adjudge it to Quintilian than to Tacitus. But of that piece we have spoken in the foregoing volume (25). The unjust censure of Mr. Bayle and others upon Tacitus, as if he derived the actions of his princes, even the most innocent, from wicked counsels and designs, is fully consuted by Mr. Gordon in the discourses which he has prefixed to his excellent translation of that historian (26); a translation which has been of great use to us in compiling part of the foregoing volume.

(7) Tacit. ibid. (8) Veg. l. 1. c. 18. (9) Ælian. tacl. c. i. p. 1. (10) Voff. hift. Lat. l. iii. c. 4. (11) Tacit. hift. l. i. c. 1. (12) Plin. l. ii. ep. 1. (13) Tacit. vit. Agr. c. 9. (14) Vopif. in Tacit. (15) Sid. l. iv. epift. 4. (16) Tacit. ibid. c. 44. (17) Plin. l. ii. epift. t, 11. (18) Idem, l. iv. epift. t3, 15. l. ix. epift. 10. (19) Plin. l. ix. ep. 10. (20) Tacit. annal. c. 11. (21) Tertull. ap. c. 16. & lib. de spettac. (22) Tacit. hift. l. i. c. 1. (23) Hier. in Zac. (24) Vopifc. in Tacit. (25) Hift. Univer. vol. V. p. 572.

Pliny was a native of Comum, now Como, the fon of L. Cacilius, by the fifter of Pliny the elder, by whom he was adopted, and thence took the name of C. Plinius Cacilius Secundus (27). He was born in the eighth year of Nero's reign, the 61st of the christian ara, and studied eloquence under Quintilian (28) with such success, that he and Tacisus were seckoned the two greatest orators of their time. In his youth he followed the profession of arms (29), was prætor under Domitian, and under Trajan conful, augur, and governor of Pantus and Bithynia. But his chief employment was to plead causes, which he did with great eloquence, and equal difinterestedness, not accepting of his clients fees or presents of any kind, even before the law forbidding them passed in the senate. He published several harangues or speeches, none of which have reached our times, except his panegyric upon the emperor Trajan. An inscription, quoted by Vossius (30), ascribes to him some historical pieces; but of these no mention is made by any ancient writer: nay, Apollinaris Sidonius tells us, that Tacieus did not apply himself to the writing of history, till he had in vain endea-voured to engage Pliny in that province (31). The letter, in which Pliny excuses himself from that task, is still extant (32), but inicribed to one Capito; perhaps in the time of Sidonius, that is, in the fifth century, it passed for a letter written to Tacitus. Some make Pliny author of the lives of illustrious men, which by most critics is ascribed to Cornelius Nepos, but by Vossius to Aurelius Victor (33). Pliny often mentions his own verses; but as they have been long since lost, we can give no account of them. He himself made and published a collection of such of his letters as he thought the most diverting and instructive (34); and of these are still extant ten books, which have been of fignal use to us in deferibing the reign of Trajan. He was, as appears from his letters, a man of great honour, probity, difinterestedness, and good-nature; of which we find innumerable instances in his letters. He presented the city of Comum, where he was born, with a valuable and numerous collection of books, which he bought at a great rate, and allotted a large fund to be employed, partly in purchasing other books, and partly in maintaining and bringing up the children of his poor countrymen (35). As the citizens of Comum used, for want of proper masters at home, to send their children to be educated at Mediolanum, now Milan, he prevailed upon them to contribute towards the hiring and maintaining of professors in all arts and sciences, and was himself at the third part of the charge: he would have willingly paid the whole, had he not believed, that the parents of the children, by being obliged to disburse two-thirds of the requifite fum, would be thence more effectually induced to chuse professors well qualified for that trust, than if the whole charge were borne by him; in which case, favour, he apprehended, might pre-Besides his countrymen, he vail over merit (36). presented others with considerable sums, namely, Quintilian, on occasion of the marriage of his daughter (37); the poet Martial, when he left Rome, to return to Spain, his native country (38); and one Romanus Firmius, to make up the fum that was requifite for his being raifed to the equestrian order (39). He was not himself possessed of a large estate; but by bestowing little upon himself, he could afford bechildren (40). A lady of merit, named Corellia, for whom Pliny had a particular value, having betrayed to him a defire of having lands on the lake of Come, he generously offered her a small estate, lately fallen to him, which bordered on that lake. Corellis refused the present, and desired to know the value of it; when one of Pliny's freed-men, no doubt by private orders from his master, undervalued it, and sold it to her at a very low rate; which Corellis afterwards knew, but Pliny could not by any means be prevailed upon to accept the full value of the land (41). He at once discharged all the debts of one of his friends, substituting himself in the room of all his other creditors, who had brought him into great trouble. When his friend died, his daughter Calvins was for renouncing the inheritance; but Pliny, to fave the reputation of the deceased, generously forbuted a confiderable fum towards her fortune, when the was married (42). The reader will find in Pliny's letters innumerable other instances of his generosity, difinterestedness, and good-nature, which the brevity we have proposed to ourselves will not allow us to relate in this place.

Pompeius Saturninus flourished under Trajan, and is highly commended by Pliny, with whom he lived in great friendship, as an excellent orator, poet and historian (43). Pliny published nothing without submitting it first to the judgment of Saturninus (44). This is perhaps the same Saturninus who died in the fifth year of Trajan's reign, and bequeathed part of his estate to Pliny (45). His works have been long fince loft. Titinius Capito is likewise mentioned by Pliny as a writer of no mean character. He described the deaths of illustrious men, amongst whom were fome of his cotemporaries, condemned, no doubt, by Domitian (46). Pliny tells us elsewhere (47), that with excellent verses he celebrated the actions of great men; and adds, that he prevailed upon the emperor, Nerva or Trajan, to erect a statue in the forum to L. Silanus, who was by Nero's orders put to death in the year 65, the eleventh of that prince's seign. Cataneus, in his notes upon Pliny (48), tells us, that Lactantius quotes a book upon the public flews written by Titinius Capito. Claudius Pollie, who is likewise greatly commended by Pliny (49), wrote the life of Musonius Bassus, his benefactor. Suidas speaks of one Alinius Pollio, who was a native of Tralles in Asia, and a celebrated sophist and philosopher, and ascribes to him several pieces; amongst the rest, one giving an account of the memorable ctions and fayings of the philosopher Musonius; but he adds, that Musonius taught at Rome in the time of Pompey the great (50); but is commonly thought to have been therein guilty of a great overlight (51). Pliny likewife mentions and commends one Verginius Romanus, who wrote comedies, and other poetical pieces (52). Under Trajan flourished, according to Voffius (53), two Greek poets, Serapio, an Athenian, Plutarch's friend, and Rufus, an Ephelian, author of the fix books upon simples, known to Galen, and other physicians. Pliny feems to have entertained a mighty opinion of the fophist Icans, who came to Rome, when he was about fixty (54), and there gained, as appears from fuvenal (55), the reputation of an eloquent orator. He was a native of Affyria, and in his youth had led a most debauched life; but afterwards, changing his conduct, applied himself to the study of philosophy and eloquence (56). He seems to have left no other works behind him, except his declamations. Of Plutarch, Suetonius, Epidetus, and feveral other writers, who lived

(26) Gord. p. 18—23. (27) Plin. prol & l. v. ep. 8. (28) Idem, l. ii. ep. 14. (29) Idem, l. i. ep. 10. (30) Voff. bift. Lat. l. i. c. 20. (31) Sidon. l. iv. ep. 23. (32) Plin. l. v. ep. 8. (33) Voff. bifd. (34) Plin. L. i. ep. 8. (35) Idem, l. ii. ep. 14. (42) Idem, l. ii. ep. 21. (39) Idem, l. ii. ep. 22. (38) Idem, l. iii. ep. 21. (39) Idem, l. ii. ep. 22. (38) Idem, l. iii. ep. 23. (39) Idem, l. vii. ep. 23. (38) Idem, l. iii. ep. 24. (41) Idem, l. vii. ep. 11. (50) Idem, l. iii. ep. 24. (43) Idem, l. vii. ep. 16. (44) Idem ibid. ep. 8. (45) Idem, l. v. ep. 7. (46) Idem, l. viii. ep. 12. (47) Idem, l. i. ep. 17. (48) Plin. l. i. ep. 17. (49) Idem, l. vii. ep. 31. (50) Suidas, p. 579. (51) Vide Forif L vii. c. 7. (52) Plin. l. vi. ep. 31. (53) Voff. poes. Grac. p. 73. (54) Plin. l. i. ep. 3. (55) Fuv. sat iii. ver 74. (56) Philostr. soph. c. 20. Suidas, p. 1274.

VOL. VI. No.

Cha

b ſk

€n fo W

b ma

W.L

ra

m c for lia:

WI

hic

di

A ¢m, licis

ter i affai

filen

reway.

twice

(0:01

comt:

t bilas 6

the far

ticog

the z

1 D:

e Rom

1 D

C H A P. XXI.

The history of Rome, from the death of Trajan, to the death of Marcus Aurelius, when the power of the Roman empire began to decline.

Adrian.

His extraction. employments, &c.

Drian, who succeeded Trajan in the empire, was the son of Elius Adrianus Aser, 2 cousin-german to that prince, and of Domitia Paulina, sprung from an illu-Arrious family in Cadiz. His family came originally from Italica in Spain, the native city of Trajan, whither Adrian, in the account he wrote of his own life, pretended, that his ancestors had removed some ages before from the city of Adria in the country of the Picentes, now the dukedom of Atri in Abruzzo. Marullinus, his great-great-grandfather, was the first Roman senator of the samily. He was born, according to Spartian, in Rome, on the twenty-fourth of January, in the year seventy-six of the christian zera, while Vespasian was consul the seventh time, and Titus the fifth i. Eutropius writes, that he was born in Italica; but Casaubon thinks he was therein mistaken k. He was named P. Ælius Adrianus, or Hadrianus, to which names he added, after b his accession to the empire, that of Trajan!. His father dying when he was but ten years old, left him under the guardianship of Trajan and Cælius Tatianus, or Attianus, as Salmasius calls him, a Roman knight m. He applied himself to the study of the Greek tongue, and was, at the age of fifteen, so thoroughly acquainted with that language, that he was commonly furnamed the Young Grecian. He then went to ferve in Spain, and staid there till he was recalled by Trajan, with whom he lived as his son. He was soon after appointed by Domitian one of the decemvirs, and thence raised to the command of the second auxiliary legion, with which he was sent into Masia about the latter end of that prince's reign. We are told, that in Masia an astrologer affured him, that the fovereign power was by the fates destined to him; which was c confirming what his great-uncle Ælius Adrianus, who was likewise skilled in astrology, had foretold many years before. When Trajan was adopted by Nerva, he was fent to him with the congratulations of the army upon that occasion, and foon after removed by Nerva from Masia into Upper Germany; whence he hastened, upon the death of that prince, which happened foon after, to carry the first tidings of it to Trajan. Servianus, who commanded in Upper Germany, and was no friend to Adrian, tho' he had married his fifter Paulina, detained him, till he had dispatched an express to Trajan with the news of Nerva's death, and afterwards supplied him with an old chariot, which broke down by the way, that he might not ingratiate himself with the new emperor, by first informing him of his accession to the empire. But never- td theless Adrian pursued his journey on foot with such expedition, that he arrived in Lower Germany, where Trajan then was, before the express o. Trajan kept him with him; but tho' he was his kinsman, his guardian, tho' he gave him afterwards his fister's grand-daughter, Sabina, in marriage, yet he never conferred any extraor-dinary honours upon him. In his youth he had squandered away his estate, and contracted great debts; which, with his other vices, Servianus took care to exaggerate to the emperor, in order to estrange his mind from him, and prevent his adopting him; for Servianus entertained a very indifferent opinion of Adrian, and believed, that Rome could never be happy under such a prince P; and truly he was a person of most extraordinary parts, and had some great virtues, but allayed with no less vices. e His extraordi- He was endowed with a memory almost beyond belief; he could repeat by heart a whole book, however difficult and intricate the subject of it was, after having once perused it; he knew the name of every foldier in the army, and remembred the names of all the old foldiers, who had once ferved under him, tho' they had been long

Trajan conferred no extraordinary honour: upon

nary memory, learning, &c.

> * SPART. in Adrian. p. 1-3. Parif. 1620. 1 Dio, l. Ixviii. p. 785. not, ad Spart. P Idem, p. 8.

1 Idem ibid. & P. Pagi p. 30. m SPART, ibid n Idem ibid.

k CASAUB in

· Idem, p. 4.

penfions

a disbanded. He excelled in every branch of learning, and was without comparison the best orator, poet, grammarian, philosopher and mathematician of his time; thoroughly skilled in physic; well acquainted with the virtues and properties of most herbs and minerals; in drawing and painting he was equal to the greatest masters; sung, and plaid upon all kinds of instruments, so as to be reckoned the most skilful musician of the age he lived in. He even applied himself to the study of judicial astrology, and magic. He used at the same time to write, dictate to several secretaries, give audience to his ministers, and discourse with them about affairs of the greatest importance; for no man was better acquainted with his domestic affairs, than he with those of the whole empire. His court was conftantly crouded with philosophers, orators, poets, Favours the mathematicians, &c. for whom he always shewed a particular esteem, and took great learned. pleasure in disputing with them, and challenging the poets by extemporary verses, at which he had an extraordinary talent. Having one day excepted against an expression used by Favorinus, that philosopher modestly yielded, the he might have produced out of good authors sufficient authority for his expression; which seeming strange to his friends, Do you think, said pleasantly Favorinus, that I will pretend to be more learned than one who has thirty legions at his beck ? In the beginning of his reign Instances of his he gave many instances of his elemency and good-nature; but afterwards caused seve- elemency. ral persons to be unjustly put to death: whence some writers cry him up as a most merciful prince, while others represent him as naturally inclined to cruelty, but often c forgiving injuries, through fear of undergoing the fate of Caligula, Nero, and Domitian. In the very beginning of his reign Tatianus advised him to put three persons to death, who, he said, would not sail to raise disturbances, viz. Babius Macer governor of Rome, Laberius Maximus, and Crassus Frugi, of whom the two latter had conspired against Trajan, and were then in banishment; but the emperor would not hearken to any fuggestions against them, saying, It would be highly unjust and tyrannical to punish any one for a crime, which he was only likely to commit r. Spartian writes, that he freely forgave all those who had any-ways injured him while he was a private person; and that one day meeting one of them after he was emperor, he told him, That he had escaped by his promotion to the empire'. On the other hand, d Dion Cassius tells us, that he remembred and punished with great severity some injuries Remembers done him in Trajan's time; and that he never forgave the famous architect Apollo- fome injuries dorus, who had spoken contemptuously of him before that prince. He allowed every done him in one free access to him, and seemed never better pleased than when they spoke to him Trajan's time. with liberty, or admonished him of his faults. Of this we read the following instance: A woman having one day applied to him on occasion of a troublesome law-suit, the emperor told her, That he was not then at leifure to hear her. The woman, not fatisfied with this answer, cried out to him aloud, To what purpose then are you emperor? With which frankness Adrian was so well pleased, that, postponing all other affairs, he heard her with great patience, and dismissed her fully satisfied ". The Roman people demanding one day with great noise in the theatre something, which Adrian was no-ways inclined to grant them, he ordered the public crier to command filence with the imperious word Tacete, Be filent, used by Domitian on the like occasion; but the crier, instead of obeying him, said only, The emperor begs you would be filent; Bears to be adwhich Adrian was fo far from refenting, that he commended his prudence, and amply monished. rewarded it w. He was courteous and affable towards persons of all ranks, conversed Kind to his familiarly with his friends, and visited them, nay, and his freed-men, when indisposed, friends; twice or thrice a day, comforting them in their fickness, and affisting them with his counsels. He frequently entertained them at his table, and honoured them with his company at their houses, without being invited, conversing with them more like a f private person than a prince. He refused them nothing which he thought reasonable to grant them, and inriched some who had never asked him the least favour x; but at the same time gave ear to slanderers, and believed every tale that was whispered But gives ear against them; whence all those whom he had most favoured, and raised to the highest to slanderers. honours, were in the end difgraced, treated by him as enemies, and either put to death, or banished y. His liberality knew no bounds; he allotted large sums for His liberality. the maintenance of poor children of both sexes, and in that excelled even Trajan. Upon such of the senators as were, by misfortunes, reduced to poverty, he settled r Spart. p. 10. 10cm, p. 70. Dio, p. 791. 9 Idem ibid. Ammian. l. xxx. Dio, l. lxix. p. 790. * Dio, l. lx'x. p. 789. w Idem ibid. Idem, p. 790. 7 SPART. & Dio, ibid.

pensions suitable to their rank, and the number of their children. Among the populace he distributed yearly an immense quantity of corn, made large presents to such

i

C

b

h

ŧ

ŀ

4

G

c di

for up

200

he

m

ra) W

po

in

þ Ħ

th

the thre

thia

IACI

Prov e the:

feari

terri

lity

let o

that sevet

Ħ; ş

reign Ti

f to th

0.311

Rome

0 10

120

to w:

ď٠

of the knights as were not able to support their dignity, and supplied all those whom he appointed governors of provinces, or commanders of armies, with horses, mules, cloaths, and money to defray the charges of their journey. During the feast of Saturn he used to send presents to his friends, laying hold of that opportunity to reward them for their fidelity and attachment to his person. His presents to kings and princes always exceeded those which they had fent him. Such of the public professors as were no longer able to discharge their office as they ought, he dismissed with marks of honour, and handsome allowances. As he spent most part of his reign in visiting the provinces of the empire, he left every-where marks of a magnificence truly great b and princely 2. He is faid never to have feized unjustly any man's property 2; neither would he ever receive legacies left him by persons who were not known to him, Respects the se- or by such of his friends as had children b. He shewed on all occasions a high respect for the senate, consuls, and other magistrates, transacting nothing without their advice.

the administration of ju-

nate.

Allows no power to bis freed-men.

He scarce ever failed assisting at their assemblies, when he was either at or near Rome, and usually waited on the consuls to their houses. He would not suffer the Roman knights to sit as judges in the cause of a senator, tho' that had been customary when the cause was pleaded before the emperor in person; neither would he allow of any Is impartial in appeals from the senate to him c. He administred justice with great impartiality, following therein the advice of P. Jubentius Celsus, Salvius Julianus, and Neratius c Priscus, all three men of great probity, and the best civilians in Rome. He narrowly inquired into the conduct and behaviour of his ministers, discharging them when guilty of the least injustice or misdemeanour. He allowed his freed-men no power; and fuch as pretended to have any, in order to gain by that means credit or wealth, he punished with the utmost severity. Observing one day from his window one of his freed-men walking between two senators, he sent one of his attendants to give him a box on the ear, and tell him, that it did not become him to walk between two perfons, to whom he might one day be a slave d. He was an enemy to all pomp and parade; whence he would never suffer the senators to attend him but upon business. He usually returned from the senate in a sedan, that the senators might be dispensed d from accompanying him to the palace. His medals are all very plain, without the usual titles of emperor, bigh pontiff, father of his country, &cc. He would not suffer his name to be put upon any of the stately buildings which he erected, except upon the temple which he built in honour of Trajan; but at the same time was pleased that several aqueducts and cities should bear his name. Out of Rome he laid quite aside the port and majesty of an emperor; in his garb and dress he little varied from a common foldier; his diet was such as chance presented; he usually marched on foot, with his head bare, making no distinction between the frozen mountains of the Alps, and the fcorching deserts of Africa; he visited the soldiers in person when sick, took particular care of their provisions, made them presents, &c. but at the same time put down e the use of arbours, shady walks, bowers, &c. banishing from the camp whatever feemed in the least to encourage luxury and idleness. He was acquainted with every foldier in the army, knew his age, remembred his exploits, if he had performed any, &c. He preferred none but men of courage, strength, and good characters, saying, He revives the Such as the officers are, such will the soldiers soon be. By this means he revived and restored the ancient military discipline, which, by the negligence of many princes, had been decaying ever fince the time of Augustus f. He is generally blamed by the ancients as too inquisitive, and prying into every one's secrets, tho' they no-ways concerned him; as addicted to the most infamous pleasures, and abandoned to all manner of superstition; which was the chief cause of his persecuting the christians, whom f he looked upon as enemies to the idolatrous worship of his gods g. He took great delight in hunting, and is faid to have killed bears, lions, and other wild beafts, with his own hand. He founded a town in Masia, which he called Adrianothera, that is, Adrian's chace, because he had killed a bear there. He loved his hunting-horses and dogs to such a degree, that he built them tombs, and wrote himself their epitaphs b. He was the first emperor, as Spartian observes b, who let his beard grow, ancient military discipline.

His vices.

<sup>2</sup> SPART. p. 10. Dio, p. 790. Philost. soph. c. 27. Dio, ibid. SPART. p. 9. Liem, p. 17. didem, p. 10. eidem, p. 9, 10. fidem, p. 5. Dio, p. 790—792. E Dio, & SPART. ibid. Ammian. l. xxv. Hier. chion. Tertul. 2pol. c. 5. h Spart. p. 12, 13. Dio, p. 792. lidem ibid. P. 792.

a to cover some scars, which disfigured that part of his face. He married, as we have related above, Julia Sabina, grand-daughter to Marciana, Trajan's fifter; but treated Diffikes his her more like a flave than a wife, and often declared, that, had he been a private per-wife Julia Safon, he would have divorced her. However, he suffered her to be honoured with the bina. title of Augusta, when he took that of the father of his country k. He is thought in the end to have poisoned her, being no longer able to bear with her haughty and imperious temper. She seems to have been a woman of a very indifferent character; for she is said to have publicly bragged of her having prevented Adrian from having any children by her, and by that means faved the world from utter destruction i. Having thus premifed a fuccinct account of the virtues and vices of Adrian, we shall b now proceed to the history of his reign, according to the order of time. Having caused himself to be declared emperor on the eleventh of August of the year 117, he immediately wrote to the senate, excusing his having assumed that title without their consent and authority, alledging, that he had been forced to it by the soldiery. He begged they would confirm the title, without conferring other honours upon him till he deferved them. In the same letter he solemnly promised never to put any senator to death, nor to transact any affair of consequence without their counsel and advice m. He doubled the donative given by other emperors to the foldiery, and appointed Tatianus, or Attianus, formerly his guardian, with Similis, captains of the prætorian guards. Similis was a man of great probity, moderation and prudence, and had The characters c distinguished himself in quality of centurion under Trajan, who had a particular value of Similis and for him. As it was much against his will that he accepted the command conferred tains of the upon him by Adrian, he resigned it three years after, withdrew into the country, pratorian and there fpent in retirement the feven remaining years of his life. A little before guards. he died, he composed his own epitaph, importing, that he had been seventy six years upon the earth, but lived only feven n. Tatianus was a man of a quite different character; for he advised Adrian, upon his accession to the empire, to put several persons to death; and was thought to have been the chief author of the murders, which that prince committed about two years after o. Adrian had no fooner taken possession of the empire, than he deprived the brave Lusius Quietus, who had served d with great credit under Trajan, of the command of his countrymen the Moors, suspecting him as if he aspired at the empire. As to the conquests made by his predecessor, he resolved to abandon them all; and accordingly withdrew his troops from Arme- Adrian abannia, Mesopotamia, and Assyria; so that the Euphrates became anew the boundary of dons the country the Roman empire. He allowed the Armenians to chuse themselves a king; and as tries conquered the Parthians were diffatisfied with Parthamaspates, whom Trajan had raised to the Trajan. throne, he appointed him king of fome neighbouring nation, and fuffered the Parthians to recal Cofrhoes, whom Trajan had driven out two years before P. He was likewise determined to abandon Dacia; but his friends prevailed upon him to keep a province, in which fuch numbers of Roman citizens had fettled. However, he ordered e the arches of the famous bridge built by Trajan over the Danube to be broken down, fearing the barbarians might make themselves masters of it, and invade the Roman territories 9. Adrian, having given the necessary orders for maintaining the tranquillity of the east, and appointed Catilius Severus governor of Syria, left Antioch, and fet out for Rome, which he did not reach till the next year . Epiphanius tells us, that before he left the east, he went into Egypt; and that passing by Jerusalem fortyfeven years after it had been taken by Titus, on that occasion he resolved to rebuild it; which defign however he did not put in execution before the latter end of his reign 4.

THE following year Adrian entered upon his second consulship, having been named f to that dignity by Trajan before he died, together with Fuscus Salinator, who had married the daughter of Servianus, Adrian's niece . This year Adrian returned to He arrives as Rome, where he was received by all ranks of men with extraordinary demonstrations Rome; but of joy; but he could by no means be prevailed upon to accept the triumph, which refuses the tri-had been prepared for Trajan, and was by the senate decreed for him. As him had been prepared for Trajan, and was by the senate decreed for him. At his mo- him by the setion that honour was conferred upon the image of Trajan, which Adrian himself seems nate. to have carried u. Soon after his entrance into the city, he remitted to the inhabi-

k Eusen. chron. Onos. l. vii. c. 13. 1 Vict. epit. * Dio, l. lxix. p. 788. cum not. Salmaf. p. 19. Dio, p. 796. O SPART. & DIO, ibid. P SPART. p. 10. Dto. l. Ixviii. p. 776. LUTROP. in Adrian. & idat. Cassiodor. Onuph. in faft. 9 EUTROP. in Adrian. & Dio, ibid. F SPART. P. 3. · EPIPHAN. menf c. 14. B SPART. p. 3. Vol. VI. Nos. CADES

Cha:

a 214

10 1

cry

1740

Will

0.3

T. ..

ot.

g:1,

the

K 15

ord.

thro

01 15

clia!

11.7

101

dag

to ( 143,3

tevu.

1:0:1

to fo

Cara

Cirr

CO433

orde

flak

pra

H

ыĥ

alil

mag

lever

raile

and p guins

to rec

Dave,

with a

the gu dittrac

larther

tam ty

a discor

hee ci:

Dough!

ים: נהון

Tillia येंगु राज्य

F. ..

4...

(...

(;;

D. .

P. 6 3

e 10 cos

d tary

c man

b whe

Remarkable

tants of Rome and Italy all debts, without restriction, due from them to the exchequer, and to particular persons in the provinces what was owing by them for the last fixteen years, burning in Trajan's new square all the bonds and registers relating to those debts, in order to secure every one against such claims. The sum which he forgave on this occasion, amounted to seven millions of our money, and upwards. No wonder therefore that fuch a generous action is fo much extolled by the historians of those times, and mentioned in most of the inscriptions and medals of this and the following year. On one of the medals which has reached our times, Adrian is represented with a torch in his hand, setting fire to the bonds, with this legend, He inriches the whole world w. Besides, he lessened the taxes both at Rome and in the provinces, and eased the cities of the great burden which had been laid upon them b by Trajan, of supplying such as travelled for the service of the public with horses, chariots and carriages, which was thenceforth done at the charge of the emperor x.

lani defeated.

Four confulars

put to death.

THE following year Adrian was conful the third time; but refigned the fasces after four months, and never after refumed them. He had for his collegue one Rusticus, of whom we find no further mention. This year the Sarmatians and the Roxoans and Roxo- lani, whose country bordered on the Palus Mæotis, invaded Illyricum; which obliged Adrian to leave Rome, and hasten into Masia, where he defeated the barbarians upon their return from Illyricum. Those who escaped, saved themselves by swimming crois the Danube, and soon after sent embassadors to Adrian, who granted them honourable terms, and by that means put a speedy end to the war. They afterwards c quarrelled with one another, and chose Adrian for their umpire, who composed their differences to the general satisfaction of both parties. Having thus both terrified the barbarians, and at the same time gained their affections, he appointed Martius Turbo, whom he had recalled from Mauritania, governor of Pannonia and Dacia, and led his army into Illyricum; whence he wrote to the fenate, complaining of Cornelius Palma, L. Publius Celsus, Domitius Nigrinus, and Lusius Quietus, as if they had formed a conspiracy against him. They were all consulars, men of extraordinary parts, and had been greatly esteemed and beloved by Trajan; but nevertheless the senate, out of complaifance to the emperor, ordered them to be immediately put to death, without fo much as acquainting them that they had been accused. As no one believed them d guilty of the crime laid to their charge, their death drew upon the emperor the public hatred, who thereupon left Illyricum, and hastened back to Rome, where he publicly declared upon his oath, that they had been executed against his will, and without his knowledge; but was not believed, fays Dion Cassius, by those who knew, that Palma and Celjus had been always his enemies, and that he was jealous of Nigrinus and Quietus, who were equally beloved and esteemed by the Roman people y. Besides these four excellent men, as Dion Cassius styles them, several other persons of great merit and distinction were accused and condemned, as privy to the supposed conspiracy; which filled the city with dread and terror. But Adrian himself, having got rid of those whom he chiefly feared, put a stop to the cruel and unjust proceedings e of the fenate, by an edict, forbidding any one to be accused or tried upon the law of majesty. He was desirous of having Tatianus, formerly his guardian, and now captain of the prætorian guards, put to death; for he was a man of a haughty and imperious temper, and assumed greater power and authority, than the emperor was willing to grant him; but nevertheless Adrian, not thinking it adviseable to spill more blood, diffembled his hatred for the present, and prevailed upon Tationus to refign his command, by offering him a place in the fenate, and the confular ornaments; which he readily accepted. Martius Turbo, governor of Pannonia and Dacia, and one of the best officers of his age, was put in his room, as was Septicius Clarus in the room of Similis, who this year refigned of his own accord, and retired from the f city 2. Toward the end of the year the emperor went into Campania, where he relieved with great generofity the poor inhabitants of all the cities through which he

THE next confuls were L. Catilius Severus, whom Adrian had appointed governor of Syria three years before, and Titus Aurelius Fulvus, who forceeded Adrian in the empire, and is commonly known by the name of Antoninus Pius 2. This year Adrian, who used to say, that an emperor ought to imitate the sun, who illuminates not one

w Spanh. 1. ix. p. 811, 815. * Spart. p. 1. * SPART. p. 17. 7 Dio, l. lxix. p. 788. * Idem, p. 795, 196. SPART. P. 7.

a place, but all the corners and regions of the earth, began his progress, with a design Adrian resolves to visit in person all the provinces of the empire, and examine the state of each coun- to visit all the try subject to Rome, that he might not be obliged to depend intirely upon the accounts empire. transmitted to him by his ministers and governors. Thus he employed almost the whole remainder of his reign, that is, near seventeen years. From several ancient coins we learn, that he visited the following countries, Gaul, Spain, Germany, Mauritan a, Africa, Libya, Sicily, Achaia or Greece, Eubxa, Macedonia, Egypt, and the city of Alexandria, Palestine, Arabia, Syria, Cilicia, Pamphylia, Lycia, Cappadocia, Phrygia, Asia, Bithynia, Thrace, Massia, and Dalmatia b. No mention is made on any of the medals, which have reached us, of Britain, Armenia or Dacia; which provinces, it is certain, he visited, as we shall relate anon. He began his progress with Gaul, He goes into b where he viewed all the chief cities and Roman forts, and fignalized himself by extra-Gaul, and ordinary bounties, relieving with great generofity the poor inhabitants in all the places thence into through which he passed. From Gaul he went into Germany, where lay the flower of the Roman troops; and therefore he spent some time there, in order to revive and establish among them the ancient military discipline; for he did not leave Germany till the beginning of the following year, when Annius Verus, grandfather to the emperor Marcus Aurelius, and Augur, or, as he is called in the Alexandrian chronicle, Augurinus, were confuls. During their confulate, Adrian, leaving Germany, returned to Gaul, and from thence passed over into Britain, where he is said to have reformed Crosses over c many abuses . The greatest part of the island was, when he arrived in Britain, into Britain. subject to Rome; but the northern nations had, upon the departure of Agricola, revolted, and recovered their ancient liberty. Adrian did not think it adviseable, nor worth his while, to make war upon them, and reduce them anew; but, in order to fecure the countries belonging to the Romans against the incursions of the warlike Caledonians, he caused a mighty wall to be built, extending from the river Eden in His wall there. Cumberland, to the Tine in Northumberland, eighty miles in length d. In other countries too, where the barbarians were not separated from the Romans by rivers, he ordered walls to be made of earth, fays Spartiane, which were strengthened with sharp stakes driven deep into the ground. In Britain he disgraced and discharged his secred tary Suetonius Tranquillus, no doubt the historian, and Septicius Clarus, captain of the prætorian guards, for their difrespectful behaviour towards the empress Sabina f. Having settled the affairs of Britain, he returned to Gaul, and built at Nisme a mag-Hereturns to nisicent palace, in honour of Plotina, Trajan's widow. No remains of this stately Gaul, edifice, or basilie, as Spartian calls it, are now to be seen; but the antiquaries take the magnificent amphitheatre, which the inhabitants call les Arenes, the Pont du gard, and feveral other ancient buildings, which are still to be seen in that city, to have been raised by Adrian, or by his successor Antoninus 8. From Gaul Adrian went into Spain, And thence and passed the winter at Tarraco, now Tarragona, where he rebuilt the temple of Au-goes into Spain, gustus founded by Tiberius, and held a general assembly of the states of Spain, in order to compose the differences which reigned amongst them, about the raising of levies to recruit the Roman armies. At Tarraco he narrowly escaped being killed by a Where he is in flave, who, while the emperor was walking in his mafter's garden, affaulted him danger of being with a drawn fword. Adrian, closing with him, seized him, and delivered him to affaffinated. the guards, who were hastening to his assistance; but afterwards, finding the slave was distracted in his senses, he committed him to the care of the physicians, and took no farther notice of the attempt. Adrian did not visit the city of Italica, whence his family originally came; but distinguished it with many privileges b. Gellius quotes a discourse made by the emperor in the senate in favour of Italica, Utica, and other free cities, demanding the rights and privileges of colonies, tho' Adrian himself f thought the condition of free cities preferable to that of the colonies. From Spain the emperor returned to Rome in the month of April, as appears from an ancient Returns to inscription, Acilius Aviola and Cornelius Pansa being then consuls: but he did not Rome. stay there long; for either in the end of this, or the beginning of the following year, When Quintus Arrius Patinus and Caius Ventidius Apronianus were confuls, he was, according to St. Jerom and Eusebiusk, at Athens. During his stay in that city, the Goes to Athens, Cephifus happening to break over its banks, and lay under water great part of the and from city of Eleusina, he caused a bridge to be built over that river, and provided thence into the b Birag. p. 175, 177. C Spart. p. 6. d Dublin. 1635. C Idem ibid. F Idem ibid. p. 6. & Dio, p. 792. I Aul. Gell. l. xvi. c. 13. d Idem ibid. Usser. Britan. eccles. antiq. p. 1024. id. & Vide Salmas. in Spart. p. 23. h Idem, k Euses. chron. p. 211.

against

ti

Б

in ſť

ne

h

р

٧

th

co:

har

all

col

tre

the

thr

yea

υſ

te

ďς

an

the

Wei

god,

271

Patri

e Jags

to be

 $Th_{3}$

of sc

Rom.

It hos

them

hono:

10 fo

again.

Pirt (

California

Dec u

itient. io.

E-41

 $\mathbb{I}_{n}^{-1}$

Ge ]

c la

Visus several

Visus Sicily, and returns to Rome.

so Africa, whence he re-

Venus and Rome.

ie, which costs him his life.

against its overflowing for the suture ". From Athens he passed into the east, where a he apprehended a war with the Parthians; but prevented it by a conference, with whom history does not inform us; but it was in all likelihood with Cofrbces king of the Parthians. The following year, Manius Acilius Glabrio and Caius Bellicius Torquatus being consuls, Adrian returned from the east through Asia, and visited Circia, provinces, and Lycia, Pamphylia, Cappadocia, Bithynia, and Phrygia, ordering temples, squares and passes the win- other edifices to be built at his expence in most of the chief cities of those provinces, especially in Nicomedia, Nicaa and Cyzicus. He likewise visited the islands of the Archipelago, and arrived in the beginning of the following year, P. Cornelius Scipio Afiaticus and Vettius Aquilinus being consuls, in Achaia, and passed the remaining part of the winter at Athens, where he was initiated in the rites of Ceres and Proferpine, b called the Eleusinian mysteries, following therein the example of Hercules, and Philip king of Macedon. From Athens, after he had presided there at the public games, and bestowed innumerable favours upon the Athenians, he failed to Sicily, where he was led by his curiofity to vifit the top of mount Ætna, in order to view from thence the rifing fun, believed to exhibit there all the colours of the rain-bow. From Sicily he returned to Rome in the beginning of the following year, when Annius Verus, grandfather to the emperor Marcus Aurelius, was the third time conful, with L. Varius Ambibulus w. The two next years, the eleventh and twelfth of Adrian's reign, and 127, and 128, of the christian æra, are quite barren of events. The consuls were Titianus and Gallicanus, Torquatus Asprenas and Annius Libox. The following year, c Rebuilds seve- P. Juventius Celsus and Q. Julius Balbus Marcellus being consuls, the cities of Nicomeral cities at his dia, Casarea and Nicae in Bithynia were almost intirely overturned by an earthquake; but rebuilt at the expence of the emperor, who was thence styled the Restorer of Bithynia, as appears from some medals v. In the beginning of this year Adrian was still at Rome; for on the third of March he proposed some difficulties touching inheritances, which were resolved by a decree of the senate, dated the sourteenth of the Crosses over in- same month 2. But soon after he set out again on a new progress, passing first into Africa; where, upon his arrival, it rained, after a five years drought, which, together turns to Rome, with the many favours he bestowed upon the inhabitants of that province, (for he left every-where fignal marks of his liberality and good-nature) gained him the affections d of all ranks of men. From Africa he returned to Rome, and there caused the obsequies of Plotina, to whom he was indebted for the empire, to be performed with the utmost pomp and magnificence. She died either while Adrian was in Africa, or soon and is ranked after his return from thence. He bewailed her with many tears, appeared for nine among the gods days in deep mourning, composed verses in her praise, and caused her to be ranked among the gods 2.

THE next confuls were 2. Fabius Catullinus and M. Flavius Aper, during whose administration a temple was built at Rome, in honour of that city, and of the goddess Venus, which was called the Temple of Rome, and the Temple of the fortune of Rome b. On account of this temple Adrian changed the ancient name of the feast, which was e yearly kept on the twenty-first of April for the foundation of Rome, calling it Romana, instead of Palilia. This temple was one of the wonders which the emperor Constantius chiefly admired when he came to Romed. It was afterwards confumed by accidental fire, and rebuilt by Maxentius. When the fabric was ended, Adrian sent the plan of it to the famous architect Apollodorus; which was tacitly telling him, that he was not the only great architect in the world: and this was what the emperor meant by fending the plan after the building was accomplished; for the himself had employed him, yet he bore him a private grudge, on account of his having checked him with great acrimony, for pretending, in Trajan's time, to give his opinion concerning certain buildings. Apollodorus, who was no flatterer, after having viewed f finds fault with the plan, defired those who brought it to tell the emperor from him, that the fabric was too low for the place in which it stood; and, on the contrary, the statues of Rome and Venus too tall: the architect, added he pleasantly, has taken care, that the goddesses shall not rise, nor walk out. Adrian was so offended at the freedom of this answer, that tho' he had defired Apollodorus to acquaint him with his sentiments concerning the building, yet he banished him, and soon after, under some pretence or other,

w Norts. epift. consul. p. 78. Dio, l. lxix. p. 797. * IDAT. ONUPH. &c. 7 Euseb. in chron. p. 211. BIRAG. p. 123.
1. Dio, p. 792 BAMMIAN. l. xvi. Digeft. v. c. 3. l. xx. Noris. epift.
ATHEN. l. viii. 4 Ammian. ronful. p. 421. 2 Dio, p. 1

a other, caused him to be put to death . In the beginning of the summer Adrian set out from Rome, with a design to visit anew the provinces of the east; and passing through Athens, purfued his journey to Afia, where he confectated feveral temples. Adrian returns In Cappadocia he purchased a great number of slaves for the servile offices of the camp. 10 Asia, To Cojrboes he fent back his daughter, who had been taken prisoner by Trajan, and promised to restore to him his golden throne; but never performed his promise. He invited to a conference all the neighbouring kings, and many of them complied with And there conthe invitation, viz. Malasses king of the Lazi, Resmagas king of the Abassi, Spadages eastern kings. king of the Sauni or Sauniges, Staquimsan king of the Zydretæ. The territories of these princes lay partly east, partly north of the Euxine sea. Besides these, several b other petty kings came to wait upon Adrian, and were by him entertained with great pomp and magnificence, and loaded with rich presents upon their departure. Baltrian princes did not come, but sent embassadors to conclude an alliance with the people of Rome. The kings of Albania and Iberia neither fent embaffadors, nor came in person; which they repented when they understood how the others had been received and entertained f. In Syria he went up to the top of mount Casius in the neighbourhood of Antioch, to observe from thence the rising sun, and to offer a sacrifice to Jupiter, who was worshipped upon that mountain; but he was there overtaken by a violent storm of thunder and lightning, which fell both upon the priest and the victim s. From Syria he passed into Palestine and Arabia, and from thence into Egypt h. stine, Arabia, c It is observed in the Alexandrian chronicle, that the famous colossus of Rhodes shook and Egypt.

this year, the fourteenth of Adrian's reign, for the first time '.

THE next year Servius Octavius Lanas Pontianus and M. Antoninus Rusinus were confuls. During their administration, Salvius Julianus, one of the most learned civilians of his age, compiled, by the emperor's command, the perpetual editi, containing all the laws which had been yearly published by the prætors in their edicts. This collection was called the edictum perpetuum, because it was to continue in force for The edictum ever, to be as a body of standing laws, to prevent the great confusion occasioned by the new edicts, and to serve as a guide and rule in the administration of justice throughout the whole empire k. Adrian continued in Egypt all this and the following d year, when Augurinus and Sergianus were consuls. At Pelusium he visited the tomb of Pompey the Great; and finding it almost intirely demolished, he ordered it to be repaired at his own expence, and performed the usual ceremonies in honour of the deceased hero. He disliked the fickle, turbulent and satirical temper of the Egypti- He dislikes the ans, especially of the Alexandrians. In a letter which he wrote to Servianus his bro-fatirical temther-in-law, he tells him, that the Christians, Sarmatians and Jews of that country xandrians. were always ready to change their religion, because they all adored one and the same god, their own interest; and adds, that they all superstitiously observed the motion and aspects of the stars, and pretended to be skilled in divination m. He speaks of a patriarch, who now-and-then visited Egypt, meaning, no doubt, the patriarch of the e Jews. He concludes with this observation, that at Alexandria no one was suffered to be idle; infomuch that even those who were blind followed some profession. That city had, it feems, forfeited many of its ancient privileges, probably on account of some sedition; for St. Jerom tells us, that it was almost intirely ruined by the Romans P; but Adrian not only repaired both the public and private buildings, and He repairs the restored to the inhabitants their former privileges, but heaped new favours upon city of Alexanthem; for which they returned him folemn thanks, and conferred upon him what flores to the Ahonours they could. But this fense of gratitude was not in them long-lived; for he lexandrians no sooner lest their city, than they published most bitter and virulent lampoons their ancient f against him and his favourites. In the palace at Alexandria, which took up the third privileges. part of the city, one quarter was confecrated to the muses and sciences, and thence called the Museum. There were lodged, and entertained at the expence of the public, men of learning, divided into feveral companies or colleges, according to the different sciences and sects which they professed. They were all under one head, who was named by the emperor, and honoured with the title of pontiff. This institution is generally ascribed to Ptolemy Philadelphus king of Egypt, who placed there his samous library. The emperor Claudius to the ancient museum added a new one, with large

* Dio, p. 789.

* SPART. p. 27. ARRIAN. in perip. Pont. p. 7.

* SPART. p. 7.

* Dio, p. 789.

* Vide Voburg. hift. Roman. Germanic. tit. i. p. 401.

* Arriant. c. 2. & Vopisc. ibid.

* Vopisc. ibid.

* Vopisc. ibid.

* Vopisc. ibid.

* Hier. chron. p. 792. Chron. Alexan Francofurt. 1645. Dio, de Linat. c. 2. & Vopisc. ibid. Vol. VI. No 1. revenues.

revenues. In the museum were always persons eminent in all the branches of lite- a rature, and it was by the learned deemed a great honour to be admitted into this

(,

L

P

u

110

B.

25

Вa

Œ

b lei

ces.

107

na(i

far. mo:

To

Iti

fell

c iwo

but kive

from

feem

prov

pero

nor

d ther

lik

Ûr

By Vi:

tor t

redu

drive

order

Roma

accor(

Piaces

MZINg

or day

Och at 017:2

) Jed acoc

poste !

P45 (2)

١, P. 55

Dion

e in St.

He visits the muleum.

He passes into Libya Cyrena-

He is ranked

fociety, or, as it is fometimes expressed, to this table. This distinction Adrian granted to Dionysius the sophist, whom he greatly esteemed, and to an Egyptian poet, named Pancrates q. Adrian did not fail visiting this place, and conversing with the most eminent men of that learned fociety: he examined them, and suffered himself to be by them examined, asking them many questions, and answering those which they proposed to him. The emperor Caracalla suppressed this society in the year 216; but it was afterwards re-established, and subsisted till the civil wars in the time of Aurelian, when that quarter, named Bruchium, was utterly demolished; insomuch that about the latter end of the fourth century, it was quite deferted, and at some b distance from the city o. Adrian from Egypt passed into Libya Cyrencaia, where he killed (for he took great pleasure in hunting) a lion of a monstrous size, which had committed great ravages in that country, and even unpeopled some parts of it w. Ancinous, jup. What most of all rendered Adrian's journey into Egypt remarkable, was the death of possible to have Antinous, a beautiful youth, greatly beloved by a prince addicted to the most unna-Gaerificed tural pleasures. He fell accidentally into the Nile, as he was sailing on that river with the emperor, and was drowned. This is the account which Adrian himself gave of his death. But Dion Cassius assures us, that the emperor, who had applied himself to the study of magic, being, by the false and execrable principles of that art, misled into a belief, that he should prolong his life by sacrificing a human victim to the c infernal gods, was obliged to accept of the tender which Antinous made him of his life, all the rest preserring their own safety to the emperor's. Adrian would by choice have rather sacrificed his dearest friends, than his beloved catamite; but as no constraint was to be used, and none of them cared to prolong the emperor's life at the expence of their own, the offer of Antinous was accepted, and he facrificed . Be that as it will, the emperor bewailed him, says Spartian y, with all the tenderness and weakness of a woman lamenting the death of her husband. To allay in some measure among the gods his grief, he delired the Greeks to rank him amongst the gods; which they did accordingly: so that in a short time all the eastern provinces were filled with statues, temples, and chapels confecrated to this new divinity. At Mantinea in Arcadia a mag- d nificent temple was erected to him by Adrian, solemn sports instituted, and priests appointed to offer victims in honour of the deified pathic. It was even pretended, that he uttered oracles; but his answers were commonly thought to have been composed by Adrian. The astrologers, having discovered, or pretending to discover, a new star, gave out, that it was Antinous. The deifying of Antinous, and the sacrilegious worship paid him, was made use of by the christian writers as an argument to impugn the divinity of the other gods, who were more ancient, but had no better claim to their godhead, than the infamous Antinous, and to expose the pagan religion. This argument we find wonderfully handled by Justin the martyr, who was converted about this time to the christian religion, and likewise by Hegesispus, Athenagoras, e Tatian, Theophilus of Antioch, Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, and Origen. Adrian caused the body of Antinous to be buried with the utmost magnificence, built a city in that place, and changed his tomb into a temple, where he was faid to work miracles '; which we find exposed and ridiculed by the pagans themselves.

Adrian returns to Syria.

The following year, when Hiberus and Sifenna were confuls, Adrian left Egypt, and returned to Syria, where he passed this and the following year, and honoured Servianus his brother-in-law with a third confulship, and gave him C. Vibius Juventius Varus for his collegue. While Servianus was conful, the emperor wrote a letter to him, giving him an account of the state of Egypt, and of Alexandria its metropolis. At the same time he sent some presents, both to him, and his wife Paulina, f the emperor's fister, who died soon after. As Adrian conferred no extraordinary honours upon her after her death, the Roman senate and people were the more displeased with those he had bestowed upon Antinous. Early in the spring he lest Syria, in order to return to Italy; but made a long stay at Athens, after having visited Thrace and Macedon. During his stay at Athens, the Jews revolted, provoked chiefly, says

Visits Thrace and Macedon,

<sup>9</sup> Strabo, l. xvii. p. 793, 794. Ammian. l. xxii. Dio, l. Ixxvii. p. 873. Athen. l. vi. & xxvi. r Spart. p. 10. B Dio, ibid. p. 873. Ammian. l. xxii. Vide Casaub. in Span. p. 36. w Athen l. xv. p. 677. Dio, l. lxix. p. 793. P Spart. p. 7. Dio, ibid. Spart. p. 8. Spanh. L vii. p. 652. Spart. p. 7. Dio, ibid. Dio, ibid. Colligen. in Celf. l. iii. p. 132. Vopisc. vit. Sat. p. 245. Dio, in excerpt. Val. p. 714. in Cels. l. ili. p. 132.

Dion Cassius, at Adrian's sending a Roman colony to Jerusalem; at his calling that city, after the name of his family, Elia Capitolina, and his erecting a temple to Jupiter Capitolinus in the place where the ancient temple stood. Spartian tells us, that Adrian published an edict, forbidding them to be circumcifed; which prompted them to take up arms, and attempt the recovery of their ancient liberty. Be that as it will, Adrian had no fooner left Syria, than they openly revolted, under the conduct of one The Jews re-Barcoquebas, whom St. Jerom calls Coquebas and Coquibus 8; but his true name was, vols, as Scaliger informs us, upon the authority of the rabbies h, Cozeb, that is, Liur, or Barcozebas, that is, the son of a lye; but being ashamed of that name, he called himself Coquebas, which imports a flar, or Barcequebas, lignifying the fon of a flar; for to himb self he applied the prophety of the flar which was to go forth out of Jacob, and pre-tended to be the promised Messiah. The Jews slocked to him from all parts, appointed him their king, and looked upon him as the deliverer and restorer of their nation k. He over-ran all Judga and Syria, committing every-where most dreadful and commit ravages, and exerting his cruelty chiefly against the christians, whom he put to dreadful rava-most exquisite torments, in order to oblige them to blascheme Cheist, and join him most exquisize torments, in order to oblige them to blaspheme Christ, and join him against the Romans. Tinius, or Tinnius Rusus, who had been formerly governor of Thrace, as appears from some medals m, and commanded at that time in Judea, being reinforced with force croops, which Adrian feat him upon the first notice of the revolt, fell upon the rebellious Jews, and, without distinction of sex or age, put all to the e sword who fell into his hands. The Jews at first durst not appear in the open field; but either kept within the strong-holds which they had seized, or concealed themselves in caves, which for that purpose they had dug to an incredible depth, fallying from thence, and often furprising the Romans with great flaughter. However, Adrian feemed to despise them, till being joined by an infinite number of Jews from most provinces of the empire, and by many others who were not of that religion, but hoped to inrich themselves with plunder, they became formidable. Then the emperor, fearing a general infurrection, dispatched an express to Julius Severus, gover- Julius Severus, nor of Britain, and the greatest commander of his time, ordering him to leave that governor of Britain, lent island, and hasten into Palestine, to take upon him the command of the Roman army against shem. d there. Severus, upon his arrival, did not think it adviseable to venture an engagement, the Jews being very numerous, and fighting, as he observed in some skirmishes, like men in despair. He therefore contented himself with intercepting their provisions, Areightening their quarters, and cutting off the parties which they fent out to forage. By this means he did not doubt but he should reduce them at last to submit, without any considerable loss on his side . Tinnius Rusus commanded under him; for to him chiefly, is ascribed by St. Jerem and Eusebius, the glory of having intirely reduced the rebels. The Jews made themselves masters of Jerusalem, after having The Jews driven out, or rather massacred, the Romans who had settled there by the emperor's selve smaller orders. But Severus belieged it anew, took the place, and laid it in afters, as we read of Jerusalem, e in St. Jerom P, Eusebius 9, Chrysoftom 1, and Appian 1, who lived at this time. If credit which is beis to be given to the tradition of the Jews, Turanus Rufus, or rather Tinnius Rufus, fieged anew, caused the ground where the temple had stood to be ploughed up , which, among the in ashes. Romans, was a mark of the greatest ignominy, and utter desolation, no one being, according to their laws, allowed to build, without an express decree of the senate, in places where that inauspicious ceremony had been performed. The taking and razing of Jerusalem under Adrian happened, according to St. Jerom , in the month of August, the twentieth year of that prince's reign, and 136. of the christian æra. The Romans were more vigorously opposed by the Jews in Bitther or Bether, a strong city at a small distance from Jerusalem, than in any other place. As great numbers of Jews had retired to that place, and the siege lasted a long time, the besieged were f reduced to the utmost extremity, for want of provisions. At length, most of them being starved to death, and the rest no longer able to manage their arms, the place Bether taken. was taken, fays St. Jerom, the same day on which Jerusalem had been reduced by Nebuchadonosor, and the temple burnt by Titus sixty-sive years before w. The reduc-

_

Chap

diij

0₩

ed i

em

the tin

chi

law

00

b St.

by

Th Ge

Up

25

200 fay

füi

CCI

kre

25 (

and cen

and

pla

gre

2 1

the

in g

the

c[p

ral

the j place

mart

D

1pe₂ Peop

dreac

loon

that

CODCC

object

The.

DOP (

 $\mathbf{m}$

tte g

3. 4.44 ٥Ţ.

$83

i maior

e natio

d an

c us,

for slaves.

tion of Betber did not put an end to the war, which was, according to Dion Coffius, a long and troublesome . It lasted, according to the Jewish tradition, three years and a half y, according to St. Jerom z, two or three years, and was ended by a complete terly defeated. victory, which the Romans gained over the Jews, Barcoquebas their leader being taken prisoner 2, and, no doubt, punished according to his deserts. In the course of this war the Romans demolished fifty castles of great strength, nine hundred and eighty-five towns, and killed in battles, skirmishes and sieges, five hundred and eighty thousand men; for those who perished by famine, fire and distempers, are almost without number b. The Romans too lost many of their best troops, notwithstanding the great caution used by Severus and the other generals; insomuch that Adrian, in the letter which he wrote to the senate acquainting them with the last victory, omitted b the expression used by other emperors and commanders, If you and your children are The Jews who well, I and the army are well . Of the Jews who outlived this second general massacre flaughter, fold of their nation, incredible numbers were fold at the same price as horses in a tamous fair called the fair of Terebinthus, or of the Turpentine-tree d; which was on that account ever after abhorred by the Jews . St. Jerom tells us, that a great fair was yearly held at the tent of Abrabam', which some writers take to be the fair mentioned here; for in the valley of Mambre near Hebron, where that patriarch pitched his tent, and received the three angels, there was in the fourth century, as Eusebius informs us e, a turpentine-tree, which the natives of the place pretended to have stood there from the beginning of the world. The Jews, who were not fold at the fair of Terebinthus, c were carried to Gaza, and there exposed to sale at another fair established by Adrian, and thence called after his name h. Such as were not disposed of in Palestine, were transported to Egypt, where they perished either by famine, or were massacred by the inhabitants, who, as we have often observed, bore them an irreconcileable hatred '. The Jews were by several presages forewarned of this dreadful calamity, among which the most remarkable was the falling of the sepulchre of Solomon, which was held by them in great veneration, and fell a little before this war broke out k. When All Jews for- the war was ended, Adrian published an edict, which was confirmed by the senate, bidden, on pain and hung up in all public places, forbidding all Jews, on pain of death, to fet foot foot in Jerusa- in Jerusalem, to approach that city, or any place whence it could be seen 1. St. Je- d rom m and Tertullian a extend this decree to all Judea; which seems to have been the opinion of the Jews themselves, for in their calendar is marked a fast, instituted, as is faid there, on account of the decree, by which their forefathers were forbidden to fet foot in the land of  $\int u d\alpha a$ . This fast is marked on the ninth of their fisch month, called by them Ab, and answering part of our August. But, on the other hand, Clement of Alexandria tells us, that he studied in Palestine under one who was of Jewish extraction P; and it is manifest from Origen 9, that in the third century there were Jews in Palestine; and from Epiphanius, that, in the reign of Constantine, their patriarch resided at Tiberias . St. Austin : likewise and St. Hilarius tell us, that they were excluded from Jerusalem, but not from the other cities of Palestine. Julian the apostate, out e of hatred to the christians, countenanced the Jews; whence in his reign they undertook the rebuilding of their temple. But the succeeding emperors renewed the pro-They are after- hibition of Adrian, allowing however the Jews, upon their paying a considerable wards allowed fum, to enter, or rather approach, the city once a year; that is, on the day in lem once a year which it had been destroyed and laid in ashes by the Romans ". They were then suffered to bewail their misfortunes, and to be eye-witnesses, says St. Jerom w, of the accomplishment of the prophecies. From the Itinerarium Burdigalense, which is supposed to have been written before the time of Julian the apostate, about the year 333. we learn, that on this occasion they assembled chiefly in the place where the temple had formerly stood, and there performed certain ceremonies altogether ido- f \* Dio, p. 793. Y V 2 HIER. in Dan. v. p. 592. y Vide Scalig. ibid. \* Euseb. 1, iv. c. 6. p. 794. c Idem ibid. d Hibr. in Jer. xxxi. p. 342. Chron. Alexan. p. 596. c Hibr. in Zac. xi. p. 272. f Idem ibid. s Euseb. chron. p. 209. & demonstr. evang. l. v. c. 9. h Chron. Alexan. p. 596. i Dio, l. lxix. p. 794. k Idem ibid. l Euseb. l. iv. c. 6. Hibr. in Ist. vi. p. 36. Just. apol. ii. p. 84. Tertul. apol. c. 21. h Hibr. in Dan. ix. p. 595. h Tertul. ibid. Scalig. li. c. 6. p Clem. strom. 1. s Orig. ad Afric. p. 244. f Epiphan. l. xxxii. c. 4. s Aug. civit. Dei, l. xvi. c. 21. t Hilar. in psal. xlviii. h Orig. in Josuah. xvii. Nazian. orat. xii. Hibr. in soph. i. w Hibr. ibid. x Itin. Burdeg. p. 43.

latrous x. Thus all the attempts of that perfidious nation towards the recovery of their former condition, served only to heighten and aggravate those calamities, with which they had been so often threatened by the prophets, and to reduce them to the deplorable

e nation 8.

a deplorable state in which we now see them, being a crew of contemptible vagabonds dispersed all over the world, without king, temple or pontiff; driven from their own country, and not daring to fet foot in it even as passengers and strangers. The edict of Adrian, excluding all Jews from Jerusalem, extended to such of them as had embraced the christian religion; so that they too being obliged to quit that city, the church was by that means delivered from the servitude of the law; for, till that time, not only the bishops of Jerusalem had been chosen from among the circumcifed christians, but all the converted Jews joined to the observance of the gospel that of the law. When the Jews were banished Jerusalem, the church began to be composed only of converted Gentiles; and before the death of Adrian, which happened in 138. b St. Mark, who was one of them, was appointed bishop of that city, and succeeded by Cassianus in the nineteenth year of Antoninus's reign, and 156. of the christian æra b. The Jews being thus driven out of Jerusalem, that city began to be peopled only by Gentiles, and by another Roman colony, which Adrian sent thither after the war. Upon the ruins and ashes of the ancient city, the emperor built a new one, giving it, Jerusalem reas we have observed above, the name of Alia Capitolina ; by which means the built by Adriancient name of ferusalem was for some ages so intirely forgotten, that a martyr an, and named faying, when he was examined at Casarea in Palestine, that he was a native of Jeru-lina. falem, neither the governor of the province, nor any who were present, could conceive what city he meant d. Eusebius, Athanasius, Hilarius, and other fathers, tell e us, that Jerulalem was no more; and truly that which Adrian built, was quite different from the ancient city, as to its inhabitants and buildings, and in some measure as to its fituation; for it extended more to the north, and took in mount Calvary, and our Saviour's sepulchre; and less to the south; for about the middle of the sourth century, the celebrated mount Sion, formerly the place where the priests resided, and the doctors of the law, was quite uninhabited, cultivated like an open field, and planted with citruls, (as had been in express terms foretold by Isaiab) and other greens. The temple lay in ruins, and the place where it stood was covered with a wood. The other quarters of Jerusalem, which Adrian had not comprised within the precincts of his new city, were filled with ruins; and thence were taken stones d and other materials both for public and private buildings. At the fight of these ruins, infinite numbers of persons of all ranks, says Eusebius, embraced the christian religion, seeing evidently sulfilled in them our Saviour's predictions touching Jerusalem f. The name of Elia still obtained in the time of St. Chrysostom, and long after, in all the public acts and registers; but by the christians the city was still named Jerusalem, especially after Constantine's time. Adrian in his new city erected a theatre, and seve-Athentre and ral temples, employing for that purpose the stones of the temple and sanctuary of everal temples the fews. Two statues of the emperor, and others of the gods, were erected in the new city. place where the temple had stood, and over the gate which led to Bethleem, one of Dion Cassius, after having described the war which Adrian waged with the Jews, speaks of another which broke out about the same time with the Alani or Massageta, a The Alani inpeople of Sarmatia, who, under the conduct of Pharasmanes their king, committed vade the product dreadful ravages in Media, entered Armenia, and penetrated into Cappadocia; but empire. foon withdrew from thence, not caring to encounter Flavius Arrianus governor of that province, who was preparing to meet them h. The instructions given by Arrian concerning the march of the Roman army against the Alani, and the order to be observed in the battle, which, it was thought, would ensue, have reached our times i. The Roman army confisted, as appears from these instructions, of troops from various f nations, commanded by one Xenophon, who, no doubt, ferved under Arrian governor of the province, fince Arrian directs him how he is to conduct himself both in the march and battle. We have a description of the Euxine sea by Arrian, probably the governor of Cappadocia, addressed by way of a letter to Adrian. The author Arrian's debegins his relation with his arrival at Trebizond, where, by the emperor's orders, scription of the a temple was then building in honour of Mercury. He imbarqued at Trebizond, in Euxine fea. order to view the eastern coasts of the Euxine sea; which he did accordingly, marble, representing a hog, to fignify the utter reduction and servitude of the Jewilb

b Euseb.l. iv. c. 6. & l. v. c. 12. CD10, l. lx. p. 793. Euseb. l. iv. c. 6. dpal. c. 11. Euseb. dem. evang. l. vi. c. 13. & l. viii. c. 3. CYR. cat. xvi. Iter Burdigseb. dem. evang. l. viii. c. 3. Chron. Alexand. p. 598. Euseb. ibid. Iter Burdigal. p. 43. l. lxix. p. 794. ARRIAN. mandat. in Alan. Upfalix, ann. 1664. d Eusen. de h Dio, Vol. VI. No. 1. viliting

Chap

a one ďκ

ine

10

ſ.

Ph

dei

Per lena

h.

with his c

be e

fon,

cail

the

fig!

him

over

blee.

ftant

of b enter

leve

his

Viji

suq

bu

for tat

Cis

of A

have port

poets

a ver

men.

fhoul

Pallec

der:a

adopt

people in the facteat

ap:a:

Pechie

MONTH.

01,, bu fai font

i air h e nels:

d be

c the

his

visiting every-where the Roman garisons; obliging the soldiers to perform their a military exercises before him; paying them their arrears, &c. and acquainting the emperor with the state of each garison. He sailed by the mouth of the Phasis, the waters of which river he observed swimming a long time, on account of their lightness, upon those of the sea. At the mouth of the Phasis stood a castle garisoned by four hundred Roman foldiers, and a town inhabited by some veterans and sea-faring men; which, for the greater fecurity of the place, he strengthened with a new ditch. He ended his voyage at Sebastopolis, the most distant city garisoned by the Romans. Of all the barbarous nations, along whose coasts he failed, the Sanni, called by Xenophon the Drilli, were the most fierce and warlike. They had then no king; and as they had formerly paid tribute to the Romans, Arrian, in his letter to the emperor, b offers either to reduce them anew, or to extirpate the whole nation k. We are sure he did not extirpate them; for we find them mentioned many ages after; neither are we told that he reduced them. To the account of his voyage along the coasts of the Euxine sea, he adds a description of the coasts of Asia, from Byzantium to Trebizond, and another of the country, from Sebastopolis to the Bosporus Cimmerius, and from thence to Byzantium, that the emperor might take what measures he thought proper, in case he designed to concern himself with the affairs of Bosporus, the king of that country, by name Cotys, being just then dead. From this relation it appears, that at this time a port was forming by the emperor's orders at Trebizond 1.

Adrian in the mean time continued at Athens, being mightily taken with the c customs and learning of the Athenians. He was there admitted to the great mysteries of Eleusina, different from those in which he had been initiated some years before, and celebrated, according to Eusebius m, the second year of each olympiad; that is, every fourth year. He therefore had not left Athens in the beginning of the nineteenth year of his reign, which was the one hundred and thirty-fifth of the christian æra, and the second of the two hundred and twenty-eighth olympiad. As he had been created archon of Athens before he was emperor, he assumed the habit peculiar to that dignity, and, with the other magistrates, celebrated the great festival of Bacchus, distributing on that occasion large sums, and an immense quantity of corn, among the populace ". Dion Cassius tells us, that he subjected to Albens the whole island of Cephalenia ; d but in an infeription addressed to Adrian Olympicus, as he is there called, the city of Pale in that island styles herself autonomos, that is, free, and governed by her own laws P. He embellished the city of Athens with many stately buildings, especially with a library of marvellous structure. These edifices had been by his orders begun before; but were finished this year, and consecrated by the emperor himself 9. He likewise finished the magnificent temple of Jupiter Olympius r, begun, according to Philostratus, five hundred and fixty years before. In this temple he consecrated an altar to himself, and suffered the Greeks to build and consecrate a temple to him, which they called Panellenion, instituting on this occasion annual sports. In short, he embellished Athens with so many noble buildings, that he was looked upon as the e fecond founder of that city; whence one quarter of it was from him called Adrianopolis. Many monuments of his generofity towards the Athenians are still to be seen ". From a decree of this prince concerning the sale of oil, produced by Wheler, it appears, that at this time all controversies were determined at Athens by the senate and people affembled by the magistrates, with an appeal to the proconsul, or to the emperor w. The Albenians employed part of the money with which he presented them, in building a city in the island of Delos, which they called Adrian's new Athens and Olympia. The Athenians of Delos are mentioned in an inscription still to be seen at Venice '; but now remain only some ruins of this city, as well as of the many magnificent buildings, which by the superstitious pagans were erected in that island z.

Adrian's generosity to the Athenians.

His buildings sbere.

Adrian returns at length to Rome. THIS year, the nineteenth of Adrian's reign, and the one hundred and thirty-fifth of the christian zera, the emperor left Athens, and returned at length to Rome, Luper-cus Pontianus and Rusus Atilianus being consuls? Dion Cassius tells us, that in the shews which he exhibited soon after his arrival, the people pressing him to declare free

ARRIAN, PETIP, PORT. Euxin. p. 1, 2, 3. k Idem, p. 4—7. 1 Idem, p. 7—10. P Euseb. chron. p. 214. P Dio, p. 795. Spart. p. 9. Idem ibid. P Vide Rein. inteript. p. 335. PHER. chron. Wheler's travels, p. 437. Spart. p. 7. Dio, ibid. Philos. fop. xxv. Spart. cum not. Casab. p. 26. Vide Wheler, p. 421—471. W Idem, p. 470. Euseb. chron. p. 215. Y Grut. p. 405. Wheler, p. 93, &c. Noria. epist. conf.

a one of the charioteers of the circus, who belonged to a private person, he returned the following answer; It does not become the Roman people to beg of their emperor the liberty of one who does not belong to him, nor the emperor to oblige the person to whom he belongs to grant him it b. He had not been long in Rome, when embaffadors arrived from Vologifes, probably king of Armenia, with complaints against Pharasmanes king of Iberia, and from the lazyges, a people of Sarmatia, who were desirous to have their ancient treaties with the people of Rome confirmed by the emperor. Adrian received them in a very obliging manner, conducted them to the senate, and there read to them an answer, which, at the request of the senate, he had composed before hand. Pharasmanes came to Rome in person, with his wife and Where he reb his son, to answer the complaints of Vologeses, bringing with him rich presents for manes king of Adrian, who repaid them with others far more valuable, and besides presented him toeria. with fifty elephants, and five hundred chosen men, to serve him as a guard; inlarged his dominions; fuffered him to facrifice in the capitol; caused an equestrian statue to be erected to him, and affifted in person at a military exercise personmed by him, his son, and the chief men of his court. Nevertheless, by a strange whim, as we may call it, after so many presents, and such extraordinary honours, he introduced into the amphitheatre three hundred criminals to be devoured by the wild beafts, or to fight as gladiators, in the embroidered tunics with which Pharasmanes had presented him, as if they had been fit only for such uses d. But this, no doubt, happened after the departure of the Iberian prince. After Adrian had travelled, we may say, all lingering dif-

over the known world, he fell into a lingering disease, attended with a frequent ease. bleeding at the nose, which the physicians of those days ascribed to his going constantly with his head uncovered in the greatest colds, heats, showers, &c. The loss of blood, as he was stricken in years, was followed by a dropsy, from which as he entertained no hopes of ever recovering, he began to think of a successor; when Begins to think feveral persons of great merit occurred to him, namely, Servianus, who had married of a successor. his fifter, and was now in the ninetieth year of his age; Fuscus the grandson of Servianus, and his own great-nephew; Pletorius Nepos, his ancient and intimate friend; and Terentius Gentianus, a man greatly beloved and efteemed by the fenate. These

d he judged, among the great men of Rome, the most capable of the supreme power; but nevertheless neglecting them, nay, conceiving an irreconcileable hatred to them, for no other reason but because they were equal to the empire, contrary to the expectation of all, and the advice of his friends, he made choice of L. Aurelius Annius He adopts Ceionius Commodus Verus, for he is called by all these names, and Adrian added those Verus. of Alius and Casar. He was sprung from an illustrious family, of which we shall His character. have occasion to speak hereaster; was endowed with many good qualities; had the port and air of a prince; was well verfed in most branches of learning, especially in poetry; and thought rather not unfit for the empire, than equal to it. He was of a very weak and infirm conflitution, and at the same time intirely addicted to lewde ness and debauchery; nay, it was commonly thought, that his beauty chiefly recommended him to Adrian, who is faid to have adopted him upon condition, that he should confent to his fatisfying the passion which he had conceived for him. But what passed between them on this occasion was never well known, says Spartian e, both Adrian and Verus having bound themselves by a solemn oath to keep it secret. The adoption of Verus occasioned great rejoicings in Rome. Adrian gave a largess to the people; distributed three thousand sesterces amongst the soldiery; exhibited games in the circus, combats of gladiators, &c. But as the new Cesar's weakness daily increased, and he began to vomit blood, Adrian soon repented his choice, telling the Adrian repents captain of his guards, That he had placed his hopes and support in a falling wall; his choice.

f that he had lost the four thousand sesterces which he had distributed amongst the people and foldiery; and adopted not a fon, but a god, alluding to the custom which obtained among the Romans of deifying their emperors and Cajars. These words being told by the captain of the guards to others, came at length to the ears of Verus, and so sensibly affected him, that they are thought to have greatly contributed to his death, which happened in the beginning of the following year, as we shall relate anon. The captain of the guards was immediately discharged, and banished the court. Verus, a few days after his adoption, was created prætor, and fent to govern the province of Pannonia; in which employment he acquitted himself Verus is some into Pannonia.

b Dio, p. 795. d SPART. P. 9. e Spart. in Æl. Ver. p. 14. <sup>e</sup> Idem, p. 794.

C

7 ti

t

tr

fi0

W

di

her ili

141

Tr.

0%

in

W. . .

his

ext.

then

0.1:

to V., d he

WI

for  $H_{c}$ Jis

the o

hafte.

Pero:

11.7:15

Voked

e put to

Peror

Pitl:

restore

that .1.

and co

means

W25 2

Airing

do, ka

been fi

receive

£32 3CI

14 7.3

1

t- .

4.0

1 3,

 $A_{ij}$

V,

c to

b 55

with reputation, and shewed himself well qualified for the command of an army. In a an inscription of the following year, the twenty-first of Adrian's reign, he is styled imperator ; whence we may conclude, if there is not some mistake in the inscription, as father Pagi pretends k, that he waged war in those parts; of which however no mention is made by historians.

Adrian retires to Tivoli.

felf to cruelty, ordering several illustrious persons to be put to death.

THE following year Adrian raised to the consulship his adopted son Verus, and gave him for his collegue Sex. Vetulenus Civica Pompeianus, whose sister Verus had married h. This year Adrian retired to Tibur, now Tivoli, where he employed his time in building a magnificent villa, the stately ruins of which are still to be seen in the posfession of the Roman jesuits at a small distance from Tivoli. Aurelius Victor tells us, that in this retreat he abandoned himself, as Tiberius had done formerly at Caprea, to all b manner of lewdness; but he was soon seized with a bloody flux, which reduced him to a miserable condition. In that state, abandoning himself to his natural cruelty, Abandons him- which till then he had restrained, he ordered many illustrious persons, under various pretences, to be arraigned and executed, and others to be privately murdered. Among the former were Servianus his brother-in-law, and his great nephew Fuscus, who, he pretended, had formed a design of seizing the empire. Fuscus was but eighteen, and Servianus ninety. We are told, that the latter, before he was executed, called the gods to witness his innocence, and begged of them that they would punish the cruelty and injustice of Adrian, by reducing him to such a state, that he should wish for death, and not have it in his power to die; which happened accordingly, as we c shall relate anon k. To palliate his cruelty, to which he had, fays Spart an, a great biass, he used to lament the unfortunate condition of princes, whose lives, he said, were never thought to have been in danger till they were killed 1. But for this faying, which we do not ever find to have been used by any good prince, he was indebted to Domitian. The following year Ælius Verus Cæsar was consul the second time, with P. Cælius Balbinus Vibullius Pius, who had been raised by Adrian to the rank of a patrician, and was one of the ancestors of Calius Balbinus, whom we shall see preferred to the empire in the year 237. that is, a hundred years after m. This year the Jewish war being ended, Julius Severus, who had utterly reduced that rebellious nation, was appointed governor of Bitbynia, where he behaved with fuch justice and d moderation, having nothing in view but the welfare and happiness of the people committed to his charge, that his name was famous in that province a hundred years after and upwards. The next confuls were Camerinus and Niger. In the beginning of this year Verus, who had spent part of the preceding year in Pannonia, being returned to Rome; and finding himself greatly indisposed, took a medicine, which Verus dies, and proving too strong for him, he fell into a sleep, and died the very day in which he among the gods was to return thanks to the emperor for the honour he had done him. The speech which he had prepared for this purpole, is commended by Spartian, in whole time it was still extant P. Dion Cassius tells us, that he was carried off by a violent voiding of blood 1. His funeral was performed with the utmost pomp and grandeur, and his e ashes deposited in the stately mausoleum, which Adrian had begun for himself. The emperor caused him to be ranked among the gods, and in several cities ordered His debauche- temples to be built, and statues erected to him r. He was, as we have hinted above, extremely addicted to luxury and voluptuousness, and passed most of his time in the company of lewd women; which his wife refenting, he used to tell her, that wife was a name of honour, not of pleasure. He had always in his hands, and even in bed with him, Ovid's books of love, together with Martial the epigrammatist, whom he used to call his Virgil. When he travelled, he was attended by a great many domes. tics, who ran by his chariot, with wings to their cloaths, attired like so many Cupids, and called by the names of the winds, Boreas, Notus, Aquilo, Circius, &c. He had f married the daughter of Nigrinus, whom Adrian put to death in the beginning of his reign, as we have related above, and had by her a fon named L. Verus, whom we shall soon see raised to the throne with Marcus Aurelius, and several daughters, of whom one was by Adrian betrothed to Marcus Aurelius, who nevertheless did not marry her. This daughter is thought to be that Fabia, who is but too famous in history. Verus being dead, Adrian was some time in suspense whom he should chuse ries.

E PAGI, p. 137. F GRUTER. p. 23. m Onuph. loat. &c. k Dio, p. 795. SPART. p. 12. п Dio, p. 793. · IDAT. PROSPER, &CC. P SPART. P. 11.

a in his room ; but at length seeing himself despised, says Aurelius Victor, on account of the weakness both of his body and mind, he declared his intention of adopting Advian adopts Titus Antoninus, upon condition, that he should adopt M. Annius Verus, called after- Titus Antoniwards M. Aurelius, and L. Verus, the fon of the deceased prince of that name. Anto-nus. ninus having taken fome time to deliberate, whether he should accept of the adoption upon the terms proposed by the emperor, in the end consented to it; and was accordingly adopted with the usual ceremonies, on the twenty-fifth of February of this year, the 137th of the christian æra, and at the same time invested with the tribunitial and proconsular power ". Many were displeased with this adoption; but no one more than Catilius Severus, governor of Rome, who aspired at the empire b himself, and began privately to pave himself a way to it; but being discovered, he was deprived of his place, which was an employment for life. The empress Sabina Sabina Audied, it seems, after the adoption of Antoninus; for in an ancient inscription he styles gusta dies. her his mother w. She is thought either to have been poisoned by Adrian, or so ill used, that she chose to lay violent hands on herself?. Adrian caused her to be ranked among the gods, not caring whether she was in the supernal or infernal regions, provided he was no longer troubled with her bad humour, or pleafed his

Adrian bore his diftemper a long time with firmness and patience; but being in the end tormented with violent pains in each joint of his body, he had recourse to migic, says Dion Cassius a, and by that means once discharged his body of the watery humour with which it was filled. But the humour being foon recruited, and his pains increasing daily, he became in a manner furious, put several senators to Adrian's impadeath, and ordered Antoninus to take care, that several others, whom he named, were tience in his executed. But that good-natured prince warned them of their danger, and advised fukness. them to keep themfelves concealed; which they did accordingly, and were faved b. In the mean time, the emperor, defirous to end his infufferable pains with his life, often called for a dagger, and for poison, promising impunity, and a great reward, to such as should bring him either. But no one could, by any promises, be prevailed upon to contribute to his death. Having one day by chance found a dagger, Attempts to dhe would have stabled himself with it, had it not by one of his domestics been lay violent wrested out of his hand. He then commanded his chief physician to give him poi felf. fon; but he chose rather to kill himself in his presence, than obey his command . He often conjured his most faithful freed-men to dispatch him, and constrained a Jazygian, by name Mastor, to promise it; but Mastor fled, and never appeared till the emperor was dead. Another, whom he had obliged to make the same promise, hastened to Antoninus, and acquainted him with it, who thereupon flew to the emperor's room, attended by the captains of the guards, and befought him to bear his illness, fince it was unavoidable, with more patience and constancy; which so provoked him, that he commanded the person, who had discovered his design, to be e put to death: but Antoninus faved him, and thenceforth narrowly watched the emperor night and day, faying, he should think himself a parricide, if he neglected to preserve his life as long as he could d. Spartian writes, that two blind persons were Two supposed restored to their sight by Adrian, while in this condition; but at the same time owns, miracles. that Marius Maximus, who flourished before him, looked upon the whole as a fiction and contrivance of Antoninus, to persuade Adrian, that he would recover, and by that means divert him from laying violent hands on himself. One of these blind persons was a woman, who, as she gave out, had been admonished in a dream to forbid Adrian to kill himself, because he would one day recover; which she neglecting to do, had been struck blind, and ordered to return upon the same errand, having f been first assured, that when she had done it, and kissed Adrian's feet, she should receive her fight again. The woman comply'd with the heavenly admonition, and was accordingly cured, after having washed her eyes in the water of the temple of the place from whence she came. The other was a blind man, who coming out of Pannonia, touched Adrian, and that instant received his fight. The emperor was then in a violent fever, which is faid to have immediately abated c. From Rome, Adrian removed to Baiæ in Campania; and there neglecting the advice of his phy-Adrian re-

&lt;sup>5</sup> Spart. Vet. p. 16. * Spart. Ver. p. 16.

* Adrian. vit. p. 11.

* Julius Capitol. in vit. on vit. p. 12.

* Onuph. p. 223.

* Spart. p. 12.

* Autonin. vita. p. 17.

* Spart. p. 12.

* Idem ibid. " JULIUS CAPITOL. in vit. Antonin. p. 18. D10, p. 797.
Ldem ibid.

Α

p

P

W.

u?

Si

te!

íto

CO

ho

bο

70 ďρ

it;

tns

hor

2m0

and

Intes.

lita

ca:

(II)

W

pl

his

free

deno

force

)Oung

the ci

those Pub!i

iguan.

banith

that it put to

136 TOC 600AZ.

P.D. J.

IL CH

ध स्त्री:

of the

ii nd

ų. K  $\mathbb{F}^{\mathbb{Z}}$

tic.

Cins.

e that i d into

C #0.

5 ct.

His death.

ficians, and often faying, that a multitude of phylicians ferves only to dispatch the a fooner a patient, he lived without any rule, chose what food and drink he liked best, and by that means hastened his death. He was convinced of the immortality of the foul, and feemed apprehensive of its future state, as appears from the celebrated verses (B) which he composed and uttered a little before he expired, inquiring of his foul, whither it designed to go? He died at Baiæ on the tenth of July, after having lived fixty-two years, five months, and feventeen days, and reigned twenty years and eleven months, wanting one day f (C). Antoninus, whom he had left at Rome, and fent for when he found himself at the point of death, arrived, according to Spartian 8, just before, according to others, soon after, he expired. His body was burnt at Puteoli, and his ashes conveyed by Antoninus to Rome, where they b were exposed in the gardens of Domitia, and afterwards deposited in the magnificent mausoleum, which Adrian had built for himself near the Tiber, that of Augustus being quite full b. Adrian had, by the cruelties committed in the beginning and the end of The fenate are his reign, provoked the public hatred to fuch a degree, that the fenate were for annulling all his acts, and calling feveral persons to an account, who had raised themfelves by abusing the interest they had with him. They therefore at first unanimously opposed Antoninus demanding for him the same honours which had been decreed to other emperors. But Antoninus remonstrating with great modesty, that they could not condemn the memory of Adrian without annulling his own adoption, and degrading him from the empire, the respect and veneration they all had for that prince, who c added tears to his intreaties, inclined them at last to comply with his demands, especially when they saw a great number of persons appear, who were thought to have been murdered by Adrian, but had been faved and carefully concealed by An-The senate dreaded likewise the soldiery, who were greatly attached to Adrian 1. And thus a prince, abhorred by all as a cruel and bloody tyrant, was But deify him, ranked among the gods, and divine worship decreed him. Antoninus built a temple at the request at Puteoli, and instituted annual sports to his honour, with priests, fraternities, victims, &c. " But what gave Antoninus a far better claim to the title of pious, was his interceding with the senate in behalf of those who had been banished by Adrian, and whom that prince, faid he, would have recalled, had he lived longer n.

of Antoninus.

for annulling

No prince, perhaps, ever raised so many public and private edifices as Adrian; for he built in most cities of any note, especially at Athens; and Greece, as appears from Paulanias, was full of his edifices, bridges and aqueducts. In an ancient inscription, mention is made of a samous aqueduct begun by him in New Atbens, and ended by Antoninus in the third year of his reign, and 140 of the christian æra. By New Athens some understand a city of Liguria, others New Athens in the island of Delos . At Rome he rebuilt the Pantheon, the temple of Neptune, the square of Adrian's public works.

> h Jul. Capit. in Anton. Dio. ibid.
> 1 Dio, p. 799. m Spart. f Idem ibid. Dio, p. 797. Eutrop. F Idem ibid. h > EUTROP. Antonin. vir. p. 18. Aur. Vict. in Heliog. p. 103. Vide SALMAS. in Spart. p. 53. n Anton. in vit. p. 19.

(B) The verses were;

Animula vagula, blandula, Hospes, comesque corporis, Oua nunc abibis in loca, Pallidula, rigida, nudula ? Nec, ut soles, dabis jocos.

Spartian seems to despise them, which shews, that he understood as little of poetry, as he did of hi-

(C) Most writers agree, that Adrian began his reign on the eleventh of August 117. and that he died on the tenth of July 138. and consequently reigned twenty years, and eleven months, wanting one day. But on the other hand, in some ancient inscriptions is marked the twenty-second year of his tribunitial power; which induced the learned Dod-well to maintain, as we have observed above, that Adrian was adopted by Trajan a year before that prince's death; and consequently, that the account given by Dion Cassius of his adoption ought to be looked upon as a mere table. But cardinal Noris (57), Petavius (58), and F. Pagi (59), observe, that these inscriptions were made in distant provinces, where the death of the emperor might not have been known a month after it had happened. Besides, as only one month was wanting to the twenty-fecond year of the emperor's tribunitial power, the author of the inscription probably looked upon it as begun; whereof there are not wanting instances both in ancient times and our own. Cardinal Noris, misled, as he himself owns, by these inscriptions, maintained, that Adrian died in 139. but afterwards finding the arguments proving his death to have hap-pened in 138. unaniwerable, he changed his opinion, and rejected the inscriptions as faulty (60).

Dodwell owns, that Adrian died in 138. but will have him to have been invested with the tribunitial power a year before the death of Trajan, contradicting therein all the ancients, who tell us, that he was adopted by that prince not long before he expired.

(56) Nor. de cenotaph. Pifan. c. 3. p. 86. (60) Noris. op. con. p. 85.

(58) Petav. doct, temp. l. xi. c. 23.

(59) Pagi, p. 35.

a Augustus, the baths of Agrippa, and an infinite number of other public edifices, confecrating them anew, but leaving them the names of their first founders. His house at Tivoli was an extraordinary structure, and adorned with fine paintings, re- His house at presenting in one apartment the infernal regions. This palace he styled his Lycaeum, Tivoli. Academia, Prytanaum, Canopus, Pacile, and Tempe, names of the most celebrated places abroad, and gave to the feveral apartments of it the names of the different provinces P. He built a new bridge over the Tiber, now known by the name of His bridge on Ponte Sant Angelo, and near it his own mausoleum 9, which from the description Pro- the Tiber, and copius gives us of it, appears to have been rather a castle than a tomb. In the manjoleum. time of the emperor Justinian it was made use of as a castle, and is at present the b chief, we may fay, the only fortress of Rome, called by the present Romans Castel Sant Angelo. Spartian, to give us some idea of the height of this lofty building, tells us, that the chariot placed on the top of it, seemed very small to those who stood on the ground; but nevertheless was of so large a size, that a corpulent man could with great ease pass through the openings which represented the eyes of the horses'. Many cities, either built, repaired, or peopled by Adrian with colonies, bore for some time his name, or that of his family, which was Ælia, viz. Carthage, Many cities Jerusalem, two cities in Spain; Mursa, now Essek, in Pannonia; Stratonice in Mace-called by his don, Palmyra in Syria, Neocesaræa in Pontus; Adrianopolis in Thrace, which still retains name. it; Adriane, or Adrianopolis, in Libya Cyrenaica; Antinopolis in Egypt, called also Adriac nopolis; Adrianothera in Mysia, which still retained that name in the fifth century; and Adriane, in the same province, the birth-place of Arifides the sophist, which, however, some writers will have to be the same city with Adrianothera.

THE regulations which Adrian established for the preservation of the discipline His military among the troops, were afterwards observed as the military laws of the Romans, inflitutions. and are often quoted by Vegetius. Vollius is of opinion, that the books of Mauritius, which we shall have occasion to speak of hereafter, are a collection of the military conflitutions of Trajan and Adrian ". Adrian was the first who appointed, that each cohort should have its proper masons, architects, and such artificers as were employed in raising buildings, and adorning them w. The regulations which he d introduced, with respect to the army, to the court, and to the tribunals of justice, were still observed in the end of the fourth century . He was the first who employed Roman knights in quality of secretaries, and committed to them the care of his domestic affairs, other emperors having employed in such offices only their freedmen . Gothofredus supposes Adrian to have been the author of a new jurispru-His laws. dence, especially by his perpetual edict, which he styles the fountain of all laws in force among the Romans, at least till the publication of the code by Theodosius the younger z. Spartian mentions some of the laws published by Adrian, namely, that the children of proscribed persons should enjoy the twelfth part of their fathers estates: e that if any one found a treasure in his own grounds, it should be intirely his; if in those of another, the owner of the ground should have the moiety of it; if in any public place, it should be equally shared with the exchequer: that such as had squandered away their estates, should be publicly whipt in the amphitheatre, and banished the city: that men and women should use separate and distinct baths: that if a mafter should be found killed in his house, not all his slaves should be put to death; nay, that those only should be put to the question, who were near enough to have prevented the murder: that mafters should no longer have power of life and death over their slaves, but that such slaves as deferved to be capitally punished, should be tried and condemned by the magistrates. Porphyrius informs f us, upon the authority of Pallas, who wrote before his time, that Adrian published an edict prohibiting all human facrifices, which were still offered in feveral provinces He forbids buof the empire b. However, this execrable custom was afterwards revived, and ob-man sacrifices.

tained in Africa, where children continued to be immolated to Saturn till the time of the proconsul Tiberius, who caused the inhuman priests of that deity to be crucified on the trees, which formed the grove round his temple. Those who executed the sentence of the proconful were still living in the beginning of the third century, as

P Idem ibid. 9 Dio, p. 797. PROCOP. de bell. Gotto. 1.1. C. 22.

1. Vide Salmas. ibid. Wossii epift. additæ ad Pearson. Ignatiana, p. 234.

7 Spart. p. 11. Gottofrep. cod. Theodos. prol. p. 283. · SPART. p. 8. o Spart, p. c. cum not. Salmaf. p. 51. Viue cum not. Salmaf. p. 51. Idem ibid. SPART, cum not. Salmaf. p. 52. b Porphyr. apud Euseb. in triennal. Constantin. c. 16.

ho

٢,

27

Ç.

t:

W 1.1

E.

57

60 řt.

o:

in:

car

h : ¥.;

w

con fa.

ti;:

din

D:

W:0

to to

III.er

Wij

2 tr

fu.

ex.

27

th:

Fi

an :

n:

2:9

T., 5

mi'a

in :--

P.41. that w

g:::::

Cerc

1/1.

the o.

form o

30: c.

time or mict; Control

Lang.

be reg Liter,

12 35 12.4

 $_{i,i,\tau}$

-

He abolifies all private work houses.

Adrian's edict in favour of vand's death.

Adrian first Suffers the christians to be persecuted, a flop to the persecution.

we read in Tertulliane; whence it is manifest, that Tiberius did not, as some have a imagined, govern Africa in Adrian's time. It appears from the ancient writers, that human facrifices were, notwithstanding Adrian's prohibition, immolated to Diana in the neighbourhood of Rome, and even in Rome, during the solemn mysteries, till the time of Constantine, or rather of Gratian, who utterly abolished that execrable praclice d. The Romans had on their estates what they called manufactures, or workhouses, where they kept great numbers of people, especially slaves, at work. These houses were like so many prisons, whither masters sent such of their slaves as had disobliged them, and even kept them there in chains. Many, to avoid being listed, or punished for crimes they had committed, fled to these workhouses, and were there kept concealed. Besides, the owners of these manufactures were thought to seize b paffengers and strangers, whether slaves or freed-men, to shut them up in these houses, and oblige them to work, without their ever being afterwards heard of. Adrian therefore, to obviate such inconveniences and disorders, put down all work-houses, except those which belonged to the emperor, or to the public. Onupbrius f supposes Adrian to have made a new division of the provinces of the empire, and is therein followed by the learned Pictro Giannone in his excellent history of the kingdom of Nagles 8; but the ancients only tell us, that Adrian divided all Italy into four districts, which were by his appointment governed by four confulars, that is, fenators who had been confuls h. The division of the provinces, which Onupbrius ascribes to Adrian, was by him copied from Festus, who wrote in the time of Valentinian I. c and none of the ancients speak of any change made in the provinces by Adrian, except that which we have just now mentioned. That which Onupbrius supposes to be Trajan's, ought, in our opinion, to be rather ascribed to Dioclesian, who divided the empire, as we read in Lastantius, into innumerable provinces, in order to multiply offices and officers, and by that means keep the people in awe and terror. Aulus Gellius tells us k, that in Adrian's time a woman of known modesty, and an umblemished character, was brought to bed eleven months after her husband's The legitimacy of the child being questioned by the heirs of the deceased, the cause was tried before the emperor, who, after having examined a great many brought to hed unexceptionable witnesses concerning the character of the woman, and with great care d eleven months and attention consulted the books of the ancient philosophers and physicians, declared after her huf- by a special decree, that a child might be born eleven months after its conception. Aulus Gellius assures us, that he himself had read this decree. In Adrian's time a violent persecution was raised against the christians, which Sulpicius Severus accounts the fourth persecution; but it is not generally reckoned so by the fathers of the church, fince no new edicts were iffued against the professors of the christian religion, and then puts but only the laws still in force put in execution, Adrian being prompted by his supersistion (for he was initiated in all the idolatrous ceremonies of the Greeks) to countenance the persecutors of those who were declared enemies to all superstition 1. But after the perfecution had raged for some time with great violence, Adrian himself e put a stop to it, being, upon the perusal of the apologies presented to him by Quadratus and Ariftides, fully convinced of the innocence of the christians, and the purity of their morals m; nay, he was even thought, if Lampridius is to be credited n, to have had a defign of caufing our Saviour to be acknowledged as God, and to erect temples to his honour; but was diverted from it by some persons who, consulting the oracles, had received this answer, That if he suffered the God of the christians to have temples, those of the other gods would be soon abandoned. Under Adrian flourished many persons eminent in most branches of literature, of whom we shall fpeak in our notes (D).

THE

(D) Adrian himself ought to be ranked amongst feventh book quoted by some of the ancients (61). Spartian speaks of certain books composed by him, and published under the title of Catacriani; wherein he pretended to imitate Antimachus, whom he preferred to Homer. These, says the above-mentioned TERTULL. 2P. C. 9.

d Lact. inst. l. i. c. 21. Euseb. ibid. Prud. in Sym. l. i. p. 217. Tatian.
p. 164.
P. Vide Salmas. in Spirt. p. 49.
Onuph. de rep. Rom. comment.
SGiann. bist.
civil. l. i. c. 5. p. 25.
Spart. p. 11:
Lact. de pers. p. 6.
Aul. Gell. l. iii. c. 16.
Sulp. Sever. l. ii. c. 45.
Hier. ep. 84.
Euseb. l. iv. c. 26.
Tertull. 2pol. c. 5.
Euseb. l. iv.
c. 3. Hier. de vir. illustry c. 19, &c.

Lamprid. in vit. Alexandr.

the writers who flourished at this time; for he published several works both in prose and verse upon various subjects; and among the rest, a Greek poem intituled the Alexandriad, of which we find the

THE emperor Titus Antoninus derived his origin, on the father's fide, from the Antoninus, city of Nemausus, now Nisme, in Languedos. His ancestors are said by Aurelius surnamed The Victor

º Jul. Cap. in Antonin. cum not. Salmas. Paris. 1620.

writer, were very obscure pieces (62): and truly, from the title, they appear to have been such as Spartian describes them. Froben printed in 1551. a dialogue between Adrian and Epidetus, wherein the emperor propoles feveral questions, which are answered by the philosopher (63). Some of his Greek and Latin verses have reached our times, betides those which we read in his life by Spartian (64), who speaks of them with great contempt. But his judgment is of no weight with us, who find them mightily cried up by the best writers of those times (65). Photius, who had perused his declamations, commends both his style and thoughts (66). We find the first book of his discourses quoted by the ancients, and the quotation relates to some remarks on the Latin grammar (67). Besides his military institutions, some writers ascribe to him a treatise concerning the manner of drawing up an army in battalia, which was long unknown, and first discovered in the reign of the emperor Anastasius, about the latter end of the fifth century, and published with some additions by Mauricius, or Urbicus, then consul (68). In the year 1664, was printed at Upfal in Sweden, a treatise on the military art and stratagems, ascribed to Mauricius; but that piece was done long after the time of Mauricius the conful, fince minuon is there made of the French, Turks, Sclavonians, &c. (69) Adrian was, according to Dion Cassus and Spartian, so found of glory that he wrote his own life in several books, but caused them to be published under the names of such of his freedmen as were persons of learning (70). Among these was Phlegon, a native of Tralles in Asia, who wrote a treatife on the long-lived, and another on wonderful things. Some fragments of these works are still extant (71); and from a passage in the former it appears, that he had not put the last hand to that piece in the nineteenth year of Antoninus's reign, the 156th of the christian æra. Suidas ascribes to Phlegon a description of Sicily, three books of Fasti, an account of the famous places in Rome, and their names, and fixteen books of the olympiads, to the 229th, begun in the year 137. of the christian æra. This piece contained an account of the most re-markable things that in each olympiad had happened in any part of the world. From the 177th olym-piad, which has been conveyed to us by Photius, that work feems to have been exceeding well digested: had it reached our times, it would have cleared up several obscure passages in history. Pho-zins finds fault with the author for the trisling accounts he gives of all those who gained prizes in the Olympic games, and inserting in his work all forts of oracles. He likewise censures his style, as not quite pure, and altogether Attie. In Photius's time only the five first books were extant, which ended with the 177th olympiad, but the author had carried his history down to Adrian's time. It was addressed to one Alcibiades, belonging to that prince's life-guard (72). In the thirteenth book of this work he is thought to have mentioned the darkness which happened at our Saviour's death (73). He speaks of the destruction of ferusalem, concerning which Photius quotes a long passage out of his fourteenth book (74). He is frequently quoted by Stephanus the geographer. Suidas teils us, that Phlegon made an epitome of his fixteen books of the olympiads, which epitome confifted of eight books; and that he likewife abridged the history of the victors in the Olympic games; and adds, that he published other works, which he does not mention (75). Phlegen, in his book of wonderful things, describes a hippocentaur, taken on a mountain of Arabia, and fent by the king of that country to the emperor, without doubt, Adrian, while he was in Egypt. The monter died, but was embalmed by the governor, conveyed to Rome, and there placed in the imperial palace; where those may fee it, concludes Phlegon, who queftion the truth of my relation (76). St. ferom tells us, that Antony, the famous anchoret, was met in the defert by a hippocentaur, who spoke to him, and directed him what way he was to keep (77), Phlegon relates another history no less surprising of a young woman, who about fix months after her death appeared again, walked, converted, eat and drank as the had done formerly; which coming to the ears of her parents, they flew to fee her, and, accordingly, had that fatisfaction. But the young woman told them, that their curiolity would prove fatal to her, and put an end to her fecond life; which words the had fearce uttered, when the feel dead at their feet. Such a furprifing event, being divulged in an instant, drew vast crouds to the place from all quarters. Phlegon hastened thither with the rest, and saw the body of the deceased laid out upon a bed; but not fatisfied with that fight, I caused the burying place of the family to be opened, thys he, when I observed the bed, on which the young woman had been laid fix months before, empty. He relates the most minute circumstances of this wonderful event, names the persons who were present, &c. (78).

Favorinus, well known by the writings of Aulus Gellius, who was his disciple, and by those of Philostratus, was a native of Arles in Provence, and from his birth an eunuch, by protession a philosopher and sophist, and well skilled both in the Greek and Latin tongues. He studied under Dion Chrysostomus, and, besides Aulus Gellius, had for his disciple the celebrated Herodes Atticus, whom he appointed his heir. He wrote a great many works quoted by the ancients(79); but his style secmed to some destitute of the gravity becoming a philosopher (80). He was for a long time Adrian's chief favourite; but that prince growing in the end weary of him, as weil as of the rest of his friends, took delight in mortifying him, by preferring to him persons of no merit; which the Athenians no sooner understood, than they pulled down and broke to pieces a statue, which they had erected to him. When Favorinus was informed of the affront, Socrates, faid he, without the least emotion, would have been glad to have come off so cheap (81). Suidas observes, that he and Plutarch strove who should write most books. lived in great friendship, and Plutarch even inscribed one of his works to Favorinus (82), who died, it feems, about the latter end of the reign of Antoninus (83). Galen mentions one Demetrius of Alexan-

(62) Spart. in Adr. (63) Gesner. epit. p. 2. (64) Voss. ibid. (65) Vide Voss poet. Lat. p. 51. Et Salmas. in Spart. (66) Phot. c. 100. (67) Vide Salmas. ibid. Et Aul. Gell. l. x. c. 13. (68) Voss. epist. addita ad Pears. Ignatiana. (69) Maur. tactic. p. 253, 364, 384. (70) Dio. p. 793. Spart. p. 6. (71) Phot. p. 256. Suid. p. 1071. Voss. bist. Grac. l. ii. c. 11. (72) Photius, c. 97. (73) Hier. chron. p. 158. Orig. in Matthaum, p. 438. (74) Phot. p. 167. (75) Suid. p. 1071. (76) Phleg. mir. c. 34. (77) Hier. in vit. Paul. heremit. (78) Phleg. mir. c. 1. p. 13, 14. (79) Voss. bist. Grac. l. ii. c. 10. Suid. p. 1022. Philostr. vit. soph. p. 493. (80) Lucian, in vit. Demonactis, p. 549. (81) Philos. ibid. Dio. p. 719. (82) Fons. l. iii. c. 7. Gell. l. ii. c. 26. (83) Fons. ibid. Vol. VI. No. 1.

Cha

have bare dec

ia g

CES

othe

thi:

Air

mu

Phue

foon

his i

man w:tl

p'ain

Atti

fijen

fma:

10 100

to K

Veria

but t

DC::b

deizi

fun,

He Trans

Picier

Of Ha

and, at flory 2

and tra

likewii

into Sic

a hiftor

Acxes.

from th

ph ft, ar

and the

to the A wood that the most

DC#1 12

PER LI

k the c

:19 I

174 174 175

PG.

(34,

(H) T

Fren

Vistor to have lived at Lanuvium, or rather Lavinium, in the neighbourhood of Rome; a perhaps they settled there, after having removed from Nisme. The Aurelian family, which dria, who imitating the style of Favoriaus, whose disciple he was, used daily to declaim in public upon what subject soever was proposed to him (86). Dionysus of Miletus was likewise a philosopher of great note, highly savoured by Adrian, raised to the equestrian order, and appointed governor of some province, but in the end disgraced. He studied under Isaus, of whom we have spoken in the reign of Trajan. Philostratus clears him from a charge brought against him, namely, that of being addicted to the study of magic (87). Heliostrus likewise sell the effects of Adrian's inconstancy; for the emperor, being in the end disgusted with him, wrote some most virulent letters against him (88). One of the same name, perhaps the same person, was, according to Dion Cassius, for some time secretary to Adrian (89).

Of all the philosophers who flourished in those times, Epicletus is by far the most renowned: Anlus Gellius calls him the greatest man the sect of the stocks had ever produced (90). He is supposed to have been a native of Hierapolis in Phrygia, was for some time a slave, and belonged to Epaphroditus, whom Suidas calls one of Nero's life-guard (91). This is, without all doubt, Nero's celebrated freedman, to whom Josephus inscribed most of his works, and who was afterwards put to death by Domisian, as we have related in that prince's reign. Celfus, the famous champion of idolatry, writes of Epithetus, that while his master was one day squeezing his leg very hard in order to torment him, Epicletus faid to him very calmly, You'll break my leg; which happening accordingly, Did not I tell you, faid he, fmiling, that you would break my leg (92)? Epictetus was, as is supposed, set at liberty, but remained always very poor (93). Being obliged by Domitian's edict, banishing all philosophers, to quit Rome in 94. he retired to Nicopolis in Epirus, whence he returned upon that prince's death, and lived at Rome till the time of M. Aurelius, says Suidas (94), by whom, as well as by his predecessor, he was, according to Themissius, held in great esteem and veneration (95). But we cannot fall in with the opinion of these writers, finde M. Aurelius used to look upon it as a great happiness, not that he had learnt any thing of, or conversed with, Epicterus, but that he had read his writings (96). Epidetus reduced all his philosophy to two points only, viz. to suffer evils with patience, and enjoy pleasures with moderation; which he expressed with these two celebrated words, drixs και dπixs; that is, suffer and abstain (97). He was against the celibacy of the philosophers, but nevertheless seems to have observed it himself (98). He published several works, none of which, except his enchiridien, or manual, has reached us (99). But Arrian, his disciple, published a great work, which he pretends to consist intirely of what he had heard him say, and set down, as sar he could remember, in Arrian's own terms (100).

Arrian, a native of Nicomedia, was one of the most learned men of his age, and, on account of his eloquence and knowledge, commonly styled the second Xenophon. He was preferred at Rome to the highest posts of honour, even to the consultation (1);

whence most writers take him to be the Flavius Arrianus, who, while he was governor of Cappadocia, repulsed the Alani, as we have related above. He lived at Rome under Adrian, Antoniaus, and M. Aurelius (2). Themistius tells us, that Trajan forced him from his retirement, in order to employ him as a minister in state-affairs (3). He published in eight books the familiar discourses of Epictetus; but only four of them have reached us (4), which are inscribed to one L. Gellius. He published twelve books more, containing the speeches of Epictetus (5), and wrote Photius quotes several other books composed by him, viz. the history of Bithynia, his native country, the history of the Alani, and that of the Parthians, in seventeen books, which he brought down to the war which Trajan waged with them (6). He described the expeditions of Alexander the Great in feven books, which are still extant, and is thought by Photius to have excelled all who wrote on the same subject (7). He published, in ten books, the lives of the successors of Alexander; and gave in one book, says Photius, an account of India (8). This account of India is now reckoned the eighth book of the history of Alexander (9). Besides these works mentioned by Photius, Lucian afcribes to him the life of a famous robber, named Telebous (10). We have already mentioned his description of the coasts of the Enxine Sen; but that of the coasts of the Red Sea, tho' commonly ascribed to him, is thought by the learned to have been done by one who flourished before Adrian, and was contemporary with Pliny the elder (11). Belides the works of Arrian already mentioned, we have still his tactica, whereof the beginning has been long fince loft: to his tactics are commonly added his instructions concerning the march of the army against the Alani, and the order to be observed in the battle.

Plutarch was a native of Charonea in Bacotia, where he was born in the reign of Claudius, about the year 50. of the christian zera. He studied under Ammonius, an Egyptian philosopher, in the reign of Nero, and in that of Domitian taught at Rome, where, amongst his other disciples, he had the samous Arnlenus Rusticus, who was put to death by Domisian in 90 (12). We are told, that he was preceptor to Trajan; which we can hardly believe, fince that prince was as old as Plutarch (14), and had from his youth been brought up in the camp. Suidas writes, that Trajan distinguished him with consular honours (15), meaning, no doubt, the confular ornaments, and ordered the magistrates of Illyricum to advise with him in all affairs of importance. He continucd at Rome till the death of Trajan, when he returned to his own country, and there bore the chief employments (16). He had several children, one of whom, by name Lamprias, published a catalogue of his father's historical pieces, which has reached us, but is imperfect (17). The philosopher Sextus, one of the preceptors of the emperor M. Aurelius, was nephew to Plutarch (18). Plutarch published a great many works, which are to every one well known, being translated into all the modern languages. His ftyle is not quite pure and Attic. Among the works

(86) Galen. prog. com. p. 455. (87) Philoft. ibid. p. 522, &c. (88) Spart. p. 7. (89) Dio, l. | xix. p. 789. (90) Anl. Gell. l. i. c. 2. (91) Suid. p. 996. (92) Orig. in Celf. l. vii. (93) Anl. Gell. l. ii. c. 18. & l. xv. c. 11. (94) Suid. p. 996. (95) Themift. orat. 5. (96) Jul. Cap. in Antonin. (97) Anl. Gell. l. xvii. c. 19. (98) Lucian. in vit. Demonac. p. 555. (99) Suid. p. 996. (100) Arrian. Epic. p. 1. (1) Phot. c. 58. (2) Voff. hift. Grac. l. ii. o. 11. (3) Themift. orat. 17. (4) Phot. c. 58. (5) Idem, c. 58. (6) Idem ibid. (7) Idem ibid. (8) Idem, p. 91. (9) Voff. hift. Grac. l. ii. c. 11. (10) Lucian. in vit. Alex. Praft. (11) Vide Salmaf. in Solin. Et Voff. hift. Grac. l. ii. c. 7. (12) Ruald. vit. Plut. (13) Idem, p. 29. (14) Vide Voff. hift. Grac. l. ii. c. to. (15) Suid. p. 546. (16) Ruald. c. 25. (17) Idem, c. 6. (18) Idem, c. 5. Et Suid. p. 729.

commonly

a which was the present emperor's, is thought to have been very ancient, but was not distinguished very early with preserments in Rome. His grandfather Titus Aurelius His extrassion

Fulwus, and prefer-commonly ascribed to him, some are thought to have been written by others; and many of his works have been loft, as appears from the citations of Gellius, Origen, Enfebius, Empapius, Theodores, and others. Marcus and Caninius Celer, two celebrated sophists, flourished under Adrian, and published some declamations (19). Polemon, another famous sophist, in great favour with Adrian, was a native of Laodices upon the Lyens, which some place in Caria, others in Phrygia; but spent the greatest part of his life at Smyrna, whither the youth slocked from all parts to hear him. He was several times sent by that city in quality of embassador to the emperor Adrian, of whom he obtained great fums for the inhabitants, the that prince was more addicted, says Philofiratus (20), to the Ephelians than Smyrneans.

As Adrian showed an extraordinary kindness for him, he took care to turn it to his own advantage, and foon appeared with a train and equipage ill fuiting his profession; which drew upon him the envy of many, and the batred of all. Antoninus treated him with great respect, tho' he had just occasion to com-plain of his rusticity, or rather insolence. Herodes Astless having heard him declaim, sent him a con-siderable sum, which, however, he resused as too small; so that Herodes, to content him, was obliged fmall; so that Herodes, to content him, was obliged to send him one much larger, which he condescended to accept. The king of Bosporus, who was well versed in most branches of learning, coming to Smyrns to see that city, and the learned men there, shewed a great desire of conferring with Polemon: but the proud and self-interested philosopher would neither wish him, nor be visited by him, till the king had sent him a present of ten talents, and then he desired to admit him into his house (21). Being deigned to admit him into his house (21). Being greatly tormented with the gout, he retired to Laodices, his native city, and there, in the fifty-fixth year of his age, placing himself among his dead ancestors, ordered the tomb to be shut up, that the sun, as he said, might never see him silenced (22). He left no writings besides declamations. Under Trajan and Adrian flourished, according to Suldas (23). Ptolemans Chemms, Zenobius, Cephaleo, and Dionysius of Halicarnassus. Psolemans wrote several books, and, among the rest, one intituled the surprising hi-flory (24). Zenobius taught at Rome under Adrian, and translated the history of Saluß into Greek. He likewise made a collection of proverbs, which is still extant (25). He is sometimes called Zenodotus. Cephaleo, being banished his own country, retired into Sicily, where he published in the reign of Adrian a history, beginning with Ninus, and ending with Alexander (26). Dionysius of Halicarnassus, descended from the samous historian of that name, was a sophist, and is commonly styled Dionysius the Articist, and the musician, because he applied himself chiefly to the study of music, and published several works upon that subject, and one among the rest divided into thirty-fix books, and containing an account of the most famous poets, and players upon instru-

Herennius Phile, born in the city of Byblos in Phanicia, wrote one book on Adrian's reign, twelve on the choice of books, and thirty on various cities, and the eminent persons they had produced: the latter work was abridged by one Ælius Severus Athenaus. Origen quotes a passage out of Herennins Philo concerning the Jews, for whom, it feems, he had no great kindness (29). Philo translated into Greek the history of Phænicia written by Sanconiathe, in his native language, about the time of the Trojan war (30). The preface, and some passages of this translation, have been conveyed to us by Eufebius (31). Philo himself wrote the history of Phasnicia, which is quoted by Enfebius (32), and Stephanus of Byzaneium (33). Hermippus of Berytus, or of that neighbourhood, was one of Philo's disciples, and highly effeemed by Adrian, tho' the son of a freed-man. He wrote five books upon dreams, which are quoted by Tertullian, and others (34). The book of legislators, quoted by Origon (35), is generally ascribed to another Hormippus, a native of Smyrna, who shourished long before Adrian's time. Paulus of Tyre, contemporary with Philo, published a treatise of releases. He obtained of Adrian the title of metropolis for the city of Tyre (36). Leander Nica-nor of Alexandria, the fon of Hermias, published several grammatical and historical pieces (37). Diogenianus, a native of Heraelea, published several writings of grammar and geography, which Hefychius made use of in compiling his lexicon (38). His collection of ancient proverbs is still extant. Under Adrian flourished, according to Vossius (39), Jason of Argos, who comprised in four books the history of Greece, to the death of Alexander. Ælian, author of the tactica, lived at this time; for he addressed his work to Adrian. Another writer of the same name flourished about a hundred years after; whence it is no easy task to determine, which of these two was the author of the history of animals, of the history via varia, and of other pieces which are by the ancients ascribed to an Ælian, but long since lost.

Under Adrian flourished the two Lasin historians

Suetonius and Florus. C. Suetonius Tranquillus was the fon of Suetonius Lenis, or Latus, a Roman knight, who, at the battle of Bedriacam, commanded a legion in quality of tribune, as we have related in the foregoing volume. The historian was born about that time; for he was very young in 88, that is, twenty years after the death of Nero (40). Pliny the younger had a great kindness for him, kept him constantly with him, and wrote to one of his friends, that the more he knew him, the more he loved him, on account of his probity, ingenuity, prudent conduct, and application (41). We may therefore suppose him to be the Tranquillus, whom, in one of his letters, he encourages to plead a cause, with-out being under any apprehension from a dream, which seemed to threaten him with bad success (42). In another letter (43), he feems very anxious about purchasing for him a little place of retirement near Rome, proper for a man of study and application. In other letters he exhorts him to publish his writings, fince they were finished (44); and asks his advice even as to his own conduct on a particular occasion(45). He obtained for him the post of a tribune; which Suetonius begged him to confer upon Cafennius Silvanus, his kinfman: this generous action (19) Philostr. soph. 24. (20) Idem, soph. 25. (21) Idem ibid. (22) Idem ibid. Et Suid. P. 554. (23) Idem, p. 646, 1126, 1447. (24) Phot. c. 190. (25) Vost. c. 11. (26) Suid. ibid. Phot. c. 68. (27) Suid. p. 743. Vost. c. 12. fons. l. iii. c. 8. (28) Suid. p. 1065. Vost. bist. Grac. l. ii. c. 10. (29) Orig. in Celf. l. i. p. 13. (30) Vost. ibid. l. i. c. 1. (31) Euseb. prap. l. i. c. 9. (32) Idem ibid. l. iv. c. 16. (33) Vost. ibid. l. ii. c. 10. (24) Tertull. de anim. c. 46. Vost. ibid. Orig. in Celf. Suid. p. 1043. (35) Orig. ibid. (36) Suid. p. 465. (37) Suid. p. 229. Vost. ibid. l. ii. c. 12. (38) Suid. p. 737. (39) Vost. ibid. (40) Sust. vit. Oth. Dom. (41) Plin. l. x. ep. 200. (42) Plin. l. i. ep. 18. (43) Idem ibid. ep. 24. (45) Idem, l. ix. ep. 34.

Chi

2 11

¥;;

to

his

h.

to

W

T.

€0

12.

(w tar

tio

m Pr

fla

c ne

in

by

2( ; lt.

erc.

Teg

WD

to do

d ig

0

h

fav

of a

to lo

then

his I

Anto

feck

Pain

in a i fame

10 124

Plimi

 $iv_{ij}$

1 mi.

Fracer

13:15

र्वदाहर कांद्र

12

F. .:

1.0

e com

Fulvus, or Fulvius, was the first conful of the Aurelian family. His father Aurelius 2 Fulvus was likewise honoured with that dignity, and universally esteemed on account of his extraordinary accomplishments and integrity. Arrias Antoninus, his grandfather on the mother's side, was twice consul, and esteemed one of the greatest and most virtuous men in Rome P. He married Boionia Procilla, descended from an illustrious family; and had by her Arria Fadilla, the mother of Antoninus, who, after the death of her husband Aurelius Fulvus, marrried Julius Lupus, and had by him a daughter named Julia Fadilla. This daughter died before the emperor, but left a son named Mummius Quadratus q. T. Antoninus was born at Lavinium, on the nineteenth of Sectember of the year 86. Domitian being then conful the twelfth time, with Cornelius Dolabella. He is styled by Julius Capitolinus, who wrote his life, T. Aurelius b Fulvius Boionius Antoninus; but from several ancient inscriptions it appears, that, instead of Fulvius, we ought to read Fulvus. As from his infancy he behaved himself in a very dutiful and obliging manner towards all his relations, many of them left him their estates, by which means he became exceeding rich. He was a great lover of the country and country-diversions, but nevertheless did not decline public employments, in which he acquitted himself with great reputation, and univerfal applause. He was consul in 120. afterwards one of the four consulars appointed by Adrian to govern Italy, and then fent into Afia with proconfular authois greatly cried up by Pliny. Suetonius married, but had no children. However, Pliny, from Bithynia, wrote to Trajan, begging him to grant to his friend the privileges, which those enjoyed who had three children (46). The emperor seldom granted such favours, but nevertheless could not help complying with the request of Pliny (47). Suetonius was afterwards fecretary to Adrian, but discharged on account of his difrespectful behaviour towards the empress Sabina (48). Suidas ftyles him a Latin grammarian, and afcribes to him feveral grammatical works; adding, that he likewife wrote a book upon the Profits of the Greeks, two upon the shews of the Romans, two upon the Roman laws and customs, one of the life of Cicero, a catalogue of illustrious Romans, and the lives of the emperors, which has reached our times (49). He wrote likewise in three books the history of the kings, which Paulinus abridged in verse (50). His book concerning the institution of offices, quoted by Priscian, is probably the same with that of the Roman laws and customs. He wrote, according to the same Priscian, eight books of the prators. A book likewise, intituled de rebus variis, is by some ascribed to him. From the great number of authors, who have quoted his works, it appears, that they were generally read, and greatly effected, both by the Greeks and Latins. Tertullian quotes his book of the Roman shews (51), and St. ferom that of illustrious men, upon the plan of which he wrote his own (52): perhaps the lives of the illustrious grammarians, orators, and poets, com-monly ascribed to Suetonius, were part of that work. The life of Pliny the elder is thought not to have been done by Suetonius, but by a much more modern writer (53). Vopiscus, speaking of his history of the twelve Casars, calls him an impartial and correct writer; but adds, that he cannot compare him to Salust, Livy, Tacitus, or Trogus (54). His writings are no less lewd and infamous, says St. Jerom, as quoted by Vossius (55), than were the lives of the emperors, whose history he writes. And truly, both he and Lampridius have mixed too much lewdness, as well as meanness, in their writings; whence they are justly censured by Rualdus, as teaching their readers to be vicious (56).

P Idem ibid. p. 17. 4 Idem, p. 25.

* Vide Salmas, in not, ad Anton, vit. p. 47.

Florus is thought to have been a native of Spain, and of the family of the Seneca's; that his family-name was L. Annaus Seneca, and that being adopted by one Florus, he took the name of L. Julius Florus. We read of one Julius Florus, who, in the reign of Tiberius, taught rhetoric in Gaul with great applause (57). Spartian, in the life of Adrian, quotes some vertes composed by a poet named Florus, whom most writers take to be the epitomizer of the Roman history; for that epitome was written in the reign of Trajan, and seems to be the product of a poetical genius. It is greatly esteemed by the learned, who nevertheless find fault with the author for not observing with due punctuality the order of time. It is not an abridgment of Livy; for with him the author often disagrees. Whether the summaries prefixed to each book of Livy's history were done by Florus, is uncertain (58). The poet Florus used, it seems, to frequent taverns and eating-houses, which was looked upon in those days as highly unbecoming persons of a liberal education. Hence Florus having written to Adrian the following verses;

Ego nolo Casar esse, Ambulare per Britannos, Scythicas pati pruinas.

That is, I defire not to be Casar, to ramble among the Britons, and to endure the frosts of Scythia: Adrian aniwered thus;

Ego nolo Florus esse, Ambulare per tabernas, Culices pati rotundos.

That is, I defire not to be Florus, to ramble among the taverns and eating-houses, and to be stung with gnats (59). Aulus Gellius mentions one Terenzius Scaurus, a celebrated grammarian, who flourished under Adrian; and highly commends T. Castricius, whose disciple he himtelf had been (60); but neither of them seems to have left any works behind them. Scaurus had been preceptor to Aurian; his son was proceptor to L. Verus, and his grandson, or rather great-grandson, to Alexander Severus (61).

(46) Idem, l. x. ep. too. (47) Idem ibid. ep. 101. (48) Spart. p. 6. (49) Suid. p. 934. (50) Auf. ep. 19. (51) Tertull. spec. c. 5. (52) Hier. vir. iliuf. pref. (53) Voss. bist. Lat. t. i. c. 31. (54) Vopisc. in Firm. (55) Voss. bist. Lat. l. i. c. 31. (56) Ruald. in vit. Plut. c. 28. (57) Voss. bist. Lat. l. i. c. 30. (58) Voss. ibid. (59) Spart. p. 8. (60) Aul. Gell. l. xi. c. 15. & 13. (61) Vide Casaub. in vit. L. Ver. p. 35.

rity;

a rity; where, by the mildness of his government, his affability, and engaging behaviour, he gained the esteem and affections of persons of all ranks. Upon his return to Rome, Adrian appointed him one of his council, and transacted nothing without his advice 5. He married Annia Galeria, the sister of Marcus Aurelius's father, and His isfue. had by her two sons and two daughters. The eldest of the daughters was married to Lamia Syllanus, but died foon after: she was probably named Aurelia Fadilla; for we find one of that name called in an ancient inscription the daughter of the emperor T. Antoninus. The other, named Annia Faustina, was married to M. Aurelius, her cousin german ". The two sons, M. Aurelius Fulvus Antoninus, and M. Galerius Aurelius Antoninus, must have died very young; for no mention is made of them in b history.

Antoninus is celebrated by all the ancients as one of the best princes that ever His character. fwayed a sceptre. His behaviour to all was extremely obliging: he was always ready to hear with patience the meanest of the people: to no one was ever admittance denied to his palace or presence, especially when they came to complain of his officers, ministers, or procurators. He was an utter enemy to all pomp and oftentation. His table, fays his historian, was rich without extravagance, and frugal without meanness. He never courted the favour of the people, but seemed rather to despise popular applause, which had been the idol of most of his predecessors. He never flattered others, nor suffered any one to flatter him. He observed with great exact- His religion, c ness, but without the least affectation, the Roman laws and ceremonies. He offered constants in in person, as high pontiff, the sacrifices, which for other emperors had been offered friendship, &c. by inferior priefts; and never failed to affift, unless prevented by some indisposition, at all public acts of religion, shewing always a profound respect for the deity w.

```
It appears from an inscription of the year 143, the fifth of his reign, that the senate erected a monument to his honour, in confideration of his great and extraordinary regard for the public ceremonies x. As he never admitted any to his friendship, with whom he was not thoroughly acquainted, he was a most constant friend, hearkened to no calumnies against them, nor entertained any fears or jealousies, as Adrian had done, who in the end was weary of all his old friends, and discharged them with dignominy. He was naturally of a sweet and mild temper, ever inclined to mercy, His elemency which he shewed even to the most vicious and wicked, chusing rather to deprive them and mildness.
  of the means of doing mischief, than to punish them according to their deserts. During his long reign of twenty-three years, he is faid never to have done any thing that favoured of cruelty, ill-nature, or could give to any person whatsoever just motive of offence y. When he arrived in Afia, with the character of proconful, he chose to lodge the first night in the house of Polemon the celebrated sophist, which was the best and largest in Smyrna. But the proud and unmannerly sophist, who was then in the country, returning home about midnight, and finding the proconful in his house, instead of thanking him for the honour he had done him, made such e complaints of the liberty he had taken, as the clown was pleafed to style it, that Antoninus, to quiet him, was obliged to leave the house at that time of night, and seek for a lodging elsewhere. However, when Antoninus was raised to the empire, Polemon did not fail to come to Rome to wait upon him. The emperor received him in a most obliging manner, and ordered him to be lodged in the palace; but at the fame time put him in mind of what had passed at Smyrna, by ordering his domestics to take care, that no one turned him out of his apartment 2. A comedian complaining to the emperor, that Polemon had driven him out of the theatre at mid-day, Antoninus answered, He drove me out of my lodgings at midnight, and nevertheless I made no complaints 2. As M. Aurelius was weeping for the death of one of his f preceptors, the courtiers, creatures for the most part void of humanity, represented to him, that it was beneath a prince to shew so much tenderness and concern; but Antoninus checked them with the following remarkable words; Pray let bim weep, and give bim leave to be a man; for neither philosophy, nor the imperial dignity, ought to extinguish in us the sentiments of nature. The emperor going one day to see the Dissembles fine house of Valerius Omulus, and admiring there, amongst other things, certain affronts.
```

```
F. Dio, l. lxx, p. 800. Jul. Cap. p. 17.
p. 18—23. w Idem ibid. Paus. l. viii.
p. 18. Dio, ibid. Philos. soph. 25.
                                                                                             Vide Mabill. analect. c. iv. p. 500.

* Rein. inscript. p. 308.

* Idem ibid.

b Jul. Cap. ibid.
                                                                                                                                                                                     " JUL. CAP.
                                                                                                                                                                           y JUL. CAP. ibid.

    Idem ibid.
```

pillars of porphyry, he asked him, where he had purchased them? But Omulus, in-

Chi

C

le

W,

Fi

'nc

his

the

th.

co

rel

rc:

a h

WCC

hut

Wro

X:

IC.

300

25

Vic

M

01 ſei

the

cve

fulli

a pr

pcop

own,

injoi

favio

20 0;

the gr

Preis

10 pr

He ch and is נדכר.

ic w<sub>i</sub>

Gazzi.

ad o

Ġ.

fr.

 $b_{i,t}$

p:23

1

1 la

e life e d gr

0 03

stead of being pleased to see the emperor take notice of the ornaments of his house, a returned him this rude answer; In other peoples houses you must learn to be deaf and dumb . Thus Omulus, who was a man of a fatirical temper, and given to raillery, treated on this, and several other occasions, the good-natured prince, who could not, as he often owned, prevail upon himself to punish any person for bare words, however free and disobliging. Having sent for Apollonius, the celebrated stoic, who resided at Chalcis in Syria, to instruct M. Aurelius in the principles of that sect, the philosopher flew to Rome, attended by a great number of disciples, all Argonauts, fays Lucian d, gaping after the golden fleece. Upon their arrival, Antoninus invited Apollonius to court, in order to deliver his disciple to him. The haughty pedant answered with great insolence, that the master was not to come to the disciple, but b the disciple to the master; which words being related to Antoninus, Does Apollonius then, said he, smiling, think it a more trouble ome journey from his lodgings to the palace, than from Chalcis to Rome? However, he ordered M. Aurelius to wait upon Adrian to adopt him.

His future

saged.

T. Antoninus was adopted by Adrian, as we have related above, upon the death of What prompted Elius Verus Casar. Some authors write, that Adrian was induced to prefer him to fo many other great men, by the particular respect and tender regard which Antoninus shewed to his father-in-law, whom, as he was very old and decrepit, he used constantly to conduct to the senate, attending him like a slave: Adrian seeing him one day leading and supporting the old man, was so pleased with that sight, that he c adopted him for that very reason f. But Adrian could not by this alone be prompted to confer so great an honour upon one, who had given so many proofs of his extraordinary talents and ability. He chose him, therefore, because he judged him to be, of all the great men in Rome, the best qualified for the sovereign power 8. He was adopted on the twenty-fifth of February of the year 138, and at the same time invested with the proconsular and tribunitial power, honoured with the name of Casar, now peculiar to the presumptive heir of the empire, and distinguished, as we conjecture from some ancient coins, with the title of emperor , which had hitherto been given to none but the fovereign. We are told, that his succession to the empire was prefiged long before by many omens. While he governed part of Italy d grandeur prein quality of proconful, one from among the croud cried out to him, while he was administring justice, May the gods prosper your undertakings, O Augustus! Upon his arrival in Asia, the priests of the city of Tralles in Lydia received him not with the usual saluration, Ave, proconsul! Hail, proconsul! but styled him emperor. At Cyzicus, a crown belonging to the statue of one of the gods, was found upon that of Antoninus, &c. 1 Adrian adopted Antoninus upon condition, that he should adopt M. Annius Verus, the son of his wife's brother, and L. Commodus, the son of L Verus Casar, which he did accordingly before the death of Adrian, probably the same day on which he himself was adopted k. The next day Antoninus returned the emperor thanks in the senate for the honour he had conterred upon him, distributed large e His generosity. sums among the soldiery and populace, employing on this occasion his own, and not the public money; and besides, paid what Adrian had promised them. All the cities of the empire used, on such occasions, to present the adopted prince with sums of money instead of crowns, which were thence called aurum coronarium. These sums the generous prince remitted intirely to the cities of Italy, and a moiety to all the rest. He even contributed out of his private fortune a great deal towards the works which Adrian was carrying on, and obeyed that prince, fo long as he lived, with as much respect and submission as the meanest of his subjects, except when he actempted to murder himself, or others 1. Adrian dying at Baiæ, on the tenth of July, he prevailed upon the fenate, much against their will, to confer such honours upon f Adr an to be him as had been decreed to the best of emperors, and continued all those in their ranked among employments, who had been preferred by him. It was, according to fome writers, on account of this tender and filial respect for the memory of his father, that the Why honoured senate decreed him the glorious surname of Pius. Others think, that they distinguished him with that title in regard of the great care he had of his father-in-law in his old age, or of Adrian in his fickness, or because he saved many whom Adrian of plus.

d Lucian. in vit. Demonact. p. 552. e Jul. Cap. p. 23. f Idem, p. 17.
797. h Goltz. p. 70. i Jul. Cap. p. 8. k Spart. in Adr. p. 12.
79. 797. I Jul. Cap. p. 18. c Idem ibid. E Dio, l. lxix. p. 796, 797. JUL. CAP. p. 16. Dio, p. 797.

a had commanded to be murdered, or finally, on account of the natural sweetness of his temper, and the extraordinary respect he shewed on all occasions for religion, and all religious persons m. Be that as it will, he bears the epithet of Pius in several medals of this very year, and is chiefly known by it in history". Pausanias thinks he deferved not only this title, but that likewise which was given to Cyrus, viz. the father of mankind, in confideration of the paternal care he seemed to have of all men o. Commodus, and the emperors who succeeded him, assumed the same title; which ferved only to render their wickedness the more remarkable P. This year Antoninus Honours conwas likewise honoured with the title of Augustus, and of high pontiff, and his wife ferred upon him Faustina with that of Augusta. He refused many other honours which the senate by the senate.

b offered him, and among the rest the title of the sather of his country 4; which however he accepted the following year r. We are told, that Antoninus, in the beginning of his reign, ordered the proconful of Africa to consult the goddess Calestis, who was worshipped at Carthage, about his fuccessors, and the state of the empire; and that the pretended deity, after having uttered, like other oracles, many things obscure and unintelligible, repeated the name of Antoninus eight times; whence it was concluded, that Antoninus should reign eight years. But as he reigned near twenty-three, another construction was long after put upon the oracle, viz. that eight emperors should reign bearing the name of Antoninus; which interpretation we shall examine in the reign of the emperor Opilius Macrinus.

We know but very little of the actions of this great prince, and are almost quite at a loss as to the order of them, with respect to what we know. Julius Capitolinus, who wrote his life, and inscribed it to the emperor Dioclesian, is but a very indifferent historian, and greatly confused and perplexed in his accounts. What Dion Cassius wrote of Antoninus has been loft eight hundred years fince, and consequently before Xipbilin undertook the epitomizing of that author; so that we can only give our readers a general idea of this excellent prince's government and conduct. He lived, according to Julius Capitolinus, after his accession to the empire, in the same manner as he had lived while he was yet a private person; no alteration appeared in his behaviour towards his friends, nor had any of his enemies ever the least motive to be grieved for his preferment. He would suffer none but slaves to wait upon him, shew- His extraordiing on all occasions the greatest respect imaginable for the equestrian and senatorial many respect for orders. He never transacted any business of consequence without the advice of the senatorial and equestrian and equestrian and equestrian fenate, paying them, when emperor, that regard which he defired to fee paid to orders. them by other emperors while he was a fenator. He frequently gave an account, even to the people, of all his actions and negotiations. When he demanded the confullhip, or other employments, either for himself or his children, he appeared like a private person among the other candidates; which shews, that he allowed the people, according to their ancient right, to chuse the magistrates. M. Aurelius owns, that Antoninus convinced him by his example, that one might lead a private e life even in a court. He moderated most of the imposts and tributes, and strictly Helessens the injoined his receivers and collectors to exact them without any severity or oppression, eribuses. faying, that he chose rather to be poor, than have his coffers filled at the expence of an oppressed people. He was no sooner raised to the empire, than he disposed of the greatest part of his private estate in favour of the indigent citizens; and the empress Faustina repining at his generosity, he told her, That a prince ought to have no private interest, no private property, and nothing in view but the public welfare. He chose for governors of provinces such only as were persons of known integrity, Prefers only and is faid never to have preferred an undeferving man to any employment whatfo- men of merit. ever. Hence some continued in their posts during the whole time of his reign; for f he was not for removing such as discharged their office to the satisfaction of the people, unless they themselves desired it, as did Orfitus governor of Rome, and some others. Gavius Maximus was for the space of twenty years captain of the prætorian guards; and others held their employments during the whole time of his reign. His paternal estate, which was very great, he laid out in bounties and largesses; but was very Takes care of sparing of the public money: whence at his death his private coffers were found empty, the public rebut the exchequer full. He deprived several useless persons of the pensions which had venues. been settled upon them by Adrian, saying, he could not bear to see the state devoured

&lt;sup>2</sup> Spanh. l. viii. p. 714. ° PAUS. Spanh. l. viii. p. 714. ° PAUS. p. 71. <sup>m</sup> Idem, p. 17. Paus. I. viii. p. 275. Dio, l. lxx. p. 799. <sup>n</sup> Spanh. l. viii. p. 275. P Idem ioid. <sup>q</sup> Dio, l. lxx. p. 799. Jul. Cap. p. 18. l. viii. p. 275. P Io. Jul. Cap. in Macrino.

by those who were no-ways serviceable to it, but lived in idleness upon the labours a tho' he himself had an utter aversion to such diversions. Tho' he was no-ways addicted to building, yet he raised a great number of stately edifices at Rome, and in the neighbourhood. He caused a port to be made at Caieta, now Gaeta; repaired that of Terracina; finished Adrian's magnificent mausoleum; built a stately palace at Lorium in Hetruria, about ten miles from Rome, in which place he had been educated; and contributed large fums towards the repairing of feveral ancient buildings in Greece,

Ionia, Syria, and Africa. The village of Pallantium in Arcadia was by him made a city, and exempted from all manner of tribute, because Evander was supposed to have built, and peopled with the inhabitants of that village, a city in the place where Rome tor; which promise he observed so religiously, that one being convicted of parricide, he contented himself with banishing him, even after he had owned his crime, to a defart island. Attilius Tatianus and Priscianus being accused of conspiring against the life of the emperor, the latter laid violent hands on himself, and the former was only

Chi

ii.

b:

b an

F.7.

L.

Ċ.,

l.

le.

r.c

ftr

¢:::

tm.

ł., r

0

in

13 U

Ç

F

ha

25 Air

2.7.4

the

the

Bri

Wino.

203

£ ....

W:::3

fulh

ite 1

61

∄ ;: 130;

 $k_{i^j^}$

. .

e app

d ce.

C ú.

Instances of his equity.

of others. Among those whom he thus treated, was Mesomedes, a lyric poet, whom Adrian had rewarded with a yearly pension on account of some verses in praise of his beloved Antinous. Tho' he was thus sparing of the public money, yet no one ever charged him with avarice; for he gave daily instances of an unbounded generosity. He would accept of no legacies from such as had children, and ordered the estates of those who had been condemned for extortion, to be restored to their children, after the persons, whom they had pillaged, had been fully satisfied. Under no prince fewer estates were confiscated than under him. He utterly extirpated the whole tribe of informers, and was ready, upon the least misfortune that happened to any city or province, to lessen their tribute and taxes ". Many obtained the privileges of Roman b citizens for themselves, and not for their children, who, in that case, remained Greeks, according to the expression of an ancient historian, and consequently were incapable of enjoying their fathers estates, which fell to the exchequer, if the deceased had no Roman citizen amongst his relations. But this regulation, favourable indeed to the avarice of princes, but repugnant to humanity, Antoninus utterly abolished w. Favours men of He bestowed great privileges and salaries in all the provinces of the empire upon such men of learning as undertook the educating of youth; maintained incredible numbers of children, whose parents were indigent; supplied all senators and magistrates with large fums to defray the expences of their necessary journies, and spent considerable fums in shews and spectacles, complying therein with the inclinations of the people, c learning.

His public

works,

Promises to put stood . He promised, in the beginning of his reign, to spill the blood of no sena- d death, and observes his pro mile.

even by the enemies of Rome.

banished. Of his fon Antoninus took particular care, and brought' him up as if he had been his own child. He would fuffer no inquiry to be made after their accomplices, answering the senate, when they pressed him to it, I do not care the world should know by how many persons I am hated. He never engaged in any war which he could avoid, and was often heard to fay, that he had rather fave one citizen, than Is esteemed destroy a thousand enemies. By this means he gained the affections, not only of his e own people, who looked upon him as their father and protector, but likewise of the declared enemies of Rome, who entertained fuch an opinion of his equity, justice and moderation, that in their disputes they chose him for their judge and arbitrator; and truly no Roman emperor was ever more esteemed and revered by all foreign nations than Antoninus. The king of the Parthians, having raifed a formidable army, and invaded Armenia, retired, contrary to the expectation of all, and disbanded his troops, upon the receipt of a letter from Antoninus. The kings of Hyrcania, Ballria, and India, fent embassadors to him, courting his friendship, and desiring his alliance. Pharasmanes king of Iberia came in person to wait upon him at Rome, and shewed a far greater respect and veneration for him, than he had formerly done for Adrian. f

And revered gods, and to religion. Julius Capitolinus tens us, that he was a property all ranks of revered to such a degree, that neither the people nor foldiery could, for the space of * JUL. CAP. p. 17-20. PAUSAN.

The Lazi, the Armenians, the Quadi, and several other nations, readily received such princes as he was pleased to appoint over them, tho' they were not then subject to the empire s. Antoninus is by some historians compared, by others even preferred, to

Numa, on account of the tranquillity which Rome enjoyed during the greatest part of his reign, and his extraordinary care of all things belonging to the worship of the gods, and to religion. Julius Capitolinus tells us, that he was by persons of all ranks a a hundred years and upwards, look upon any one as truly emperor, who did not bear the name of Antoninus; which was therefore affumed by all his fuccessors during a whole century: nay, Severus appointed, that the name of Antoninus should be peculiar to the emperors, like that of Augustus; so great was the veneration he had for Antoninus! That great name was indeed profaned and dishonoured by Antoninus Caracalla; but neverthelefs respected to such a degree, even after his reign, that the emperor Macrinus obliged his fon Diadumenus to assume it, fearing the foldiers would not acknowledge him emperor, unless distinguished by that still venerable name a.

Adrian died, as we have related above, on the 10th of July 138. Camerinus and Niger being confuls. These were succeeded by the emperor Antoninus, the second time conful, b and Caius Bruttius Prasens. This year Antoninus gave his daughter Annia Faustina in Marries his marriage to M. Aurelius, whom he created Cafar, and at the request of the senate, danghter Fautho' this year only quæstor, named for the consulate of the year ensuing; which he relius. discharged with him, as appears from an ancient inscription on a monument raised to the honour of M. Aurelius by the two captains of the prætorian guards, Petronius Mamertinus and Gavius Maximus, and by the other officers of the ten prætorian cohorts, and the city-guards b. In another infcription which antiquaries take to be of this year, Antoninus is styled the benefactor and preserver of the city of Mopjuestia, for having maintained the inhabitants in the possession of their ancient rights and privileges. From a third inscription we learn, that Antoninus ended this year an aquec duct, which had been begun by Adrian at New Athens in the island of Delos d. The next confuls were M. Peducaus Syloga and T. Hoenius Severus e, during whose administration one Celfus revolted; but all we know of his revolt is, that on this occasion the empress Faustina was greatly displeased with the kindness which the good-natured emperor shewed to his enemies f. Soon after Faustina died, and was, notwithstand-Faustina dies, ing the dissolute life she had led, at the request of Antoninus, honoured with divine and is ranked worship, priests, temples, statues of gold and silver, &c. Games were instituted to among the gods her honour, and her statue was, by Antoninus's order, carried amongst those of the other gods at the Circensian sports. The emperor was not unacquainted with her irregular conduct; but had done all that lay in his power to keep her diforders cond cealed from the multitude 8. The following year, L. Cuspius Rusinus and L. Statius Quadratus being consuls, Antoninus instituted solemn sports at Puteoli, in honour of Adrian, which were styled Pia and Pialia, and were to be celebrated the second year of each olympiadh. The next confuls were C. Bellicius Torquatus and Tiberius Atticus Hero-Caudius Atticus Herodes. The latter, who is greatly cried up by Aulus Gelius and desis raifed to Philostratus k, was a native of Athens, and the most eloquent orator of his time. He had an extraordinary talent at making speeches off-hand; but not having succeeded as he expected in one which he made while he was yet a youth before the emperor Adrian, he attempted to drown himself in the Danube. He instructed M. Aurelius and L. Verus in the Greek tongue, and was greatly esteemed by Antoninus, who e appointed him governor of the free cities of Ajia. He died in the fifteenth year of the reign of Marcus Aurelius, and 176. of the christian æra, and left behind him many speeches, letters, and other works, none of which have reached our times. In the following consulship of Lollianus Avitus and Claudius Maximus, the Brigantes in The Brigantes Britain revolted; but were foon reduced by Lollius Urbicus governor of that province, revolt, and are who deprived them of great part of their country, subdued the more northern nations, and built a new wall between the friths of Forth and Clyde. For the victories gained by Lollius, Autoninus was honoured, as appears from some ancient medals, with the title of Britannicus in. The next year Antoninus entered upon his fourth confulship, having for his collegue M. Aurelius Casar, the second time consul, and gave f the manly robe to Lucius Verus his adopted fon, who had ended the fourteenth year of his age on the fifteenth of December of the preceding year. He imitated therein Augustus, who had taken upon him the confular dignity when he gave the manly robe to his adopted children Caius and Lucius Cafars. The same year Antoninus confecrated the temple which he had built to the honour of Adrian, and on that occasion

Erucius

Q

Vol. VI. No 1.

distributed considerable sums among the populace o. In the next consulship of Sex.

b GRUT. p. 258. CONUPH p. 223.

f Coff. vit. per Vulcat. p. 43. F Jul.

h Philost. foph. 2 Spart.in Geta, p. 90. * Idem in Diad. P. 224. CUSPIN, p. 353. ONUPH, in fast, p. 225. Cost. vit. per Vulcat. p. 42. Cap. p. 18. h Idem, p. 13. Pagi, p. 211. I Aul. Gel. l. ix. c. 2. h Ph xxvii. Vide Alford. annal. Britan. ad ann. 142. Ussen. Bittan. ccclef. antiq. p. 1024. CASAUB. in Spart. p. 50. " JUL. CAP. p. 36.

Chà

2 5

n

01 ħ

kg

25.

€ċ.

30

ea:

im Ti

b RC A:

C

ft:4

fea:

rei

dea

0.

H: bed

adv.

had

pro

&GF

dε

OUI

rius

Writ

note

in Gu

Ca are

P:cur

thing.

B'AN: } Arei A

10 51. 7

127 W. te :17

1 200

F-30.

R. F. W.

On; -...

4.

Par.

E.g.

d rar.

C 300

Erucius Clarus and Cn. Claudius Severus, fome disturbances were raised in Germany 2

Shews a great esteem for M. Aurelius;

The two brothers Quinti-christians.

mities.

and Dacia; but were foon composed by the governors of those provinces. The Alani likewise, attempting to invade the Roman dominions, were driven back into their own country with no small loss o. During the administration of the following confuls Largus and Messalinus, the emperor invested M. Aurelius with the tribunitial and proconsular power. By Faustina, the daughter of Antoninus, he had already a daughter named Lucilla, who was afterwards married to L. Verus. The emperor on all occasions shewed a particular esteem for M. Aurelius, consulted him in all affairs of moment, often followed his advice, and fuffered him to govern as if he had been his partner in the fovereign power, giving no ear to the malicious infinuations of those who attempted to estrange his mind from the young prince, as if he wished b But none for L. for his death P. As the conduct of L. Verus was very different from that of M. Aurelius, the emperor treated him in a quite different manner, not bestowing upon him either the title of Casar, or any other peculiar to the apparent heir of the empire; nay, he did not, during the whole time of his reign, invest him with any power whatfoever; which was a plain indication, that he disliked him, and not without reason, as we shall see hereaster, and only suffered him, because he had been obliged by Adrian to adopt him 4. This year being by the Romans reckoned the nine bundredth of their city, the secular games were celebrated by Antoninus with extraordinary pomp and magnificence r. In the consulate of Torquatus and Julianus, the Moors took up arms, upon what provocation we know not; but were utterly defeated, c driven quite out of their own country, and obliged to shelter themselves in the most distant parts of Libya beyond mount Atlas. The three following years were quite barren of events. In the first Servius Scipio Orfitus and Q. Nonius Priscus were confuls; in the second Glabrio Gallicanus and Vetus; and in the third Quintilius Condianus and Quintilius Maximus. The two latter were brothers, and are mightily cried up by the ancients, on account of their learning, their experience both in civil and military affairs, their wealth, and, above all, in regard of their mutual unity and concord; for they acted on all occasions, says Dion Cassius, as if they had not been two, but one person: whence they are known in history by the name of the Quintilis. They governed the provinces together, the one being lieutenant to the other; were d confuls together; wrote to the emperor, received answers, judged causes, published books, in common, and were in the end unjuftly condemned and executed together by order of the emperor Commodus, as we shall relate in the history of that prince's reign. They were natives of Troas, and highly esteemed by M. Aurelius, under whom they governed Greece in 173. and Pannonia in 178. They published a treatise on agriculture, whereof fome fragments have reached our times ". THE following year, the fifteenth of Antoninus's reign, Sextus Junius Glabrio and

C. Omullus Verianus being consuls, that eminent champion of the christian religion, Justin the martyr, published his first apology, and presented it to the emperor, to his adopted fons, and to the fenate. As Antoninus was a prince of a mild disposition, e Antoninus fa- he was fo far moved by it, and by the informations which he had received from vourable to the other parts of the empire, that he wrote a letter to the whole province of Asia in favour of the distressed christians, which he concluded with these words; If any one for the future shall molest the christians, and accuse them merely on account of their religion, let the person who is arraigned be discharged, tho' he is found to be a christian, and the accuser be punished according to the rigour of the law w. At the same time the emperor wrote in behalf of the christians to the Athenians, Thessalonians, Larisseans in Thessaly, and to all the Greeks x. These letters put a stop to the persecution; which however broke out anew, and raged with great violence under Marcus Aurelius, Antoninus's fuccessor, as we shall relate hereafter. The following year, when C. Bruttius Præ- f sens and A. Junius Rusinus were consuls, the Tiber, overflowing its banks, laid the lower parts of Rome under water. The inundation was followed by a fire, which confumed part of the city, and a famine, which swept off great numbers of the citizens, notwithstanding the care which the good-natured emperor took to have corn conveyed to the city from the most distant provinces. The same year the cities of Narbonne in Gaul, and Antioch in Syria, and the great square at Carthage, were in

o Idem, p. 19. P Idem, p. 24. Idem in Ver. cons. Pausan. l. viii. p. 273. Dio, l. lxxi. p sophist. xxvii. Vide Casaub. in Spart. p. 94. Chron. Alex. p. 608, 610. Euseb. ibid. & l. iv. c. 13. <sup>4</sup> Idem in Ver. p. 36.

<sup>5</sup> Aur. Vict. & Noris, epift.

<sup>6</sup> Dio, l. lxxi. p. 814. Casaub. in Spart. p. 94. Philost.

art. p. 94. w Euseb. l. iv. c. 26. Just. apol. p. 100.

a great part confumed by accidental fire; but soon restored by Antoninus to their former condition v. This year L. Verus discharged the office of quæstor, and exhibited on that occasion public shews, at which he presided, sitting between Autoninus and M. The following year he was raised to the consulship, and had for his collegue T. Sextius, or, as he is called by others, Sextilius Lateranus. C. Julius Severus and M. Rufinus Sabinianus discharged that office next, and were succeeded by M. Ceionius Silvanus and C. Serius Augurinus, during whose consulthip the cities of Cos and Rhodes, with feveral others in Lycia and Caria, were overturned by a violent earthquake; but foon restored to their former lustre, Antoninus contributing thereunto immenfe fums, and making good the loffes which the inhabitants had fullained z. The four following years are quite barren of events: the confuls were Barbarus and b Regulus; Tertullus and Sacerdos; Plantius Quintillus and M. Statius Priscus; Appius Annius Bradua and T. Vibius Bradus. The two latter were fucceeded by M. Aurelius Cafar the third time, and L. Verus the fecond time conful. During their administration, the emperor was seized with a violent sever at Lorium, one of his country- Is taken ill, seats, which in a few days put an end to his life on the seventh of March, after he and dies. had lived feventy-three years, five months, and fixteen or feventeen days, and reigned twenty-two years, seven months, and twenty-six days. When he found death approaching, he fent for the captains of the prætorian guards, and the chief officers of the court, and in their presence confirmed his adoption of M. Aurelius, c and recommended to him the empire, without taking the least notice of Lucius Verus. He then ordered the golden image of Fortune, which always flood in the emperor's bed-chamber, to be removed to the room of M. Aurelius. When the tribune came for the parole, the word he gave him was equanimity. He left his paternal estate to his daughter, and legacies to all his friends and domestics. Though he died in an Heis univeradvanced age, he was no less lamented by all the subjects of the empire, than if he sally lamented. had been snatched from them in the bloom of his youth 4. His funeral was performed with the utmost pomp and magnificence, and his body deposited in the pompous mausoleum of his predecessor Adrian; on which occasion two funeral orations were pronounced, one by M. Aurelius, and another by L. Verus. He was by the senate d ranked among the gods, a temple was built to his honour, priefts, facrifices, and annual sports instituted, &c. b Gordianus, who assumed the title of Augustus at Carthage in the year 237. wrote in his youth an elegant poem, intituled, Antoniniades, describing the lives, the wars, the public and private actions, of Antoninus and his fuccessor M. Aurelius, named likewise Antoninus c; but that work has not reached our times. Some speeches were published under the name of Antoninus, which Marius Maximus maintained to be his, tho' they were commonly thought to have been written by others d. Of the writers who flourished under him, we shall speak in our note (E).

Gord. CAP, p. 20. Vict. epit. 2

4 Idem in Anton. p. 21. 2 JUL. CAP. p. 21. ª Idem, p. 22. b Idem ibid. · Idem

(E) These were Justin, Julius Paulus, Appian, Callinicus Sutorius, Calvistus Taurus, Apollonius, Ptolemy the astrologer, Fronte, Telephus, and Claudius Maximus. Justin is thought to have inscribed his abridgment of Trogus Pompeius to the emperor Antoninus Pius. That writer, in an ancient manuscript, is styled M. Junianus Justinus. His work was known to St. Ferom, St. Austin, and Orosius, who often copies him. Some have confounded Juflin the historian with Justin the martyr, who flourished about the fame time; but never published any work in the Latin tongue, not even the apologies, which he wrote at Rome, and presented to the emperor. Trogus Pompeius, whose history Justin abridged, is ranked among the best historians of Augustus's reign, and put upon the level with Livy, Saluft and Tacitus (61). Julius Paulus published several poetical pieces, and is commended by Aulus Gellius, on account of his great crudition and probity. He lived in Gellius's time; but died before that grammarian began to write: whence he is thought to have flourished under Adrian and Antoninus (62). Appian, who wrote the Roman history in Greck, was a native of Alexandria, pleaded fome time at Rome, and was afterwards employed by the emperors to take care of their private effaces and revenues (63). He lived in the reigns of Trajan, Adrian and Antoninus, and was writing in the year 900. of Rome, the tenth of Adrian's reign (64). His Roman history is, properly speaking, a separate and diffinct history of all the nations subject to Rome, from the earliest times to the reign of Augustui, tho' he sometimes carries it down to the time of Adrian (65). He speaks of the destruction of ferusalem under Adrian, as happening in his time (66). His history of the wars of Africa, Syria, Parthia, Pontus, Iberia, Spain, Illyricum, and of Hannibal and Mishridates, with five books of the civil wars, of which he wrote seven, have reached us; and befides, some fragments of several other histories copied by M. Valois from the collections of Confiantine Porphyrogenitus. He likewise wrote the history of the wars of Judea, and of that which Trajan waged (61) Voss. bist. Lat. c. 19. & 23. (62) Anl. Gel. l. i. c. 22. l. v. c. 4. l. xvi. c. 10. l. xix. c. 7. Voss. poet. Lat. p. 52. (63) Appian. in Syr. Suid. p. 353. (64) Appian. p. 7. (65) Idem, p. 4- Evagr. l. vi. c. 24. (66) Appian. in Syr. p. 83. with

n.

h

11

C 20

JD.

ti,

d (

a],

Pho

tho

hε

hab

ou;

in ti

gua;

the t his c

their 277 htali: f 165_ FACT

0-City

> ¢. 12:

e from

Marcus Aurelius Antoninus furnamed The Philosopher.

preferments.

M. Aurelius is by all the ancients reckoned the best prince that ever swayed a 2 sceptre, and his reign commonly styled The golden age; for he made good the faying which he had borrowed of Plato, and had often in his mouth, viz. That flates would be happy, when princes were philosophers. He was of the Annian family, which His extraction, some writers derive from Numa Pompilius. However that be, it is certain, that his great-grandfather Annius Verus, originally of Succubæ, a city of Bætica in Spain, was the first fenator of the Annian family, and afterwards created prætor. His son, who

e Dio, l. ixxi. p. Sis. Jul. Cap. in M. Aur. p. 33.

with the Dacians (67). Photius admires the elegance of his style; but chiefly commends him as an unbiassed writer, and one who, in his accounts, aimed mostly at truth (68). He borrowed many things of Polybius and Plutarch, whom he often copies (69). Scaliger is of opinion, that many things unworthy of so great an historian have been, by the ignorant transcribers, inserted into his history of Syria. His plan, which was to write the hiltory of Rome, and all the provinces of the empire, was much admired by Evagrius (70). Caliniens Sutorius Was a native of Petra in Arabia; but ipent molt part of his life at Athens. He wrote the history of Alexandria in ten books, quoted by St. Ferom 71, and published feveral other pieces on various subjects (72). Some fragments in Greek by one Callinicus, published by Leo Allatius, are ascribed by Vofsius to Callinicus Sutorius (73). But Jonssius sup-poses Callinicus Sutorius to have flourished in the time of the emperor Gallienus, to whom, and not to Galen the celebrated physician, he inscribed, in his opinion, one of his works (74). Calvifus Taurus is often mentioned by Aulus Geilius, who went to hear him while he instructed the Athenian youth in the principles of the Platonic philosophy (75). He was a native of Tyre, according to Philostratus; but, according to Suidas (76), and Eufebius (77), of Berytus. He published several works, one among the rest shewing the difference between the doctrine of Plato and that of Aristotle. Aulus Gellius quotes a treatise written by him on anger, and the first book of his comments upon Plato's Gorgias (78). The fame writer commends him on account of his abilinence; for he lived chiefly upon lentils (79). Telephus, who instructed L. Verus in the Greek tongue, was born in Pergamus, and wrote a book on the rhetoric of Homer, another on the perfect agreement between that poet and Plato; the lives of fuch poets as had written comedies or tragedies; instructions on the choice of books; a description of Pergamus, with the history of its kings and laws; an account of the laws and customs of Athens; and a collection of epithets (80). Claudius Maximus was by birth a Tyrian, and one of M. Aurelius's preceptors, whom he instructed in the principles of the Stoics. He published several philosophical pieces, and difcourses on the Platonic philosophy, which have reached our times, and are defervedly effeemed by the learned. Some writers are of opinion, that he was conful in the year 144, the feventh of Antoninus's reign, and afterwards proconful of Africa (81). We have already mentioned Apollonius the stoic, who was another of M. Aurelius's preceptors, and whom that prince went frequently to hear, even after he was raifed to the empire. Most writers ascribe to him a work mentioned by Photius, wherein the author gives an account of illustrious women, of fuch especially as had applied themselves to the study of philosophy (82). Ptolemy, the celebrated astrologer and geographer, flourished under Adrian and Antoninus. He made his last astronomical obfervation on a Wednesday, the second of February in the year 141, the fourth of Antoninus's reign; but nevertheless Suidas supposes him to have lived to the reign of M. Aurelius, and gives us a catalogue of his works. His geography is greatly commended by the ancients; but we are told, that some of the manufcript copies of that work are very different from the printed copies (83). Suidas writes, that he was born in Alexandria; but Vossius maintains, that he was a native of Pelufium, and supposed to have been an Alexandrian, because he made his aftronomical observations in that city (84). Sulpitius Apoliinaris, a celebrated grammarian, is often mentioned by Aulus Gellius, who feems to have enter-tained a great opinion of him (85). He left some letters, and fome grammatical writings, wherein he found fault with another grammarian, by name Cafellius Vindex (86). Some of his observations upon Terence have reached our times (87). M. Cornelius Fronto is cried up by the ancients, as one of the best orators of his age, and by some put upon the level with Cicero. Aulus Gellius tells us, that he never visited him, which he did frequently while he was yet very young, without profiting much by his infructions (88). In Adrian's time he passed for the most eloquent orator of that age, and was afterwards appointed by Antoninus to teach M. Aurelius and L. Verus the Latin eloquence. M. Aurelius valued him above all his preceptors, caused a statue to be erected to him in Rome, and honoured him with the consular dignity (89). St. Ferom styles him an illustrious orator (90); and Sidonius speaks of him as the author of a particular kind of diction, more grave, and less flourished, than that of the ancient orators (91). He published several harangues, one of which, against Pelops, was highly esteemed, and preferred to all the rest (92). Sosipater Charisius published some letters of his, and other writings, on the propriety of words, in the collection of authors who have written on the Latin tongue (93). Sidonius commends one Leo, a man of great rank in the fifth century, for adopting the style of Fronto, from whom he was descended (94). We read in Minucius Felix, that one Fronto, a native of Cirtha in Numidia, published some discourses against the christians, which were in great request about the beginning of the third century (95). These discourses are, by some able critics, ascribed to Fronto the (67) Idem ibid. p. 10. Phot. c. 57. (68) Phot. ibid. (69) Voff. hift. Grec. l. ii. c. 13. (70) Evag. l. vi. c. 24. (71) Hier. in Dan. (72) Suid. p. 1360. (73) Voff. ibid. (74) Jonf. l. iii. c. 9. (75) Aul. Gel. l. xviii. c. 10. (76) Suid. p. 871. (77) Eufeb. in chron. (78) Aul. Gel. l. i. c. 26. l. vi. e. 14. (79) Idem, l. xviii. c. 8. (80) Suid. p. 897. (81) Vide P. Pagi, p. 144. (82) Jonf. l. iii. c. 9. Phot. p. 161. Spanh. p. 53. (83) Voff. hift. Grec. l. iv. c. 17. Cpt. difput. append. c. 16. (84) Voff. ibid. (85) Aul. Gel. l. iv. c. 17. l. xiii. c. 17, &c. (86) Aul. Gel. l. vi. c. 6. l. xiii. c. 19, &c. (87) Vide Calvif. an. 163. (88) Gell. l. ii. c. 26. (89) Jul. Cap. in Aurel p. 23. (90) Hier. in chron. (91) Sid. l. i. epift. 1. l. iv. epift. 3. (92) Sid. l. viii. ep. 10. (93) Vide Cafaub. in Spart. M. Aur. (94) Sid. l. viii. epift. 3. (95) Min. Fel. p. 8.

a bore the same name, was by Vespasian raised to the rank of a patrician, appointed governor of Rome, and honoured twice with the confulship. He had three children, Annius Verus, the father of M. Aurelius; Annius Libo, who was conful; and Annia Galeria Faustina, who was married to the emperor Antoninus Pius. Annius Verus married Domitia Calvilla, called also Lucilla, the daughter of Calvisius Tullus, who had been twice conful, and had by her M. Aurelius, and a daughter named Annia Cornificia. M. Aurelius was born in Rome, during his grandfather's fecond confulship, on the 26th of April of the year 121. which was the fourth of Adrian's reign. His first name was Catilius Severus, that of his mother's grandlather, who had been governor of Rome, and twice conful. Upon the death of his father, who died in b his prætorship, he was adopted by his grandfather M. Annius Verus, and took his name. The emperor Adrian used to call him M. Annius Verissimus, on account of his great fincerity; and under that name Justin the martyr addresses him in his second apology. When he was adopted by Antoninus, he took the names of M. Elius Aurelius Verus, the name of Aurelius being peculiar to the family of Antoninus, and that of Ælius to the family of Adrian, into which Antoninus had been adopted. Upon his accession to the empire, he left the name of Verus to L. Commodus, his brother by adoption, and took for himself that of Antoninus; but is generally distinguished from his predecessor, either by the prænomen of Marcus, or the surname of Philosophus; which was given him by the unanimous confent of historians, and not by any public c act or decree of the senate . He was from his tender years brought up by the em- His education. peror Adrian, whom Dion Cassius calls his kinsman s. That prince would have willingly adopted him, and named him for his fuccessor; but chose in his room, as he was then too young, T. Antoninus, who had married his aunt, obliging him to adopt his nephew h. Annius Verus, his grandfather, committed the care of his education, while he was yet an infant, to a matron, who lived in his house; but M. Aurelius thanks the gods, that he was but a short while under her tuition i; for Adrian, taking him from his grandfather, brought him up in the palace, employing the greatest men of that age to instruct him in every branch of literature. He applied His studies and himself to the study of philosophy under the celebrated sophist Apollonius Sextus of learning. d Chæronea, Plutarch's nephew, Junius Rusticus, Claudius Maximus, Cinsia Catullus, and Claudius Severus; to that of eloquence under Herodes Atticus, and M. Cornelius Fronto; and to the study of the law under L. Volusius Metianus, or, as some style him, Mæcianus, the most learned civilian of that age. M. Aurelius is said to have excelled in all these branches of learning, and to have been one of the greatest orators, philosophers and civilians of his time. He delighted chiefly in the study of philosophy, was thoroughly acquainted with the tenets and principles of the different fects, and, when he was but twelve years old, entered himself among the philosophers, wore their habit, and practifed all their aufterities, lying on the ground, fasting, and abstaining e from several meats. He shewed, even after he was emperor, great respect to those His respect to who had instructed him, especially to Junius Rusticus, of whom we have spoken in his preceptors. our notes; transacted nothing without his advice (for he was a person well versed in the arts both of peace and war); faluted him always before the captains of the guards; raised him twice to the consulship; and, after his death, prevailed upon the senate to erect him a statue. He shewed no less gratitude and veneration towards his other mafters, setting up in his closet their images in gold, visiting frequently their sepulchres, and adorning them with crowns, victims and flowers. His great application to the study of philosophy, and the austerities he practised, impaired his Practises the health to such a degree, that he became very weak and infirm, tho' naturally of a austrities of f robust constitution k. To strengthen his stomach, greatly weakened by fasting the philosophers when he was but a youth, he used to take every day some treacle, which was made up for him by one of his physicians, named Demetrius, and, after his death, by the celebrated Galen 1. As he led a very regular life, he lived, notwithstanding his bad health, almost to the age of fixty, and performed great things, applying himself to the dispatch of business with more care and assiduity, than any of his predecessors had done. He had an utter aversion to all forts of shews, sports and diversions, being His aversion to naturally grave and ferious; but nevertheless appeared at them sometimes, tho' very shews, and all seldom, that he might not seem to condemn those who frequented them. He used, diversions.

f Dio, l. lxix, p. 797. Jul. Cap. in M. Aur. Justin. apol. ii. Grut. p. 300.

h Jul. Cap. p. 23. Eutrop.

1 M. Aur. de feip.l. i. c. 14.

k Jul. Cap. ibid. M. Anton.

l. i. c. 3.

1 Galen. prog. p. 460. de antidot. c. 2. & lib. de ther. p. 457.

Vol. VI. Nol.

m

br

in k

ſ

0 eig

h20

m

go!

for

dear

this

Pari

the J

petty

and I

of C:

ticke

ю'd,  $C: \bar{\tau}_{x}$

l alls

Str.C:

V 4

T.-6.

(1)

0.7

* Ai 748

e of v

His issue by

Faultina, the daughter of Antoninus.

while he was emperor, to read, write or to talk to his ministers about public affairs, during the whole time of the sports, for which he was often rallied by the populace, but despised their ralleries m. When he was but sixteen, he made over his paternal estate to his sister, saying, that his grandfather's estate was enough for him. Adrian adopted Antoninus Pius, as we have related above, upon condition, that he should adopt M. Aurelius, at that time eighteen years old, and L. Commodus, who was only in the seventh or eighth year of his age, but already Adrian's grandson by adoption, being the fon of L. Ælius Cæfar. These adoptions happened, in all likelihood, on the same day that Antoninus was adopted, that is, on the twenty-fifth of February of the year 138. M. Aurelius was so far from being elated with his new dignity, that, on the contrary, he could not help betraying great uneafiness and concern, telling b those, who came to congratulate him upon his promotion, that they knew not how difficult and dangerous a thing it was to command. Adrian at the same time appointed him quæstor for the ensuing year, tho' he had not yet attained the age required by the laws of Rome for the discharge of that dignity. The same prince had betrothed to him, when he was but fifteen, the daughter of L. Verus Cafar, named, as is commonly believed, Fabia; and appointed, that Antoninus should give his daughter Annia Faustina to young Lucius. But upon the death of Adrian, Antoninus proposed a match between his daughter and M. Aurelius, who agreed to it, married her some years after, and had a daughter by her in the year 147. the ninth of Antoninus's reign, named Lucilla, who was married to L. Verus in 164. and c afterwards to Pompeianus. He had several other daughters by her, of whom three were still alive in the year 193. and one was put to death by Caracalla in 212. Annia Faustina brought him likewise several sons, viz. Commodus, who was afterwards emperor, Antoninus Geminus, Severus, or rather Verus, styled on some medals Annius Verus, T. Aurelius Antoninus, and T. Ælius Aurelius. Commodus and Antoninus Geminus were twins, born on the thirty-first of August of the year 161. the first of their father's reign o. In the year 139. Antoninus named M. Aurelius consul for the ensuing year, declared him Calar, lodged him in the palace of Tiberius, and took him in a manner for his partner in the empire. M. Aurelius, without being in the least elated with these extraordinary honours, pursued his former course of life, visited d his friends, as if he had been a private person, frequented the schools of the philosophers, applied himself to the study of the Greek and Latin eloquence, &c. In the beginning of the year 147. Antoninus invested him with the proconsular and tribunitial power, and thenceforth transacted nothing without his advice, which he generally followed, as he entertained a high opinion of his integrity, penetration, and extraordinary accomplishments P.

He takes L. Verus for his partner in Antoninus having declared, a little before he died, M. Aurelius his successor, and recommended to him the empire and his daughter in the presence of the chief officers of the court, the senate, as soon as he expired, obliged M. Aurelius, says the author of his life, to accept the fovereignty, and take upon him the management of affairs, e without fo much as mentioning L. Verus, who was likewise the fon of Antoninus by adoption, but very different in his temper and conduct both from his father and brother, being intirely abandoned to all manner of debauchery, and more inclined to tread in the footsteps of Nero and Caligula, than to imitate the virtues of T. Antoninus and M. Aurelius 9. Antoninus, who was well acquainted with his temper, had never invested him with any power, nor even conferred upon him the title of Casar. However, M. Aurelius immediately declared him not only Casar, but Augustus, and his partner in the fovereign power; so that Rome saw herself then for the first time the fovereignty governed by two fovereigns at once. As they were at the same time consuls, this year, the 161st of the christian æra, is distinguished in the Fasti, and inscriptions, f by the consulate of the two Augusti. This action of Marcus Aurelius is cried up by Aristides as the greatest, and the most heroic and magnanimous, that is recorded in history of any prince r. In raising Lucius to the empire, he gave him the name of Verus; so that he was thenceforth named Lucius Verus, instead of Lucius Commodus: he added that of Antoninus, which he assumed himself; whence he is styled in most ancient inscriptions M. Aurelius Antoninus '. The two emperors went together from a the senate to the camp of the prætorian guards, where they promised the soldiers a They both gobounty of twenty thousand sesterces, M. Aurelius speaking for both. They performed vern with afterwards with great pomp the funeral of their deceased father, caused him to be and unanimity. ranked among the gods, and instituted a new college of priests, called Aureliani, (from the name of his family) or Aurelian priests. They both governed with great mildness and unity, Lucius behaving himself rather as Aurelius's lieutenant, than his partner in the fovereignty. Their administration was such, that no one had occasion to regret the loss of Antoninus, whose measures were pursued by both princes. That their union might be the more lasting, M. Aurelius betrothed his daughter Lucilla to L. Verus, and on that occasion both princes added a great number of children to b those who were supplied with corn at the public expence. But the tranquillity and happiness, which Rome and the whole empire enjoy'd under the two sovereigns, was foon interrupted by a dreadful inundation of the Tiber, which happened in the be-Many calamiginning of the following year, when Rusticus and Aquilinus were confuls, overturned the beginning many private houses and public buildings in the city, carried away great numbers of their reign. of people and cattle, and laid under water the neighbouring country to a great distance. This inundation was followed by earthquakes, conflagrations in several provinces, and a general infection of the air, which produced an infinite number of infocts, that destroyed what the slood had spared, and occasioned a famine in Rome. These calamities were in great measure allayed by the care and presence of the two e emperors, who, at their own expence, supplied the distressed city with corn, and made good the loss sustained by particulars. At the same time the Parthian war broke out, the Catti made irruptions into Germany and Rhatia, and the Britons began to revolt. Against the latter was dispatched Calpurnius Agricola, and Ausidius Victorinus against the Catti: but it was thought proper, that L. Verus should march in person against the Parthians, while M. Aurelius continued at Rome, where his presence was judged necessary. The good emperor was not displeased to have such a specious pretence of removing his collegue from Rome, hoping that a warlike life would give him a distaste to the idle amusements and debaucheries of the town: but he was therein greatly disappointed, as we shall see anon ". What success attended d Agricola and Victorinus, we are no-where told. All we know of the wars with these nations is, that Didius Julianus, who reigned after Pertinax, is said to have overcome the Chauci, and likewise the Catti, who had made inroads into the Roman dominions. The war in Britain must have likewise lasted a long time; for it was not ended eight years after, when that of the Marcomanni broke out w. As for the Parthians, they had at this time for their king Vologeses, probably the son of Costboes, who reigned in the times of Trajan and Adrian. Antoninus had refused to restore to him the The Parthians golden throne, which had been feized by Adrian. This perhaps occasioned the war; declare war, for before Antoninus died, the Parthian had made vast preparations, and soon after his Armenia. death appeared in the field at the head of a formidable army x. Great disturbances, e of which we find but a very confused account in the ancients, happened likewise at this time in Armenia, raised, in all likelihood, and somented by the king of the Parthians. Sohemus, king of Armenia, was driven from the throne, and the king of the Henochii, a people dwelling between the Caspian and Euxine seas, was killed by a petty prince, named Tiridates, who was afterwards taken prisoner by the Romans, and by M. Aurelius confined to Britain v. Severinus, a native of Gaul, and governor of Cappadocia, having entered Armenia at the head of several legions, was there attacked by the Partbians near a place called Elegia, and cut off with all his men: we are told, that not a fingle person of the whole army escaped the general slaughter. Dion Cassius ascribes this victory to Vologeses; but he obtained it by Osrboes, or, as Lucian I calls him, Othryades, who commanded the army, and was in all likelihood some prince of the royal family of Parthia, on whom Vologeses designed to bestow the crown of Armenia. Vologeses elated with this victory, entered Syria at the head of a very Vologeses king numerous army, committing dreadful ravages both in that province, and in Cappa- of the Parthians docia, which he likewise invaded, after having put to flight Attidius Cornelianus, who invades Syria.

&quot;Jul. Cap. p. 23. "Jul. Cap. p. 24. "Jul. Cap. ibid. & in L. Ver. p. 39. Herodian. Li. p. 46. & l. iv. p. 546. Grut. p. 252. Pagi, p. 180. "Jul. Cap. p. 25. Aristid. orat. 9. p. 107. "Jul. Cap. in M. Aur. p. 25. & in Ver. p. 36. "Aristid. orat. 16. p. 421. p. 107, 9 July 8 Vide Goltz. p. 34-

one of the emperors should march in person; and accordingly L. Verus set out from L. Verus goes commanded in Syria. Against so formidable an enemy, it was judged proper, that JUL. CAP. p. 25. t Idem ibid. "Idem in Ver. p. 37. W Sp. ARIST. orat. ix. p. 119. Jul. CAp. in Aur. p. 25. y Dio, l. lxxi. p. 802. p. 485. & hist. p. 347. Dio, p. 802. w Spart. in Julian. p. 60.

Rome this year for Syria. M. Aurelius accompanied him as far as Capua, whence a

Ch

1

th

bo

0,

in.

h:

zi:

b rat

Mia.

m

2110

and

i0 .5

1:::

L.

a vo

Par

the I

of to demo

other flagg

he lo

prov

2070

0:1

Cal

Ofri

Rom

Were

his tr

appoi:

leurto.

e fent A

lieuten

leavin

Libon

imperi

of Vari

and ev

itturne

eren w

to both

au had

that the

R. 1. 3 F.5 78. £ ---

F. ...

13.

Lucus , Dø k Ve

THI

d ftirr

c tage

His debaucheries on the ruad.

he was scarce returned to Rome, when news was brought him, that his collegue had been feized at Canofa with a violent diftemper, occasioned by the debaucheries and disorders to which he had abandoned himself on the road: for the luxurious prince, instead of pursuing his march with all possible expedition, and hastening to save Syria, which was over-run by the Parthians, and ready to revolt from Rome, stopt in all the cities through which he passed, spending his time in banquets and revels, and plunging himself into the most infamous debaucheries. Upon the news of his illness, M. Aurelius caused vows and facrifices to be offered for his recovery, and took a second journey to see him. When he began to recover, M. Aurelius returned to Rome; and L. Verus foon after pursued his journey, passing over into Greece, and b from thence into Afia, Pamphylia and Cilicia. As he stopped in every place that could afford him any kind of diversion, he arrived, when the year was already far spent, in Syria; and chusing Antioch for the place of his residence, abandoned himself there to all manner of lewdness and debauchery, while the officers who commanded under him carried on the war. These were Statius Priscus, Avidius Cassius, Martius Verus, Saturninus, Fronto, and Tatianus, all persons of great experience, and generally esteemed the best commanders of that age. As for the emperor Verus, he was so taken up with his pleasures and diversions, that tho' the war lasted four years, he never once appeared at the head of his army, which consisted of the flower of the Roman troops; but wallowed in all manner of lewdness at Antioch, Daphne and Laodicea, c while his officers were fignalizing themselves in the field a. All we know of this war is, that many great exploits were performed in Armenia, Syria, Mejopotamia, Media, and upon the banks of the Tigris b; that the Romans befieged Edessa in the province of Ofrhoene, and gained many fignal victories; that Ofrhoes was once forced to fave The Parthians himself by swimming cross the Tigris d; that the Parthians received a dreadful overthrowat Europa, a city of Syria, on the Euphrates, a little below Zeugmae; and that in the end, Ofrhoes, who commanded the Parthian troops, having lost his army, was obliged to conceal himself in a cave f. Lucian, who wrote about this time, is not ashamed to tell us, that in the above-mentioned battle three hundred and seventy thousand of the enemy were killed; and that the Romans lost only two men, and had d but nine wounded s.

overthrown.

manner of pleasures, and luf-

fers his lieutenants to carry on the war.

Rome happy under M. Au-

His clamency and good-nature.

WHILE L. Verus wallowed in all forts of pleasures at Antioch, M. Aurelius made it his whole study to reform, by his example, and several wholsome laws, the manners of the Romans, to redress abuses, to reward the virtuous, and reclaim, rather by gentle means than feverity, the vicious. The people enjoyed under his mild administration all the blessings of liberty, and were truly no less free than their ancestors had been in the best times of the republic. He paid a greater deserence to the senate than Antoninus himself had ever done, referring to them the decision of such causes as belonged to his own tribunal, and undertaking nothing without their advice, to which he readily submitted, saying, It was more reasonable for him to sollow the e advice of so many wise men, than for so many wise men to follow his. He never failed attending the fenate, delivering his opinion there like a private fenator. He administred justice in person with great affiduity and impartiality; heard with patience fuch as complained of his ministers, and endeavoured, so far as was consistent with equity, to dismiss no one from his presence distatisfied. He suffered no criminal to be condemned or executed, till he had examined with great care and attention the charge, and heard what the person accused could alledge in his defence. He was naturally inclined to mercy; but nevertheless punished such as were guilty of any enormous crime with the utmost rigour. However, we have innumerable instances of his clemency, and very few of his severity. Aurelius Victor tells us, that he obliged f the inhabitants of Nicea to fend yearly to Rome a certain quantity of corn, for having beaten one of their citizens, by name Hipparchus, a man of great learning, and extra-ordinary accomplishments. They continued to pay this tribute to the time of Constantine, by whom it was remitted.

THE following year L. Ælianus, or Lælianus, and Pastor, being consuls, Statius ey the Romans. Priscus made himself master of Artaxata, and a place called The new city, which soon became,

* Jul. Car. in M. Aur. p. 26. & in Ver. p. 37. Philost. foph. xxvii. Dio, in excerpt. Val. p. 775. & l. ixxi. p. 802. b Lucian. hift. p. 362. c Idem, p. 358. d Idem, p. 356. e Idem, p. 361. f Idem, p. 356. g Idem hift. p. 357. h Aur. Vict. in Constant. Aristid. orat. ix. Dio, p. 804. Jul. Cap. in M. Aur. p. 26.

Vol. VI. Nº 1.

that

a became, says Dion Cassius, the first city of Armenia. Priscus being soon after sent against the Parthians, Martius Verus took upon him the command of the troops in Armenia; and partly by force, partly by his wife conduct and obliging behaviour, prevailed upon the Armenians to submit to the Romans, and to restore Sohemus to the Armeniare throne, who, being driven out by Vologefes, had refided fome time at Rome, and had duced. been there created fenator, and honoured with the confulfhip. On feveral medals of this year mention is made of the reduction of Armenia by Verus, who, in some inscriptions, is said to have given a king to Armenia k. Tho' he had no share, as we have related above, in that conquest; yet the senate distinguished both him and M. Aurelius with the title of Armeniacus, and both assumed this year that of impera-b rator, no doubt, for the reduction of Armenia. The following year, when Macrinius and Celsus were consuls, M. Aurelius sent his daughter Lucilla into Syria, to be M. Aurelius married there to L. Verus, to whom she had been for some time betrothed. She was daughter Lucilla attended by her sister Cornisicia, by Civica Pompeianus, uncle to L. Verus by the father, cilla to L. Veand by many other persons of distinction. M. durelius would have willingly accom-rus. panied her in person into the east, but parted with her at Brundusium, and returned to Rome, that he might not feem to affume to himself the glory of finishing the Parthian war m. The next year, the fourth of M. Aurelius's reign, Gavius Orfitus and L. Arrius Pudens being consuls, Vologeses, having attacked the Romans at the head of a very numerous army, was utterly defeated by Cassius; who, pursuing the advan- The Parthians c tages of his victory, advanced to Ctestphon, took that city, and laid the palace of the utterly defeated by Cassius, Parthian monarchs in ashes. He likewise made himself master of Edessa, of Babylon, who takes most and all Media. The city of Seleucia on the Tigris opened its gates to him, and received of their cities, the Romans as friends; but nevertheless Cassius ordered the inhabitants, to the number &c. of four hundred thousand souls, to be inhumanly massacred, and the city to be utterly demolished. Some writers ascribe this calamity to the treachery of the inhabitants; others to the cruelty of Cassius, who thus retaliated upon the Parthians the dreadful flaughters which the Romans had in former times suffered from them. On his return, he lost great numbers of his men, who died of distempers, or perished for want of provisions ". For these successes the senate bestowed on L. Verus, tho' he had never d firred from Antioch, the glorious title of The conqueror of the Parthians and Medes, as appears from feveral ancient infcriptions and medals of this and the following year °. Of this war the ancients give us no farther account; but from Rufus Festus P and Dion Cassius 9 it appears, that towards the end of the reign of Commodus, the provinces of Osrboene and Adiabene, with the city of Nisibis in Mesopotamia, were subject to the Romans. Many Greek historians immediately published accounts of this war; but were guilty, it seems, of considerable mistakes; which prompted Lucian to compose his treatise on the manner of writing history. The war being ended, Lucius Verus appointed kings over the foreign nations which had submitted to Rome, and left the senators who had attended him governors of the Roman provinces. M. Aurelius had e fent Annius Libo his cousin-german into Syria, to govern that province in quality of lieutenant, while L. Verus refided there; but he dying fuddenly, L. Verus, upon his The death of leaving Syria, appointed Casonius Vettilianus governor of that province in his room. Annius Libo. Libo was faid to have been poisoned by Verus, not able to bear with his haughty and imperious temper. But Antoninus gave no credit to that report; nay, at the request of Verus, he fuffered Agaclytes, one of his collegue's freed-men, to marry Libo's widow, and even affisted at the nuptial ceremonies, tho' no-ways pleased with the marriages. THE next year, Q. Servilius Pudens and L. Fusidius Pollio being consuls, L. Verus L. Verus rereturned to Rome, which he entered in triumph with M. Aurelius, who took his chil-turns to Rome, dren with him in the triumphal chariot. The title of Parthicus was given by the senate with M. Aurelius, who took his chil-turns to Rome, and triumphas with M. Aurelius. to both emperors, and both assumed that of Father of their country, which M. Aure-lius. f lius had declined till the return of his brother. L. Verus, after his triumph, begged, that the title of Cafar might be conferred on the two fons of M. Aurelius, viz. Commodus and Annius Verus; who accordingly received it on the twelfth of October of this year. The return of L. Verus proved fatal, we may fay, to whole world; for he carried the plague into all the provinces through which he passed; so that the Advendful infection not only spread through Italy, but extended to the most distant countries plague rages in n Dio, p. 802. vinces of the P FEST. p. 551. empire. <sup>1</sup> Occo. ibid. <sup>m</sup> Jul. Cap. p. 26. <sup>n</sup> Dio, p. 802. Occo. p. 283. Birag. p. 218, 236. P Fest. p. 551. iift. p. 347. Dio, p. 811. & Jul. Cap. in Aur. p. 22. Dio, ibid. * Occo. p. 302, 303. Lucian. hist. p. 358. Amman. l. xxiii. 9 Dio, l. lxxv. p. 848. & Ver. p. 38. LUCIAN. de hift. p. 347.

Cha

Ь

p.

C

to

h

ŀ

h

f

i

1:

0.

25 Jε

ſc

gr

y

ų

ſ

b

2

 $I_{\mathcal{E}}'$

ra.

fie

Fe

g.

€(

i

A

dr

ho

fail

e the

 $H_c$ acco

bγ

C.50

fuch

liz.

rec!a

but f differ

f endea

Feru.

f:on

Tai :

821

CC.

4 d m

b fa

that were subject to, or had any communication with Rome, or the Romans. We are a told by Ammianus Marcellinus, that this plague first broke out at Seleucia, where the foldiers, pillaging the temple of Apollo, found a little golden coffer under ground, which, upon their opening it, cast out such a pestilentious air, as immediately infected the neighbouring country, and foon spread into most parts of the world; but those who wrote at this very time, and before the infection reached the provinces of the Roman empire, affure us, that it began in Ethiopia, and was thence carried into Egypt, and from Egypt into the country of the Parthians, where it infected L. Verus's army". Be that as it will, it was, without all doubt, brought into Italy by the troops which had been employed against the Parthians, and made a dreadful havock in all the provinces of the empire, raging with great violence for some years, especi- b ally in Italy, and at Rome, where it carried off many thousands, and among the rest great numbers of illustrious persons. M. Aurelius caused such of the common people as died to be buried at his own expence, and enacted on that occasion some laws concerning burials and fepulchres, which were still in force in Dioclesian's time w. The plague was followed by a dreadful famine, by earthquakes, inundations, and other calamities. At the same time the Marcomanni, one of the most warlike nations in Germany, invaded the empire, having first drawn into their alliance all the barbarous nations which bordered on the Roman dominions, from Gaul to Illyricum, viz. the Narisci, the Eermonduri, the Quadi, the Suevians, the Sarmatians, the Victovales, Roxolani, Basternæ, Costobochi, Alani, Vandali, Iazyges, and several other nations. This c war, which by the historians of those times is called one of the greatest wars Rome ever fustained, was kindled while the flower of the Roman troops were yet employed in the east against the Parthians; but suspended for some time by the address of the commanders on the frontiers, that Rome might not be at the same time engaged in two fuch dreadful wars. The affairs of the east were no sooner settled, and L. Verus returned to Rome, than M. Jurelius acquainted the senate, that a war with the Marcomanni was inevitable, and of fuch confequence, that it required the prefence of both emperors; for M. Aurelius did not care to commit the whole management of the war to Verus, judging him unfit to carry it on with success; and was, on the other hand, unwilling to leave him at Rome, where he began to be daily more and more despised d on account of his enormous debaucheries. The fenate approved his proposal; so that both emperors, after having offered an infinite number of facrifices, and implored by all forts of ceremonies, both foreign and Roman, the protection of the gods, left Rome about the close of the year, in their military apparel, and hastened to Aquileia, to make the necessary preparations there for taking the field early in the spring x.

Marcomanni,

War with the

And is followed by a famine, by earthquakes,

Both emperors fet out from Rome.

The Marcoother German nations sue for peace;

THE next confuls were the emperor L. Verus the third time, and M. Quadratus, nephew to the emperor Antoninus Pius. Early in the spring the two emperors took the field, and their approach struck the enemy with such terror, that they repassed the Danube, and even put to death the authors and promoters of the war. The Quadi, whose king was dead, promised not to crown the person whom they had e chosen in his room, without the consent and approbation of the emperors. Most of the nations who had taken arms dispatched embassadors either to the emperors or their generals, to make their submissions, and ask pardon for having disturbed the peace of the empire. Hereupon Verus, who had left the diversions of the city much against his will, and panted after them, was for returning immediately to Rome; but M. Aurelius, suspecting the sincerity of the barbarians, continued some time at Aquileia, fortifying that place with new works, and then passed, together with Verus, the neighbouring Alps; provided with great care for the fafety of Italy and Illyricum, and returned to Rome about the end of this year y. The following year, Apronianus and Paulus being confuls the second time, the war seems to have broke out anew; for it f appears from several ancient inscriptions, that both princes took this year, the eighth of their reign, the title of imperator; which was never done but on occasion of some victory 2: and in the chronicle of Eusebius we read, that the Romans gained this year a fignal victory over the Marcomanni, Quadi, Sarmatians and Dacians 1. The next But renew the year, in the consulate of Q. Sosius Priscus and P. Calius Apollinaris, the Germans, war with great notwithstanding their late defeat, renewed the war with more vigour than ever; infomuch that both emperors left Rome in the depth of the winter, and returned to

Aquileia,

* Ammian. l. xxiii. p. 251, 253.
Ros. l. vii. c. 15.
* Idem ibid. p. 28. & 39.

Geog. p. 285, & 309.
* Euseb. chron. p. 136. D. 28. & 20. P. Dio, p. SoS. Jul. Cap. in Aur. p. 28. Oros. l. vii. c. 15. 2 Occo. p. 285. & 309.

a Aquileia, with a defign to attack the barbarians early in the fpring; but the plague beginning to rage there with great violence, they thought it adviseable to leave the place, and hasten back to the metropolis. As they were on the road in the same coach, L. Verus was seized with an apoplexy near Altinum, M. Aurelius caused him to be immediately taken out of the coach, and blooded, by which means he brought him alive to Altinum, where he lay three days speechless, and then died, after having L. Verus dies. lived thirty-nine years, and reigned eight, and some months b. M. Aurelius conveyed his body to Rome; caused it to be interred with extraordinary pomp by that of his father L. Casar in the mansoleum of Adrian; prevailed upon the senate, notwithstanding the hatred they bore him, to rank him among the gods; appointed him priefts, b sacrifices, &c. and took particular care of all his relations; nay, even of his wicked and debauched freed-men, whom however he removed from the court, retaining only one of that herd, by name Ecleaus, who afterwards murdered his son Commodus, as we shall relate hereaster. L. Verus was a prince intirely abandoned to all manner of Hischaracter. lewdness and debauchery, passing his whole time in revels and banquets, and often scouring the streets in the night-time, as Nero had formerly done, and committing great disorders in the public-houses and shews, which he used to frequent in disguise, and mix with the mob, by whom he was often roughly handled. During his four years stay in Syria, he was so taken up with pleasures and lewd amours, that he was with much-ado prevailed upon by his officers to march twice to the banks of the Euc phrates, whence he hastened back to Daphne, one of the suburbs of Antioch, a place fo infamous for all manner of lewdness, that to live after the manner of Daphne was become a proverb to express the most dissolute and luxurious way of living, and that all who had any regard to their reputation avoided appearing there. In that place Verus abandoned himself without restraint to all forts of abominations, while his gene- His debaucherals were carrying on the war against the Parthians and their allies; which gave occa-ries, revels, fion to many severe lampoons, the Antiochians being greatly addicted to satire. But tanquets, &c. Verus preferred his pleasures to his reputation: he brought with him out of Syria a great number of comedians, players, buffoons, &c. and passed most of his time in their company. Soon after his return to Rome, he is faid to have spent at one entertaind ment fix millions of fefterces; for he prefented each of the guefts, who were twelve in number, with crowns of gold, and with all the gold and filver plate, great part of which was fet with jewels, which they had made use of during the banquet, and likewise with golden boxes filled with precious ointments; and at their parting he gave to each of them a chariot, and mules richly caparifoned, to carry them home. He turned the court, says the writer of his life, into a tavern; for after he had supped with M. Aurelius, he used to withdraw to his own company, and pass the whole night in drinking with his debauched companions, and lewd women. He was fo fond of a horse named Celer, or the Swift, that he erected a statue to him in gold, fed him with raifins and almonds, covered him with purple, ordered him to be kept in a room of e the palace, and, when he died, erected a stately monument to him on the Vatican. He suffered his slaves to be as free with him at all times, as they were with their masters, according to the Roman custom, during the feast of Saturn, and was intirely governed by them, his freed-men, and his concubines. He built a magnificent villa on the Clodian way, and there spent most of his time in revelling with his freed-men, and fuch women as were infamous for their lewdness. He once invited thither M. Aurelius, who complied with his invitation, and staid five days with him, hoping to reclaim him from his vices by the example of his regular and blameless conduct; but finding he was not to be reclaimed, the good emperor bore with him patiently, diffembled his diforders, concealed them as much as lay in his power, and even f endeavoured to excuse them. However, it was privately whispered abroad, that Verus's horrible excesses, and his arbitrary manner of proceeding after his return from the east, occasioned a misunderstanding between him and M. Aurelius, who was thought to have intimated in his speech to the senate, that he was not much grieved for the death of his collegue, which enabled him to do good to all without controul or restraint; nay, as the best of princes are often maliciously censured, M. M. Aurelius Aurelius was said to have delivered himself from so troublesome a collegue, either by said by some to possess or have additionable from the proof of the p poison, or by ordering his physician Posidippus to let him blood unseasonably c. Dion him to be mur-Cassius seems inclined to believe, that M. Aurelius thought it expedient to prevent by dered.

b Jul. Cap. in M. Aur. p. 28. & in Ver. p. 39. Galen, prog. t. iii. p. 459. e Jul. Cap. p. 28-34.

Chi

b

0

h

b ti

li

27

T

in

Н

in

h

ŀ

m.

25

[#.

D.

on riv

D

0 t

d

th

11.3 tho

 $\mathbf{F}^{lc}$

D:W

to :

and

Wire

 $T^{e3}$

dari Mich.;

lent

B

then

the j

one ,

10.1

....

4

 $\mathcal{U}_{i,j}$

Ü,

۹,- e foo:

d g

c th

But cleared from that afpersion by others.

that means Verus from raising disturbances in the state d; for he is said to have formed a a conspiracy, with a design to murder M. Aurelius, and reign alone e. But it is a crime, say other historians, to imagine, that such a prince as M. Aurelius, to whom flattery itself has never equalled any other, would by any means contribute to the death of his brother, whatever his life and actions might deferve f. Only fuch fratricides as Caracalla, and persons guilty of the most enormous crimes, can entertain fuch thoughts of Aurelius 8. Some charged the empress Faustina with his death, as if she had poisoned him for having discovered to his wife his incestuous conversation with her. Others faid, that he was poisoned by his wife Lucilla, jealous of the great passion he had for his own sister Fabia, whose power she could not brook h.

M. Aurelius war against the Marcomanni.

M. Aurelius, now delivered from so vicious and troublesome a partner, made it b. his whole study to oblige all with his engaging behaviour, and unbounded generofity. He feemed to excel not only his predecessors, but even himself, governing with such moderation and mildness, as can hardly be expressed i. The necessary preparations prepares for the for the war with the Marcomanni ingroffed at this time his whole care and attention. His lieutenants gained, it feems, some advantages over that formidable enemy in the very beginning of the ensuing year, while M. Cornelius Cethegus and C. Erucius Clarus were consuls; for soon after the death of L. Verus, and before the twenty-fifth of February of this year, he took upon him the title of imperator, as appears from several medals and inscriptions k. However, the Marcomanni soon resumed their courage, and falling upon Vindex, captain of the guards, cut both him and most of his c men in pieces 1. After this victory, they approached the Roman territories, where they were met by the flower of the troops of the empire. Hereupon a bloody battle ensued, which lasted many hours, both the Romans and barbarians fighting with The Romans incredible courage and resolution; but at length the Romans were utterly defeated, great flaughter and put to flight, after having lost near twenty thousand men. The Marcomanni purfued the fugitives to the very walls of Aquileia; which city they had taken, had not the Roman generals rallied their men with great skill and conduct. The barbarians entered Italy itself, destroying all with fire and sword, and committing everywhere most dreadful devastations m. The news of this fatal overthrow filled d Rome with terror and consternation. As the plague, which still raged in most provinces of the empire, had greatly weakened the army, flaves, gladiators, and even the banditti of Dalmatia and Dardania, were admitted into the army. Besides, M. Aurelius prevailed upon some mercenary Germans to serve against their countrymen. Thus a confiderable army was foon raised; but as money was wanting to pay them, and defray the other charges of fo dangerous a war, the good-natured emperor, not being able to prevail upon himself to burden his people with new taxes, exposed to fells the plate, public fale the furniture of the palace, the gold and filver plate, all the valuable picfurniture of the tures and statues belonging to the crown, and even his wife's rich garments embroipalace, to de- dered with gold, and a curious collection of pearls, which Adrian had purchased 🤄 fray the charges of the war.

during his long progress through the provinces of the empire, and lodged in a particular cabinet, called Adrian's cabinet. The fale lasted two months, and produced fuch an immense sum, as enabled the emperor to relieve the people this year, when provisions were very dear, with an extraordinary largess; to defray the charges of a five years expensive war; and to buy back, when the war was ended, part of what he had fold, allowing however the buyers full liberty to keep their purchases, or return them, and take their money again n. When he was upon the point of setting out from Rome, he married his daughter Lucilla, the widow of L. Verus, to Claudius Pompeianus, who was originally of Antioch, and the son of a private Roman knight, but a person of extraordinary merit, and famed for his wisdom and integrity, which M. Aurelius f ever preferred to wealth and nobility o. Julian, surnamed the apostate, blames M.

Aurelius for having left the empire to his fon Commodus, and not to Pompeianus, who was every way qualified for it; whereas Commodus was altogether unfit for the difcharge of so great a trust P. However, neither Lucilla herself, nor her mother Faustina, were pleased with the match. Lucilla retained the title of Augusta, and all the Annius Verus, badges of sovereignty 4. Before the emperor left Rome, his son Annius Verus Casar the emperor's second son, dies.

<sup>4</sup> Dio, p. 802. <sup>e</sup> Philost. foph. xxvii. p. 548. <sup>f</sup> Jul. Cap. in Ver. p. 39. <sup>g</sup> Herodian. l.iv. p. 645. Aur. Vict. <sup>h</sup> Jul. Cap. <sup>i</sup> Idem, p. 29. Eutrop. <sup>k</sup> Birag. p. 221. <sup>1</sup> Dio, l. lxxi. p. 803. <sup>m</sup> Idem ibid. & Lucian. pfeud. p. 493. <sup>n</sup> Jul. Cap. in Aur. p. 29. Eutrop. & Birag. p. 221. <sup>o</sup> Lamprid. in Comm. p. 48. Herodian. l.i. p. 464. <sup>p</sup> Julian. Cæs. p. 13. <sup>q</sup> Jul. Cap. p. 31. Herodian. l.i. p. 427.

died

M. Aurelius

a died at Palestrina, in the seventh year of his age. M. Aurelius loved him with all the tenderness of a father; but nevertheless bore his death with great firmness, comforcing the empress Faustina, and the physicians, who are said to have occasioned his death by opening unfeafonably a swelling under his ear r. The emperor set out at length for Germany, whither he shewed a great desire of carrying Galen with him; but that celebrated physician chusing to stay at Rome, the good-natured prince would not press him to leave it. He left likewise at Kome his son Commodus, under the care of Pitholaus, his chief chamberlain, injoining him to employ none but Galen, in case his fon should be taken ill during his absence .

THE ancients compare this war to the Punic and Cimbrian wars; but at the same b time give us a very succinct and confused account of it. The barbarians, say they, The barbarilaid waste several provinces of the empire; defeated great armies. The Marcomanni ans over-run and the Vandals made themselves masters of Pannonia, and held it for some time. vinces of the The Castobochi over-ran Greece, and advanced as far as Elatea, a famous city of Phocis empire. in Achaia; they overturned cities, and committed every-where dreadful devastations. However, they were at length overcome by M. Aurelius, who, during this bloody M. Aurelius and destructive war, gave innumerable instances of an extraordinary prudence and carries on the intrepidity, chusing rather to prolong the war, and tire out the enemy, than expose war in person his men to unnecessary dangers. The soldiers, animated by the example of their fuccess. leader, behaved with uncommon bravery; and the captains of the guards, as well as c the other generals, fignalized themselves in a very eminent manner ". The Marcomanni, Quadi, Sarmatians and Vandals, were constrained to abandon Pannonia, and retire beyond the Danube. The emperor pursued them, and coming up with them as they were passing that river, gavethem a dreadful overthrow. The lazyges were twice defeated, first in Pannonia, and the second time as they were croffing the Danube on the ice. A Roman soldier, who was upon guard during the night near the Danube, hearing one of his comrades, who had been taken by the barbarians, crying on the other fide in an affecting manner, threw himself, armed as he was, into the Dion Cassius tells us, that the Roman soldiers having demanded of the emperor a lard gess after a bloody battle, in which they had behaved with extraordinary valour, and obtained a complete victory, he refused it, telling them, That he could not inrich His sirmness them, without improverishing their parents and relations; and adding as they were dard intrepidity. them, without impoverishing their parents and relations; and adding, as they seemed diffatisfied with this answer, That their complaints gave him no uneasiness or concern, fince he was well apprifed, that the gods alone disposed of empires. Pompeianus, the emperor's fon-in-law, who commanded a body of troops, desiring to have Pertinax joined in the commission with him, M. Aurelius readily complied with his request, tho' he had, not long before, upon fome complaints, deprived Pertinax of an employment which he had in Dacia. Pert nax was attended with great fuccess in his new commission, which induced the emperor to admit him into the senate. Being Pertinax creatriver, croffed it, rescued his fellow-soldier, and returned with him to his post w.

e soon after convinced, that the complaints brought against him were quite groundless, to repair the injury he had done him, he honoured him with prætorial ornaments, and appointed him governor of Rhatia and Noricum, whence he drove the Germans, who had broke into that province, and was on that account, notwithstanding the meanness of his birth, raised by the emperor to the consular dignity. The emperor, during his first expedition against the Marcomanni, resided for the most part at Carnuntum, a city of Upper Pannonia upon the Danube, which some take to be the prefent village of St. Perronel in Austria 2.

BEFORE the war with the Marcomanni was ended, another broke out in Egypt, Diffurbances the robbers and shepherds of that country, who were numerous, taking up arms, at in Egypt. f the infligation of their priefts, and committing dreadful diforders. Being headed by one Isidorus, a man of great resolution and intrepidity, they killed a Roman centurion, and fome foldiers, by treachery; and afterwards, the Egyptians joining them in great numbers from all parts, they defeated the Roman troops in a pitched battle; over-ran the whole country, and would have made themselves masters of Alexandria itself, had not Cassius, whom M. Aurelius had appointed governor of Syria, marched against them. Cassius was reckoned the best commander of his age, and had signalized

<sup>1</sup> Galen. prog. 459. & 461.

Ammian. I. xxai. p. 1

p. 352.

Local Dio. p. 803.

Aristid. orat. ix. p. 117.

W. Dio. i. W. Dio. i. V. Idem, p. 810. Jul. Cap. in Pertin. p. 54.

himself I JUL. CAP. p. 31. Aur. p. 29. PAUSAN. l. x. p. 352. lxxi. p. 804.805. Aur. Vict. p. 31.

Dio, ibid. BAUDRAND. p. 165.

VOL. VI. Not.

himself both in the Parthian and German wars. However, he did not think it a

Ch

b 0

q

th

ſc

c۲

th

ſį

fc

m fui

Đ٧

ing

the

Ьı fίξ

ďι А

Ь

0

Ĉ g fla

it l

a h ĉ Will

the:

frie bra

befo

of A

lais !

acko

to th

Arr.

 $f_{i,i}$

(:::

Lon.

oi ch

 $\Omega_{\rm B}$

Q, E, Ľ.

C W

Which are suppressed by Cal-

The emperor

the reproaches

adviseable to engage so bold and desperate an enemy; but having found means to fow divisions among them, as he was a man of great craft and address, he obliged them at last to submit, and lay down their arms. Cassius, having thus quelled the disturbances in Egypt, marched into Armenia and Arabia, where he performed great exploits; but neither of them, nor of this year, which feems to have lasted some time, Spain invaded any farther mention is made in history. At the same time the Moors over-ran almost by the Moors, all Spain, ravaging that country with fire and sword; but were in the end driven out who are driven by the emperor's lieutenants. Severus, afterwards emperor, was at that time quæstor of the province of Bætica. There were likewise some disturbances in the country of the Sequani, now the Franche-Comté; but these the emperor composed with his b authority, and seasonable severity c. The next confuls were Herennianus and Severus, uncle to the emperor of that name, who, at his request, was by M. Aurelius admitted into the senate d. During their administration, a great dispute arising between Herodes Atticus and the city of Athens, the emperor seemed inclined to savour the latter; which so provoked Herodes, who was a man of a violent and stery temper, that when the cause was to be decided by the emperor then residing at Sirmium, now Sirmich, in Pannonia, instead of pleading with his usual eloquence, transported with rage, he launched into bitter and scurrilous invectives against the emperor, telling him amongst other things, that he suffered himself, which was highly unbecoming an emperor, to be governed by a woman, and an infant only three years old; for the empress Fau- c stina, and her young daughter, instructed by her, had interceded with the emperor in behalf of the Athenians. When he had done railing against the emperor, Bassaus, captain of the guards, told him, That his infolent behaviour might perhaps cott him his life. But Herodes, without shewing the least concern or remorfe, answered, That a man of his age had nothing to fear, and immediately withdrew. As for the empebears patiently ror, he heard him the whole time quite unconcerned; and when he withdrew, address of Herodes At- fing the Athenian deputies, You may alledge your reasons, said he, tho' Herodes bas not been pleased to alledge bis. He heard them with great attention, and could not help shedding tears, when they described the cruel and arbitrary proceedings of Herodes, and his freed-men, who had usurped a kind of sovereignty over the city, and oppres- d fed the people in a tyrannical manner. However, the emperor did not condemn Herodes, but only his freed-men; and the punishment which he inflicted upon them was very small, says our historian, and no-ways answerable to their crimes; nay, to all he remitted part of it, and to one of them, named Alcimedon, the whole, thinking him sufficiently punished by the death of his two daughters, killed by a flash of lightning after their arrival at Sirmium. Some time after, Herodes wrote to the cmperor, complaining, that he did not honour him, as he had done formerly, with his letters; and the good-natured prince immediately fent him an answer, filled with the most tender and sincere expressions of friendship, condescending, in a manner, to beg his pardon, for having condemned persons belonging to him t. Basseus, captain e of the guards, whom we have mentioned above, is by Dion Cassius styled M. Rusus Basaus. He was, according to that writer, a common peasant; but being forced into the service, gave such proofs of his courage and integrity, that the emperor created him captain of the guards, tho' he was quite destitute of learning, and spoke fo broad, that he could hardly be understood s. The following year, when Maximus and Orfitus were consuls, M. Aurelius gained, it seems, considerable advantages over the Germans; for, on all the medals of this year, mention is made of his victories in Germany, and on some he is styled Germanicus; which title was given to his son Commodus this very year, on the fifteenth of October h. The next confuls were M. Aurelius Severus the second time, and T. Claudius Pompeianus, during whose adminif stration nothing happened, which historians have thought worth transmitting to po-M. Aurelius in sterity. But the ensuing year, when Gallus and Flaccus were consuls, M. Aurelius, by an event altogether miraculous, escaped being cut off with his whole army. This happened beyond the Danube, in the country of the Quadi, where M. Aurelius was great danger of being cut off with his whole Marcomanni. North Hungary, falls into the Danube over-against the ancient city of Strigonium, to this year making war, and near the river Gran, which rifing from the mountains of * Dio, p. 803. Vulcat, Gallican, in vit. Cass.

Jul. Cap. ibid. p. 32.

d Onuph, in fast. p. 231.

Nurs. epist. consul. p. 108.

e Dio, ibid.

s Dio, p. 803. & in excerpt. Val. p. 717. JUL. CAP. ibid. p. 32. PHILOST. Soph. XXVII. p. 558—561. F Liem in Birag: p. 223, 225. Lamprid. in Comm. p. 50. 8 Dio, p. 803. & in excerpt. Val. p. 717.

a which the Dan gives its name. This memorable battle was begun by the enemy's flingers and archers, who, from the opposite banks of the Dan, galled the Romans to fuch a degree, that the emperor thought it adviseable to pass the river, and dislodge them; which was done accordingly, not without great flaughter on both fides; but the enemy retiring in good order, as it had been concerted among them before-hand, drew the Romans, who advanced with more bravery than conduct, into a disadvantageous place, among barren mountains, quite destitute of water. The Romans, closing their ranks, defended themselves with great bravery, and repulsed the enemy, who thereupon giving over the attack, feized the avenues, and blocked them up on all fides, hoping to reduce by thirst those whom they could not overcome by force b of arms. The Romans, finding themselves thus shut up among barren mountains, quite spent with their wounds and the fatigues of the battle, oppressed with heat, and tormented with an infufferable drought, attempted to open themselves a way through the midst of the enemy; but all their efforts proving unsuccessful, they found themfelves obliged to continue under arms, exposed to the rays of the sun, and oppressed with a violent thirst, without being able either to fight or retire. In this deplorable extremity, both foldiers and officers began to abandon themselves to despair, while the emperor, more affected with the miseries of the soldiers than his own, flew through all the ranks, endeavouring to infpire them with courage, and raife their drooping spirits; but as they saw no possible means of escaping the present danger, his words c were to no purpose, and nothing was heard but groans and lamentations, nothing feen but marks of the utmost despair. In this distress, when they expected every moment to be either cut in pieces, or to become a prey to the barbarous enemy, who furrounded them, clouds appeared all on a sudden gathering in the air; the sky was overcast, and, to their inexpressible joy, rain fell in great plenty; which the faint-lieved by a miing foldiers received, holding their mouths, helmets and bucklers up to heaven, as raculous they are represented on the famous column of Antoninus at Rome. In this posture the shower: barbarians fell upon them; fo that they were obliged at the same time to drink and fight; for they were so oppressed with drought, that such of them as were wounded drank their own blood mixed with the water which they had received in their helmets. As they were more eager to quench their thirst than to repulse the enemy, they had been all cut in pieces, had they not been miraculously succoured by a dreadful storm of hail, attended with thunder and lightning, which discharged itself upon the barbarians, as they advanced against them. Thus were seen at the same time fire and water descending from heaven; water to refresh the Romans, and fire to destroy their enemies; for either no fire fell upon the Romans, or what fell was immediately extinguished; and the rain which fell upon the barbarians was so far from overcoming the flames which consumed them, that, on the contrary, it doubled their violence, as if it had not been water, but oil. The enemy, thus destitute of water in the midst of a heavy shower, were obliged either to wound themselves, in order to extinguish e with their blood the devouring flames, or to have recourse to the Romans, and throw themselves upon the mercy of M. Aurelius, who received and entertained them in a friendly manner k. Thus Dion Cassius relates this memorable event, so much celebrated by Apollinaris, Tertullian, Eusebius, Julius Capitolinus, Themistius in his oration before Theodosius, St. Jerom, Gregory of Nyssa, the poet Claudian, and the chronicle of Alexandria. It was engraved on the famous column of Antoninus, with the other exploits of M. Aurelius during the Marcomannic war, and on another which Themiftius tells us he had feen 1. The truth of this miraculous event has been universally acknowledged both by the christian and pagan writers, who nevertheless disagree as to the authors of it. Dion Cassius ascribes it to a celebrated magician of Egypt, named f Arnuphis, who attended the emperor in this war m; Suidas to a magician, by name Julianus, who was originally of Chaldea, and wrote several books of magic n. Julius Capitolinus o, Themistius P, and the poet Glaudian 9, pretend, that this miraculous shower was owing to the emperor's own prayers. In the above-mentioned column of the Antonini it is by the pagans ascribed to their thundering Jupiter. But all the Which was obchristian writers assure us, that so signal a favour was granted by heaven to the prayers tained by the of the christian soldiers, who served in the Roman army. This Eusebius afferts upon christian sol. the authority of Apollinaris bishop of Hierapolis, which ought to be of great weight, diers.

t

P

b d

20

fu

B

of

th

ap

h

m

c

m

and

Cap

na

25 fu

f

λ

ij

Λ

an

con

they imn luch

all r

rere

raile

and ancie

accor

emp!

1 favou

15 the

F.tor

COTE

thail tic ş

 $\mathcal{G}_{\mathfrak{X}}$ t(

p.E

1

e a ne

d ti:

C W an

The legion Meiirina.

M. Aurelius acknowledges

flians for his deliverance.

fince this miraculous deliverance happened in his time r. The christians, by whose a prayers the army was faved, belonged to the legion Melitina, mentioned by Dion Cassius, or, as Xiphilin expresses it, to the legion that had been raised or quartered at Melitine; for the legions, as is well known, often borrowed their names from the places where they were quartered. Melitine was one of the chief cities of Armenia Minor, and stood on the banks of the Euphrates. This legion, which, according to Xiphilin, confisted intirely of christians, and had been prompted by a vision, if Gregory of Nyssa is to be credited, to embrace the true religion, was in all likelihood the twelfth, which by Titus had been quartered in the city of Melitine in the year 70. " and was in Cappadocia in the year 230. the ninth of Alexander Severus's reign w. The province of Cappadocia probably comprehended at that time Armenia b Minor; fo that we may suppose it to have been still at Melitine; for there we find it placed in a notitia imperii, or state of the empire, published many years after the death of Severus. The twelfth legion was diftinguished by the furname of the thunderigx; and Apollinaris, as quoted by Eusebiusy, tells us, that the legion Melitina was honoured with that title by the emperor, by way of reward for the above-mentioned miracle. The fame thing we read in Xipbilin, and in Onuphrius, who maintains, that till the time of M. Aurelius no mention is made of the thundering legion z. But from an ancient inscription it appears, that the twelfth legion was distinguished by that furname even in Trajan's time . Of this legion, which still subsisted in the time of Eusebius, were the forty martyrs of Sebaste, so much spoken of by the ecclefiaftic writers of the primitive times. But what most of all confirms the truth of the above-mentioned miracle is, the letter which the emperor himfelf wrote to the fenate, giving them an account of it, and of the victory he gained on that occasion 4. Tertullian affures us, that in his letter he ascribed, tho' in a doubtful manner, his deliverance to the prayers of the christians; Having obtained rain, says he, as quoted by Tertullian, perhaps by the prayers of the christians. He expressed himself to the senate with great caution and circumspection, as the reader may observe; but of his being in his own mind fully convinced, that his fafety was owing to the christians, he gave foon after a very strong proof, by enacting, that such as should thenceforth accuse a christian on account of his religion, should be punished with the utmost d numjeis indevi-ed to the chri- rigour, that is, as Eusebius understands it, with death . As Tertullian quotes the emperor's letter in writing against the pagans, we cannot doubt but he had seen it, nor call in question what he says of it. Eusebius quotes some passages of it out of Tertullian, and speaks of it in his chronicle as a thing that was faid to have been. But St. Jerom, in translating that passage of Eusebius, positively affirms, that it was still extant. Orofius and Xipbilin only say, that it was thought to be extant in their times f; whence it is manifest they had not seen it. A letter ascribed to M. Aurelius concerning the victory, which he obtained by the prayers of the christians, has reached our times. It is commonly annexed in Greek to the apologies of Justin the martyr, and is to be found in Latin in Onuphrius 8 and Baronius b, translated, as they e tell us, from the Greek text, which was itself a translation from the original Latin. They both look upon it as an authentic piece; but notwithstanding their judgment, it is by the best critics rejected as spurious, to whose opinion we readily subscribe, finding it frequently contradicts all the historians who have described the reign of M. Aurelius . After fo glorious a victory, M. Aurelius was proclaimed emperor the feventh time, and the empress Faustina was honoured by the senate with the title of mater castrorum, or the mother of armies k. This memorable victory was gained by the Romans in the year of the Christian zera 174. the fourteenth of M. Aurelius's reign. Great numbers of the enemy were cut in pieces, many were taken prisoners, and the rest put to flight and dispersed.

Marcus Aurelius could not however be yet prevailed upon by his friends to leave Germany, and return to Rome, being defirous to reduce the countries of the Marcomanni, and the Sarmatians, to Roman provinces, not out of vanity and ambition, says Dion Cassius, but because he found by experience, that he could not rely upon

TEUSEB. l. v. c. 5.

Dio, p. 806.

GREG NYSS. orat. 2. de quadraginta martyr.

Dio, p. 806.

Dio, p. 806.

Loseph. bell. Jud. l. vii. c. 4.

Dio, l. lv. p. 564.

Loseph. bell. Jud. l. vii. c. 4.

Dio, l. lv. p. 564.

Loseph. bell. Jud. l. vii. c. 5.

Loseph. bell. Jud. l. vii. c. 5.

Loseph. l

a their fidelity. This he would have compassed, had he not been interrupted in the midst of his conquests by the revolt of Cassius, which we shall relate anon. He continued in Germany great part of the following year, when Piso and Julianus were confuls; and having placed twenty thousand men in the countries of the Quadi and Marcomanni, harassed these two nations to such a degree, that they resolved to abandon their native soil, and settle elsewhere. But M. Aurelius, having received timely notice of their design, prevented them from putting it in execution; so that their fields being laid waste, and all communication with the neighbouring nations cut off, they were in the end constrained by famine to fend embassadors to the em- The Marcoperor, and sue for peace. The Quadi sent with their embassadors all the Roman manni and Quadi sue for b deserters, and thirteen thousand prisoners, whom they had taken during the war; peace. and by that means obtained a peace, upon condition, that they should not for the future traffic within the Roman dominions, nor fettle within fix miles of the Danube. But this peace was short-lived; for the Quadi, instead of executing the articles of their agreement, joined the Iazyges, who were still in arms, and drew over the Marcomanni. At the same time they drove out Furtius, their king, for disapproving their measures, and, of their own authority, appointed one Ariogeses in his room; which M. Aurelius refented to fuch a degree, that tho' the Quadi promifed to fet at liberty fifty thousand Roman captives, upon condition, that he concluded a peace with them, and confirmed to Ariogeses the title of king, the emperor c would not hearken to the proposal, but on the contrary proscribed the new prince, and fet a price upon his head. Hereupon the Quadi, being joined by the Marcomanni, the Iazyges, the Buri, the Narisci, and many other nations, of whom we find no farther mention in history, attacked the Romans, but were, after a long, bloody They receive & and obstinate dispute, put to the rout, and utterly deseated. Ariogeses himself was great overtaken prisoner, and brought to the emperor, who, notwithstanding his late menaces throw. and refentment, generously spared his life, and contented himself with confining the captive to the city of Alexandria, the metropolis of Egypt 1. After this victory, most nations in Germany fent deputies to fue for peace, offering to submit to such terms as the emperor should think fit to impose upon them. The Quadi seem to have cond tinued in arms till the reign of Commodus. The Marcomanni, after so many losses, fubmitted, and obtained a peace, upon condition, that they should not settle within The Marcofive miles of the Danube. Zantiches, king of the Iazyges, came in person to wait on manni, and M. Aurelius, attended by all the great men of the nation, and was by him received other nations, into favour, but obliged to retire with his people farther from the Danube than the Marcomanni. They were a very powerful and warlike people, and had taken above an hundred thousand prisoners, during this war, whom they set at liberty upon the conclusion of the peace, this being in all likelihood one of the articles of it. Besides, they supplied M. Aurelius with a body of eighty thousand horsemen, of whom he immediately fent five thousand into Britain, where the Romans were threatened with e a new war. The Buri, Narisci, and other German nations, obtained a peace upon fuch terms as the emperor would never have granted, had he not been obliged by all means to put an end to this war, in order to lead his troops against Cassius, whose revolt was likely to bring dreadful calamities upon the empire, as it had already Avidius Caf-

Avidius Cassius, whom we have frequently mentioned in describing the Parthian His extraction. and Egyptian wars, was, as some authors write, descended by the mother from the ancient family of the Cassii. His father, by name Avidius Severus, raised himself, according to the author of his life m, from the degree of a centurion to the first employments in the state; and was, on account of his extraordinary parts, highly f favoured by the emperor M. Aurelius, but died before the revolt of his fon. Such is the account which Vulcatius Gallicanus gives us of his extraction. But another historian writes, that Cassius himself owned, that he had nothing, except the name, common to him with the famous Cassius who killed Casar the dictator; and adds, that he was originally of Cyrrbum in Syria, and the son of one Heliodorus, who had the good fortune to raise himself by his eloquence to the government of Egypt ". One of Adrian's secretaries was named Heliodorus, and him a modern writer takes to have been the father of Cassius. He was remarkable for maintaining discipline raised the courage of the barbarians.

p. 810. ARISTID. orat. 26. Val. p. 717. M VULCAT. GALL p. 810. ARISTID. orat. 26. VALES. in excerpt. Dionis, p. 103. m VULCAT. GALLICAN. in Caffio.

n Dio, l. lxxi.

cl

CO

fo

th

A

b of tio

affe

con

"

"

"

c "

"

"

دد أ

" b

es t ee j ee {

66

44

"

"

66

"

" a

· b e " u

" ſa

"

" wha

he I fent

have rener

the o

that

that

(:

dea:

d " ,

His Severity towards the Soldiers.

A signal inflance of it.

Appointed governor of Syria.

military discipline among the troops.

among the troops; but his severity, according to Vulcatius, savoured of cruelty; for a if any foldier was found to take but the least thing by violence from the people of the provinces, he caused him to be immediately crucified in the place where the fact was committed: some he ordered to be burnt alive; others, chained together, to be thrown into some river, or into the sea. He used to punish deserters with cutting off their hands and legs, faying, that the fight of a criminal living in mifery, made a deeper impression than his being put to death at one blow. As he had been attended with wonderful success against the Parthians, M. Aurelius, in his first war with the Marcomanni, fent him against the Sarmatians their confederates. As he was encamped near the Danube, some auxiliaries of his army, upon intelligence, that the enemy lay carelefly on the banks of that river, went without his knowledge to attack b them, killed three thousand of them, and returned to the camp loaded with booty. Their centurions, who had put them upon this enterprize, and headed them in the action, expected fome great reward from Cassius for having with a handful of men killed such a number of the enemy, while the tribunes and other officers had neglected so favourable an opportunity. But Callius, looking upon this as a bad precedent, which might be attended with worse consequences, instead of rewarding the centurions, caused them all to be seized and crucified like slaves. This severity occasioned a mutiny in the army; but Cassius, without betraying the least fear, appeared naked and unarmed in the midst of the incensed multitude, crying aloud to them, Kill me, and, to your neglest of duty, add, if you dare, the murder of your general. c This intrepidity allayed their fury; and no one during to utter a fingle word of complaint, they all returned to their tents, and thenceforth made it their whole study to learn and observe the military laws, knowing they served under a general who could not by any fears or menaces be prevailed upon to wink at their faults, or suffer them to pass unpunished. This instance of severity made such a deep impression on the minds of the Sarmatians, that despairing to conquer a people thus observant of military discipline, and the rules of war, they immediately sent embassadors to the emperor to beg peace for a hundred years P. After the first Marcomannic war, he was by M. Aurelius appointed governor of Syria, the emperor judging him the best qualified of any in the empire to restore the ancient discipline intirely neglected by d the troops quartered in that province (F). Nor was he mistaken in his judgment; He restores the for in a few months the most dissolute were reclaimed from their pleasures and luxurious manner of living, the ancient discipline revived, and the whole army thoroughly reformed. Cassius, upon his arrival at Antioch, ordered all the soldiers and officers to repair forthwith to their colours, published a proclamation forbidding them, on pain of being cashiered, to appear at Daphne, every seventh day examined their cloaths, arms, and equipages, and frequently obliged them to perform their exercises all in a body, faying, It was a shameful thing that wrestlers and gladiators should be continually exercised, and not soldiers, whose labours are lessened in proportion as they become accustomed to them?. As for Cassus's other qualities, the author e of his life represents him as a man endowed with great virtues, which however were allayed with no less vices, infomuch that he was by some called a second Catiline. But to us that writer seems to contradict himself in the character he draws of Cassius;

P VULCAL GALL. ibid. p.46.

9 Idem, p. 47.

(F) The emperor, upon his appointing him governor of Syria, wrote the following letter to his lieutenant in that province: "I have given to Avi-" dius Cassius the command of the legions in Syria, " which Cesonius Vectilianus found, as he informs " me, diffolved in luxury, and abandoned to all forts " of pleasures. He is, you know, a strict observer " of the ancient discipline, without which the fol-" diers can never be kept to their duty. You re-" member the old verie,

" Moribus antiquis res stat Romana virilis.

" And truly the strict observance of the ancient " discipline is the chief support of the empire. Take " care that sufficient provisions be got ready for the " legions, which, if I am not deceived in Avidius " Cassius, will not be misapplied." To this letter the lieutenant returned the following answer: "You could not prefer to the command of the legions in Syria a man better qualified for that important trust than Avidius Cassius: for only an officer of his severity can reclaim them from their volup-" tuous manner of living, and put them out of conceit with the pleasures of the effeminate Greeks, " to which they have intirely abandoned themselves. " He will shake their flowers off of their heads, and " teach them their duty. The necessary provisions " for the legions are already laid up; and nothing can be wanting so long as they have such an excellent commander as Avidius Cassius (14).

a for in one place he paints him not only as fevere, but cruel and inhuman towards his foldiers; and in another tells us, that he was greatly beloved by them. How can his being styled a fecond Catiline, on account of his virtues and vices, his good and his bad qualities, be reconciled with what he writes elfewhere? viz. that had he attained the empire, he would have proved an excellent prince, a prince of great clemency and moderation r. Dion Cassius speaks of him, not only as an eminent commander, but as a person equal to, and in every respect worthy of, the sovereign power. He always abhorred an absolute and monarchical government, and is by Is an enemy to fome thought to have had nothing else in view, when he revolted, but to restore monarchy. the commonwealth to its former authority. He had been charged in the reign of Antoninus Pius with a design of deposing that prince; but his father, who was a man b of great interest at court, having prejudiced the emperor in his favour, the accusation was dropt. However, he was thenceforth looked upon as a suspicious and disaffected person. When he commanded in the Parthian war under L. Verus, that prince, suspecting him, and indeed not without reason, wrote the following letter concerning him to M. Aurelius, his partner in the empire. " Avidius Cassius seems L. Verus's to me to aspire at the empire, as it is well known he did in the reign of our father letter concern-Antoninus Pius. I therefore advise you to keep a watchful eye over him. He mg him. " centures and condemns all our actions, grows exceeding rich, and speaks of us "both with the utmost contempt, calling you a doating philosopher, and me a c"luxurious fool. Consider what is to be done: I bear no hatred to the man, but " would have you to reflect, that by invefting fuch a person with power, and trusting "him with the command of the troops, by whom he is greatly beloved, you may injure both yourself and your children." Nothing can give us a greater idea of the virtue truly heroic of this excellent prince, than his answer to this letter, which was couched in the following terms: "I have perused your letter, in which you M. Aurelius's 66 betray greater fear and uneafiness than becomes an emperor, or is consistent with answer. "the equity of our reign. If the empire is allotted by heaven to Avidius Cassius, it will not be in our power to cut him off. You know the saying of your grand-" father Adrian, that no man cuts off his successor. If Cassius is not destined to the d" empire, he will fall of himself, without our cruelty, into the fatal snare. Besides, " we cannot in justice treat a person as a criminal, who is accused by none, and is, " as you write, beloved by the army, and consequently a man of merit, and a good commander. In cases of treason, even when the crime is proved, the world is 46 apt to think the sufferer injured; which made your grandfather Adrian complain of the hard fate of emperors, who are never thought to have been in danger till "they are killed. I chuse to name Adrian rather than Domitian, who was the first " author of this faying, because a thing, however well faid, has not its due weight " and authority, when it comes from a tyrant. Let therefore Avidius Cassius pursue " his own measures; he is an excellent officer, and a man of great courage, and e " useful to the state. As for my children, to whose safety you would have me to " facrifice him, if he deserves to be more beloved than they, if his life promises " greater advantages to the state than theirs, let Avidius Cassius live, let the children of M. Aurelius perish .. " The good-natured emperor took no farther notice of what Verus had wrote to him; for, upon the return of Cassius from the east, where he had performed great exploits, he put him at the head of an army, which he fent against the Sarmatians, and afterwards appointed him governor of Syria, as we have related above. In the mean time, the Marcomanni, and other German nations, renewing the war with great vigour, Cassius laid hold of that opportunity to seize the empire. Some authors write, that the empress Faustina, being well apprised, f that her fon Commodus was no-ways qualified for the sovereign power, and fearing that some one might seize it, who would destroy her and her little children, solicited Cassius to declare himself emperor as soon as he should hear the news of M. Aurelius's death, and promifed in that case to marry him. They add, that a report being spread of the emperor's death, Cassius immediately caused himself to be proclaimed He assumes the in his room, and that, tho' the rumour proved afterwards false, he found himself title of empetoo far engaged to recede. Others clear Faustina from being any ways privy to the

* Idem, p. 41-45.

Dio, l. lxxi. p. 810.

t Idem, p. 40, 41.

And is joined by most of the design of Cassius (G), and tells us, that the report of the emperor's death was spread a abroad by Cassius himself, in order to induce the governors of the eastern provinces to join him, M. Aurelius being greatly beloved, and his fon no less hated ". Be that as it will, he foon became mafter of all the countries beyond mount Taurus, and of Egypt itself, Flavius Calvisius, governor of that province, having declared in his favour. The troops in Bithynia were likewise inclined to side with him, but restrained by Clodius Albinus, their commander, of whom we shall have occasion to speak hereafter. Several foreign princes and nations espoused his cause, but none with more zeal than the Jews w.

> Martius Verus, governor of Cappadocia, was the first who gave the emperor notice of this revolt. M. Aurelius concealed it for some time; but when he found it divulged by public fame, he acquainted the foldiers with it in a very judicious and modest speech, only complaining of the ungrateful return which Cassius made him for the kindness he ever had, and should ever have for him, notwithstanding his revolt, as he hoped to shew as soon as he had brought him to a sense of his duty. Neither did Cassius on his side utter any injurious reslections against M. Aurelius, but only charged him with neglecting the most important affairs of the state to attend the study of philosophy, and with suffering, thro' an excess of goodness, many disorders, which it was incumbent upon him as emperor to correct. In the mean while, M. Aurelius having terminated the war with the Marcomanni, and other German nations, as the time approached for his fon Commodus to put on the manly robe, c he sent for him from Rome, and gave him it, with the usual ceremonies, on the feventh of July, ordering on that occasion considerable sums to be distributed among the Roman people y. At Rome the senate were no sooner informed of the revolt of Cassius, than they declared him a public enemy, and confiscated his estate, which the emperor ordered to be returned, not into his private coffers, as his predecessors had done, but into the public treasury. At length M. Aurelius lest Germany, and fet out for Illyricum, with a design to pursue his march thence into the east, and meet Cassius, declaring, that he was ready to resign the empire to him, if the gods should judge it expedient for the public good, that Cassius should reign, and not M. Aurelius: For it is not, added he, any private interest or ambition, but the pub-d lic welfare, that prompts me to undergo fo many labours, to expose myself to so many dangers. He was not advanced far on his march, when news was brought him, that Cassius had been killed by a centurion named Antonius, and another officer of a still inferior rank, who had the command only of ten men 2. Dion Cassius gives us but a confused account of his death; and Vulcatius Gallicanus promises to inform us how he was killed, and where he was overcome, but is not fo good as his word. However, from what he writes it is plain, that a battle or encounter happened between him and the emperor's troops, probably commanded by Martius Verus; for on his bravery the emperor chiefly relied, and had therefore fent him before him into Syria, giving him the government of that province, instead of the government e of Cappadocia. We are told, that a great many letters, written to Cassius by his friends and correspondents, falling into Verus's hands, the generous commander committed them to the flames, faying, he did not doubt but that would please M. Aurelius; and if it did not, that he chose however to save many lives at the expence of one 2. Others write, that these letters were brought to M. Aurelius, who ordered

M. Aurclius marches against him.

Cassius is killed ;

> " VULCAT. GALL. in Cast p. 42, 43. w Idem ibid. x Jul. Cap. ibid. p. 32. Dio, l. lxxi. p. 809, 812. in Aur. p. 32. 2 Dio, p. 812. 2 Dio, p. 813. w Idem ibid. Dio in excerpt. Val. p. 718. Albin. vit. p. 81.
> 9,812. Y LAMPRID. in Commod. p. 45. & Jul. Cap.

m.

СП

to ban

Ver

prei

em

* 1

f fo!

an an

(G) Vulcatius Gallicanus, to clear the empress from this charge, produces two letters written by her to M. Aurelius on occasion of this revolt. In one the expresses herself thus: "My mother Fau-" flina, in the time of the defection of Celsus, ad-" vised your father Antoninus Pius to shew his kind-" ness in the first place to his own family, and next " to others. And truly it is incumbent upon every " good prince to take care of his wife and children.
"Your fon Commodus is yet very young, and your " fon-in-law Pompeianus is stricken in years, and a

&quot; stranger. Do not therefore spare men, who, had they conquered, would neither have spared you, " nor your wife and children. You will hear from Cacilius, whom I shall send to you, what reports "have been fpread of you by the wife of Caffins, by his fon, and his fon-in-law, &c." In the other letter she presses him to pursue Cassius, and his accomplices, with the utmost severity, if he loves her and his children, assuring him, that if he neglects to oppress them, they will not fail to oppress him (15).

a them, fealed as they were, to be immediately burnt in his presence b. With Cassius was killed his captain of the guards, and foon after his fon Metianus, whom he had appointed governor of Egypt, to secure that important province. No other person of distinction, at least of the senatorial order, perished on account of his rebellion; nay, these were put to death without the emperor's knowledge, and against his will; for he was greatly concerned that the blood of any fenator should have been shed during his reign: hence, when the head of Cassius was brought to him, he expressed And his head great forrow, turned his eyes away, and caused it to be honourably interred, complaining, that he had been robbed of an opportunity of shewing his mercy. The emperor who is reign of Cassius, or rather his dream, as Dion Cassius styles it, lasted but three months his death.

b and six days. M. Aurelius himself would neither try, imprison, nor condemn any fenator concerned in the conspiracy; but referred the whole to the senate, appointing the criminals a day to appear before their judges. In the mean time, he wrote a letter to the senate, wherein, after acquainting them, that he had appointed Pompeianus, his fon-in-law, consul for the ensuing year, he thus exhorts them to proceed, rather with clemency than rigour, against those whom they were to try: " As for His letter to what concerns the defection of Cassius, I beg and conjure you, conscript fathers, the senate. " to have a tender regard to your characters, and to mine: let no one senator be put " to death; let the blood of no person of distinction be spilt; let such as have been " already banished return, nay, and enjoy their estates. I wish I could raise from the dead those who perished in the first heat of the war. Revenge is never commendable in an emperor; it ill becomes him in his own cause, let it be never so " just. You will therefore pardon the children of Avidius Cassius, his son-in-law, " and his wife. But why do I say, pardon, when they have committed no crime? Let them live in fafety, and enjoy their paternal estate, with all their father's plate and furniture. Let them have full liberty to live where they please, that they may be so many instances of your elemency and of mine. I further beg and desire, that all the senators and Roman knights in general, who have been privy to this rebellion, be by your authority exempted from death, proscription, instany, in short, from all kind of punishment. Allow it to be said to your home. d " nour and mine, that in this rebellion such only perished as were killed in the hurry 46 of the war" d. The fenate not only complied with his request, but returned him thanks for the regard he had shewn even to the most undeserving members of their body. As for the children of Cassius, the emperor took them under his protection, His kindness to forbidding any one to reproach them with the misfortunes of their family, and se-the children of verely punishing such as did. Vulcatius tells us, that he even raised the sons of Cassius. Cassius, and Druncianus or Druentianus, who had married one of his daughters, by emperor, hearkening only to the impulse of his own good-nature, returned her the f following answer: " I have read your letter, my dear Faustina, wherein you advise His letter to "me to treat the accomplices of Cassius with the utmost severity, which you think Faustina on this well deserve. This I look upon as a pledge of the love you bear to your this occasion. " husband and children. But give me leave, my dear Faustina, to spare the chil-"dren of Cassius, his son-in-law, and his wife, and to write to the senate in their 66 behalf. Nothing can more recommend a Roman emperor to the esteem of the "world, than clemency. This placed Cæsar among the gods; this consecrated Augustus; this procured to your father the title of Pius. I am grieved even for the name Alexandra, to great preferments; which was the more commendable, as the emperor was well apprised, that Cassius's wife, children, and son-in-law, had, with many ill-natured reflections, endeavoured to bring him into discredit with the people and foldiery. Of the many persons concerned in this revolt, only a few centurions were executed, and some officers of greater distinction banished. Among the latter was Flavius Calvisius, governor of Egypt, who was confined to an island; but the emperor would not suffer his estate to be confiscated. An impostor, who pretended to be inspired by the gods, and was said to have foretold the revolt of Cassius, was banished to the island of Scyros in the Archipelago. All the accomplices of Calvisius were pardoned, as were likewise the cities that had declared for Cassius. The empress Faustina, in a letter which she wrote to her husband on occasion of this revolt e, pressed him to pursue the accomplices of Cassius with the utmost severity. But the b Val. in excerpt. Dio. CDio, p. 813. Vulcat. Gall. in Cass. p. 43. Noris ep. cons. p. 110. Volcat. Gall. ibid. p. 44. & Jul. Cap. in Aur. p. 33. Vide not. G.

Commodus

invested with

The emperor

goes into the east.

power.

death of Cassius, and wish it had been in my power to save him. Be therefore a se satisfied, and don't abandon yourself to fear or revenge. Marcus Antoninus is " protected by the gods f." Some of his friends openly blaming his clemency, and taking the liberty to tell him, that Cassius would not have been so generous, had fortune proved favourable to him, the emperor immediately replied, We have not lived nor ferved the gods fo ill, as to think they would favour Cassius: he added, that the misfortunes of some of his predecessors were intirely owing to their own ill conduct and cruelties, and that no good prince had ever been overcome or flain by an usurper. Nero, Caligula and Domitian, said he, deserved the doom that overtook them; neither Otho nor Vitellius were equal to the empire; the downfal of Galba was occasioned by his avarice, an unpardonable fault in a prince 8. Thus the rebel- b lion of Cassius served only to give new lustre to the unparallelled elemency, goodnature and generofity of M. Aurelius, who could not prevail upon himself to take THE rebellion being quashed at once by the death of Cassius, M. Aurelius wrote a letter to the fenate, acquainting them, that he had named Pompeianus, his four-inlaw, conful against the ensuing year; adding, that he would have honoured him away the lives of those who had conspired against his and that of his son-

long before with that dignity, had he not thought himself obliged in justice to confer it first upon several persons of extraordinary merit, and well-deserving of the republic. The fenate, in their answer to the emperor's obliging letter, begged him to return to Rome, and to invest his fon Commodus with the tribunitial power h. c With the latter request he complied, as appears from several ancient inscriptions. But as for the other request, the emperor either did not return to Rome, or his stay there was very short; for we are told, that, immediately after the death of Callius, he went into the east, and that he had begun his march thither even before he received that news k: it is not therefore likely, that he interrupted it to return to Rome. He had fent Pertinax before him into Syria to make head against the rebels; but upon the news of the death of Cassius, he recalled him, and appointed him governor of Illyricum, in which province he had gained no less reputation by his prudence and moderation, than by his many victories over the Germans during the Marcomannic war; so that he was greatly esteemed and revered both by the Romans and d foreigners, nay, even by the enemies of the Roman name 1. The emperor took with him into the east his fon Commodus, and his wife Faustina, who died suddenly in a village called Halala at the foot of mount Taurus. She was a woman of a loose Faustina dies. Her character, and wanton life, and altogether unworthy of having fuch a father as Antoninus, fuch a husband as M. Aurelius, whom some did not believe to be father of Commodus ... Dion Cassius writes, that it was questioned whether she died of the gout, or laid violent hands on herself, to avoid the shame of being named among the accomplices of Cassius, who, according to that writer, was chiefly prompted by her to take arms and revolt". Her chief gallants were Tertullus, Utilius, Orfitus, and Moderatus, whom nevertheless Antoninus, either not giving credit to what was said of the em- e press, or diffembling her irregular conduct, preferred to several employments. Her lewdness, and her intimacy with the above-mentioned persons, especially with Tertullus, were so publicly known, that a mimic having one day asked his companion upon the stage, in the presence of the emperor, what was the name of the person who was too familiar with his wife? the other repeated the name of Tullus three times; whereby the whole audience perceived, that he meant Tertullus, the first syllable of his name fignifying three times o. Some of the emperor's friends advised him to divorce her; but he answered, If I divorce her, I must return her her dower, that is, the empire, which I have received of her father. In one place he commends her free and open temper, her fincerity in friendship, and her acquiescence to his f will P. He bewailed her, according to the emperor Julian 9, after her death, more than was becoming, in a man of his gravity, for a woman of the most unblemished Extraordinary character. He pronounced himself her funeral oration, and begged the senate to henours paid rank her among the gods; for which he is deservedly exposed and ridiculed by the her by the emabove-mentioned emperor. He founded a society of young women, whom he peror and the brought up at his own expence, and called after the empress's name. The village fenase.

F VULCAT. GALL. p. 32. g Idem ibid. 1 Idem in Cass. p. 45. ONUPH. in fast. p. 235. P. PAGI, p. 218. Norts de votis decennalib. imperator c. 3. & ep. consul. p. 120.

Jul. CAP. ibid. p. 32.

Idem in Pertin.

Idem in M. Aur. p. 30. b Dio, p. 813. Jul. Cap. ibid. p. 32. I Idem in Pertin. Idem in M. Aur. p. 30.

Jul. Cap. ibid. M. Antonin. de seip. I. i. c. 14.

Julian. Cas. p. 13. m Idem in M. Aur. p. 30. n Dio, p. 813. * Idem ibid. p. 50. where.

a where the died he made a colony and a city, flyling it Faustinopolis, and erected a temple in it to her honour, which was afterwards confecrated to Heiogabalus, the most lewd and debauched of all the Roman emperors. The fenate, out of flattery and complaifance to the emperor, not only ranked among the goddeffes a person unworthy of a place among women of any modelty and reputation, but erected statues to her and to M. Aurelius, with an altar, ordaining, that young women, immediately after their marriage, should repair to it, and there offer a solemn sacrifice'. By this fcandalous inflitution, they deferved that their daughters should all refemble Faustina, and their fons Commodus. Faustina being dead, Fabia, the lister of L. Verus, who had been formerly betrothed to M. Aurelius, did all that lay in her b power to induce him to marry her; but he not thinking it adviseable to subject his children to the authority of a step-mother, took in the room of a lawful wife the daughter of one of the deceased empress's domestics; for to that purity, which the christian religion requires and commands, even the most virtuous among the pagan philosophers were utter strangers. As the Syrians, looking upon Coffius as their countryman, had readily joined him, a law passed at this time, enacting, that no one should be fent with the character of governor into his own country ".

THE next confuls were T. Vitrasius Pollio and M. Flavius Aper, both for the second time w. Claudius Pompeianus, the emperor's fon-in-law, and Clodius Albinus, who had restrained the legions in Bitbynia from joining Cassius, as we have related above, c were likewise consuls this year. M. Aurelius, arriving in the east, freely forgave all The empero's the cities and communities there, which had fided with Cassius, except Antioch, the clemency and inhabitants of that metropolis having distinguished themselves above all the rest cities that had by their zeal for Cassius, and their hatred to him. He therefore published a severe sied with Cassius and their hatred to him. edict against them, deprived them of all their privileges, suppressed their public sius. affemblies, and took from them their shews and spectacles, to which they were greatly addicted. But his anger being foon appealed, before he left Syria, he restored them to their former condition, and even condescended to visit their city. From Syria he passed into Egypt, where he not only forgave, but inriched with several privileges, the city of Alexandria, which had likewise sided with Cassius. Having d visited most of the chief cities in the east, and given every-where innumerable instances of his humanity and good-nature, he failed from Smyrna, where he had staid some time, and had feveral conferences with the celebrated fophist Aristides, and arrived at Athens, where he was initiated in the Eleusinian mysteries. He conferred many favours on the city of Athens, and established there public professors of all sciences, with handsome allowances to be paid them yearly out of the exchequer x. From Athens he failed for Italy; and landing at Brundusium, commanded his soldiers immediately to refume, as he did himself, the Roman gown; for neither he, nor any of his officers or foldiers, ever appeared in Italy in a military habit. He returned He returns to e to Rome with his fon Commodus, whom he named conful, tho' at that time but fix-Rome; teen, for the ensuing year. Soon after, he honoured him with the title of imperator, which he himself assumed for the eighth time, probably on account of some victory gained by Pertinax, governor of Illyricum, over the Germans. At length, on the twenty-third of December, both he and his son Commodus entered Rome in triumph, Which he enters distributing on this occasion large sums among the people and soldiery, that is, as in triumph with his son with his son many pieces of gold a head as he had been years absent, which, according to Dion Commodus. Cassius, were eight v, but, according to the calculation of others, in our opinion more exact, only fix. At the same time, he exhibited most pompous and magnificent shews, tho' he took no pleasure himself in such diversions. The following year

f Aurelius Commodus Casar and Quintillus being consuls, Commodus was honoured by the senate with the title of the father of his country, and by the emperor with that of Augustus; on which occasion M. Aurelius remitted whatever was due from particu- Instances of his lars, either to the emperor or to the treasury, ever fince the time in which Adrian generofity and had forgiven all such debts 2. The same year he presented the inhabitants of Smyrna good nature. with large fums, enabling them by that means to rebuild their city, which was almost utterly ruined by a dreadful earthquake described at length by Aristides in one of his orations. As the emperor continued all this year at Rome, or in the neighbourhood of that city, he reformed, partly by his example, and partly by wholfome

* Dio, l. lxxi. p. 813.
* Dio, p. 814. Philostr. foph. xxxvii. Aristid. orat.
Oros. l. vii. c. 15. Euser. chron.
Aristid. orat. xx. Dio ibid. p. 813. w In.
7 Dio ibid. Jul. Cap. p. 29. W IDAT. ONUPH. &c. Oros. l.vii. c. 15. Eusen. chron.

laws, several abuses. He could not suppress the combats of gladiators without dis- a

He marches against the Marcomanni;

And gains à signal victory over them.

His death.

obliging the people; however, as he was an enemy to all cruelty and blood fied, he allowed the combatants only blunt swords, in the nature of our foils, saying, that with them they might equally display their skill and dexterity b. The next year, when Orfitus and Julianus Rufus were confuls, the Marcomanni and their confederates renewing the war with great vigour, the emperor refolved to march against them in person. But before he left Rome, he married his son Commodus to Crispina, the daughter of Bruttius Prasens; and repairing to the senate, desired leave to take out of the public treasure the necessary sums for carrying on the war, saying, That an emperor had nothing of his own, not even the palace he lived in, but that all belonged to the senate and people s. He then went to the capitol, where he declared b upon his oath, that; fince his accession to the empire, no senator had been put to death by his orders; that such as had perished in the rebellion, had been killed without his knowledge; and that he would have spared them all, Cassius himself not excepted, had it been in his power so to do. As he was eminently skilled in philosophy, many persons of learning earnestly intreated him to explain to them, before he left Rome, the most difficult and intricate points of the different secus of philosophers, which he did accordingly, spending therein three whole days. They seemed to apprehend, that by his death this knowledge might have been lost; which shews how thoroughly he was versed in the different tenets of the various sects of philosophers d. At length he set out from Rome, with his son Commodus, on the c fifth of August of the year 178, the eighteenth of his reign. The following year, Commodus Augustus and T. Annius Aurelius Verus being confuls the second time, M. Aurelius gained a fignal victory over the Marcomanni, Hermonduri, Quadi and Sarmatians; for which both he and his fon Commodus, as appears from feveral ancient inscriptions, took the title of imperator f. All we know of this action is, that the Roman army was commanded by Paternus, and the Germans were utterly defeated 8; infomuch that all Germany, and the different nations inhabiting it, would have been obliged to submit to the Roman yoke, had not Antoninus been prevented by death from crowning his conquests with the reduction of so powerful and extenfive a country. He died the following year, Præsens and Sex. Quintilius Condianus de being consuls, on the seventeenth of March, after having lived fifty-eight years, ten months, and twenty-two days, and reigned, from the death of Antoninus Pius, nineteen years, and ten or eleven days b. Dion Cassius positively affirms, that he was dispatched by his physicians, desirous to curry favour with Commodus; and adds, that when the tribune came to him the last time for the parole, he bid him go to Commodus, and court, not the fetting, but the rising sun i. On the other hand, Julius Capitolinus feems to ascribe his death to a contagious distemper; for he tells us, that the plague still raged in the army; and adds, that the emperor, with much ado, prevailed upon his fon and his friends not to abandon him; which he took fo much amis, that he abstained from all fort of nourishment. Two days before he e died, he recommended his fon Commodus to the army, and conjured his friends to affift him with their advice. On the feventh day of his illness, he defired to fee his fon again, but immediately difmissed him, lest he should be infected with the same diftemper. When he was gone, he composed himself, as if he designed to sleep, and expired the following night k. He died, according to Tertullian i, at Sirmium, now Sirmich, in Sclavonia; according to the two Victors, at Vendobona, now Vienna, We need not mention the concern of the foldiery and Roman people for in Austria. the loss of so good and so great a prince. His body, or rather his ashes, were conveyed to Rome, and deposited in the monument of Adrian. He was immediately ranked among the gods, a temple was erected to him, and an order of priests f appointed to his honour. Whoever had not some image or statue of M. Aurelius in his house, was judged a facrilegious person, says Julius Capitolinus, in whose time, that is, in the reign of Dioclesian, he was still worshipped in most families among their domestic gods m. He was, without all doubt, one of the greatest and best princes that ever swayed a sceptre. His only fault was, according to Dion Cassius, his too great goodness; for tho' he rewarded with great generosity the good and

He is ranked among the gods.

His fault.

<sup>b</sup> Dio in excerpt. Val. p. 718.

<sup>c</sup> Dio, p. 814.

<sup>d</sup> Jul. Cap. in Cast. p. 41.

<sup>e</sup> Spart. in Comm. p. 50. & Dio, p. 814.

<sup>f</sup> Dio, p. 810. Birag. p. 227. Jul. Cap. in M. Aur. p. 34.

<sup>g</sup> Dio, p. 810. & 814.

<sup>h</sup> Idem ibid. & Theoph. Antioch. l. iii. p. 137. Chron. Alex. p. 614.

<sup>l</sup> Dio, p. 814.

<sup>k</sup> Jul. Cap. p. 34.

<sup>l</sup> Tertull. apol. c. 25.

<sup>m</sup> Jul. Cap. p. 34.

rirtuous.

a virtuous, yet he did not restrain and punish with due severity the vicious and wicked; whence some governors of provinces, presuming upon his good-nature, plundered, and often with impunity, the people committed to their care. Julius Capitolinus blames him for winking at the monstrous excesses of his wife, and for promoting to the fovereign power L. Verus, whom he must have known to be quite unequal to, and altogether unworthy of that high dignity, fince Antoninus Pius had not so much as honoured him with the title of Casar. The emperor Julian prefers M. Aurelius to Cafar, to Augustus, and to all the other princes who had reigned till his time; but at the same time finds fault with him for bequathing the empire to his vicious son Commodus, and not to his fon-in-law Pompeianus, who was a person of extraordinary b parts, and well qualified for so great a trust x. The meditations of M. Aurelius, which tions have reached our times, are highly commended by all the ancients, as an epitome of the best rules, which human reason or philosophy can suggest for the conduct of a virtuous life. Some have questioned, whether what has been transmitted to us be the while work, or only an abiltract of it, feeing it confifts of loofe and unconnected fentences, whereof the fense is not always complete. But the ablest critics are of opinion, that M. Aurelius left the work fuch as it is at present, having composed it only for his private use y. It consists of twelve books, of which the first seems to have been composed in the height of the Marcomannic war, while he was encamped on the banks of the Gran in the country of the Quadi. He ended the second book at Carnuntum, c of which city we have spoken above, where he resided, according to Eutropius, three whole years. He seems to have put the last hand to this work before the death of Faustina; for in the ninth book he speaks of her as yet living, and ready to ly-in; that is, before the end of the year 175. the fifteenth of his reign . We must not confound this book with another, intituled borologium principum, which was published under the name of M. Aurelius, but is thought to have been composed by Antonius Guavara a Spanish bishop b. As M. Aurelius was a great encourager of learning, many eminent writers, especially philosophers, flourished in his reign. Tatian, the disciple of Justin the martyr, tells us, that the pagan philosophers were so far from practifing the poverty which they recommended to others, that, on the contrary, d many of them enjoyed large pensions, receiving of the emperor above six hundred pieces of gold a year, without rendering any fervice to the state, or being commended by any other merit, but that of wearing long beards c. But of the writers who flourished about this time, we shall give a particular account in our notes (H).

* JULIAN. CES 13, 14, 22, 23, 41, 49. Y Vide Voss. hist. Græc. l. ii. c. 14. 1. c. 15. Idem, l. ix. c. 3. Prol. Voss. hist. Græc. TATIAN. 2 M. AUREL. * TATIAN. p. 157.

(H) The most celebrated among the philosophers Were, Crescentius, Cellus, Lucian, Demonax, Alexander the famous impostor, Sextus the stoic, Sextus the empiric, Numenes, Hermogenes, Aristides, &c. Crescentius was a Cynic philosopher, and, according to the character which Tatian draws of him, intirely abandoned to all manner of lewdness (16). He inveighed with great virulence against the christians, whom he charged with impiety and atheilm, tho', in feveral conferences and disputes, he had been convinced of the truth by Justin the martyr, who was chicily at his initigation crowned with martyrdom (17). We do not know that he left any writings behind him. We find two philosophers bearing the name of Cellus, and both of the fect of Epicurus, mentioned by Origen (18). Of these one flourished under Nero, and the other under Adrian, and his immediate successors (19). The latter wrote several books against magic, much commended by Lucian, who inferited to him his history of the celebrated impostor Alexander, which he undertook at his in-stigation (20). Some distinguish this writer from the author of the discourses against the christians, whom Origen consused; but Baronius, and most critics, ascribe to the same writer the books against magic, and those against the christian religion. It is certain, that Celsus, whom Origen answers, lived long before his time; but not before the reign of M. Aurelius: for he not only speaks of the Marcionists, who first appeared about the year 142. the fifth of the reign of Antoninus Pius, but of the followers of Marcellina, a woman of the feet of Carpocrates, who came to Rome in the year 157, the twentieth of M. Aurelius's reign (21). He probably published his work against the christians during the persecution of M. Aurelius; for he represents them as reduced to conceal themselves through fear of being dragged to execution (22). Chrysosom mentions one Celjus, no doubt the same writer, who published some pieces against the christian religion before the time of Porphyrius of Batanea (23). Celsus intituled his work against the christians, true discourses ; but Origen shews, that he aimed at nothing less than truth, and confutes him with great learning, piety, and judgment. Many writers look upon Origen's answer to Celsus, as the best apology for the christian religion that ever was published (24). Eusebius thinks it contains whatever was, or ever will be, faid upon that subject (25). Origen wrote in the reign of the emperor Philip, who was killed in the year 249 (26).

The works of Lucian have reached our times, and are deservedly admired for the elegance and purity of the style; but filled with impious and atheistical sentiments; whence he had the surname of the Atheist, or the Blasphemer (27). He was a native of Samosata in Syria, and of a mean descent. In his youth he declaimed, and pleaded causes, and was in his old age register to the governor of Egypt (28). Suides writes, that he was thought to have been devoured by dogs, for having ridiculed the christian religion, without sparing even the author of it; but of fuch a death no mention is made by any writer who flourished before Suidas. Some fay, that he embraced, and afterwards renounced, the christian religion; but this opinion is founded only on a wrong translation of the word Inuny begs in Suidas by conwith the tenets and doctrine of the christians than other pagans. He wrote the life of Softrates of Boso. sia, a famous philosopher, who practised great austerities (29); but that work has not reached us. Some have, against all reason and authority, ascribed to him the life of Apollonius Tyanaus, which was done by Philostratus (30). He wrote, according to Eunapius (31), the life of the philosopher Demonax, whose disciple he had been. He represents him as the greatest philosopher of his time; but, after all, he was only a Cynie, somewhat more polished and civilized than the rest of his brethren. What we find most commendable in him is, that tho' he was of a noble family, rich, eloquent, and well versed in most branches of learning; yet he lived in poverty, practifed great austerities, and would not suffer any one to attend him. When he grew old, and could no longer live without being affifted by others, he chose rather to die of hunger, than to suffer any one to perform the least office about him. He was a native of Cyprus; but lived at Athens, where he was highly esteemed in his life-time, and equally regretted after his death. The Ashenians intending to establish in their city a combat of gladiators, he told them, That they ought first to overturn and utterly demolish an altar which they had erected to Mercy. The emperor having defired some of his friends to ask him in his name, what was the best method of governing, he answered, To speak little, to hear much, and to fall upon no provocation into a passion (31). Lucian, in his dialogue on friend-ship, speaks of several wars between the Scythians, who dwelt on the banks of the Tanais, and the other northern barbarians, especially those of Bosporus, who were in Lucian's time governed first by Leucaner, and afterwards by Eubiotes his natural brother. Lewcanor probably succeeded Rhametalces, who was king of Bosporus in the reign of Antoninus Pius. The ships which faved Lucian, as we shall relate anon, were carrying the embassadors of Eupator, king of the same country, to Pontus, either to pay there the money which was yearly owing from them to the Romans, or to receive that which the Romans annually paid to them; for the words end xould's are capable of both fenses. Euboites, in his war against the Scythians, led with him all the Greeks, according to the expression of Lucian (32); that is, as we suppose, the inhabitants of the Greek cities on the Chersonesus, which confirms the opinion of those who maintain, that the kings of Bosporus were masters of that coun-The account which Lucian gives us of the celebrated impostor Alexander, is very diverting. He was a native of Abonitichos, a maritime city of Pamphylia, and generally revered on account of his pretended predictions, and counterfeit miracles, as a prophet. Lucian however, who was not easily deceived, looked upon him as an impostor, ridiculed his miracles, and exposed him in all companies; which so provoked the pretended prophet, that he endeavoured to stir up his countrymen, the inhabitants of Abonitichos, against him. Alexander nevertheless, some time after, pretended to be reconciled to him, and even offered him a ship to convey him to Amastris in Pontus, whither his affairs called him. Lucian accepted the offer; but was not a little furprifed, when, at a great distance from land, he observed the pilot bursting all at once into tears, and making various figns to the mariners. Lucian 1magined the vessel to be in danger; but was more terrified, when the pilot frankly owned to him, that he had received politive orders from Alexander to throw him into the fea; but could not prevail upon himself, after having lived so long without reproach, to commit a murder in his old age. He left him however in a desert and barren island, where he must have soon perished, had he not been saved by the vessels of the king of Bosporus, which happened to fail by. He was for profecuting Alexander before the governor of Pontus and Bishynia; but that magistrate dissuaded him from it, telling him, that he could not condemn Alexander, without incurring the displeasure of Rusilianus, who was very powerful at court, and had in his old age married the daughter of the impostor, believing the moon to be her mother. Thus Lucian had no other means left of being revenged on Alexander, but by writing his life, and painting him in his true colours. This piece however he did not publish till the impostor's death, which feems to have happened in the reign of M. Aurelius.

(16) Tatian, p. 157. (17) Eufeb. l. iv. c. 16. (18) Orig. in Celf. l. i. p. 8. (19) Idem ibid. (20) Lucian, pfeud. p. 498. (21) Orig. in Celf. l. viii. p. 424. & l. v. p. 272. Iren. l. i. e. 24. (22) Idem ibid. (23). Chryf. in 1 Corinth. hom. vi. (24) Vide Du Pin. tom. 1. p. 388. 389. (25) Eufeb. l. vi. e. 36. (26) Idem ibid. & Hier. p. 433, 434.

Sextus was a native of Cheronea in Baotia, by sect a Stoie, and had been preceptor to M. Aurelius and L. Verus. Most writers suppose him to have been nephew to Plutarch. M. Aurelius went frequently to hear him after he was emperor, and owns in his meditations, that he was indebted to him for many excellent rules relating to the conduct of a moral and virtuous life (33). Apuleius glories in being defeended from him by his mother (34). At the same time flourished another philotopher bearing the same name, but a native of Libya, and by sect a Pyrrhonian (35). He is styled by Galen, and Diogenes Laertius, the empiric. Some of his works have reached our times (36). Suidas confounds him with the other Sextus, and the other with Sextus Condianus, who was conful in 180. There are still extant four hundred and thirty fentences of a philosopher named Sextus or Xyslus, which were translated into Latin by Rufinus of Aquileia, under the name of St. Sixtus, pope and martyr (37). St. Austin was for some time deceived by them (38). But St. Ferom, in several places of his works, ascribes them to some philoso-pher of the sect of Pythagoras (39). About this time Numenes is likewise supposed to have flourished, whose writings are often quoted by Eusebius and Theodoretus against the pagans. St. Clement of Alexandria quotes him for this famous saying, that Plato was but Motes speaking Greek (40). He was, according to Suidas (41), a native of Apamea in Syria. He shows, that Plate copied from Meses what he wrote concerning God, and the forming of the universe (42). He has been blamed by the pagans for explaining the mysteries of Ceres and Proserpine; which goddesses are said to have appeared to him in the attire of common prostitutes, to reproach him by that means with the state to which he had reduced them, by acquainting the world with the ceremonies practifed in the celebration of their mysteries; which is not much to their honour. He published several works, which are frequently quoted by Origen, Eusebius. Eunapius, Theodoresus and Hesychius; but none of them have reached us (43). He seems to have joined together the tenets of Plato and Pythageras: whence he is by some ranked amongst the followers of Plate; by others amongst the Pythagoreans (44). Grones, Arifocles, Antiochus, Alexander, Hermogenes, Aristides, and Phrynicus, were all contemporaries with Numenes. Crones was one of his disciples, and wrote a treatise on the generation of things, which we find quoted by Origen and Plotinus (45). Ariflocles was a native of Pergamus, and first a Periparetic philosopher; but afterwards he abandoned the fludy of philosophy, and applied himfelf to that of eloquence under the celebrated Herodes Atticus. He declaimed in his own country; but did not meet with the applause he expected (46).

(27) Suid. p. 55. (28) Lucian. hift. p. 359. & Apol. p. 262. (29) Idem, in vit Demonac. p. 546. (30) Vide Voss. hist. Grac. l. ii. c. 15. (31) Lucian. in vit. Demonac. p. 546—555. (32) Idem, toxar. p. 631. 638. (33) M. Ans. l. i. c. 6. (34) Apul. meta. l. i. p. 103. (35) Ruald. vis. Plutarch. c. 5. (36) Vide Joss. l. ii. c. 1. (37) Bib. patr. p. 565. (38) Aug. retract. l. ii. c. 42. (39) Hier. ad Cre. c. 2. in Exech. xviii. &c. (40) Clem. strom. 1. (41) Suid. p. 242. (42) Idem ibid.

Antiochus was a native of Æga in Cilicia, by profession a sophist, and one of the disciples of Dionysius the Milesian, of whom we have spoken in the reign of Adrian. Philostratus seems to have entertained a great opinion of him, and not undefervedly; for he is faid to have had an utter contempt for riches, and to have spent his whole estate in purchasing corn for his poor countrymen during a famine (47). Alexander was likewise by profession a sophist, and is greatly commended by Philostratus. He was born in Seleucia, comprised at that time in Cilicia; but afterwards raifed to the metropolis of Isauria. His mother, tho' married, was thought to have had him by a criminal conversation with Apollonius Tyanaus (48), whose chastity has, by some writers, been mightily cried up. He was one of the disciples of Favorinus, Adrian's great tavourite, and afterwards secretary for the Greek tongue to M. Aurelius. Hermogenes, a native of Tarfus, gained fuch reputation among the fophists, when he was but fifteen years old, that M. Aurelius went in person to hear him, was greatly taken with his extraordinary genius, and loaded him with presents; but as he surpassed most men when he was but a child, so when he attained to man's estate, he deserved to be ranked among children, says Philostrasus (49). However, he lived to a great age, despised by those who had once admired him (50). Ariflides, one of the most cele-brated sophists of his time, was a native of Adrianothera in Mysia. He is highly commended, on account of his eloquence, by Phrynicus his contemporary (51), by Philostratus (52), and generally by all the ancients; but if he excelled, as he is faid to have done, all the other fophists, several of his orations, which have reached our times (53), convince us, that we have no reason to regret the loss of their works. He was subject to various infirmities, and constantly indisposed. We read in his journal, which he intitles sacred discourses, many things relating to maladies and their remedies, which he pretends to have learnt of Asculapius in his dreams (54). Notwithstanding his infirmities, he lived to a great age, and died in the reign of Commodus.

Lucius, or, as he is styled by others, Saturantius Apulcius, was a native of Madaura, a Roman colony, on the borders of Numidia and Getulia, the son of one of the chef men of that city, and of Salvia, one of the descendants of Plutarch (55). He passed his childhood partly in Greece, (for his mother was originally of Thessaly) and partly at Carthage, where he learnt, without the assistance of an instructor, the Latin; but not without much labour, as he himself owns. From Carthage he went to Athens, where he applied himself to the study of poetry, geometry, dialectics, and music, and thoroughly informed himself of the different tenets of the various sects of philosophers; but embraced that of Plato, which however did not prevent him from studying magic with great application. He is even faid to have been fo well skilled in that art, as to work feveral miracles, which the pagans opposed to those of our Saviour (56). These miracles however are not well attested; and Apuleius himself, being accused as a magician before Claudius Maximus proconful of Africa, endeavoured to clear himfelf from that charge, as from an enormous crime, by an excellent difcourse, which has reached our times (57). He is thought to have studied that art in Thessaly, where it was in great request (58). St. Austin (which to us feems very strange) doubts whether what Apuleius writes of his being, by a magic potion, transformed into an als, was true or fabulous (59). The pagans themselves looked upon his metamorphoses as only fit to amuse children (60). He wrote with great elegance both in Greek and Latin; but his ftyle is somewhat affected: he is fond of antiquated words, coins new ones, and frequently gives new ideas to old ones. He was reckoned one of the most eloquent men of his age; but neither his eloquence, nor his other extraordinary accomplishments, ever raifed him to any dignity in the empire, tho' he was far from despiting honours, as appears from the manner in which he speaks of a statue erected to him at Oca, a city of the province of Tripolitana, where he married a woman named Pudentilla; and of the office of pontiff conferred upon him in his own country, which gave him a right to exhibit combats of gladiators and wild beafts. Several pieces of Apuleius are still extant, and some fragments of others, which have been long fince loft. Of the former some are but a bare translation of Aristotle, or of other ancient writers (61). He is often quoted by the ancients, as appears from the collection of fuch quotations prefixed to his works, but especially by St. Austin, who takes great pains to confute his false theology (62).

Amongst the historians who flourished under M. Aurelius, those of chief note are Polyenus a Macedonian, who inscribed to M. Aurelius and L. Verus the eight books of stratagems published by Casaubon (63). He left other works, (and among the rest a description of the city of Thebes) which have been long fince lost (64). Amyntianus wrote and addressed to M. Aurelius the history of Alexander the Great, which was not much admired. He likewise published the life of Domitian, and the lives of some other Latin and Greek princes (65); but none of his works have reached our times. Those of Damophilus have undergone the same fate: he was a philosopher and sophist, brought up, as Suidas informs us (66), by Julianus, who was consul in the year 175. the fitteenth of M. Aurelius's reign. He is frequently quoted by the emperor Julian, who supposes him to have been a native of Bithynia. Some of his works he inscribed to Lollius Maximus (67). The history of Greece written by Paufanias in ten books has reached The author describes with great care and exactness the situation and antiquities of each city, and all the curiofities which in his time were to be feen in a country once so famous; but some critics find fault with him for interweaving his hiftory with so many fables, which however are of great use for the right understanding of the ancient writers (68). It appears from the quotations of Stephanus the geographer, that he described after the same manner Phanicia and Syria. He bestows mighty encomiums upon Antoninus Pius, and mentions his wars with the Germans, Sarmatians, and other barbarians; whence it is plain, that he had not done writing in the year 175 (69). He relates nothing posterior to the reign of M. Aurelius; whence we may conclude, that he either died, or ended his work under that prince. Philostratus speaks of one Paufanias a sophist, a native of Cafaren in Cappadocia, and disciple of Herodes Acticus. Of this Pausanias he observes, that he spent the greatest part of his life at Rome; that in speaking he changed all the quantities, and did not distinguish the letters that had a like found; which however was common to all the Cappadocians (70). Philostratus ascribes to him only some declamations; whence he ought, in our opinion, to be distinguished from the historian of that name, tho' Vossius and Sylburgius take the author of the history and of the declamations to be one and the same writer (71); for we cannot think, that Philostratus would have passed over in tilence so great and important a work, had the sophist been the author of it. Suidas speaks of another Paulanias, by birth a Lacedamonian, who wrote the history of his own country; but we must distinguish him too from the author of the history of Greece, who re-bukes the Lacedemonians with great liberty, and whose dialect comes nearer the Ionic than the Doric, which was the dialect of the Lacedemonians [72]. In the beginning of the reign of M. Aurelius flourished one Iamblicus, by birth a Babylonian, and by profession a magician. He published several works in Greek, and among the rest one styled Babylonica (73), which is faid by Tennulius to be still preserved in the famous library of the Escurial in Spain (74). Perhaps it was consumed by the late conflagration; for that was the fate of many inestimable manuscripts lodged in that famous library. Leo Allatius published a fragment of it. Vossius takes Iamblicus's Babylonica to be nothing else but the filly romance, of which Photius has been at the trouble of giving us too long an abstract. Suidas seems to insinuate the fame thing. Photius tells us, that Iamblicus was originally a flave, and relates several particulars concerning him, copied from an unknown author (75). Theophylus of Antioch has transmitted to us a table of the Roman emperors, from Julius Cafar to the death of M. Aurelius, with the years, months and daps of their respective reigns. This table was made by one of M. Aurelius's freed-men, named Chrylores, and not Crator, as Vossius calls him, led into that mistake by the text of Theophylus, where we read ον ο μεν Κεάτως instead of τομενκλάτως, as it is corrected by Scaliger (76). The above-mentioned table was copied from a work of Chryfores, containing the names and chronology of all those who had ruled in Rome, from the foundation of the city to the time of M. Aurelius. Scaliger has added it to the chronology of Eusebius. It is likewise to be found in the works of Clement of Alexandria, free from most of the faults which have crept into that of Theophylus. Amilius Parthenianus composed the history of all those who attempted to usurp the sovereign power. He did not end his history before the year 175. for he wrote the life of Avidius Caffius. He is quoted by Vulcatius Gallicanus, who flourished under Dioclesian. Vossius ranks him among the Latin historians (77). The grammarian Proculus, who instructed M. Aurelius in the Latin grammar, and was on that account raised by him to the confulfhip, published a work on foreign countries, or, as some read it, religions, de regionibus, or religionibus (78). He was by birth an African; but thoroughly versed in the Latin tongue 79). Hephostion and Harpocration, who instructed L Verus in the Greek tongue (80), have both left some works behind them. An excellent piece de re metrica, which feems to be very ancient, and bears the name of one Hephestion, a grammarian of Alexandria, has reached our times, and is common'y ascribed to Herhestion the preceptor of L. Verus. Suidas mentions several other works published by him (81) Another learned piece is still extant on the ten orators of Athens, done by one Valerius Harpocration, supposed to have been preceptor to L. Verus (82). At this time flourished Apollonius of Alexandria, surnamed Dy o.es, who published several grammatical pieces. Some of his works have reached our times, viz. four books on the fyntax, to which is prefixe his life, done by an anonymous writer, and another piece, intituled, Some false histories, or rather wonderful histories (%). He was father to one Herodianus, who lived, anding to Suidas, in the time of M. Aurelius, and 10hished several grammatical piec s 84). Ammiscus Marcellinus reckons him among the many great men for whom the world was indebted to the mufeum of Alexandria 85). Sylburgius takes him to be the historian Herodianus, who wrote the lives of the emperors, from the death of M. Aurelius to the reign of Gordian; that is, to the year 238 (86) But Vositus speaks of the grammarian and historian as two different persons: and truly the historian might have been born in the reign o' M. Aurelius; but cannot be fald to have flourished unier that prince, fince he was still writing sitty-eight years after his death (87). Artemidorus, author of several ooks on the interpretation of dreams, lived under Antoninus Pius and M. Aurelius; for he is quoted by Lueian; and he himself tells us, that he was acquainted with one who had entered the lifts in the combats that were exhibited by Antoninus Pius at Puteoli, in honour of Adrian. He was a native of Ephelus, and in his other works styled himself Artemidorus the Ephesian; but in that on the interpretation of dreams, he took the furname of Daldianus, from Daldis, a fmall city of Lydia, the birth-place of his mother. He wrote four books on the interpretation of dreams, which have reached us, with a fifth, wherein he relates the issue of several dreams. Of these books he inscribed the three first to one Cassius Maximus a Phonician, who, it feems was a man of great eloquence, and his particular friend; and the two others to his fon, named likewife Artemidorus (88). Besides these books, he wrote some others, according to Suidas (89), who styles him a philotopher, on the manner of foretelling events by birds, and by the lines of the hand. For the compiling of his books on dreams, he read all the authors who had handled the fame subject, and were very numerous; he fpent many years in travelling through all the provinces, and vifiting all the cities of the empire; he conferred with all those who pretended to any knowledge in divination (90); and the fruit of so many labours, journies, inquiries, conferences, &c. was a work the most useless and trifling that ever was published, as is owned by those who have been at the pains of illustrating it with notes (91).

(43) Vide Jonf. l. iii. c. 10. (44) Idem ibid. (45) Idem ibid. (46) Philostr. soph. xxix. (47) Idem, soph. xxxi. (48) Idem ibid. (49) Idem ibid. (50) Dio, l. lxxi. p. 802. (51) Phos. c. 158. (52) Philos. soph. xxxv. (52) Vide Phot. c. 246, &c. (54) Philos. ibid. Suid. p. 426. (55) Apul. met. l. ii. p. 115. & prol. p. 29. (56) Hier. pf. lxxxi. Latt. l. v. c. 3. Aug. epift. cxxxvi. (57) Apul. apol. (58) Vit. Apul. p. 15. (59) Aug. civit. Dei, l. xviii. c. 18. (60) Voss. hist. Grac. l. iv. Macrob. in som. Scipion. l. i. c. 2. (61) Apul. prol. (62) Aug. civ. Dei, l. viii. c. 14. (63) Voss. hist. Grac. l. ii. c. 14. (64) Suid. p. 559. (65) Phot. c. 131. (66) Suid. p. 640 (67) Vide Jons. l. iii. c. 11.

(68) Voss. bist. Grec. l. ii. c. 14. (69) Paus. l. viii. p. 272. (70) Philost. soph. xxxix. (71) Voss. ibid. (72) Suid. p. 466. (73) Phot. c. 49. (74) Voss. ibid. l. iv. p. 582. & Samuel. Tennul. im not. ad lambl. arith. Arnemia, ann. 1668. (75) Phot. p. 241. (76) Vide Scal. in chron. Euseb. p. 396. (77) Voss. bist. Lat. l. iii. (78) Tret. Pollio. histor. trigin. tyrannor. p. 195. (79) Voss. bist. Lat. l. i. c. 12. (80) Jul. Cap. in vit. Ver. p. 35. (81) Suid. p. 1209. (82) Idem, p. 441. (83) Voss. bist. Grec. l. ii. c. 14. (84) Suid. p. 379. (85) Ammian. l. xxii. p. 135. (86) In Herodian. prol. (87) Voss. ibid. l. i. c. 1. (88) Artemidor. l. i. c. 28. l. iii. c. 67. (89) Suid. p. 442. (90) Idem, p. 3. (91) Voss. ibid. l. ii. c. 12.

The same author wrote some books on physic (92). Marcellus of Ida in Pamphylia wrote, in the reign of M. Aurelius, forty-two books in hexameter verse on physic, and is quoted by St. Jerom (93). Marulus, a Latin poet, wrote some stires in the beginning of the reign of M. Aurelius, not sparing that prince, nor his predecessor Antoninus Pius; but he patiently tore his railleries (94). Apuleius speaks of a poet who lived in his time, and had begun an excellent poem upon Alexander the Great (95). This is probably the writer, whom he calls elsewhere (96) Corvinus Clemens, and who was quastor. Aulus Gellius, or Agellius, must have flourished about this time; for he was disciple to Titus Castricius, to Favorinus, to Herodes Atticus, and to Cornelius Fronto, who a'l lived under Adrian and Antoninus Pius (97). Cornelius Fronto had been consul when Aulus Gellius was yet a youth (98). He bestows great encomiums on the celebrated philosopher and apostate Peregrinus; but does not mention his death, which rendered him more famous than any thing he had done in his life time; for he publicly burnt himself at the sports of the two hundred and thirty-fixth olympiad:

whence we conclude, that Aulus Gellius had done writing before that time; that is, before the year 165. of the chriftian æra, the fifth of the reign of M. Aurelius and L. Verus. He studied grammar at Rome, and philosophy at Athens, under Calvisus Taurus, whence he returned to Rome. He lest no work behind him, except his Noëles Attica; for thus he styled the collection of several memorable and amusing events, which he compiled for the use of his children (99). St. Austin commends him on account of his easy and elegant elocution (100); but most critics find fault with his antiquated words, his harsh and improper expressions, and, above all, with want of judgment in chusing for his collection such events as are for the most part of no importance, and only contain some grammatical and trisling remarks. Macrobius however often copies him. The annals of Gellius are frequently quoted by the writers of the Roman history; but the author of these annals, by name Cn. Gellius, lived about the year 620. of Rome, and was contemporary with Cieros (1).

(92) Artemidor. prol. p. 4. (93) Voss. ibid. (94) Voss. poet. Lat. p. 52. (95) Apul. stor. p. 3+4. (96) Idem, apol. p. 338. (97) Aul. Gell. l. xxii. c. 21. (98) Idem, l. xxx. c. 8. (99) Idem, presat. (100) Aug. civit. Dei, l. ix. c. 4. (1) Voss. hist. Lat. l. i. c. 8. Macrob. saturnal. l. i. c. 16.

C H A P. XXII.

The Roman history, from the death of M. Aurelius, to the death of Alexander, when the empire was first transferred without the consent of the senate.

Commodus was the first emperor that was born in his father's reign, and the second Commodus. that succeeded his father in the empire. He was born on the thirty-first of August of the year 161. and raised to the empire on the seventeenth of March of the year 180. He is commonly called L. Ælius Aurelius Commodus, and fometimes Commodus Antoninus. He was educated with great care by his father; but nevertheless proved one of the most lewd, cruel and wicked tyrants that ever disgraced a throne; which confirms in some degree the opinion of those, who believed him to be the fon of a famous gladiator, with whom his mother Faustina was said to have had a criminal conversation d. He gave, when only twelve years old, a remarkable His cruelty. instance of his cru-lty at Centumcella, now Civita Vecchia; where finding the water in b which he bathed somewhat too warm, he commanded the person who attended the bath to be thrown into the furnace; nor was he fatisfied, till those who were about him, pretended to have put his order in execution c. After his accession to the empire, he equalled, if he did not exceed, in cruelty, Caligula, Domitian, and Nero himfelf, playing, we may fay, with the blood of his subjects and fellow-creatures, of whom he caused great numbers to be racked and butchered in his presence, merely for his diversion. The ancients relate several instances of his cruelty, very odd and monstrous: he caused one to be thrown to the wild beafts, for reading the life of Ca'igula written by Suetonius, because that tyrant and he had been born on the same

d Jul. CAP. in M. Aur. p. 30.

LAMPRID. in Commod.

day . Seeing one day a corpulent man pass by, he immediately cut him asunder, a partly to try his strength, in which he excelled all men, and partly out of curiofity, as he himself owned, to see his intrails drop out at once. He took pleasure in cutting off the feet, and putting out the eyes, of fuch as he met in his rambles through the city, telling the former, after he had thus maimed them, by way of raillery, that they now belonged to the nation of the Monopodii; and the latter, that they were now become Luscinii, alluding to the words luscinia, a nightingale, and luscus, one-eyed. Some he murdered, because they were negligently dressed; others, because they feemed trimmed with too much nicety. He pretended to great skill in surgery, especially at letting blood; but sometimes, instead of easing by that means those whom he vifited, or who were prevailed upon to recur to him, he cut off, by way of diver- b fion, their ears or nofes. He affumed the name and habit of Hercules, appearing publicly in a lion's skin, with a huge club in his hand, and ordering several persons, tho' not guilty of any crime, to be difguifed like monsters, that, by knocking out their brains with his club, he might have a better claim to the name of the great destroyer of monsters. In short, the shedding of blood seemed to be his chief diverfion e. As for his lewdness, the author of his life tells us, that even in his father's reign he turned the court into a brothel; and, upon his death, he abandoned himfelf, without restraint or shame, to all manner of abominations, spending whole days and nights in public-houses amongst the meanest of the people, and in the company of gladiators, buffoons, common profitutes, &c. He kept constantly three hundred c concubines, and the like number of catamites. He debauched all his own fisters, and murdered one of them, by name Lucilla, after he had forced her to comply with his incestuous desires. But to give a detail of his infamous practices and pollutions, is beneath the dignity of an historian, and what we cannot help blaming in Suetonius His skill in ar- and the Augustine writers. He took great delight in shooting with the bow, and gave innumerable proofs of his dexterity and skill in that art, which we should look upon as fabulous, were they not attested by all the ancients. He excelled all men in strength, and is said to have run an elephant through with his spear, and to have once killed in the amphitheatre a hundred lions, one after another, and each of them at one blow. Forgetful of his rank and dignity, he entered the lifts with the com- d mon gladiators, having learnt with them in the common school the use of their weapons. He is faid to have fought in the public amphitheatre feven hundred and thirty-five times, and to have always come off conqueror; whence he often subscribed himself in his letters, The conqueror of a thousand gladiators. He seemed to be more pleased with the applause of the populace on these occasions, than any of the ancient Roman captains had ever been with a triumph. Imagining one day, that the people rather derided than applauded him, he ordered them all to be maffacred upon the fpot, and the city to be fet on fire; which barbarous fentence had been put in execution, had not the captain of the prætorian guards with much-ado appealed him. Having with his extravagancies foon drained and exhausted his exchequer, he betook e himself to all manner of rapine; loaded the people with taxes; sold the governments of the provinces, and other employments; exempted criminals from the punishment due to their crimes, upon their paying him a fum of money, and allowed others to murder whomfoever they pleafed; fo that the city, and indeed the whole empire, was filled with blood and maffacres, every one purchasing of the emperor the liberty of murdering such as he feared or hated h. But to proceed to the history of his reign according to the order of time.

chery.

His lewdiels

ries.

and deb.nucke-

He enters the lists with the common gladiators.

His avarice.

Commedus, a few days after his father's death, went to the camp, attended by all the chief officers; and there, after a plaufible and popular speech to the soldiers, prefented them with the usual donative. He was for returning immediately to Rome, f panting after the diversions of the city; but Pompeianus, who had married his fifter, representing to him how dangerous and shameful a thing it would be for him to return before he had ended the war, he was with much-ado prevailed upon to continue fome time in Pannonia, where he is faid to have gained some advantages over the Quadi, which must have been very inconsiderable, since he did not on that score take upon him the title of imperator. However, both the Quadi and Marcomanni, imagining that he was refolved to pursue the war, and finding themselves no longer in a condition to make head against his victorious troops, sent embassadors to him, with propo-

h Idem ibid.

a fals of an accommodation; which he readily hearkened to, and granted them a peace He concludes & upon the following terms: 1. That they should not settle within five miles of the peace with the Danube. 2. That they should deliver up their arms, and supply the Romans with a Quadi, &c. certain number of troops, when required. 3. That they should assemble but once a month in one place only, and in the presence of a Roman centurion. And, 4. That they should not make war upon the lazyges, the Buri, or the Vandali, without the confent of the people of Rome. On the other hand, Commodus promifed to abandon, which he did accordingly, all the castles and fortresses which he held in their country, except fuch as were within five miles of the Danube. With the other German nations, which his father had almost intirely reduced, he concluded a very dishonourable b peace; nay, of fome he purchased it with very large sums. Having thus rather abandoned than ended the war, he hastened back to Rome, where he was received with all possible demonstrations of joy, and honoured with a triumph, with the furname of Pius, and with all the marks of diffinction that had ever been conferred upon the most deferving princes. Having visited the capitol and other temples, and returned thanks to the senate, the people and the soldiery, for their fidelity and attachment to him during his absence, he was conducted by them to the palace on the twenty-second

THE following year Commodus entered upon his third confulship, having for his collegue one Birrus, or Burrhus, probably Antiftius Burrhus, who had married his e fifter. On one medal of this, and on feveral of the following year, Commodus bears the title of Felix, the Happy; whence it is manifest, that Lampridius, whom most modern antiquaries follow, was mistaken, when he wrote, that this title was not by the fenate decreed to him till the death of Perennis, which happened five years after; that is, in the year 186 m. The next confuls were Mamertinus and Rufus, during whose administration Commodus took the title of imperator for the fifth time, on account of some advantages gained by his lieutenants, Albinus and Niger, over the barbarians who dwelt beyond Dacia. The above-mentioned confuls were succeeded by Commodus the fourth time conful, and Victorinus the second time. During their consulship, the Caledonians, having passed the wall which parted them from the Romans, The Caledod committed dreadful devastations, and cut in pieces a Roman army, with their general; nians invade but were in the end repulsed with great flaughter by Ulpius Marcellus, a man of a territories; but mean descent, but an excellent commander, and a strict observer of the military are repulsed by discipline. Of this war the ancients give us no particular account, but only tell us, Ulpius Marthat it proved very bloody; that the emperor, for the great advantages gained by cellus. his lieutenant, took the title of imperator the fixth time, with the furname of Britannicus; and that Uipius Marcellus, by his gallant and prudent conduct, gained fuch credit and reputation, that Commodus, envying him the glory he had acquired, deligned to put him to death; but in the end spared him o. This year Commodus, who had hitherto followed the advice of his father's friends and counfellors, began to e despise them, thinking himself sufficiently qualified to govern without so many tutors about him, as he expressed it. He therefore discharged them all, employing in their Commodus room either his debauched companions, or such as were recommended to him by them. dismisses his fa-Thus Pescennius Niger was preferred to the command of the armies in Syria, at the and counsellors. recommendation of the wreftler Narcissus; and many others were raised to great employments by means of the emperor's freed men, flaves, concubines, &c. whose imperious and arrogant behaviour drew upon the young prince the hatred and contempt of the senate; which he being well apprised of, began in his turn to put to death, under various pretences, some of the most eminent members of that illustrious body. His fifter Lucilla, feeing him abhorred, on account of his cruelties, by all the great f men in Rome, formed a conspiracy against him, with a design to place in his room a person whom she favoured, and was thought to love both above her brother and her husband Pompeianus. She had the title of empress, and all the honours attending it, being the widow of the emperor Lucius Verus; but nevertheless was obliged to give place to Crispina, the wife of Commodus; which her haughty spirit could not bear. She therefore drew into a conspiracy Claudius Pompeianus, to whom she had betrothed A conspiracy her daughter, Quadratus, and many other senators of distinction. It was agreed among formed against him by his suffer him by his suffer. the conspirators, that they should fall upon the emperor while he was going to the Lucilla, and

&lt;sup>1</sup> Dio, I. Ixxii. p. 817. HERODIAN. I. i. p. 461. Aur. Vict. LAMPRID. ibid. Dio, p. 818. H
DD. p. 471. Goltz. p. 81.

<sup>1</sup> Vit. Commod. p. 48. Onuph. p. 228.

<sup>m</sup> Birag. p. 24
Goltz. p. 81. Birag. ibid. Dio, p. 820.

<sup>o</sup> Dio, I. Ixxii. p. 821. & in excerpt. Val. p. 725. * LAMPRID. ibid. Dio, p. 818. He-ROD. p. 471. GOLTZ. p. 81. 1 VII. C R GOLTZ. p. 81. BIRAG. ibid. Dio, p. 820. m BIRAG. p. 246.

Cha

th th

ĺm

th

me

alı

im

hi

lo:

the

Dи

hia

and

con

dor

rag

fate

rec

As

tion

to t

bat

mir

div

non

Na

Н

h

C

h

de

COI

eve

rev

the

his l

the

esp<sub>0</sub>

tain

empl

it bui

capta

obtain

pretei

acm;

letter

and k

11. Br the f

f their

e Bur

d all

c an

b di

Who are all put to death.

the guards

dered.

executed.

cause his favourite freed-amphitheatre through a narrow and dark passage; and that Pompeianus should give a him the first blow. Accordingly they assaulted him in the appointed place; but Pompeianus shewing him, instead of striking at once, the naked dagger, and crying out, This present the senate sends you, the guards had time to rescue the emperor, and seize the conspirators, who were soon after put to death. The emperor banished his fifter to the island of Caprea, where he afterwards ordered her to be privately murdered P. Herodianus tells us, that one Quintianus was to give the first blow; and Ammianus, who follows him, adds, that Quinotianus actually wounded the emperor, who, by the loss of blood, fainted away 9. But we have chosen to follow such writers as lived nearest those times. This same year the empress Crispina was likewise confined to the island of Caprea, and there murdered by the emperor's order, for imitating b him in his debaucheries r. Quadratus had a concubine, by name Marcia, and a favourite freed-man, named Eclectus. The latter the emperor created his chief chamberlain; and the former, who was a woman of great beauty, he kept for his concubine, and distinguished her with all the honours that were peculiar to the empresses, except that of having fire or torches carried before her s. She is supposed to have been a great friend to the christians; and to her power at court, and authority with the emperor, is commonly ascribed the profound tranquillity, which the church enjoyed in the midst of so many cruel executions t. One Anterus, or, as others call him, Saoterus, a native of Nicomedia, and the emperor's favourite freedman, was thought to have put him upon the wicked measures which he was pursuing; for he bore a great sway c The captains of with the prince. Wherefore the captains of the guards caused him to be murdered by one Cleander, of whom we shall speak hereaster. The emperor expressed greater concern for his death, than he had done for the conspiracy formed against himself; mantobemur- and being informed, that Tarruntinus Paternus, one of the captains of the guards, was privy to it, he removed him from his employment, under colour of creating him a fenator, and a few days after caused him to be assassinated, with Salvius Justanus, to whose fon the daughter of Paternus had been betrothed, pretending, that they had both conspired to depose him, and seize the empire for themselves ". Salviu Julianus was grandfon to the famous civilian of that name under Adrian, and uncle to Di-Several persons dius Julianus, who was afterwards emperor. The same year were fally accused of d condemned and treason, condemned and executed, Velius Rusus, Egnatius Capito, and the two Quintilii, Maximus and Condianus, who had been all confuls. Sextus Condianus, the son of Maximus, who had been conful in the year 180. and was a young man of extraordinary parts, was condemned with his father and uncle; but escaped, at least for fome time, by causing a report to be spread, that he was dead; but many attesting that he was still alive, diligent fearch was made after him. Many persons, who had never feen him, were accused of having harboured and concealed him in their houses, and, upon that charge, either put to death, or banished. Of Sextus himself we find no further mention in history. Emilius Jungus and Attilius Severus were both banished in their confulship, which they held, it seems, during the two last months of e this year, and with them many senators and knights of great distinction *. Under the succeeding consuls, M. Eggius Merullus and Cn. Papirius Ælianus, was accused of aspiring at the empire, and put to death, the emperor's savourite minister Perennis. He was captain of the prætorian guards, an excellent commander, and, according to ster put to death Dion Cassius, a man without reproach x. But Herodianus and Lampridius give him a quite different character, and speak of him as one who abused the great authority he had with the emperor, flicking at no violence, murder or injuffice to fill his own coffers, while Commodus was wholly intent upon his pleasures and diversions, in which he encouraged him, that he might govern with an absolute sway; which he did but for a short while, as we shall see anon y. This year Commodus took the title of imperator f the feventh time, probably an account of some advantages gained by his lieutenants in Britain; for the disturbances there were not yet intirely quelled 2. The next confuls were Commodus the fifth time, and Acilius Glabrio the fecond 2. This year, while Commodus was affifting at the Capitoline sports instituted by Domitian in 86. a person, in the habit of a Cynic philosopher, appeared unexpectedly in the midst of

Perennis the emperor's favourite mini-

His downfal and death differently reported.

the theatre; and addressing the emperor, told him aloud, That while he minded

nothing

P Vit. Commod.p. 46. Herod. p. 474. Dio, p. 818.

4 Ammian. l. xxix.

5 Dio, ibid. Herod. l. i. p. 486.

5 Vide Baron. ann. 112.

8 Vit. Commod. p. 47. Dio, p. 819.

W Dio, lxxi. p. 819.

7 Herod. l. i. p. 472.

7 Vit. Com. p. 48. Herod. I. i. p. 486.
 Vide Bas
 I. lxxi. p. 819.
 Vit. Comm. p. 47.
 BIRAG. p. 248.
 Vit. Com. ibid. * Noris. epist. conful. p. 116.

a nothing but his pleasures and diversions, he was in danger of losing both his life and the empire, by the wicked practices of Perennis and his children. Perennis caused the pretended Cynic to be immediately seized as a madman, who disturbed the public fports, and foon after ordered him to be burnt alive; which gave the emperor no small jealousy. Not long after, some soldiers arriving at Rome from Illyricum, where the fon of Perennis commanded, shewed to Commodus in a private audience, some medals, on which was engraved the image of the fon of Perennis, as if he had been already emperor; which so alarmed the prince, that he commanded the traitor to be immediately put to death b. Thus Herodian. But Dion Cassius and Lampridius relate his downfal in a quite different manner. According to them, the army in Britain, b diffatisfied either because he had punished them with too great severity on account of fome fedition, or because he had removed several senators, and given their posts in the army to Roman knights his creatures, fent deputies to Rome, fifteen hundred, fays Dion Cassius, (which seems altogether incredible) to complain of him, and charge him with a delign of raising his son to the empire. They were backed by Cleander, and the emperor's other freed-men, who could not brook the arbitrary and haughty conduct of the favourite minister. Hereupon Commodus, naturally timorous, abandoned the traitor to the rage of the provoked foldiery, who, after a thousand outrages, tore him in pieces. His wife, his fifter, and his two fons, underwent the fame His wife and fate. To his eldest son, who commanded the army in Illyricum, the emperor wrote children unuerc an obliging letter, injoining him to come with all possible expedition to Rome, to fate. receive there new marks of the esteem and affection he had for him and his father. As the young man was an intire stranger to what had passed, and not yet in a condition to revolt openly, he readily complied with the invitation; but had no fooner entered Italy, than he was cut in pieces by the foldiers who attended him, pursuant to the private orders they had received from Rome c. The other brother was probably killed at Rome with his father. Perennis was succeeded in the post of prime Perennisis sucminister by Cleander; for the emperor himself was so taken up with his pleasures and ceeded by Ciediversions, that he could not bestow one minute on the affairs of the state: he would ander, not even be at the trouble of figning his dispatches; and in several letters to his friends d all he wrote was, Vale, Farewel. Cleander was by birth a Phrygian, and originally a flave, having been fold as such in Rome by auction, as were in those days most slaves. He belonged at first to M. Aurelius, and afterwards to Commodus, who, favouring him above the rest of his slaves, gave him leave to marry Demostracia, one of his concubines, brought up the children he had by her in the palace, presented him with his liberty, and appointed him his chamberlain. He is thought to have procured the death of Perennis, that he might ingross all the power to himself; which he easily compassed, and abused his authority in a more flagrant manner than Perennis had Wine abuses his ever done. By him all things were openly fet to fale, offices, provinces, public authority. revenues, public justice, and the lives of men both innocent and guilty. Antifius e Burrbus, who had married one of the emperor's fifters, took the liberty to acquaint the prince with the unaccountable conduct of his minister; but that liberty cost him his life, Cleander having charged him with aspiring at the empire, and prevailed upon the emperor, whom he blindly controuled, to condemn him, and all those who espoused his cause, or attempted to defend him. Among these was Ebutianus captain of the guards, in whose room Cleander persuaded the emperor to substitute him-felf, and two others, whom he named to him. Upon the death of Perennis, that The captains employment had been given to one Niger, who held it only fix hours; another enjoyed of the guards changed daily it but five days, and several others not so long, the timorous emperor changing the and hourly. captains of his guards daily and hourly. Most of these officers lost their lives with f their employment, being accused of treason by Cleander, who courted, and at last obtained, that important post for himself d. After the death of Perennis, the emperor pretended to be greatly concerned for many things that had been done during his administration, in order to throw the whole odium upon him. He wrote an obliging letter to Pertinax, whom Perennis had banished into Liguria, his native country, in Britain, which had mutinied, and raised great disturbances in that island, neither The Roman the Roman foldiers, nor the Britons, being able to brook the tyrannical government of foldiers in Britannical government of full muting.

 Herodian. ibid. p. 474, 475.
 p. 822. Vit. Com. ibid. c Dio, p. 811. Vit. Commod. p. 48. d HEROD. p. 475. Dio.

and kept there for the space of three years, appointing him commander of the troops

Vol. VI. Nº 2.

A a

Com-

Ьb

to ſo

fil

C٢

0 ſe

n

in at

the

ch

of

00 ta d th

Se

hit

hin

riec

lius all

abo

Wer

acco

infor

Murc

0:her

MOn](

100 k

Being

be m lad f

Day!

f ter, ]

e oth

c m

Commodus. Upon the arrival of Pertinax, the soldiers pressed him to assume the a fovereignty; but he, rejecting the offer with indignation, brought by degrees the mutinous foldiery to a fense of their duty, and restored tranquillity to the province, but not without great trouble and danger; for one of the legions openly revolting, much blood was spilt, and Pertinax himself was left upon the spot for dead. As his feverity drew upon him the hatred and ill-will of the foldiery, he defired to be recalled; but the emperor did not comply with his request till three years after d. This year Commodus took the title of imperator for the eighth and last time, on account of the advantages, as is conjectured, which Clodius Albinus is said to have gained about this time over the Frisians c.

The war of the deserters under the conduct of Maternus.

Under the next consuls, Crispinus and Ælianus, a common soldier, by name b Maternus, having fled from his colours, and being joined by many others guilty of the same crime, grew in a short time so powerful, the banditti slocking to him from all parts, that he over ran and plundered great part of Gaul and Spain, stormed the strongest cities, and struck the emperor and people of Rome with such terror, that troops were raised, and armies dispatched against him. Pescennius Niger was sent to make head against him in Gaul, where he became very intimate with Severus, who was then governor of the country of Lyons, and wrote a letter to the emperor, commending the prudent conduct and gallant behaviour of Niger in pursuing the rebels and deserters. Maternus, finding himself reduced to great streights by the brave Niger, divided his men into feveral small bands, and marched privately with them c by different ways into Italy, having nothing less in view than to murder the emperor during the folemnity which was kept annually in honour of the mother of the gods, and, upon his death, to feize the empire. They all arrived at Rome undiscovered; and some of his men had already mixed themselves with the emperor's guards, when others of his own party betrayed him. He was immediately seized and executed, and his death put an end to the diffurbances, which some of his followers had begun to raise in other provinces &. The same year broke out the most dreadful plague, fays Dion Cassius, that had been known. It lasted two or three years, and raged with most violence in Rome, where it frequently carried off two thousand persons a day. The emperor, to avoid the contagion, retired to Laurentum, a city of Latium, on the d fea-side h. The following year, Fuscianus and Salinus being both consuls for the fecond time, the emperor gave out, that he defigned to pais over into Africa; but having, under that pretence, exacted very confiderable fums, and even suffered the people to offer up vows for his fafe return on the fifth of April, he spent the money in banquets and revels, and continued at Rome and in the neighbourhood. About this time Severus was translated from the government of Pannonia to that of Sicily, whence he returned to Rome, to clear himself of a crime with which he was charged, viz. of consulting the astrologers, as if he entertained thoughts of usurping the sovevereignty. His cause was heard by the captains of the guards, the collegues of Cleander; and, as Commodus was hated, fays Spartian, Severus was cleared, and his e accuser crucified k. This year great part of the capitol, a samous library, and feveral contiguous buildings, were utterly destroyed by lightning. Eusebius says, it consumed whole quarters of the city, and in them several libraries. At the same time the city was afflicted with a dreadful famine, occasioned, as some authors write, by Cleander, who, having now nothing less in view than the fovereignty, bought up under-hand all the corn, in order to raise the price of it, and gain the affections of the foldiery and people, by distributing it among them m. Other writers tell us n, that Papirius Dionysius, whose province it was to supply the city with provisions, contributed towards the famine, in order to make the people rife against Cleander. Be that as it will, the populace ascribed all their calamities and misfortunes to the f Cleander all hated minister, who now began to act in a more arbitrary manner than ever, putting in an arbitrary to death and pardoning, banishing and recalling from exile, whom he pleased. Several manumitted slaves he created patricians, and gave them a place in the senate; others he made governors of provinces, and raised to the first employments. But his reign was short-lived; for the following year, in which Rome saw for the first, and indeed for the last time, twenty-five consuls, all named by Cleander, and most of Severus accused and acquitted.

Who is seized,

them his creatures, while the people were celebrating the Circensian games, a troop

&lt;sup>d</sup> Vit. Com. ibid. & Pertin. p. 54. Albin. vit. p. 81. Nig. vit. p. 75. p. 475. Vit. Com. p. 51. h ldem ibid. l Vit. Com. p. 49. k Spart. in Sever, in chron. Oros. l. viii. c. 16. Dio, p. 823. vit. Com. p. 51. 6 HEROD. l. i. 1 Euses.

a of children, having at their head a young woman of an extraordinary stature, and a fierce aspect, entering the circus, began to utter aloud many bitter invectives, and dreadful curses, against Cleander; which being for some time answered by the people with other invectives and curses, the whole multitude rose all on a sudden, slew in a The people rise tumultuous manner to the palace of Quintilius in the neighbourhood of Rome, where against him. the emperor was then residing with Cleander; and renewing there their curses and imprecations, demanded the head of the perfidious wretch, by whom they had been fo grievously and tyrannically oppressed. Hereupon Cleander ordered the prætorian The pratorian cavalry to charge the multitude; which they did accordingly, driving them with horse fall upon great flaughter into the city; but there the populace discharging showers of stones, them; but are b bricks and tiles from the tops of the houses, and from the windows, and the cityguards, who hated Cleander, joining the multitude, the prætorian horse were forced to give way, and fave themselves by a disorderly slight. The people pursued them to the palace of Quintilius, where the emperor was passing his time in the company of some lewd women, utterly unapprised of the tumult, Cleander having forbidden those who were about him to acquaint him with it. However, Marcia, his favourite concubine, thought it incumbent upon her to inform him of what had passed; and his fister Fadilla, entering his apartment in a great fright, and with her hair dishevelled, cried out to him aloud, That all was loft, unless he abandoned Cleander to the fury of the incensed populace. Hereupon the emperor, struck with terror and amazec ment, fent for Cleander; and having caused his head to be struck off that instant, The emperor fent it to the people, the fight of which put an end to the combat, which still continued with great flaughter. His head and body were by the incenfed populace infulted in a most outrageous manner. His wife, his children, and most of his creatures, were at the same time massacred, and their bodies first dragged through the streets, and then thrown into the common fewer". Lampridius tells us, that the people were chiefly provoked against him, for having caused Arrius Antoninus to be falsly accused of treason, and put to death, because he had, while proconsul of Asia, condemned one of his creatures, by name Attalus. Julianus and Regillus were appointed captains of the guards in the room of Cleander and his collegues; but the emperor caused d them both to be soon after put to death, tho' he had ever shewn a particular kindness and affection for Julianus, whom he used to style his father 1. About the close of this year, Pertinax was, at his own request, recalled from Britain, and charged with the care of supplying the city with provisions, in the room of Papirius Dionysius, who was likewise put to death, with all those who had any ways contributed to the raising of the price of corn. THE following year Commodus entered upon his fixth confulship, having Petronius Septimianus for his collegue. The several conspiracies which had been formed against himself and his ministers, filling him with jealousies and suspicions, he abandoned himself without controul to bloodshed and cruelty. He put to death, besides many Commodus e others mentioned by Spartian and other writers, Petronius Mamertinus, who had mar-causes many ried one of his sisters; his son Antoninus; Annia Faustina, cousin-german to M. Aure-sons to be put lius; Sulpicius Crassus, proconsul of Asia, and fix consulars on one day. He caused to death. all those who were any-ways related to Avidius Cassius, of whom we have spoken above, to be burnt alive. Among the multitudes of all ranks and conditions, who were doomed to be inhumanly massacred this year, Dion Cassius gives us a particular account of the death of one Julius Alexander, a native of Emesa in Syria, who being informed, that the emperor had fent thither a centurion with a band of foldiers to murder him, furprised them in the night, and killed them all to a man, with several others, whom he suspected to be his enemies. Having thus filled the city with slaughf ter, he retired on horseback, with a design to take refuge among the barbarians; and would have made his escape, had he not been retarded by a friend of his, who could not keep up with him, and whom he could not find in his heart to leave behind him. Being therefore overtaken by those who pursued him, he first killed his friend, that he might not fall into their hands, and afterwards himself q. This year Severus, who had been one of the twenty-five confuls of the preceding year, was appointed commander of the troops in Illyricum, and Pertinax was sent into Africa with the character of proconful. The following year, Apronianus and Bradua being consuls, a fire

Dio, l. lxxii. p. 823. Herod. l. i. p. 479-481. Vit. Comm. p. 48. Idem ibid. & Dio, p. 823. 4 Dio, ibid, o Vit. Comm. ibid.

Chi

2 I

0

h.

Ы

d

3

80

C it

b fo

20

fro

2

2 tha

ing

po c ro

his

do

d:t

and

this

Cüi

inn

his

8 d to

th is

2 tì

C

 $\mathcal{J}_{\mathcal{U}}$

not

he i

it w ditp

he r

Pero

fhori

of th

the c fcarco

bren

£221

8-22

ti.

l<sub>ves</sub>

b.,,

l . .

b.__

u,

 $\mathbf{1}$

f the co

e thin

The temple of Peace confumed by fire,

of Vesta, with many other buildings.

broke out in the night-time in the celebrated temple of Peace, preceded, and, as some a writers suppose, produced by a small earthquake; for no thunder was heard r. Dien Cassius writes, that it began in the adjoining houses. Be that as it will, the temple, with all the buildings round it, was reduced to affies. That magnificent structure had been raised by Vespasian after the destruction of Jerusalem, and inviched with all the spoils and ornaments of the temple of the Jews. The ancients speak of it as one of the most stately buildings in Rome. There men of learning used to hold their assemblies, and lodge their writings, as many others did their jewels, and whatever else they had of great value. It was likewise made use of as a kind of magazine for the spices that were brought by the Roman merchants out of Egypt and Arabia; so that many rich persons were at once reduced to beggary, all their valuable effects b and treasures being consumed in one night, with the temple s. Galen complains, that many of his books were lost by this misfortune'. The fire spread with great violence to other quarters of the city, and consumed a great number of stately edi-And the temple fices; among the rest, the temple of Vesta. The vestals fled to the palace, with the statue of Pallas, which was supposed to have been brought from Troy, and had never before been exposed to public view; but the slames seized the palace itself, and reduced great part of it to ashes, before their rage could be staid. However, the public papers and registers were with much-ado preserved. The conflagration lasted several days, in spite of the utmost endeavours of the people, the soldiery, and the emperor himfelf, who returning on that occasion from the country, exposed his own person, in c order to encourage others to exert themselves by his example. It ceased at length of itself, or was extinguished by a sudden and violent rain, which they all looked upon as fent by the gods ". This year Pertinax was preferred from the government of Africa to that of Rome, and Didius Julianus sent to govern Africa in his room. The next confuls were Commodus the feventh time, and Helvidius Pertinax the fecond. This year the Roman troops were defeated by the Saracens, whom we find now mentioned for the first time in history w. Commodus being told, that Severus, who commanded in Illyricum, and Nonius Murcus, who had the command of some other army, aspired at the empire, appointed Clodius Albinus, in whom he reposed an intire confidence, governor of Britain, and wrote a letter to him with his own hand, fays Julius d Capitolinus, giving him leave to assume the title of Casar, and the ornaments peculiar to that dignity, in case any disturbances should arise in the empire. Albinus, adds the fame writer, prudently declined that honour, fearing to be involved in the ruin of Commodus, which he apprehended to be at hand x. The account which Dion folly, and public Cassius and Herodian give us of the latter end of this prince's reign, is nothing but a detail of his follies, and the shews which he exhibited, and in which he himself acted the chief part. Both these historians were present; and the former, who assisted at the above-mentioned shews in quality of senator, tells us, that he and the other senators chewed the whole time bay-leaves, that by their bitterness they might be diverted from laughing at the prince's folly; which would have cost them their lives. How- e ever, he owns, that the address and skill which the emperor displayed in shooting with the bow, was univerfally admired and applauded; for a panther having feized a man, and being ready to devour him, Commodus let fly an arrow against the beast with fo much skill and force, that the panther fell dead to the ground, before the man He changes the received the least hurt y. A few days before his death, he changed the names of some of the months, calling August Commodus, September August, October Hercules, November Invincibilis, December Exuperatorius, and January Amazonius; which last title he himself assumed, because he had first sallen in love with Marcia upon seeing her painted in the dress of an Amazon. He was likewise for changing the name of the city itself, and calling it Colonia Commodiana, or The colony of Commodus. Upon f this head he wrote to the fenate, styling himself in the letter, Imperator Casar Lucius, Ælius, Aurelius, Commodus, Antoninus, Augustus, Pius, Felix, Sarmaticus, Germanicus, Maximinus, Britannicus, Pacator orbis terrarum, Invictus Romanus Hercules, Pontifex Maximus, Tribunitiæ Potestatis XVII. Imperator VIII. Consul VII. Pater Patriæ, &c. The fenate readily complied with his defire, and not only flyled Rome Colonia Commodiana, but the house in which they assembled, The bouse of Commodus. They had given him before, by way of derifion, fays Lampridius, the title of Pious, upon his names of some months.

Thems.

His vanity.

Dio, & Herod. ibid. Galen. de libris fuis, p. 263. Nige p. 27. * Vit. Albin. p. 79. y Dio, F HERODIAN. l. i. p. 485. Dio, p. 829. Dio, & HE GALEN. ibid. HEROD. p. 482. w Vit. Nigr. p. 77. t GALEN. ibid. * Vit. Albin. p. 79. p. 484. Herod. p. 826.

railing

a raising to the consulship one of his mother's gallants; the title of Happy, for having compassed the death of Perennis; and that of Hercules, in consideration of his extraordinary strength, and his killing many thousand wild beasts in the amphitheatre. He had often appeared on the public stage in the Amazonian and other fantastical dresses; He aels and but this year he was not ashamed to enter the lists with the gladiators, to act, and to dances in pubdance in the theatre quite naked. Not fatisfied with these follies, he resolved to lie quite naked. appear on the first day of the ensuing year 193. as conful, and at the same time as He designs to gladiator, and, in order to that, to cause Erucius Clarus and Sosius Falco, the two appear on the confuls elect, to be murdered. This design he imparted to Martia the night before like a conful it was to be put in execution, telling her, that the confuls were to be murdered the and gladiator. b following night; and that he intended to march in procession, not from the palace, and with the enfigns of the imperial dignity, as was usual on the first of January, but from the school of the gladiators, armed like one of them, and attended by them alone. Marcia threw herself at his feet, and conjured him, with tears in her eyes, to reflect on the danger to which he exposed his life, by trusting it to men destitute of all honour and probity. But Commodus, without giving ear to her remonstrances, ordered Lætus, captain of the guards, and Eclestus his chief chamberlain, to get ready the apartment which he had built for himself in the house where the gladiators belonging to the public were lodged. These two officers did likewise all that lay in their power to divert him from so strange a resolution; but to no purpose: for the empec ror, instead of yielding to their intreaties, flew into a great passion; and retiring to his chamber, as if he defigned to repose a little, it being then about noon, he set down on a piece of paper the names of many illustrious senators, and other persons of distinction, whom he designed to murder, in order to inrich himself with their estates, and at the head of the fatal lift the names of Marcia, Lætus and Eclectus. Having left He dooms Marthis paper upon his bed when he went to bathe before dinner, according to the Roman Cia, Lætus and Eclectus to custom, a little child, with whom he used to amuse himself, entering his bed-chamber, death; innocently took it up to play with it; but Marcia meeting him, fnatched it out of his hand, imagining it to be fome writing of consequence. She was greatly surprised, when, upon viewing it, she found herself, Lætus and Eclestus, doomed with the rest

d to destruction. She immediately acquainted Latus and Eclestus with the danger that threatened them, who thereupon resolved to be before-hand with the tyrant . Such Who conspire is the account which Herodian gives us of this conspiracy. But Dion Cassius, who had against him. already related the death of Domitian with these very circumstances, tells us only in this place, that Lætus and Eclettus, no longer able to bear the cruelties and follies of Commodus, and terrified with his menaces, agreed with Marcia to dispatch him. Julius Capitolinus writes, that they acquainted Pertinax with their design, who did not strive to divert them from it 2. But Dion Cassius b and Herodian c assure us, that he was altogether unapprifed of their attempt, the conspirators not having time to e think of any thing but dispatching the tyrant, and securing themselves. Be that as it will, the conspirators agreed, that the safest and most expeditious way was to dispatch him with poison; which was accordingly administred to him by Marcia, as he returned very hot from bathing, after having killed fome wild beafts. The emperor, being foon after seized with a heavy slumber, retired to refresh himself with a short sleep (for he slept, as historians observe, at all hours); and Eclestus, laying hold of that opportunity, ordered the company to retire, hoping by that means to conceal the cause and manner of his death; but Commodus awaking when the company was scarce gone, was seized with a violent vomiting; and suspecting that poison had been given him, began to threaten all about him with immediate death. Hereupon f the conspirators, searing he should void the poison, and escape, sent in haste for his great favourite Narcissus, the famous wrestler, who being gained over by them with great promises, threw himself upon the emperor, and seizing him by the throat, He is murdered itrangled him 4. Thus died Commodus, the last night of the year 192. after having lived thirty-one years, and four months, and reigned twelve years, nine months, and fourteen days. He was murdered in a palace which stood on mount Calius, where he then resided, because he could not sleep, as he said, in the imperial palace . His body was privately conveyed away, and buried in the fields; but was afterwards

<sup>2</sup> Her. D. l. i. p. 486, 487.
<sup>a</sup> Jul. Cap. in Pert. p. 55.
<sup>b</sup> Dio, l. li. p. 490.
<sup>d</sup> Idem, l. i. p. 488. Dio, p. 828. Comm. vit. p. 52. b Dio, l. lxxiii. p. 830. e He-vit. p. 52. e Vit. Com. p. 51; ROD. l. ii. p. 490. Eusen. chron. p. 226.

taken up by Pertinax, who succeeded to the empire, and deposited in the monument of

Vol. VI. Nº 2.

Вь

Adrian.

His statues are pulled down, and his acts annulled.

The conspirators gave out, that he died of an apoplexy; which Eutrosius a feems to have believed. His death was no fooner known, than the fenate affembled, without waiting for the return of day, and declared him a public enemy, loaded him with curses, ordered his statues to be broke to pieces, his name to be razed out of all public infcriptions, and demanded his body, that it might be dragged through the streets, and thrown into the Tiber. When Pertinax, who had already been declared emperor, answered, that it was buried, they defired to know who had been so bold as to pay that honour to a gladiator, to a parricide, to a more cruel and bloody tyrant, than Nero or Domitian f. Tho' he was thus generally abhorred as a monster of cruelty, and an enemy to mankind, yet the emperor Severus flyled himself his brother, caused him to be ranked among the gods, appointed priests and sacrifices to b his honour, and ordered the anniversary of his birth to be observed with great solemnity 8. However, the empire was greatly indebted to him for establishing a company of merchants, and a fleet, for conveying corn from Africa to Rome, when any misfortune should befal the fleet that transported it from Egypt ". Another action we find recorded of his, truly worthy of the son of M. Aurelius: One Manilius, who had been fecretary to Avidius Cassius, and privy to his conspiracy, having made his escape, and concealed himself ever since his death, was apprehended in the beginning of the reign of Commodus, to whom he offered to discover many things of great importance: but Commodus would not fo much as hear him; nay, he burnt all his letters, without opening any one of them i. But this happened in the very beginning of his reign, c when he followed the advice of the wife counfellors whom his father had placed about him. No mention is made in history of his children; but it appears from an ancient medal, that he had fome, who must have died very young k. Of the authors who wrote in his reign, we shall give an account in our note (1).

Commo-

f Vit. Com. p. 53. Dio, p. 830. B Vit. Com. ibid. & Dio, p. 824.

Dio in excerpt. Val. p. 725. K Spart. l. vii. p. 659.

h Vit. Com. p. 52.

(I) Julius Pollux inscribed to Commodus, when he had only the title of Cafar, his onomasticon, which is still extant, and consists of ten books. It is a collection of fynonymous words used by the best Greek writers to express one and the same thing. He was one of the preceptors of Commodus, who being chiefly taken with his fine and harmonious voice, honoured him with the professorship of eloquence lately founded in the city of Athens (41). He was, according to Philostratus, who ranks him among the fophists, well acquainted with the Greek tongue, and a good judge of the writings of others, no great writer himself, his style being quite flat and lifeless. He was a native of Naucratis, once a famous city of Egypt, on one of the arms of the Nile, to which it gave its name (42). He died in the fifty-eighth year of his age (43). In the library of the duke of Bavaria is lodged a manuscript chronicle done by one Julius Pollux, and extending from the creation to the reign of the emperor Valens; which plainly shews, that it is not the work of this Julius Pollux, but of another, who flourished near two hundred years after his time (44). Phrynicus was contemporary with Pollux, and likewise inscribed to Commodus, when he was only Cafar, a work, of which Photius had read thirty-five or thirty-fix books. It was a collection of words, phrases, and some sentences extracted out of the best Greek writers, and alphabetically digested. But these thirty-six books might have been reduced, according to Photius, to fix or feven, by retrenching the author's uscless di-gressions and repetitions. In some of these books Phrynicus addressed himself to Commodus; in others to Basilides a sophist of Miletus, and to his other friends (45). A collection of Attie words, done by Phrynicus, has reached us, with a letter to one Cornelianus prefixed to it, wherein he mentions another work compiled by him at the request of Cornelianus, which contained a collection of many Greek words commonly used, but not quite pure and Attic. He owns, that some of them are to be found in the ancients; but maintains, that they were therein faulty, and ought not to be imitated (46). We find one Attidius Cornelianus governor of Syria in the beginning of the reign of M. Aurelius; and to him, in all like shood, the above-mentioned letter is a idressed (47). Thrynicus is not mentioned by Suidas. Philofiratus speaks of one Aristenetus of Byzantium, who flourished under Commodus, and ranks him amongst the most eloquent men of his time (48). As for Ariflenetus, the author of some letters that are still extant, it is manifest, that he wrote after the foundation of New Rome; that is, either under Confiantine, or after his time. Both he and Apollinaris Sidonius fpeak of a celebrated mimic, by name Caramailus; whence some writers conjecture, that these two authors lived at the fame time; that is, about the middle of the fifth century (49). The author of the letters was, as is evident, a pagin, tho' in his time paganifm was almost utterly abolished, his work being a conjused heap of follies and abjurdities, altogether unworthy of one who had the least tin-cture of christianity (50). Those who have been at the trouble of illustrating these letters with comments, diftinguish the author of them from Ariflenesus quoted by Stephanus the geographer (51), and from another of the same name, who was consul with Honorius in the year 404, and trankly own, that they know not who he was. They even feem inclined to think it a mere rhapfody, published under the name of Ariftenetus, which was prefixed to the first letter. The whole work scems to be a collection

(41) Philoft. soph. xxxviii. p. 590. (42) Idem. p. 488. (43) Suid. p. 559. (44) Voss. hist. Grac. l. iv. c. 17. (45) I'hot. c. 158. (46) Vide I'etr. Hallicum de vit. S. A'bericii, p. 114. Duacii, ann. 1636. (47) M. Aur. vit. p. 25. (48) Philost. soph. xxxvii. p. 587. (49) Voss. rhet. p. 115. (50) Vide Aristsnet. l. i. epist. 26. Paris. ann. 1686. (51) Steph. p. 203.

Commodus being dead, and his body privately conveyed away, Latus and Eclestus Latus and Ecrepaired without delay to the house of Helvidius Pertinax, whom they judged the lectus effer the most deserving person in the senate, and the most worthy of the empire. As the tinx, death of the emperor was not yet publicly known, Pertinax, roused out of his sleep, (for it was about mid-night) by their entering his house, did not doubt but they had been fent by Commodus to murder him. However, he ordered his domestics to let them into his room; and upon their appearing there, without rifing from his bed, or betraying the least concern, he told them, That as Pompeianus and he were the only friends of M. Aurelius left alive, he had long expected every day to fall a facrifice to the cruelty of the tyrant, and with great firmness bid them strike, and put their orders in execution. Lætus, admiring his constancy and intrepidity, told him, that b the tyrant was dead, and that they were come to offer the empire to him, as the perfon in the fenate the most worthy of it. Pertinax, suspecting some treachery, even after they had acquainted him with all the circumstances of the death of the tyrant, fent fome of his friends to the place where his body lay; and upon their return, no room being left for any further doubt, he yielded to their intreaties, accepted the empire, and went to the camp of the prætorian guards with Lætus their captain, caufing in the mean time a report to be spread in the city, that the emperor was dead of an apoplexy, and that Pertinax reigned in his room. The soldiers were greatly surprised to see him appear in the camp at that time of night; but Latus, assembling e them, told them, that the emperor being dead of an apoplexy, he brought them a new prince, the most deserving person in the senate, who, he was sure, would be received with great joy, and acknowledged by all the armies of the empire, fince he had every-where given fignal proofs of his courage, prudence and other princely vir-Pertinax himself spoke after Latus, and in his speech promised to each soldier three thousand drachma's, which would have gained them over to his interest, had he not added very unfeafonably, that he hoped by their means to reform feveral abuses; for they concluded from thence, that he designed to restore the ancient discipline, and deprive them of many privileges, which had been granted them by Commodus. This occasioned an universal discontent, which however they diffembled for d the present; and a small number having at first saluted him with the title of emperor, Who is acknowthe rest followed their example, took the oath of allegiance to him, and, after the ledged by the usual facrifices, accompanied him, crowned with laurel, to the senate; where he was guards, and received with the greatest demonstrations of joy imaginable his the new contrast of the greatest demonstrations of joy imaginable his the new contrast of the greatest demonstrations of joy imaginable his the new contrast of the greatest demonstrations of joy imaginable his the new contrast of the greatest demonstrations of joy imaginable his the new contrast of the greatest demonstrations of joy imaginable his the new contrast of the greatest demonstrations of joy imaginable his the new contrast of the greatest demonstrations of joy imaginable his the new contrast of the greatest demonstrations of joy imaginable his the greatest demonstration of the greatest demonstrations of joy imaginable his the greatest demonstration of the greatest demonstration received with the greatest demonstrations of joy imaginable by the new consuls Quin-by the senate. tus Sosius Falco and Caius Julius Erucius, and by all the magistrates and other senators, who had affembled upon the first news of the death of the tyrant. Among the rest came Pompeianus, who, in congratulating him upon his new dignity, could not help bewailing at the fame time the unhappy end of his brother-in-law Commodus; which Pertinax was fo far from refenting, that he pressed him to accept the empire, and would have willingly yielded it to him, fays Capitolinus, could Pompeianus have e been prevailed upon to accept it. When the fenators had taken their places, Pertinax, before they had conferred upon him the title of Augustus, earnestly intreated them not to lay so heavy a burden upon him in his old age, but to pitch upon some other more able to discharge such an important trust, and better qualified by his nobility and birth for so high a station. He was not satisfied with begging them in general to chuse another, but particularly named Acilius Glabrio, who had been twice conful, and pretended to derive his pedigree from Anchijes the father of Æneas, took him by the hand, and earnestly intreated him to place himself upon the imperial throne; but collection of several passages copied out of Plato, Lucian, and others, and jumbled together, if we may be allowed the expression. Athenaus, whose work, intituled, Dipnosophijia, has reached our times, lived under Commodus; but did not begin to write, as we may well judge from the liberty with which he speaks of him, till after his death (52). But he must have been then very old; for he had known Panera-tes, a famous poet in the reign of Adrian, fince Calaubon pretends, that Atheneus himself speaks in that place, and not Callixenes, whom he had quoted before (53). Suidas, who supposes him to have flourished under M. Aurelius, styles him a grammarian, and teils us, that he was a native of Naucratis in Egypt (54). We have but an abridgment of his Dipnolophista, made, according to Casaubon, at Constantinople five or fix hundred years tince. This writer is highly esteemed, and not undeservedly, by fuch as are fond of the Grecian antiquities. He pub lished other works; but none of them have reached our times (55).

<sup>1</sup> Herop. l. iv. p. 482-493. Dio, l. lxxiii. p. 830. Vit. Pert. p. 55.

(52) Athen. l. xii. Voff. hift. Grac. l. ii. c. 15. (55) Voff. bift. Grac. L. ii. c. 15.

(53) Athen. l. xv. p. 677. (54) Suid. p. 111.

Glabrio,

Is bonoured

with all the dignity.

titles peculiar

Glabrio, and with him all the rest, declaring, that they would acknowledge no other a prince but Pertinax, he was in the end obliged to yield m. Capitolinus, tho' no-ways He accepts the favourable to Pertinax, cannot however help owning, that he was raised to the emempire against pire against his will, and that he had ever shewn an utter aversion to the sovereignty, and to all the badeges of the fovereign power; in confirmation of which, he alledges a letter written by Pertinax himself, and recorded by Marius Maximus n. After the fenate had faluted him with the title of Augustus, he returned them thanks in an oration fuited to the occasion, which was received with loud acclamations both of the fenate and people, who were come in crouds to pay their homage to the new prince, whom they highly esteemed and revered. The consuls pronounced, according to custom, his panegyric: after which Falco, who was one of them, upon the b emperor's commending Latus, captain of the guards, and owning himself indebted to him for the empire, is faid by Capitolinus to have rebuked the new prince with great freedom for countenancing one who had been the chief minister of the crimes of Commodus. Pertinax heard him without the least emotion, and only told him, when he had done speaking, that he was young, and had not yet learnt to obey; that Latus had put the orders of Commodus in execution against his own inclination, and shewn, as soon as he was at liberty to act as he pleased, what were his private fentiments o. Pertinax received, with the title of Augustus, all the other titles peculiar to the imperial dignity, that of the father of his country not excepted, which is to the imperial faid to have never before been given to any prince on the first day of his reign P. c To the rest he desired that the title of the prince of the senate might be added, which had been laid aside ever since the times of the republic 4. At the same time the fenate decreed the title of Augusta to his wife Flavia Titiana, and that of Casar to his fon. But he could not by any means be prevailed upon to accept that honour for his wife, whose conduct he disliked; and as to his son, he told the senate, that he should enjoy the title they had decreed him, when he deserved it. He would not even suffer his son, who was yet very young, to live with him in the palace; but fent him and his fifter to the house of Flavius Sulpicianus, their grandfather by the mother, to be brought up there far from the gaieties and licentiousness of the court. From the fenate, the emperor went to offer the usual facrifices in the capitol, visited d the other temples, and then, amidst the loud acclamations of the people, repaired to the palace, where he gave a great entertainment, as it was the first day of the new year, to all the magistrates, and the chief men of the senate, pursuant to an ancient custom, which had been neglected by Commodus. Dion Cassius saw that day, for the first time, Pompeianus in the senate; for during the last years of Commodus's reign, he had lived constantly in the country, alledging his old age, and the weakness of his eyes, for not affilling at the deliberations of the senate. But these complaints, says Dion, ceased when Pertinax was raised to the empire, and returned as foon as he died's.

education of Pertinax.

Thus Pertinax began his reign, to the great satisfaction of Rome, and of all the e provinces of the empire, where he was proclaimed emperor with extraordinary demonstrations of joy, no one doubting but he would soon restore the state to its former The birth and lustre, and redress the abuses and disorders introduced by Commodus. He was born on the first of August of the year 126, the tenth of Adrian's reign, in a little village called Villa Martis, at a small distance from Alba Pompeia, now Alba, in the duchy of Montserrat. He is commonly styled by historians, and in most inscriptions, Publius Helvius Pertinax. His father, by name Helvius Successus, had either been a slave himself, or was the son of an enfranchised slave, and followed the mean profession of drying wood, and making charcoal. We are told, that he gave the name of Pertinax to his fon on account of his obstinately adhering for some time to the same f calling, which however he was afterwards perfuaded to abandon, and to keep a grammar-school in Rome, his father having taken care to have him instructed, when very young, in the Greek and Latin languages. But that profession not answering his expectation, he betook himself to a military life, and served first in Syria, in the reign of Antoninus Pius, as a common foldier; but was foon raifed to the rank of a centurion, by the interest of Lollius Avitus, or rather Lollius Gentianus, his father's o Idem, p. 55.

P Idem idiu.
Dio in excerpt, Val. p. 729. M Herod. Dio, ibid.
 N Vita Pert. p. 59.
 I lxxii. p. 832.
 Herod. l. ii. p. 494.
 Vit. Pert. p. 55.
 Dio, l. lxxiii. p. 831.
 Vit. Pert. p. 52.
 Vict. epit.

a patron. Having in that post distinguished himself under Lucius Verus, M. Aurelius's His rife and collegue in the empire, during the Parthian war, he was rewarded with the com- preferments. mand of a cohort in Syria, and afterwards employed in Britain, or, as fome read, Bithynia, Masia, Italy, and Germany, in which last place he commanded the Roman fleet. From Germany he was sent into Dacia, and there, upon some talse information, deprived of his employment, whatever it was, by M. Aurelius, notwithstanding the esteem he had for him. Capitolinus writes, that he was governor of Dacia, and charged with aspiring at the empire. Be that as it will, M. Aurelius, being soon after convinced of his innocence, created him fenator, honoured him with the enfigns of prætor, and gave him the command of the first legion, which he led against the b Germans, who had made themselves masters of Rhatia and Noricum. These countries he recovered in one campaign, for which eminent fervice M. Aurelius made him conful. He was afterwards fent into Syria against Avidius Cassius; and upon his death recalled from thence to guard the banks of the Danube, and command the army in Illyricum. Having acquitted himself in that office to the general satisfaction both of the Romans and barbarians, he was afterwards preferred to the government of the two Masia's, then to that of Dacia, and lastly to the government of Syria, which he held to the reign of Commodus, when he returned to Rome; but did not continue long there, being ordered by Perennis, who then governed with an absolute fway, and suspected all men of merit, to quit the city, and retire to Liguria, his c native country, where he lived, as it were, in exile, three whole years; during which he embellished the place where he was born with a great number of fine buildings; but would not fuffer his father's cottage, or rather shop, which stood in the midst of them, to be pulled down, or any-ways altered. After the downfal of Perennis, he was by Commodus fent into Britain, to restore the ancient discipline among the troops there, that were ready to revolt; which he compassed, not without exposing himself to great dangers. He was recalled from thence at his own request, and upon his return charged with the care of supplying the city with provisions; then appointed proconful of Africa; and lastly governor of Rome, which employment he held when Commodus was killed ". The conspirators judged him, as we have related above, of d all the great men in Rome, the most worthy of the empire. And truly he was, according to Herodian, in every respect well qualified for so important a trust, being a man of great wisdom, extraordinary valour, and a blameless character w. Dion His character. Cassius cries him up on account of his mild temper, his goodness, and his application to business; and adds, that he was grave without being sullen, mild without indolence, prudent without craft, exact without affectation, frugal without avarice, and great without pride or arrogance x. Aurelius Victor styles him a person thoroughly acquainted with mankind, and one who admired and imitated the manners of the ancient Romans Y. The other Victor says, that he was an enemy to all pomp, and outward appearance; that he received persons of every rank and condition with e great affability, and treated them as his equals. Julius Capitolinus is the only writer who gives him but an indifferent character, and charges him with avarice, and want of fincerity; but that writer lived a hundred years after Pertinax, whereas both Dion Cassius and Herodian were personally acquainted with him. The emperor Julian charges him only with having been privy to the conspiracy 2; but even from that charge he is cleared by the above-mentioned writers.

As he found the exchequer quite drained, he ordered all the filver statues of Com- His conduct. modus, which had been pulled down by a decree of the senate, to be melted, and and excellent turned into money; and fold by auction all his concubines and catamites, his arms, administration. his horses, his gold and silver plate, and all his rich moveables; among which parf ticular mention is made of chariots fo contrived as to shew the hour, and measure the way 2. By this means he raised money wherewithal to pay the prætorian guards what he had promifed them, to discharge several debts contracted by Commodus, and to give a bounty to the people. At the same time he restored to the lawful owners whatever had been unjustly taken from them by Commodus, recalled such as had been banished for the pretended crime of treason, put them in possession of their estates, and punished with the utmost severity those who had been any-ways accessory to their misfortunes. He publicly declared, that he would accept of no legacies or inherit-

* Vit. Pert. p. 54, 55. HEROD. l. ii. p. 493. Dio, l. lxxiii. p. 183. Vict. epit. W HEROD. ibid. Dio, p. 832. & in excerpt. Val. p. 743.

* Vie. Pert. p. 54, 55. HEROD. l. ii. p. 493. Dio, l. lxxiii. p. 183. Vict. epit. W HEROD. ibid. Julian. C. 55. p. 14. W HEROD. Ibid. Vit. Pert. p. 56. Vo 4. VI. Nº 2. Сc ances fied with him.

They revolt, raife Falco to she empire.

to Rome, and enter the palace.

of Pertinax.

His death.

ances from fuch as had children or lawful heirs of their own, faying, I had rather a be poor, than wallow in riches acquired by dishonourable methods. He abolished all the taxes laid by Commodus on the rivers, ports, and high-ways; and would not fuffer his name to be fet up, according to custom, in such places as belonged to the emperors, faying, that they did not belong to him, but to the public b. Thus by the mildness of his government, by his equity and moderation, he gained the affections both of the senate and people; but by attempting to restrain the licentiousness of The pretorian the prætorian guards, he disobliged both them and their commander Lætus, who at first had been so zealous in his cause. The private men, not doubting but he would restore the ancient discipline among them, had, three days after his accession to the empire, attempted to set up another, viz. Triarius Maternus Lascivius, a senator of b an illustrious family; but he, escaping from them while they were carrying him to the camp, fled to Pertinax, affured him of his loyalty, and then withdrew from Rome. This obliged the emperor to confirm to them all the privileges which had been granted them by Commodus. However, he kept them to their duty, which they, inured to the licentiousness of the preceding reign, not being able to brook, attempted and attempt to to raise Falco, the consul, to the empire. Pertinax, who was then at Oftia giving the necessary orders for supplying the city with provisions, returned in great haste to the palace; and repairing from thence to the fenate, complained there of Falco, whom the fenators were for condemning immediately as a traitor, and a public enemy. But Pertinax, rifing up, cried out, that in his reign no fenator, however guilty, c should be put to death; and publicly declared, that he forgave him. Falco, being thus difmissed, retired to his estate, where he lived in safety. Some writers pretend, that he was utterly unacquainted with the defign of the prætorian guards, who had agreed to make him emperor, without imparting their resolution to him. However that be, the foldiers, highly exasperated against Pertinax, who laboured to revive the ancient discipline, and stirred up underhand by Lætus, who did not think his former services sufficiently rewarded, began openly to mutiny, and declare, that they would no longer obey the orders of Pertinax, nor acknowledge him for emperor. To exasperate them still more, Lætus caused several of them to be publicly executed as privy to the late conspiracy, pretending, that he obeyed therein the orders of d Pertinax, tho' the prince was quite unapprifed of these proceedings. By this means Three hundred the mutiny increasing daily, on the twenty-eighth of March a body of about three of them march hundred of the mutineers, more bold than the rest, leaving the camp, and passing through the streets of Rome with their drawn swords, went strait to the palace, which they entered without opposition, the emperor's freed-men and officers either betaking themselves to flight through fear, or treacherously opening all the gates to them. Pertinax, in the mean time, knew nothing of what passed, till his wife, in a great fright, brought him word, that the prætorian guard had revolted, and were already in the palace. Hereupon the emperor dispatched Sulpicianus, his father-in-law, whom he had appointed governor of Rome, to appeale the tumult in the camp, and ordered e Latus to stop those who had entered the palace. But Latus, covering his face, that he might not be known, instead of obeying the emperor's orders, retired to his own house. As the mutineers still advanced, some of the emperor's friends, who had remained with him, advised him to retire, and conceal himself, till the people, by whom he was greatly beloved, could come to his affistance. But Pertinax rejected their advice, faying, that to fave his life by flight was a thing altogether unworthy The intrepidity of an emperor. He therefore resolved to go forth, and meet them in person, believing that, awed by his presence, they would return to a sense of their duty. Accordingly he appeared unexpectedly before them, and asked them, without betraying the least fear or concern, whether they, whose duty it was to defend the emperor's per- f fon, were come with an intent to betray and murder him? At the fame time he represented to them the heinousness of their crime, the ignominy which it would cast upon their memories, and the fatal consequences of so black a treason, with fuch spirit and energy, that many of them, moved by his words, began to sheath their swords, and retire. But a Tungrian, by name Tausius, darting his javelin at the emperor's breast, and crying out, The foldiers fend you this, the rest fell on with great fury, and dispatched him with many wounds. The emperor made no resistance; but covering his head with his robe, and calling upon Jupiter the avenger,

2 received their blows. Eclectus alone remained with him, and endeavoured to defend him; but after having killed two of the foldiers, was himself run through, and lett dead by his mafter, for whose fafety he had facrificed his life. The soldiers cut off his head, and carried it upon the point of a spear, as it were in triumph, to the camp, whither they retired with great precipitation, before the people could affemble, who, they knew, would not fail to revenge the death of a prince whom they fo tenderly loved. And truly it was no fooner known, that Pertinax had been murdered, than the enraged populace flocked together from all quarters of the city; and uttering dreadful menaces against the authors of his death, ran up and down the streets in quest of them. The senators were no less concerned for his death, than the people; He is univerb the more, because they were now convinced, that the soldiers would suffer none to saily lamented. reign but tyrants. However, as they had more to lose than the common people, they did not offer to revenge his death, but either shut themselves up in their own houses, or in those of the soldiers of their acquaintance, thinking themselves there most safe. Such was the unfortunate and much-lamented end of Publius Helvius Pertinax, after he had lived fixty-fix years, feven months, and twenty-fix or twenty-eight days; and reigned, according to Dion Cassius, eighty-seven days, that is, from the first of January to the twenty-eighth of March d. His body, together with his head, was interred with great pomp by Didius Julianus, his successor, in the butying-place of his wife's family. The emperor Septimius Severus, with the title of e emperor, took the name of Pertinax, which he knew would, above any thing elfe, recommend him to the army in Illyricum, and to the Roman people. He punished with great severity all those who had been accessory to his death, disbanded the prætorian guards, honoured his memory with a most magnificent funeral, at which was Honours paid carried the effigies of the deceased prince, pronounced himself his panegyric, and him after his caused him to be ranked in the number of the gods, appointing the son chief priest death.

restored the empire to its former lustre, had he reigned longer i. Pertinax had sent, as we have related above, Flavius Sulficianus, his father-in-law, to appeale the tumult in the camp of the prætorian guards; but in the mean time the news of his death reaching the camp, and the three hundred foldiers arriving foon after with his head fluck on a fpear, Sulpicianus was not ashamed to apply to the murderers of his fon-in-law for the empire, and to offer them money for it. But they resolved to make the most of it, caused it to be proclaimed on the ram- The empire parts of the camp, that the empire was exposed to sale, and the best bidder should exposed to sale, have it. When news of this scandalous proclamation was first brought to Rome, to his father. The day of his accession to the empire was yearly celebrated with the circensian games; and his birth-day, for many years after, with other sports c. He performed great things, fays Herodian, during his short reign, and would have

Didius Julianus, the wealthiest man in the city, was entertaining some of his friends at a banquet, who, in the midst of their mirth and jollity, advised him, as he had e more ready money than any man in Rome, not to lose the opportunity of making so valuable a purchase. Julianus, ravished with the dazzling prospect of rule and empire, hearkened to their advice, rose from table, and hastened to the camp; where he represented to the foldiers, whom Sulpicianus was haranguing in his own behalf, that his competitor would not fail one day to revenge the death of his fon-in-law; and gave them it under his hand, that he would reftore all things to the condition they were in under Commodus. This pleased the licentious and diffolute soldiery, who had committed in that prince's reign all forts of disorders with impunity. However they would hear what they both offered, and suffered them to bid upon one another, Sulpicianus in the camp, and Julianus at the gate; till the latter, rising at once from five thousand drachma's a man to six thousand two hundred and sifty, to be immediately paid, filenced the other, was admitted into the camp, and proclaimed And purchased emperor, on condition, that he should forgive his competitor, and never take the by Didius Juli-

least notice of his aspiring at the empires. Spartian relates his accession to the empire in a different manner: according to him, the senate assembled upon the news of the emperor's death; but Julianus coming too late, and finding the doors shut, was accosted by two tribunes, P. Florianus and Vectius Aper, who encouraged him to seize on the empire. Julianus, believing that Sulpicianus had been proclaimed emperor e Dio, p. 834, 835. Herod. l. ii. p. 498. Vit. Pert. p. 58. p. 840—842. Vict. epit. Vit. Pert. p. 59. Herod. p. 495. Herod p. 499.

d Dio, l. lxxiii. p. 834. с 1210, f Herod. ibid.

His extraction and preferments.

by the prætorian guards, answered, that the empire was already disposed of; but a they nevertheless carried him to the camp against his will, where, upon his warning them not to chuse one who would undoubtedly revenge the death of Pertinax, and his promifing to respect the memory of Commodus, he was proclaimed Augustus upon the above-mentioned condition 8. M. Didius Severus Julianus, thus raised to the empire, was descended of an illustrious family, come originally from Milan, in which city his grandfather was born. The emperor was the fon of Petronius Didius Severus, and Æmilia Clara, the grand-daughter of the celebrated civilian Salvius Julianus, who flourished under Adrian, and compiled the perpetual edist. He was born on the twenty-ninth or thirtieth of January of the year 133, the fixteenth of Adrian's reign, and brought up by Domitia Lucilla, the mother of M. Aurelius. That prince, who b had a particular affection for him, created him first quæstor, then ædile, afterwards prætor; and when the time of his prætorship expired, gave him the command of the twenty-second legion, quartered at that time in Germany. Not long after, he appointed him governor of Belgic Gaul, where, with the few forces he had under his command, he drove back the Chauci, who had made an irruption into the Roman territories; for which fervice he was rewarded with the confulship. After he had discharged that office, he was sent into Illyricum, which country he defended with great valour against the neighbouring barbarians, and was on that account preferred to the government of Lower Germany; whence he was recalled to Rome, and charged with the care of supplying the city with provisions. He narrowly escaped being c put to death in the reign of Commodus, as privy to the pretended conspiracy of Salvius Julianus, his uncle by the mother, and was for some time confined to the city of Milan. But Commodus, ashamed of having caused so many other senators to be inhumanly massacred, not only discharged Julianus, but preferred him to the government of Bitbynia, and afterwards to the confulship, in which he had Pertinax for his collegue, whom he succeeded in the proconsulship of Africa. Hence Pertinax used to call him his collegue and his successor, which was afterwards interpreted as a presage of his being succeeded by Julianus in the empire i.

ALL authors agree, that Didius Julianus was possessed of immense wealth; but His character. disagree as to his character. Dion Cassius, who had been named by Pertinax to the d prætorship, charges him with avarice and gluttony, and paints him as one who was wholly intent upon amassing riches by any means, however shameful and unjust, and at the same time sparing no expence to please and satisfy his palate. He spoke without judgment, fays that writer, and uttered fuch things in public as made him be pitied by all men of fense. He was underhand a great encourager of disturbances and troubles in the state, and is supposed to have privately stirred up the soldiers against Pertinax, tho' his nephew had married that prince's daughter. Dion Cassius adds, that he himself in pleading had often reproached him in public with his crying injustices k. Herodian writes, that he was generally despised on account of his disorderly life, and that he thought of nothing but his pleasures and diversions. Spartian, e on the other hand, tells us, that in all his governments and employments under M. Aurelius, he acquitted himself with great integrity; from which however he was said to have swerved in the reign of Commodus. He adds, that he was so covetous, as not to allow himself sometimes any other food but roots and greens; which is pointblank contrary to what we read in Dion Cassius and Herodian, both which writers lived at that time in Rome. Spartian however owns, that Julianus was charged with eating and drinking to excess, with gaming, and using such weapons as were peculiar to the gladiators, tho' in his youth he had never been addicted to any of these vices m. He shewed himself, according to that writer, kind, assable, and obliging to all men; and was fo far from being elevated with his new dignity, that, on the f contrary, he seemed rather to debase himself too much. As soon as he was declared emperor, he appointed, at the request of the prætorian guards, Flavius Genialis and Tullius Crispinus their commanders. At the same time he accepted the name of Comname of Com- modus, which they begged him to take upon him; and this name is still to be seen on some of his medals ". After the usual ceremonies, the prætorian guards accompanied him in battle-array to the fenate. The people did not offer to oppose their march; but no acclamations were heard; some, who were at a distance, even uttered

He takes the modus.

k Dio, l. lxxiii. p. 835. SPART. in Jul. p. 60. D SPART, ibid. 1 Idem, vit. Jul. p. 61. m Julian. vit. p. 63. 1 HEROD. L ii. p. 498. n BIRAG. p. 262, a invectives against him. As for the senators, those among them who were the most grieved to ice him emperor, were the most forward in congratulating him with feigned joy on his accession to the empire. Among these was, as he himself owns, Dion Cassius the historian. Julianus made a speech in the senate, says Dion, who was present, worthy of himself, wherein he desired them to confirm what the soldiers had done, as if he would hold the empire of them; but told them at the same time, that he was the fittest person they could chuse. The senate immedately passed a He is acknowdecree declaring him emperor, and his family patrician, and investing him with the ledged by the tribunitial and proconsular powers. At the same time his wife Manlia Scantilla, and senate. his daughter Didia Clara, were honoured with the title of Augusta. From the senate b he repaired to the palace, where he found the body of Pertinax, which he caused to be honourably interred, and passed the night in great agonies, resecting on the sate of Pertinax, which he apprehended might in the end be his own P. Thus Capitolinus; but Dion Cassius, who was an eye-witness of what passed at Rome under Julianus, tells us, that the new prince, entering the palace, and despising the frugal supper which had been prepared for Pertinax, (for that prince was murdered, and he declared emperor, on the same day) ordered a magnificent feast to be got ready, and passed the night in mirth and jollity, leaving the body of the deceased prince in the place where he had been murdered 1. The next morning, the senate and the Roman He receives knights coming to wait upon him, he received them in a most obliging manner, calling them in a very c them, says Capitolinus, according to their age, his father, his brother, or his son. obliging man-He went afterwards to the senate, and returned them thanks for having admitted him to administer, in conjunction with them, the sovereign power, and for the honours they had conferred on his wife and daughter. On this occasion he received, according to Capitolinus, the title of the father of his country, which however does not appear on any of his medals. From the fenate he went to the capitol to offer there the usual facrifices, the fenators, who attended him, striving to shew great joy in the height of their grief. But the people, strangers to all dissimulation, openly He is hated, loaded him with curses and reproaches, hoping by that means to oblige him to refign and openly the power, which he had purchased of the soldiery in so shameful a manner. They cursed, by the d even discharged showers of stones at him, and wished aloud, as he was facrificing in the capitol, that he might never obtain any favour of the gods. The emperor endeavoured to appeale them with great promises; but they answered boldly, that they scorned to receive any thing from such an usurper and parricide: insomuch that, to differfe them, (for they flopt up the way) he was obliged to order the foldiers to fall upon those who stood nearest, which they did accordingly, and killed or wounded great numbers of them. This exasperated the people to such a degree, that they all took arms; and in the circus, where the emperor affisted at the public games, renewed their curses and imprecations both against him and the prætorian guards, imploring aloud the affistance of the other armies and generals, namely, of Pescennius Niger, who at that time commanded a powerful army in Syria. All this Julianus bore with great patience, says Spartian; and, during his short reign, gave many instances of an extraordinary sweet temper. He appointed Repentinus, His governhis fon-in-law, captain of the prætorian guards, in the room of Sulpicianus, father-ment. in-law to the deceased emperor; and, to gratify the soldiery, re-established many in the different provinces of the empire, the most famed were Pescennius Niger in Syria, Septimius Severus in Illyricum, and Clodius Albinus in Britain. Clodius Albinus Clodius Albiwas a native of Adrumentum in Africa, but descended from the Postbumian and Ceio-nus, his exf nian families, two of the most illustrious in Rome. His father Ceionius Posthumus traction and gave him the name of Albinus, because at his birth he appeared whiter than new-born children usually are, the Latin word albus importing white. He was brought up in Africa, where he studied the Greek and Latin languages, in which he was well versed. The ancients cry up his knowledge and learning, and mention with great commendations a treatise which he composed on agriculture. But his martial genius did not allow him to pursue the peaceable prosession of letters. When he was yet very young, he was often heard to repeat, among the children of his age at school, that verse of Virgil, _ Arma amens capio, nec fat rationis in armis; — especially the first part of it,

Among the many great captains, who commanded at this time the Roman armies things, which had been appointed by Commodus, and abolished by Pertinax.

· Dio ibid. P Vit. Pert. p. 61. 9 Dio, l. lxxiii. p. 836. r Vit. Pert. p. 61.

Arma amens capio, that is, I am for following the profession of arms, right or wrong; a I am for a military life at all events. He therefore entered into the service very early, and, by the interest of Lollius Serenus, Babius Matianus, and Ceionius Postbumianus, men of rank, and nearly related to him, was first raised to the command of a troop of Illyrian horse, and soon after to that of the first and sourth legions. He commanded the army in Bithynia in the year 175, the fifteenth of the reign of M. Aurelius, and restrained them from joining, as they designed, Avidius Cassius, for which fervice he was rewarded with the confulfhip. In the reign of Commodus he was appointed governor of Gaul, where he gained great advantages over the Fristans, and other neighbouring nations. From Gaul he was translated into Britain, which government he held at this time'. The emperor Commodus, suspecting that Septimius b Severus, governor of Illyricum, and Nonius Murcus, who commanded an army in some other province, defigned to revolt, in order to engage Albinus in his cause, wrote a letter to him, if Capitolinus is to be credited, giving him leave to assume, if he saw occasion, the title of Casar, and all the badges of that dignity; which he prudently declined, fearing to be involved in the ruin of that tyrant, which he apprehended to be at hand (K). The same writer adds, that some time after, a salse report of the death of Commodus being spread in Britain, Albinus, giving credit to it, encouraged his foldiers to abolish monarchy, and re-establish the ancient republican government; which gained him the affections of the fenate, but provoked Commodus to such a degree, that he immediately sent Junius Severus to succeed him in the go- c vernment of Britain; but he did not arrive there before the death of Commodus was publicly known in that province. M. Aurelius had a particular value for him, and thought him, as appears from one of his letters to the captains of the guards quoted by Capitolinus (L) ", well qualified, on account of his feverity and gravity, for the His character. command of an army. But his severity seems to have bordered upon cruelty; for he is faid never to have pardoned the least fault, but to have crucified even the centurions, when he found them any-ways remiss in their duty. He was unjust to his domestics, insupportable to his wife, and to all surly and morose. He was very proper in his dress, but quite otherwise in his repasts, minding nothing but plenty; for he had an extraordinary appetite, and is faid by Capitolinus to have often eat at d a breakfast five hundred figs, a hundred peaches, ten melons, twenty bunches of grapes, a hundred beccafico's, and four hundred oifters w. Sometimes he abstained altogether from wine, and fometimes drank to excess even in the time of war. He was far from being chafte, but abhorred and punished with the utmost severity all forts of unnatural lust. As he was, notwithstanding his many vices, a man of great courage and skill in military affairs, he was commonly called a fecond Catiline. The

Vit. Alb. p. 79-84.

Idem ibid. p. 79.

* Idem, p. 83.

w Idem, p. 83.

(K) This letter was conceived in the following terms: Besides the other letters, which I have written to you concerning your fuccessor, and the affairs of the public, this, you fee, is a familiar letter, written with my own hand; in which I give you leave, whenever you shall see occasion, to take upon you at the head of the army the name and quality of Cafar. For I hear, that Septimius Severus and Nonius Murcus speak ill of me to the army, in order to estrange from me the minds of the soldiery, and pave themselves a way to the throne. I give you leave, when you think fit, to assume the name of Cafar, and to present the soldiers with a donative of three pieces of gold a man. I send you letters for my receivers, fealed with the head of an Amazon, which receivers, sealed with the head of an Amazon, which you will deliver to them, when you have occasion for the money; otherwise they will not supply you with it out of the treasury. That you may not be without the badges of the dignity ro which I raise you, I give you leave to wear a scarlet robe even in my presence: the purple you shall have the first time I see you, but not inriched with gold, which my great grandfather Elius Verus never wore, tho' adopted by Adrian (56).

(L) M. Aurelius wrote the following letter con-

(L) M. Aurelius wrote the following letter concerning him to the captains of the guards: I have entrusted Albinus, of the family of the Ceionii, with the command of two cohorts. He is, 'tis true, an African, but free from the vices of that country. He is the fon-in-law of Plantillas, and, besides, a man of great experience, of a grave and composed behaviour, and capable of maintaining the necessary discipline in a camp: at least, I am sure we need not apprehend any thing from him. I have doubled his falary, and defire you to encourage him, affuring him, that his services shall not remain unrewarded (57). The same prince wrote another letter concerning him foon after the rebellion of Avidius Caffins, in which he expresses himself thus: The fidelity of Albinus deserves the highest encomiums; for when the forces in Bithynia were ready to revolt, and join Cassius, he spared no pains to maintain them in their duty, and deseat their evil designs. I therefore think him worthy of the confulfhip, and accordingly design to substitute him in the room of Cassius Papirius, who is dangeroully ill, and, as I am informed, past recovery. But of this take no notice till he is dead, lest it should come to the ears either of Papirius himfelf, or his friends, which would give me great concern (58).

f emperor f.

a harangue he made to his troops in Britain against monarchy gained him the affections of the senate to such a degree, that no prince, says his historian, was ever loved by them so much as he x.

Caius Pescennius Niger Justus, as he is styled on some medals v, was descended Pescennius of an equestrian family, and born at Aquinum. He had but a small estate, and little Niger, his exof an equeltrian family, and born at Aquinum. Fie had out a little traction, pre-learning; but nevertheless raised himself from the degree of a centurion to the first ferments and military employments in the empire. He had some command in Gaul, where he character. contracted a great friendship with Septimius Severus, at that time governor of the country of Lions, who recommended him to the emperor Commodus as an excellent soldier, and experienced commander. He was afterwards made conful, at the request b of the troops under his command 2. Herodian calls him a gallant foldier, an excellent officer, an experienced general, an illustrious conful, and an unfortunate empe-For 2. He kept the foldiers to their duty, and would not suffer them to exact any thing from the people, nor the officers from the foldiers, upon any account whatsoever. He caused two tribunes to be stoned for having deducted a very inconsiderable fum from the pay of the men under their command, and condemned ten foldiers to be beheaded for stealing a fowl; but the whole army interceding in their behalf, he thought it adviseable to spare their lives, and only oblige them to pay to the countryman the price of ten fowls. He would not allow his foldiers, while they were in the field, to drink wine, nor to use plate, or have any gold or filver c about them, when they went to battle, that the enemy might not, in case of any misfortune, set themselves off with their spoils. He suffered no bakers to follow the army, obliging the foldiers to content themselves with bisket. Some troops, that were in garison on the frontiers of Egypt, having one day begged leave to drink wine, he returned them no other answer, than that they were but at a small distance from the Nile. He required nothing of the foldiers, but what he practifed himfelf. In his garb and dress he little varied from a common soldier, and his diet was the fame with that of the meanest in the army. He always led the march on foot, with his head uncovered in all feafons and climates. He obliged even his own domestics to carry burdens on their backs, that they might not seem to walk at their d ease, while the soldiers were loaded with their arms and baggage. He had constantly before his eyes Marius, Hannibal, and other famed commanders of antiquity; and when, upon his being faluted emperor, the person, who, according to custom, was appointed to pronounce his panegyric, began to commend him, he immediately interrupted the orator, and defired him to fay fomething in praise of Marius, of Hannibal, or of some other renowned commander, who was dead. Tell us, faid he, what they have done worthy of imitation; for to praise the living is an useless task, especially to praise an emperor, who can punish, reward, proscribe and condemn: as for me, I only defire to please while I live; when I am dead, then praise me, if I deserve it. If he had prevailed, no one doubted but he would have restored e the empire to its former lustre, without using that cruelty for which Severus is blamed b. For tho' he was naturally severe, says Herodian c, yet he governed with great mildness, and was always ready to contribute to the diversions of the people; which gained him the affections of the Syrians, especially of the Antiochians, who delighted in nothing but shews and spectacles. Spartian commends him on account of his chastity, which the Gauls, says that writer, admired in him above all his other virtues. On the other hand, Victor the younger styles him a man abandoned to all manner of lewdness. Dion Cassius speaks of him as a person no-ways remarkable either for his good or bad qualities. However, it is certain, that he was univerfally esteemed and beloved by the people of Rome, who all wished to see him

Severus was a person endowed with extraordinary talents, and in every respect Septimius infinitely superior both to Albinus and Niger. He was generally esteemed, and not character. undefervedly, the most active, vigilant, laborious, and enterprising man in the whole empire; inured to labour, indefatigable in every duty of war, equal to the greatest commanders of ancient times, a great master of civil affairs, prompt in foreseeing events, dextrous at concerting schemes, a constant friend, a dangerous enemy, and equally violent in his love and hatred. He was a great diffembler, full of deceit,

<sup>7</sup> Birag. p. 264. SPART. in Nigr. p. 75.
6 HEROD. l. ii. p. 501. & l. iii. p. 518.
6 HEROD. ibid. Vit. Nigr. p. 74. * Idem, p. 83. b Vit. Nigr. p. 75-77.
Dio, l. lxxiv. p. 842.

* HEROD. 1. iii. p. 501. 4 Vit. Nigr. p. 76.

and ever ready to facrifice his reputation, and every thing elfe, to his interest and a ambition 8. He was naturally inclined to crucky and avarice, but more to crucky; for we find some instances of his generosity, but none of his humanity; nay, he is faid never to have pardoned a fault, or performed a good-natured action h. He was an enemy to all pomp and shew, frugal in his diet, contenting himself for the most part with roots and greens, but sometimes, tho' feldom, drinking to excess. In the field, his diet was the same with that of the common soldiers; he shared with them all their labours, and encouraged them more by his example, than by words, to bear with patience the toils of war, which, notwithstanding his severity, gained him the affectis extraction, tions of the soldiery. Severus was born at Leptis, a city of Libya Tripolitana, but his ancestors had been Roman knights, and afterwards admitted into the senate; for b he was nephew by the father to two confuls, M. Agrippa and Septimius Severus; the latter was twice consul. His father, M. Septimius Gela, had another son, named likewise Geta, and a daughter; but neither her name, nor that of her son, has been transmitted to us k. Severus was born on the eleventh of April in the year 145, the eighth of the reign of Antoninus Pius. He studied first in Africa, and afterwards at Rome, the Greek and Latin tongues; declaimed in public, when only eight years old; applied himself to the study of philosophy and eloquence; and excelled, according to Spartian, Aurelius Victor, and Eutropius, in each branch of polite literature. Dion, on the contrary, writes, that he had more inclination than ability to learn the liberal arts 1; and Spartian owns, that he spoke to the end of his life the Latin tongue with c the African accent m. He was instructed in the knowledge of the law, together with Papinianus, by Q. Cervidius Scavola, who published various books of jurisprudence, whereof some fragments are still preserved in the Pandests n. He seems to have had likewife some knowledge of physic, and is said to have been thoroughly acquainted with judicial aftrology, a science to which the Africans were generally addicted P. In his youth he was accused of adultery, but acquitted by Didius Julianus, at that time proconful of Africa. Afterwards he came to Rome, where, after he had pleaded for some time with little success at the bar, he was, by the interest of his uncle Septimius Severus, admitted by the emperor M. Aurelius into the senate, and appointed governor of the island of Sardinia, whence he was fent to command d the troops in Africa in quality of lieutenant to the proconful. Upon his return from Education.

And employments.

Africa, he was created prætor; and after his prætorship preferred to the command of the fourth legion, then quartered in Syria. On his journey into that province, he visited the city of Athens, and received some affront there, for which he deprived the inhabitants, when emperor, of many privileges granted them by his predecessors. Next, he was raised to the government of Gallia Lugdunensis, or the country of Lions, where, by his affability, and obliging behaviour, he gained the affections of all. From Gaul he was removed to Pannonia, which province he governed with proconfular authority, as he did afterwards that of Sicily. Upon his return to Rome, he was accused of having consulted the astrologers about his attaining the empire; but as e Commodus began then to be universally hated, he was acquitted, and his accuser crucified. He was raised soon after to the consulship, and then appointed commander of all the troops employed in Illyricum to defend the banks of the Danube q. He His wife Julia. married to his first wife one Martia; and upon her death Julia, a native of Emesia in Syria, for no other reason but because the astrologers had told her, that she was to marry a sovereign. She is styled in several inscriptions Julia Domna Augusta, the mother of the armies, of the senate, of her country, &c. r. By her Severus had Bassianus, commonly known by the name of Caracalla, born the fourth of April 188. Geta, born in Milan, the twenty-seventh of May 189. and two daughters, who were married after their father's accession to the empire. Julia dishonoured with her lewd- f ness her husband and family, and had the mortification to hear herself publicly reproached by a Caledonian lady with the same vices which she pretended to condemn in her s. She was likewise accused of conspiring against her husband, and charged with several other crimes by Plautianus, who did all that lay in his power to dif-

<sup>**</sup> Dio, l. lxxiii. p. 837. & l. lxxvi. p. 869. Herod. l. ii. p. 503. Vict. epit. Tertuil. apol. c. 4. h Herod. l. iii. p. 527. ldem, l. ii. p. 507. h Spart. vit. Sev. p. 64. Dio in excerpt. Val. p. 742. Grut. p. 268. l Dio in excerpt. Val. p. 741. m Vit. Sev. p. 71. lvit. Citacall. cum not. Cisaub. p. 132. & Jons. l. iii. c. 12. Gralen. ther. t. ii. p. 457, 458. leg. go. Dio, l. lxxvi. p. 866. l Vit. Sev. p. 64, 65. Dio, l. lxxvi. p. 840. Herod. l. ii. p. 503. Spon. p. 270. Spanh. l. vi. p. 628. l Aur. Vict. Sever. vit. p. 71. Dio, l. lxxvi. p. 869.

a credit her with the emperor; infomuch that, to retrieve her reputation, she betook herself to the study of philosophy, and kept continually about her a great number of fophilts, philosophers, mathematicians, geographers, and persons eminent in the various branches of learning, which has rendered her name famous in history . Julia had a fifter named Masa, who was married to one Julius, who had by her two daughters, Sommis and Mamea, the former the mother of the emperor Heliogabalus, and the latter of Alexander, who succeeded him.

To resume now the thread of our history, and return to Didius Julianus: while he was striving to gain the affections of the Roman people by the mildness of his government, news was brought him, that Pescennius Niger had revolted in Syria, and Pescennius was acknowledged emperor by all the eastern nations, and the troops under his command. Soon after he received the like tidings from Illyricum, where Severus had east, and Sevebeen salured by the army which he commended there with the server which he commended there will be seen to the server which he commended the server with the server been faluted by the army, which he commanded there, with the title of Augustus. rus in Illyri-The armies in Gaul likewise swore allegiance to him, as soon as they heard, that he cumhad taken upon him the title of emperor. Their example was followed by all the armies, provinces, and cities in Europe, except the city of Byzantium; so that Severus having fecured the provinces behind him, and left fome troops to guard the banks of the Danube, began his march to Rome. As he was well apprifed, that Albinus, governor of Britain, was in a condition to thwart his deligns, he wrote an obliging letter to him, wherein he declared his intention of adopting him, and gave him c the title of Casar, which Albinus assumed at the head of his army, with all the badges of his new dignity, bestowing on that occasion great encomiums on Severus. As for Niger, Severus did not so much as attempt to gain, or rather deceive him, well knowing, that he would not hearken to any proposals whatsoever ". Julianus, in the mean time, repairing to the senate, caused Severus to be declared an enemy Severus deto his country, and likewise his soldiers, if they did not abandon him within a limited clared a public time. Deputies were even fent by the fenate to persuade the soldiers to quit the enemy. party of Severus, and join Julianus. Among these was Vespronius Candidus, a confular of great authority, Valerius Catulinus, who was named to take upon him the command of the troops which Severus had with him, and one Aquilius, a centurion, d the chief minister of the cruelties of Commodus, with orders to dispatch Severus as soon as his troops had deserted him. But the deputies, instead of exhorting the troops to abandon Severus, joined him themselves, and encouraged the soldiers to pursue their march, and revenge the death of Pertinax. Hereupon Julianus, having first paid the prætorian guards the larges he had promised them, ordered them to their arms, and at the same time sent for the marines, who were on board the fleet at Misenum, and with the prætorian guards made up a considerable army. But as they had been long inured to idleness, they scarce knew how to make use of their arms, and shewed great backwardness to make head against the enemy, who were In his march e advancing with long marches, being received every-where with loud acclamations, to Rome he is and supplied with plenty of provisions, upon their giving out, that they were going every where to revenge the death of Pertinax, a prince universally beloved. Julianus, finding loud acclamahe could not depend upon his troops, caused the palace to be fortified, as if he tions. could have maintained himself there after losing all the rest. At the same time, he ordered Marcia and Latus, the chief authors of the death of Commodus, to be murdered, not doubting but they favoured Severus; dispatched a great number of affaffins, to try if he could by any means murder Severus, with promifes of immense rewards, if they succeeded in the attempt; and caused an incredible number of children to be inhumanly butchered, in order to make use of their blood in the abomif nable mysteries of magic w. While Julianus was thus losing his time in useless preparations, Severus arriving at Ravenna, made himself master of that city, and the fleet riding there; which so terrified Julianus, that, distrusting his troops, he ordered the senate to assemble on the twenty-ninth of May, when one of his ministers defired them in his name to fend out the vestals to meet the enemy, and intreat them to retire; which proposal being rejected as no less ridiculous than ineffectual, Julianus, as some authors write, was so provoked, that he assembled his troops, with a design to put all the senators to the sword, if they did not comply with his request. But he foon changed his mind, and went to the fenate in person, with a proposal of a

&lt;sup>t</sup> Риіlos. vit. Apoll. Tyan. l. i. с. 3. & foph. lvi. p. 617. w Dio, p. 838. Vit. Jul. p. 62. Dio, l. lxxiii. p. 837. HEROP. l. ii. p. 513.

(

tı

h

a

h

ſŧ.

in

p3

th

th W

V

d t

t

ſ

W

de

tro

the

may

e form

the 15,

Th

ror

of F

With

a fo

Parti

m hi

i oblig

#"0 hou

Re:

ĊΞ.

p D.

Ĺ

His

o h

quite different nature, which was, that they would pass a decree, declaring Severus a Julianus causes his partner in the empire. The decree passed without opposition, and was imme-Severus to be diately fent to Severus, who not only rejected the offered affociation, but, at the instigation of Julius Latus, ordered Tullius Crispinus, captain of the prætorian guards, who had brought the decree, to be cut in pieces, a report being spread, that Crispinus had private orders to dispatch him. Hereupon Julianus, being quite at a loss what to do, and the fenate declining to affift him with their advice, ordered the gladiators at Capua to take arms, under the command of Lollianus Titianus, and wrote an obliging letter to Pompeianus, the son-in-law of M. Aurelius, who then led a retired life at Tarracina, offering to take him, as he was an excellent commander, for his partner in the empire. But Pompeianus wisely declined the offer, pleading his old age, and b the weakness of his sight; which however would have served him well, says Dion Cassius, had he seen any effectual means of relieving his distressed country x. In the Julianus aban. mean time the troops sent by Julianus into Umbria to guard the passes of the Apennine mountains, declared for Severus; and the prætorian guards themselves, abandoning the emperor whom they had fet up, agreed not to oppose Severus, upon his promising them impunity, provided they delivered up to him those who had murdered Pertinax y. Julianus, seeing himself thus deserted by his troops, shut himself up in the palace, with Genialis, one of the captains of the guards, and Repentinus his fonin-law. The guards in the mean time, having feized fuch of their comrades as had who had been substituted either to Falco or Erucius, the ordinary consuls of this year

Severus de-

been any-ways concerned in the death of Pertinax, acquainted therewith Silius Meffala, c 193. Messala immediately assembled the senate, when a decree passed, depriving clared emperor, Julianus of the empire, sentencing him to death, declaring Severus emperor, and degraded by the appointing divine honours to Pertinax. This decree was carried to Severus by fenate, and put some of the chief men in the senate, who intreated him, in the name of the rest, to hasten his march to Rome. At the same time the senate sent a band of soldiers to the palace, with orders to put Julianus to death; whom they sound drowned in tears, and ready to resign the empire, upon condition that they spared his life. Some authors write, that at the fight of the armed band, he only faid, What crime bave I committed? whose life have I taken away 2? Others tell us, that he implored the faith d of Cafar, giving that title to Severus 2. Be that as it will, his head was struck off by a common foldier, and his body, according to Aurelius Vistor, exposed to public view. Such was the end of Didius Julianus, after he had lived fixty years, four months and as many days, and reigned two months and fix days. Severus, upon his arrival at Rome, delivered his body to his wife and daughter, by whom it was buried in the tomb of his ancestors on the Via Lavicana, about five miles from Rome b.

A hundred fenators fent to meet Severus.

Severus received the news of his competitor's death, when he was yet some days journey from Rome. However, he pursued his march with his troops in battle-array, and incamped every night, as if he had been in an enemy's country; which filled the city with terror and dismay. The senate deputed a hundred persons of great distin-Etion out of their body to congratulate him upon the death of his rival, and his accession to the empire. Severus received them in his armour, at the head of his troops, and caused them to be searched, as if he suspected their sidelity; but afterwards entertained them in a very familiar and friendly manner, presented them with seven hundred pieces of gold, and gave them liberty either to depart immediately, or to flay, and return to Rome with him. He appointed Flavius Juvenalis captain of the guards, with Veturius Macrinus, whom he had named before to that employment. At the fame time he dispatched an express to Plautianus, injoining him to seize the children of Pescennius Niger, and of all the officers who served under him. He had the good luck to intercept several letters and edicts sent by Niger to the senate and people of f Rome, which he would not fuffer to be read to them . When he approached Rome, he caused all those to be executed, who had any hand in the death of Pertinax; and fent orders to the other foldiers of the guards to meet him without their arms, and in the attire which they wore when they attended the emperor in the great folemnities. His orders were obeyed, the guards imagining, that they were to attend in that dress the emperor's entry. When they arrived in the camp, Severus sent them word to wait in a body till he was at leifure to receive and harangue them; and in the mean time

* Dio, in excerpt. Val. p. 729. Vit. Jul. p. 63.

Dio, p. 838. Herod. p. 510.

Dio, p. 868. Vit. Jul. p. 66.

Vit. Sever. p. 66. & Nigr. p. 75. HERODIAN. l. 111. p. 526.

a time gave private orders to his own troops to furround them at a distance, and shut them up on all fides, while they were intent upon hearing his harangue. He then ascended the tribunal; and betraying great anger and resentment in his countenance, reproached them in most bitter terms for murdering their prince, and such a prince as Pertinax; for felling by auction, to the eternal ignominy of the Roman name, the empire; and even for abandoning, like so many cowards and traitors, Julianus, whom they themselves had chosen. He told them, that he could inslict no punishment upon them answerable to the enormity of their crimes; that nevertheless he granted them their lives; but commanded them forthwith to quit their horses, and all their mili- He disbands all tary badges, and retire without delay a hundred miles from Rome, folemnly declar- the pratorian b ing, that whoever among them should be found within that distance of the city, guards. should irremissibly be put to death, and publicly executed. They were thunderstruck with this order; but forced to comply with it, being surrounded on all sides by the armed troops of Severus, who obliged them to quit their horses, and stripped them even of their tunics. Thus stripped and degraded, they retired with that shame and confusion, which were justly owing to the heinousness of their crimes d. Dion Coffius tells us, that one of their horses followed his old master, throwing down and treading under foot all those who endeavoured to stop him; insomuch that the unhappy foldier, finding his horse would not, by any means, leave him, killed him, and running himself through with the same sword, sell dead by him. The same o historian adds, that the faithful horse betrayed a kind of joy in dying by his master's hand c. Severus entered Rome, attended by all his troops under arms, and with the His entry into standards of the prætorian guards reversed. He came to the gate on horse-back, and Rome. in his military habit; but there took his gown, and made his entry on foot, accompanied by the senators in their robes, with crowns of laurel on their heads; which the people likewise wore, who, on this occasion, were all clad in white. The streets through which he passed, were strewed with slowers, the houses adorned, and covered with rich tapestry, and the whole city perfumed with sweet odors. Severus, having visited the capitol, and the usual temples, retired to the palace; but the soldiers, taking up their quarters in the temples, portico's and other public buildings, spread d themselves all over the city, and committed every-where great disorders, threatening to plunder the citizens houses, if they were not plentifully supplied with provisions, for which they would allow nothing. This alarmed the people, and inspired them with a great aversion to the new emperor f. The next morning Severus went to the fenate, attended by all his troops under arms; but he had scarce begun to speak, when he was interrupted all on a sudden by dreadful cries of the soldiers without, The soldiers demanding an immense sum of the senate, which had been formerly given to the mutiny. troops that had attended Augustus to Rome, and was consequently, said they, due to them. The senate, altogether unapprised of the cause of that uproar, was, as we may well imagine, ftruck with horror and difmay. The emperor himfelf betrayed fome fear; but however, starting up, he went out to them; but could not appeale the mutinous multitude, without promising them part of what they demanded; that is, two hundred and fifty drachma's a man, instead of two thousand five hundred. Then returning to the senate, he excused himself for having assumed the title of empe- The emperor's ror without their consent, pretending, that he had done it purely to revenge the death speech to the of Pertinax, and deliver them from the tyranny of Julianus. He promised to govern fenate. with great moderation, and tread in the footsteps of M. Aurelius and Pertinax, adding a folemn oath, by which he bound himself to the observance of all the laws; and particularly swore, that no senator should, for any crime whatsoever, be put to death in his reign, who had not been first tried and condemned by the senate; nay, he f obliged the senate to pass a decree, declaring such emperors as acted otherwise, those who obeyed them therein, and their children, public enemies. This gave great fatisfaction to the generality of the fenators; but men of discernment, and such as were better acquainted with his dark and referved temper, with his falshood and diffimulation, gave no credit to his fair promises; but, on the contrary, looked upon him as a second Tiberius. However, they unanimously conferred upon him all the titles peculiar to the imperial dignity, invested him with the tribunitial and proconfular powers, created him high pontiff, &c. Severus acquainted the senate with his

d Herod. p. 510. Dio, p. 839. Herod. p. 512. Dio, l. lxxiv. p. 640. 2 Vit. Sever. p. 66. e Dio, ibid. f HEROD. P. 512.

having

The friends of Iulianus pro-[cribed.

guards chosen.

Severus lets out against Niger.

Niger prepares for war.

The site of Cx- having bestowed on Albinus the title of Cxfar, begged they would confirm it to him, a far confirmed to caused several medals to be struck with his name, statues to be erected to him, &c. He distributed large sums among the soldiery and people, which are taken notice of on several medals of this year b; but what chiefly gained him the hearts of the people, was his confecrating and inrolling with extraordinary pomp and folemnity the emperor Pertinax in the number of the gods. This apotheolis, perhaps the most magnificent that had ever been seen in Rome, is described at length by Dion Cassius i. Before he left Rome to march against Niger, he caused the senate to proscribe all the friends and adherents of Julianus; executed without mercy such of them as were discovered, and feized, and even attempted, out of hatred to that prince, to abolish the decrees of the celebrated civilian Salvius Julianus, his great-grandfather. In the next place, be New pretorian he chose new guards in the room of those whom he had cashiered, and sour times as many, which filled Rome with foldiers, and proved very chargeable to the state; for their pay much exceeded that of the other troops. Besides, the natives only of certain countries, viz. of Spain, Macedon, Noricum, and above all of Italy, had been hitherto admitted to serve in the guards; but Severus, without any regard to their countries, chose the most resolute and brave men in his army, and appointed, that, for the future, they should be always taken from among the other troops; by which means the guards, who of late had ferved only for shew, became the flower of the Roman forces; and the hopes of a less toilsome and more honourable and advantageous warfare encouraged the rest to discharge their duty with more punctuality and c exactness; but on the other hand, the Italian youth, (for the guards had hitherto been mostly natives of Italy) having no longer that resource, turned either robbers or gladiators: hence this regulation was no-ways pleasing, either to the Romans, or to the other inhabitants of Italy k. About the same time the emperor gave his two daughters in marriage to Probus and Aetius, and honoured both his fons-in-law with the consular dignity. To the former he offered the government of Rome; but he declining that employment, it was conferred upon Domitius Dexter. The emperor, having thus fettled affairs in Rome, and supplied the city with great plenty of corn, set out in the beginning of July on his march into the east against Niger, whom he had never once named during his stay at Rome. His troops mutinied the first day at a place d called Saxa Rubra, about nine miles from Rome; but the mutiny was foon quelled. However, he incamped there the first night, when his brother Geta came to wait upon him, expecting some great preferment; but Severus ordered him to return to his government, and shewed no inclination to employ him. Before he decamped, the children of Pescennius Niger were brought to him, whom he received and entertained with the same kindness as if they had been his own. He pursued his march with all possible expedition, having dispatched an express to the commander of the troops in Illyricum, injoining him to hasten into Thrace, and wait for him there. He ordered Heraclius to attempt the recovery of Bithynia, which province had declared for Niger; and wrote to Albinus in Britain, to hold himself ready to march upon the first notice. e

In the mean time Niger, hearing that Severus had been acknowledged emperor by the senate and people of Rome, and was already advancing by long marches against him, wrote to the governors of the provinces, injoining them to guard the narrow passes, especially that of mount Taurus between Cappadocia and Cilicia; raised new forces in Antioch, and all the other cities of Syria, and sent deputies to demand succours of the neighbouring princes. He went in person to view the fortifications of Byzantium, in which city he left a numerous garifon, looking upon it as a place of the utmost importance. From Byzantium he advanced to Perintbus, called afterwards Heraclea, where, in a skirmish between his men and those of Severus, whose party the city of Perintbus had embraced, a confiderable number of the latter were flain, f and among them several persons of great distinction. Hereupon the senate, to curry favour with Severus, declared Niger a public enemy, and likewife Æmilianus, then proconful of Asia, a person of extraordinary talents, long experience, and generally esteemed the greatest statesman of his age m. Spartian writes, that Niger, improving the advantage he had gained at Perintbus, made himself master of all Greece, Macedon and Thrace, and thereupon offered to take Severus for his partner in the empire; which proposal he rejected with contempt and derision a. The following year 1946

Severus

h Birag. p. 268. i Dio, p. 88. p. 733. l Vit. Sever. p. 67. Val. p. 734. n Vit. Nigr. p. 67. 1 Dio, p. 840. HEROD. p. 512. Dio, l. lxxiv. p. 840. & in excerpt. Val. p. 67. HEROD. l. ii. p. 512, 513. Nig. vit. p. 76. Dio, in excerpt.

a Severus and Albinus were both confuls the second time, and Niger in all likelihood took upon him the same dignity; for on some medals he is styled conful. We know nothing of what passed in the war between Niger and Severus, till the arrival of the latter before the city of Byzantium, which he befieged this year; but meeting with a vigorous resistance from the numerous garison, he left some of his troops before the place, and ordered the rest to cross the sea, and march towards Cyzicus, in the neighbourhood of which city they were met by Æmilianus at the head of a numerous army. Hereupon a battle enfued, in which much blood was shed on both sides; but Æmi- Emilianus, lianus was in the end defeated, and obliged to shelter himself first in Cyzicus, and after-Niger's gene-wards in another city not named in history, where he was taken, and put to death and slain. b by the generals of Severus; for the emperor himself was not, it seems, present at the battle of Cyzicus P. Not long after, another battle was fought between Nicea and Cius, two cities of Bitbynia, which proved far more bloody than the former, Niger commanding his own troops in person, and Candidus, an officer of great experience, those of Severus. Both armies fought with a fury hardly to be expressed, as appears from Dion Cassius's account of the engagement; but Niger, in spite of his Niger himself utmost efforts, was at last obliged to save himself by flight beyond the streights of overthrown. mount Taurus; which he caused to be fortified and well guarded q. After this victory, Severus wrote to Niger, offering to let him live in fafety, provided he laid down his arms, and disbanded his troops; which Niger seemed inclined to do; but was c diverted from it by Aurelianus, whose daughters were betrothed to his sons. He therefore retired to Antioch, in order to raise there troops and money. In the mean time the cities of Laodicea and Tyre declaring for Severus, Niger detached against them a body of Moors, who pillaged the rebellious cities, put most of the inhabitants to the fword, and fet fire to their houses, which were in great part consumed, but afterwards restored by Severus. In the mean time Severus's army, advancing to the foot of mount Taurus, was stopped there, and quite disheartened, at the fight of the strong works, and the great number of troops that defended them; infomuch that despairing of being able to open themselves a passage, they had some thoughts of returning: but an incredible quantity of rain, mixed with fnow, falling in the night-time, the d fortifications were utterly demolished the next day by an impetuous torrent from the mountain; which so terrified Niger's men, now persuaded that the gods savoured the enemy, that they betook themselves to slight, and lest Severus's troops to enter Cilicia, without offering to make head against them. Niger had already raised a new army, confisting chiefly of the Antiochian youth, who were very zealous and sanguine in his cause; but utter strangers to military discipline. However, Niger placed them fo advantageously, that when they were attacked by the regular and well disciplined troops of Severus, under the command of Valerianus and Anulinus, they not only repulsed them, but would have gained a complete victory, had it not been snatched out of their hands by a dreadful and unexpected storm of thunder and lightning; e which discharging itself in their faces, prevented them from pursuing the advantage end gained a complete victory. This battle, by far the most bloody of the three, Athird battle, was fought on the very spot where Alexander the Great first vanquished Darius; that in which Niger is, near the city of Issue, at a place called Pylæ Ciliciæ, or the Gates of Cilicia, it being is utterly dea narrow plain on the confines of Syria and Cilicia, inclosed on one fide by the sea, and on the other by steep mountains, on which Niger's forces were posted. Niger who pursued him, overtaking him at a small distance from Antioch, cut off his head, Niger is stain.

```
P HEPOD. P. 516. Dio, p. 842. Vit. Sev. p. 67. Dio, l. lxxiv p. 843. Nig. vit. p. 76.
   · BIRAG. P. 264.
                                                                                                      9 Dio, p. 842.
F HEROD. I. iii. p. 519, 520. Dio, l. lxxiv p. 843.
   Vol. VI. Nº 2.
                                                                                                             Severus
```

and carried it on the point of a spear to Severus, who caused it to be first shewn to the inhabitants of Byzantium, and then fent it to Rome r. Thus Dion Cassius and Herodian; but Spartian tells us, that Niger, being dangerously wounded, was taken prisoner, and in that condition brought to Severus, in whose presence he expired '.

they had gained, and disheartened them to such a degree, that no longer doubting but the gods were averse to their cause, they began to despair of success, and retire. Hereupon Severus's troops, refuming their courage, renewed the charge, and in the is faid to have lost in this battle twenty thousand men. Of the dead on the side of Severus no mention is made in history. Niger, after this overthrow, retired to Antoch; but not thinking himself safe there, continued his flight towards the Euphrates, with a delign, as was supposed, of taking shelter among the Parthians: but those Severus punishes without mercy such as had sided with Niger.

Severus was not present at any of these battles; but where ever he was, (for as to a that particular we are left by historians quite in the dark) he foon made all those who had fided with his competitor, feel the effects of his refentment. He put fuch of the fenators to death, as had ferved under Niger in quality of generals or tribunes. He spared the lives of the other senators; but banished them to the islands, and seized their estates. He caused an infinite number of other persons of an inferior rank to be publicly executed, without confidering whether they had engaged in the war by force or constraint. Many who had never feen Niger, were involved in this general massacre of his friends and partizans t. Herodian writes, that Severus persuaded Niger's generals, by means of their children, whom he had with him, to betray the cause which they had embraced; and after gaining the victory by their treachery, b murdered both them and their children ". He first banished the wife and children of Niger, and afterwards caused them, and all those of his family, to be murdered, and their estates to be confiscated. Spartian names six illustrious persons of the Piscennian family, who were put to death by his orders ". However, he would not fuffer a pompous inscription on the basis of a statue of Niger at Rome (M) to be erazed, saying, Let the world know what an enemy I have conquered . He punished with exemplary feverity fuch cities as had fided with Niger, especially Antioch, which he deprived of the privileges and title of a city, subjecting it as a mere village to Laodicea; which heightened the jealoufy between these two neighbouring cities. However, the following year, at the intreaties of his eldest fon, then an infant, he reinstated the city of c Antioch in its former rights and privileges v. He obliged fuch cities as had affifted Niger with money, tho' not by choice, but constraint, to pay four times as much to him; which drew upon him the public hatred: but as he loved money, he was glad of any pretence to raise it?. The next consuls were Scapula Tertullus and Tineius Clemens, during whose administration, Severus, passing the Euphrates, reduced the inhabitants of Ofrhoene and Adiabene; who, taking advantage of the late disturbances, had murdered the Roman foldiers left among them, and shaken off the yoke . He likewise entered Arabia; for the Arabians too had either revolted, or joined Niger, but were in the end obliged to submit to Severus b. Herodian writes, that he overran all Arabia Felix c; and Eutropius and Victor cry up his exploits in that country, d speaking of them as if he had been the first who reduced Arabia to a Roman province. But Arabia Petræa had long before been made a province by Trajan; and as for Arabia Felix, we do not find it mentioned among the provinces of the empire, either in Severus's time, or afterwards. Eusebius tells us, that Severus subdued the Adiabenians and Arabians, who had affisted Niger d. He likewise made war upon the Parthians; but did not bring them under subjection, as Spartian pretends e. For these wars the senate decreed him the titles of Arabicus, Parthicus, and Adiabenicus, which, with that of imperator the fifth time, are given him in the inscriptions of this year 195. the third of his reign f. He refused the triumph which was likewise decreed him, that he might not feem to have triumphed for victories gained in a civil war. The title e of Parthicus he likewise rejected, lest his assuming it should provoke the Parthians 8. The Scythians defigned to make war upon him, and had already begun their march; but were stopped, and deterred from putting their design in execution, by a dreadful florm, in which three of their chiefs were struck dead with lightning h. In the beginning of the following year, when Cn. Domitius Dexter, governor of Rome, was conful the second time, with L. Valerius Messala Thrasea Priscus, the city of Byzanium surrendered after a three years siege. It was at this time by far the greatest, and the most populous and wealthy city of Thrace, fortified with walls of an extraordinary height and breadth, and defended by a great number of towers, seven of which were

The city of By-

He makes war

upon the Adiabeniane, Ara-

bians and Parthians.

him. He was dear to both the Antoninus's, and to the whole empire. As his name was Niger, (that is, black) we have caused a flatur to be creded to him in black marble, that it might answer his name. This statue was, as Spartian informs us, a present from the king of Thebes to Statius Posthumius.

* Dio, I. lxxv. p. 851. & in excerpt. Val. p. 734.

* Herod. l. iii. p. 521.

* Vit. Nig. p. 79.

* Herod. l. iii. p. 523.

* Diog. p. 1921.

* Vit. Car.cal. p. 85.

* Dio. in excerpt. Val. p. 737.

* Dio, l. lxxv. p. 848.

* Herod. l. iii. p. 528.

* Dio. in p. 948.

* Herod. l. iii. p. 528.

* Dio. in p. 948.

* Herod. l. iii. p. 528.

* Evit. Sever. p. 67.

* Vit. Sever. p. 67.

* Vit. Sever. p. 67.

* Vit. Sever. p. 67.

* OLTZ. p. 849.

(M) The house of Niger was still standing in Dioelesian's time, as Spartian informs us, and in one of the rooms his statue done to the life in the black marble of Thebes, with an epigram on the basis to this purpose: Here stands the great Niger, the terror of Egypt, the ally of Thebes, who had proposed a golden age to all. Kings, nations, Rome itself, loved a built with such art, that the least noise heard in one of them, was immediately conveyed to all the rest. This city Niger seized at the first breaking out of the war, placed a numerous garifon in it, and supplied the inhabitants with great flore of warlike machines, most of them invented and built by Perifeus, a native of Nicea, and the greatest engineer of his age. Severus laid fiege to this place when he first arrived in Thrace, left a confiderable body of troops to carry it on, and, after the defeat and death of Niger, purfued it with the greatest part of his army by land, and by fea with all the ships he could assemble from the different ports of Asia. The Byzantines defended themselves, before the death of Niger, and even after his head had been shewn to them, with fuch resolution and intrepidity as can hardly be expressed. They baffled all the attempts of the affailants, killed great numbers of them, crushed such as approached b the walls with huge stones, and when stones began to fail them, with the statues of their gods and heroes; but in the end they were obliged by famine, after having been reduced to the fatal necessity of devouring one another, to submit, and open their gates to the conqueror, who put all the magistrates and soldiers to the sword; but spared the engineer Periscus. The city, with its stately theatres, baths and public And destroyed. buildings, was laid in ashes; the inhabitants were stripped of all their effects, and publicly fold for flaves, and the walls levelled with the ground; those walls, says Dion Cassius, which were the strongest rampart of the Roman empire against the incursions of the barbarians k. The chronicle of Alexandria, and the modern Greek writers, c tell us, that Severus himself rebuilt in great part the city of Byzantium, calling it Antoninia, from his fon Caracalla, who affumed the name of Antoninus. After the furrender of Byzantium, Severus fent his army, divided into three bodies, under the command of Latus, Anulinus, and Probus, to reduce part of Mesofotamia; which they did accordingly: and the country they conquered, perhaps Acabene, or Arctacene, was by Severus made a new province, whereof Nifibis was declared the capital. The government of this new province was, like that of Egypt, given only to Roman knights m.

AFTER these successes, Severus began to think of destroying Albinus, whom he had Severus relulled asleep with the title of Casar, while he was employed against Julianus and Niger. solves to destroy d As Albinus was as much beloved by the fenate, as Severus was hated on account of his Albinus. cruelty, and many persons of great distinction had even solicited him to come to Rome, and there assume the title of emperor, Severus thought he could not use too much dispatch in crushing him. However, not judging it adviseable to declare himfelf an open enemy to one who had not given him the least provocation, he had recourse to treachery, and wrote a pompous letter to the fenate in his commendation, and another to Albinus himself, filled with the most tender expressions of friendship, calling him his dearest and intirely beloved friend, his brother, his partner in the sovereign power; but those who brought him this letter, had secret orders to draw him aside, Sends assays under colour of communicating to him in private some affairs of the utmost import-to murder him.

e ance, and dispatch him with their daggers. They were likewise provided with poison, in case they could prevail upon any of his domestics to administer it to him. After Albinus had read the letter, the affaffins, purfuant to their directions, told him they had fomething to communicate to him by word of mouth, which required the utmost fecrecy. Hereupon Albinus desired them to attend him into a gallery; but observing, that they took more than ordinary care to prevent others from entering with them, he began to suspect some treachery, and caused them to be seized, and put to the question, when the violence of the torments extorted from them a full confession of the errand on which they were come. Hereupon Albinus betook himself to open Albinus causes force; and having affembled a mighty army, caused himself to be proclaimed em-himself to be f peror in Britain, and thence passed over into Gaul, where he was joined by many proclaimed empersons of great distinction, both Gauls and Spaniards. Severus, upon the first news of his revolt, leaving the east, hastened through Thrace and Illyricum into Gaul. Some writers tell us, that before he fet out on his march, he caused a young virgin to be facrificed, hoping to learn from her intrails what fuccess would attend him in this war. At Viminacium, a famous city in Upper Mæsia on the Danube, he gave the title of Cafar to Bassianus his eldest son, and on that occasion distributed large lums among the foldiers. At the same time he obliged his son to quit the name of Dio, l. lxxiv. p. 847. Dio, ibi * Dio, ibid. Herop. 1. iii. p. 523. 7—850. " Suid. p. 257. 1 Chron. Alex. p. 620. Suid. p.

Baffianus, and style himself thenceforth M. Aurelius Antoninus, for whom Severus ever a

Is declared a public enemy.

had a great esteem and veneration o. Before Severus reached Gaul, several skirmishes happened between the troops that had declared for him there, and those of Albinus, in one of which, called by Herodian a battle, the generals of Severus were utterly defeated, and their troops dispersed P. This greatly alarmed him, and obliged him to quicken his march, after he had detached part of his troops to guard the narrow passes of the Alps, and prevent his competitor from entering Italy. In the mean time the senate declared Albinus a public enemy; after which declaration, one Numerianus, who kept a grammar-school at Rome, hastening into Gaul, passed himself there upon the inhabitants for a fenator fent by Severus to raise troops; and having by this means got together a considerable body, he attacked and defeated a detachment of Albinus's b horse, and gained some other small advantages; which Severus no sooner knew, than he wrote to him as a senator, believing him to be one, commended his zeal, and commissioned him to levy what forces he could. Having therefore raised a small army, he continually harassed Albinus's men, took many prisoners, and intercepted a great sum of money, which he sent to Severus. When Albinus was deseated, he went to wait upon Severus, told him who he was; but despising the great riches and honours which the emperor offered him, he accepted only a small pension, and retiring into engage near Lyous.

S. verus marches against him.

The two armies

Severus in great danger.

the country, spent the rest of his life in quiet and solitude 9. In the beginning of the following year, when Lateranus and Rufinus were confuls, Severus, having passed the Alps in the midst of winter, approached Lyons, where Al- c binus then resided, with a design to enter Italy early in the spring. He was not a little alarmed at the sudden and unexpected arrival of Severus; however, having with incredible expedition drawn together his troops quartered in that neighbourhood, he fell upon Lupus, one of Severus's generals, and defeated him with great flaughter r. Hereupon Severus advanced in person against his rival; and Albinus not declining the challenge, both armies, to the number of one hundred and fifty thousand men, were drawn up on the nineteenth of February in the neighbourhood of Lyons, probably in the spacious plain between that city and Trevoux. As the fate of the two commanders depended upon this battle, and no less a reward was proposed for the conqueror than the Roman empire; as the British legions were no-ways inferior either in d courage or experience to those of Illyricum, and both armies expected to share the fortune, whatever it was, of their generals, the engagement was one of the most sharp and bloody recorded in history. After they had fought many hours with a fury hardly to be expressed, without any considerable advantage on either side, Albinus's lest wing was utterly deseated, and obliged to take shelter in their camp, which the enemy entered in that confusion, and plundered; but, on the other hand, his right wing, having drawn Severus's men into certain ditches, which they had covered with earth, gained so great an advantage over them, that the emperor himself, who flew to their assistance at the head of the prætorian guards, was put into the utmost confusion, and obliged, if we believe Herodian, to save himself by flight, after having c quitted, that he might not be known, all the badges of the imperial dignity . Spartian writes, that he was wounded, and believed dead by the army, who were for creating another emperor in his room; and Dion Cassius, that his horse was killed under him, and he himself in imminent danger of losing his life ". The same author adds, that feeing his men fly, he threw himself sword in hand upon the sugitives, and forced them to return to the charge; which they did with fuch fury, that the enemy, not able to withstand them, began to give ground; which Latus perceiving, fell upon them with the whole body of horse under his command, and completed their overthrow. Lætus had declined engaging fo long as the victory continued doubtful, with a design, as was supposed, of setting up for himself, after the two f parties had destroyed each other w; and hence it was, that Severus, as Herodian informs us x, instead of rewarding him, as he did his other generals, put him foon Albinus intire- after to death. Albinus's army, no longer able to keep the field, fled to Lyons, ly defeated, and whither they were pursued by the conquerors; who, entering the city with the fugitives, first plundered it, and then laid it in ashes v. Albinus, who had concealed himself in a house on the Rhone, finding no means of making his escape, laid violent hands on himself z. Thus Dion Cassius. But other authors write, that being mor-

9 Dio, l. lxxv. p. 851. PDio, 862. w Idem ibid. P Herod. l. iii. p. 524. Sev. vit. p. 68. 524. Dio, p. 851. Vit. Sev. p. 63. Vit. Sever. p. 68. thid. HEROD. l. iii. p. 524. Dio, p. 851. Vit. Sev. p. * HEROD. l. iii. p. 524. Idem, p. 525. Dio, p. 853.

tally

a tally wounded either by himfelf, or fome of his own men, he was brought in that condition to Severus, in whose presence he expired a. Be that as it will, Severus The cruelty of beheld with great pleasure the dead body of his competitor, rode over it several times, Severus. causing his horse to tread it under foot, lest it lying in its gore before his tent, till it was half putrified, and torn in pieces by the dogs, and then ordered the poor remains of it to be thrown into the Rhone. The head he caused to be cut off, and fent it to Rome, ordering it to be fet up there on a pole in the forum. He pardoned at first his wife and children; but foon after changing his mind, he caused them to be inhumanly massacred, and their bodies to be thrown into the river. The whole family of Albinus, all his friends, and most distant relations, without distinction of fex or b age, were by Severus's orders barbaroufly flaughtered, and their effates confifcated. Most of the great men of Gaul and Spain, who had shewn any attachment to Albinus, underwent the same fate. By means of these murders and confiscations, he amassed an immense treasure, inriched his toldiers, and, at his death, left greater wealth to his children, than any prince had done before him b.

AFTER this victory, all the cities that had declared for Albinus, were foon reduced, and the inhabitants punished, some with death, some with the confiscation of their estates; so that Severus, seeing all quiet in Gaul, and likewise in Britain, which he divided into two provinces, let out for Rome, leading with him his victorious army. His approach filled the city with terror and difmay, those who had favoured c Albanas, expecting no better treatment than the friends of that unfortunate commander had met with in Gaul. Their apprehensions were heightened by a letter which Seve- Severus's letrus wrote to the senate, when he sent the head of Albinus to Rome; for in that letter he ter to the se-complained of their affection to Albinus, as if they had all privately favoured and nate. affilted his declared enemy; reproached them with ingratitude; cried up the conduct and government of Commodus, whom he had never mentioned before but as a tyrant and monster; and, in speaking of the head of Albinus, used this expression; I fend it to you, that you may thereby know you have provoked me, and see with your eyes the effects of my rejentment. Both the senate and people were thunder-struck with this letter; they expected nothing but a general maffacre, the more because they were d informed, that Severus had feized the papers of Albinus, and by that means discovered all his friends and correspondents. However, as he drew near, the senate went out to meet him, and received him with all possible demonstrations of joy, attended him to the capitol, and thence to the palace, where he ordered great sums to be distributed among the people and soldiery. The next day he went to the senate, and there read a speech filled with bitter invectives against the partizans of Albinus; produced the letters that had been written to him; commended the cruelties of Sylla, of Marius, and of Augustus, as necessary precautions; ascribed the ruin of Pompey, and the death of Cafar, to their unfeatonable elemency; and mentioning Commodus, ftyled him a god, and bestowed the highest encomiums upon him; adding, that e none but infamous and abandoned wretches could censure or blame the conduct of fuch an excellent prince ". Having ended his speech, he returned to the palace, and His cruelties in filled the city with maffacres and bloodshed. In a few days forty-two senators, most Rome. of whom had been confuls or prætors, were facrificed to his fury and revenge, and an incredible number of persons of an inferior rank. Herodian tells us, that he cut off all those, who, on account of their birth or riches, bore any sway in the senate or the provinces. Many were condemned and executed upon bare suspicions, and many for no other crime but that of being possessed of great wealth under a covetous and inhuman tyrant d. While the city was yet floating in blood, he went to the senate, and, out of hatred to the fenators, caused them to rank Commodus with the usual ceremonies among the gods, to appoint priefts, and inflitute an annual fellival to his honour. He condemned Narcissus, the famous wrestler, who had strangled him, to be devoured by the wild beafts, and spared none who were suspected of having been any ways privy to his death . After Severus had spent some months at Rome, and there cut off, not only the partizans of Albinus, but such as gave him the least umbrage, he took leave of the fenate, and, with his two fons Caracalla and Geta, fet out Goes into the for the east, with a design to make war upon the Parthians, who, under the conduct east to make of their him. Walnut had made them follows matters of great part of Messachusia war upon the

<sup>a</sup> Vit. Alb. & Sev. p. 68. b Vit. Sev. p. 68. c Dio, 68. d Dio, p. 853. Herod. p. 527. Vit. Sev. p. 69. e Dio, l. lxxv. p. 526. Vit. Alb. p. 60. & Sev. ev. p. 69. Vit. Sev. p. 69.

Vol. VI. Nº 2. He

of their king Vologeses, had made themselves masters of great part of Mesopotamia. Parthans.

He imbarqued with his army at Brundusium, and arriving in Syria, marched strait to a Nisibis in Mesopotamia, whence the Parthians retired into their own country upon the first news of his approach. He was met on his march by Augarus, or Abgarus, king of Osrboene, who styled him his prince and protector, delivered up to him his children as hostages, and supplied him with a considerable body of archers to be employed in his intended expedition against the Parthians f. The following year, Tib. Saturninus and C. Gallus being confuls, Severus having made vast preparations for the war against the Parthians, began his march about the end of the summer, judging the autumn the most proper season for that expedition. He followed the course of the Eughrates, the greater part of his army being conveyed down in boats, and the rest marching on the banks of the river. To pais from the Euphrates into the Tigris, he caused b the canal Naarmalcha, made formerly by Adrian, to be cleanfed, and by that means arrived in a short time at Seleucia and Babylon, both which places he found abandoned Hetakes Seleu- by the enemy, and took without opposition. Thence he advanced to Ctefsphon, the metropolis of the Parthian dominions; which he invested, and took after a laborious and Cteliphon. fiege, during which his foldiers, for want of provisions, were obliged to feed upon fuch roots as they found in the fields; which bred various diftempers in the army. However, the place was in the end forced to furren ler; but the king, who had shut himself up in it, found means to make his escape, attended by a small body of horse; which was a great disappointment to Severus. The emperor gave up the city to be plundered by the foldiers, who put all the men to the fword; but spared the women c and children, whom, to the number of one hundred thousand, they fold for flaves. After the reduction of Ctefiphon, Severus wrote to the fenate, giving them a pompous account of his exploits, which he caused to be represented in painting, and exposed to public view. The senate decreed him a triumph, and honoured him with the title of Parthicus Maximus; which is to be seen on several medals of the next and the following years 8. Spartian tells us, that the army, in the transports of their joy for Caracalla made the reduction of Ctefiphon, proclaimed Caracalla, the emperor's eldest fon, his parta partner of the ner in the sovereign power, and at the same time gave the title of Cajar to his second fon Geta h; which honours were afterwards confirmed to both by the fenate. Caracalla had entered the eleventh year of his age on the fourth of April of this year 198. d Severus, not thinking it adviseable either to keep Ctesiphon, or pursue Vologeses, set out on his return into Syria about the beginning of winter, loaded with booty. He is supposed to have concluded a treaty with the Parthians; for we read of no wars empire.

cia, Babylon

Disturbances in Britain.

from their daily incurlions k.

Lætus murdered.

Severus

THE following year, when P. Cornelius Aullinus and M. Aufidius Fronto were confuls, Severus, on his march back into Syria, attacked the city of Atra, Barsemus, king of that place, having formerly fent confiderable fuccours to Niger; but was obliged to abandon the enterprize, after having loft a great many men, and most of his warlike engines!. About this time Severus caused two officers of great distinction to be put to death, viz. Julius Crispus, tribune of the prætorian guards, and Lætus, one of his best generals; the former for faying, that Severus exposed his troops wantonly to dangers, and obliged them to undergo great hardships only to satisfy his private f ambition and vanity. Latus's crime was, according to Herodian, his having afted with treachery in the battle of Lyons, as we have related above. But Dion Cassius, who commends him, both as an excellent citizen and foldier, tells us, that Severus put him to death, for no other reason but because he was greatly beloved by the soldiers, which the jealous emperor could not bear m. After he had allowed some respite to his harassed troops, and amassed an immense quantity of provisions and warlike engines, he returned before the city of Atra; but all his enforts against that between them and the Romans till eighteen years after, and Vologeses reigned peaceably to his death, which happened after that of Severus. While Severus was thus employed in the east, some disturbances arose in Britain, where the Caledonians taking up arms, invaded the Roman dominions, committing every-where dreadful ravages. Lupus, whom Severus had appointed governor of Britain, not finding himself in a condition to make head against that warlike nation with the troops he had with him, and well knowing, that Severus could not fend him timely affiftance, was forced to e purchase a peace of the enemy, and, with large sums, redeem the Roman territories attacks the city of Atra; but is * Idem ibid. Dio, p. 854. Ammian. l. xxiv. p. 278. Onurn. in fast. p. 70. Dio, l. lxxv. p. 854. & in excerpt. Val. p. 746. k Idem, obliged to raise GOLTZ. p. 85. 1 Idem, p. 844. the siege. p. 851, 866. * ldem, p. 855.

place

a place proving unfuccessful, he was forced to raise the siege anew, having lost, during the eighteen days it lafted, most of his machines, and an incredible number of men ". Thus did one city baffle all the attempts of Trajan and Severus, the two greatest commanders among the Roman emperors, as it did afterwards those of Artaxerxes, who, about the year 226. re-established the Persian on the ruin of the Partbian empire. Severus fpent most part of the following year, when Tib. Claudius Severus was conful the fecond time, with C. Aufidius Victorinus, in fearching after fuch of Niger's partizans as had not yet been discovered, and in gleaning, to use the expression of Tertullian o, after the vintage. Many persons of distinction, who believed themfelves to be fafe, were on this occasion seized, and condemned without mercy, such b especially as gave the tyrant any umbrage on account of their birth or riches P. next year, when L. Annius Fabianus and M. Nonius Mucianus were confuls, Severus gave the manly robe to his eldest fon, tho' he was then but fourteen years old, and named him could with himself for the year following. They both entered upon their confulship in Syria; and on that occasion the emperor gave a largess to the soldiers. Severus went, during his consulship, into Arabia, and from thence into Pa- Severus visus lestine, where he remitted the taxes with which he had loaded the inhabitants for their fine, Egypt, fleady adherence to Niger. While he was in Palestine, he published an edict, forbidding, under the severest penalties, the subjects of the empire to embrace either the Jewish or Christian religion; which gave rise to the fifth general persecution 4. c From Palestine he passed into Egypt, where he visited the tomb of Pompey the Great, and then purfued his rout to Alexandria, to which city he granted a public council or fenate; a mark of distinction which they had often begged in vain of other emperors'r. During his stay in Egypt, he visited all the cities, and viewed with great attention the curiofities of that ancient kingdom, especially the pyramids, the labyrinth, the statue of Memnon, &c. He examined with great care the books he found in the temples, and caused such of them as contained any secret knowledge to be conveyed into the sepulchre of Alexander the Great, which he ordered to be shut up, that no one might for the future either fee the body of that prince, or peruse those books'.

THE next consuls were Septimius Geta, the emperor's brother, and Fulvius Plau-Plautianus his d tianus, his great favourite. Some writers call Plautianus the emperor's kiniman; chieffavourite. others fay, that he was only his countryman, being a native of Africa, as was Severus. Be that as it will, all agree, that he was of a very mean descent; and some add, that in his youth he had been banished, for stirring up and heading the populace in a sedition. However, the emperor favoured him above all the great men in Rome, and was so passionate for him, that not in conversation only, but in public, in his speeches to the senate and people, he extolled him more than Tiberius had ever done his favourite Sejanus. He created him captain of the prætorian guards, and shared with him His great the power and wealth of the empire; for Plautianus was said to be possessed of as power. great riches as Severus himself, and thought to be no less powerful; at least greater e court was paid to his power, than to that of the emperor. The fenators and foldiers fwore by the fortune of Plautianus; public vows and facrifices were offered for his fafety, as if he had been emperor, and Rome was filled with his statues, mostly erected by the authority of the fenate. His table was better ferved than the emperor's, and his equipage far more magnificent. As there was no access to honours but through his favour, his house was constantly crouded with senators, knights, and great part of the people, all folicitors for admission to Plautianus, who was harder of access than the emperor. Geta, the brother of Severus, and the empress Julia, stood no less in awe of him than the rest, well knowing, that his authority was of far greater weight than theirs. This exorbitant power was most notoriously abused by the f favourite minister, who condemned, banished, and even put to death, many illustrious persons, whom he hated or suspected, without consulting the emperor, nay, without his knowledge; for tho' whatever the emperor faid or did was immediately carried to Plautianus, yet Severus was quite unacquainted with the crimes and arbitrary proceedings of his minister; and hence looking upon him as a man without n Idem, I. lxxv. p. 555.

O TERTUL. apol. c. 35.

P Vit. Sev. p. 69.

USEB. l. vi. c. 2.

P Vit. Sev. p. 70.

Dro, in excerpt. Val. p. 737.

Vit. Sev. ibid. 9 ldcm, p. 70.

reproach, he continued to heap upon him all forts of honours. He had already distinguished him with the consular ornaments, and created him senator, without removing him from the command of the prætorian guards; and this year he not only appointed appointed him conful, but, to the great furprize of Rome, and the whole empire, a daughter of Plautianus.

orders forme of pulled down.

Caracalla the occasion of his

+ 14 in.

declared his intention of marrying his eldest fon Caracalla to Fulvia Plautilla, the daughter of Plautianus; which he did accordingly this very year, foon after his ries his son Ca- return to Rome; for having settled the affairs in the east, he arrived unexpectedly at Rome about the latter end of May, and, according to Herodian, entered the city in triumph. Spartian writes, that he declined the triumph decreed him, because he could not fit in the triumphal chariot by reason of the gout; but suffered his son Caracalla to triumph over the Jews, who had, it feems, revolted, but had been again brought under subjection by Severus u. The emperor, upon his return, distributed immense sums among the soldiers and people, ten pieces of gold a man more than any other prince had ever been known to give, and added to this extraordinary largefs b most magnificent shews, which lasted seven days w. When the shews were over, the nuptials of Caracalla and Plautilla were celebrated with the utmost pomp and magnificence. Dion Cassius writes, that what Plautianus gave his daughter on this occasion, would have been a fufficient dower for fifty queens; and adds, that he appointed a hundred persons of good families to attend her, whom he had for that purpose privately caused to be made eunuchs, tho' some of them were married, and even had children; which, as that writer observes, highly provoked both the senate and people against him . About this time Severus gave the manly robe to his fecond fon Geta, who had entered the fourteenth year of his age on the twenty-seventh of May of this year 203. the tenth of his father's reign y. The following year, L. Fabius Septimius Cilo being c consul the second time, with L. Libo, the emperor, notwithstanding his great kindness for Plantianus, being offended at the great number of statues erected to him in all the public places of the city, caused some of them to be taken down. Hereupon a report being spread, that he was differed, several governors of provinces, looking bi flatues to be upon him already as a public enemy, caused his statues to be pulled down in their governments; but paid dear for their over-hafty zeal, some of them being deprived of their employments, and others tried by the senate, and condemned to banishment. Among the latter was Racius Constans, governor of Sardinia, who was tried by the emperor in person, in conjunction with Dion Cossius, and several other senators. Severus on this occasion solemnly declared, that he would never suffer the least affront or d injury to be offered with impunity to Plautianus; but nevertheless, before a year was over, he changed his fentiments, and fuffered him to be put to death in his presence. His ruin was chiefly owing to Caracalla, who, not able to bear with the haughty and imperious temper of his wife Plautilla, hated both her and his father-in-law Plautianus, openly declaring, that if ever he obtained the fovereign power, they should both foon feel the effects of his refentment. Hereupon Plautianus resolved to be before hand with him, not doubting but upon his death he should be able to seize the empire for himself, as Severus was now stricken in years, and troubled with the gout. In the mean time Geta, the emperor's brother, being taken ill, and finding there was no hope of his recovery, defired to fee Severus before he died, and acquainted e him with the haughty, imperious and tyrannical conduct of his favourite minister. Thenceforth the emperor began to look upon him with a jealous eye, and to leffen by degrees his overgrown power; which he was no fooner apprifed of, than he resolved to exert the authority he still enjoyed, and secure, by the murder both of the emperor and his fon, the fovereignty to himself; at least Saturninus, one of the tribunes of the prætorian guards, declared to Severus, that Plautianus had charged him to affaffinate them both, and shewed him his orders in writing. Herodian 2 and Ammianus Marcellinus 2 seem not to question in the least the truth of his deposition; but Dion Callius looks upon the whole as a contrivance of Caracalla to destroy Plautianus, whose haughty behaviour he could no longer brook b. Be that as it will, f they all agree, that Plautianus, coming to the palace of his own accord, or fent for by the emperor, as Dion will have it, and entering the emperor's room, where Caracalla then was, in order to clear himself from the crime laid to his charge, the young prince rushed upon him with a great fury, snatched his sword from his side, which He is murder- he wore as captain of the guards, and ordered those who were present to dispatch ed by his orders. him, being prevented by the emperor, who began to relent, from doing it himself. His body was cast into the street; but soon after taken, by the emperor's orders, and interred.

W Vit. Sev. p. 63. W Dio, l. lxxvi. w Dto, l. lxxvi. p. 859, 860. Herod. ibid. iii. p. 531, 533. Ammian. l. xxix. p. * Dio, p. 859. Y Vit. Sev. p. 268. Dio, l. lxxvi. p. 861.

a interred c. Severus immediately affembled the fenate; but without uttering any invectives against Plautianus, only bewailed the unhappy lot of mankind, fince some loved to excess, and others abused the love that was shewn them. He did not seem to believe, says Dion Cassius, that Plautianus had ordered the tribune to murder him; but nevertheless prosecuted, and condemned either to death or banishment, all his friends and creatures. His daughter Plautilla, and his brother Plautius, were banished to the island of Liparis, where they were murdered by order of Caracalla, soon after his accession to the empire d. Herodian writes, that they were banished to Sicily, and there generously supported by Severus during his life-time . This year, the 957. of Rome, the 204. of the christian æra, and the twelfth of the reign of Severus, were celebrated with extraordinary pomp the fecular games f.

THE next confuls were the emperor's two fons, Caracalla the second time, and Geta the first. During their administration, Severus continued either at Rome, or in the neighbourhood, and applied himself wholly to the administration of justice, which he did with great impartiality, following therein the advice of the celebrated civilian Papinianus, whom he appointed captain of the guards; for at this time the chief Papinianus province of that officer was to decide law-suits with the emperor, or in his name. made captain Papinianus, in the discharge of this important office, employed as his counsellors of the guards. Paulus and Ulpianus, two men eminently accomplished in the knowledge of the laws. As the empire now enjoyed a profound peace, Severus was at leifure to reform many Severus rec abuses; which he did accordingly: but is blamed by most of the ancients, on account abuses, enasts of his excessive severity, especially by the emperor Salien who at letters in the abuses, enasts of his excessive severity, especially by the emperor Julian, who thinks his cruel in-good taws, &c. flexibility, as he styles it, his greatest fault 8; for he never pardoned the least transgression. He enacted several laws, which are mightily cried up by the writers of those times, as equally just and necessary. Many of them are still extant in the Code. He allowed no power to his freed-men; nor would he fuffer the fenate to diffinguish them with any honours. He chose for governors of the provinces men of unblemished characters, and was always ready to hear with great patience the complaints of his people. No prince ever managed the public money more frugally; and by that means he left the exchequer exceeding rich at his death, tho' he had found it quite d empty, and had been engaged in several expensive wars. When he died, corn was found in the public granaries sufficient to supply the city for seven years, and oil in the store-houses, which he built at a vast charge, for the consumption of five years, reckoning not only the city of Rome, but all the places in Italy that produced no oil. He even left wherewithal to supply for ever the indigent people of Rome with a certain quantity of oil every day, which was in part to be fent yearly by the inhabitants of Libya Tripolitana, who of their own accord submitted to that burden out of regard to Severus, who was of the fame province, and had obliged them, by utterly extirpating a neighbouring nation, that often invaded their country, and laid waste their But this contribution proving in process of time very burdensome to them, e Constantine remitted it. Severus repaired most of the public edifices of Rome, and raised an incredible number of new ones in Rome, in Antioch, in Alexandria, in Byzan-tium, and in most of the great cities of the empire. The following year, when Num-Several sense mius Albinus and Fulvius Æmilianus were consuls, was remarkable for the death of death. many illustrious fenators, inhumanly massacred by the emperor's orders. Among these were Quintillus Plautianus and Apronianus, both persons of unblemished characters, and of great authority in the senate, but hated by the emperor on account of their illustrious birth, and extraordinary accomplishments. They were both accused of having consulted the astrologers about the death of Severus, and their own fate, and condemned, without so much as being heard. Bæbius Marcellinus, another f senator of great distinction, was condemned by the senate, and that instant hurried to execution, upon the deposition of a single evidence, who charged him with having listened while Apronianus was consulting the astrologer. The evidence had been suborned by Pollenius Sebennus, who was himfelf foon after condemned at the fuit of the people of Noricum, whom he had tyrannically oppressed, while he governed that province. The following year, when Ager and Maximus were confuls, the northern inhabitants The Britons reof Britain invaded the Roman territories, and putting to flight the legions that guarded volt. them, committed every-where most dreadful ravages. Virius Lupus, then governor, e Herod, l. iii. p. 535. f Censor. e. b. 71. b Vit. Sev. p. 67. Dio, p. 869. C. Idem ibid. Herod. p. 534. d Dio, p. 862. e Hero 7. Zos. l. ii. p. 669. g Jul. Cæs. p. 14. Vit. Sev. p. 71. 77. Zos. l. ii. p. 669. Ju Dio in excerpt, Val. p. 741, &c. Vol. VI. N° 2.

or, as Ulpian calls him, prefident of Britain, not thinking himself in a condition to a withftand the enemy, retired before them, and in the mean time acquainted the emperor with the state of affairs in that province; who apprehending that the whole island, unless awed by a powerful army, would soon revolt, and shake off the yoke, resolved to go thither in person; and accordingly, having made the necessary preparations for this expedition, he set out for Britain the ensuing year, while his two sons were consuls, Caracalla the third time, and Geta the second. Before he lest Rome, he invested his fon Geta with the tribunitial power, and conferred upon him the title of Augustus, which he had bestowed three years before on his eldest son Caracalla; so that there were now three Augustus's at a time, which had never happened before.

he marched early in the spring of the ensuing year, when Pompeianus and Avitus were confuls, against the Maata, who bordered on the Roman dominions, and the Caledonians, who dwelt more to the north. No battle was fought in this expedition; but bridges, and drying marshy grounds, fifty thousand of them are said to have perished k. Herodian writes, that the Caledonians incessantly harassed the army on their march, attacked them unexpectedly, cut many thousands of them in pieces, and then retired into their fens and woods, whether the Romans could not follow them 1. The emperor, though stricken in years, and troubled with the gout, purfued his painful march, furmounting with great chearfulness all difficulties, till he reached the most distant and northern coasts of the island, laying the country waste far and wide, and putting all to fire and fword; infomuch that the Caledonians were where he had left his fon Geta to administer justice during his absence. For this expedition he was honoured by the senate with the title of Britannicus Maximus, and his

in the end obliged to purchase a peace, by yielding to the Romans part of their country, and delivering up their arms. Dion Cassius adds, that Severus, during his stay in the most northern parts of Britain, observed with great exactness the length of the days and nights, of the fummer and winter m; which he could not do, without continuing there, that is, in the north of Scotland, at least fix months. Having thus concluded a peace with the Caledonians, he returned to the fouthern parts of Britain, nevertheless, what by the enemy's ambuscades, what by the hardships the Roman c foldiers underwent, and the toils they endured in cutting down woods, building

The emperor took both his sons with him, being glad of that opportunity to remove b them from Rome, where they abandoned themselves to idleness and debauchery, and to inure them to the toils and fatigues of war. The Britons were no sooner informed of his arrival in their island, than, dreading his power, they sent embassadors to him, offering to submit upon honourable terms. Severus detained the embassadors till he was ready to take the field, and then dismissed them, without granting them their request. He passed the first winter, it seems, in the southern parts of Britain, whence

C

ſ

2

C

h

to fa

ye

Pa

qo

fpe.

Call

to t

thei

Rh.

f the

Out

¢χρ

the

L.

t: Ċ.

25

1

of

e w

Geta invested nitial power, and declared Augustus.

Severus's expedition into Britain.

He over-runs the whole island.

two fons with that of Britannicus ".

His wall in Britain.

Severus spent great part of the following year, when Man. Acilius Faustinus and Triarius Rufinus were confuls, in building a wall in Britain from fea to fea, to fecure his e conquests, and part the Roman territories from those of the more northern Britons not subject to Rome. No mention of this wall is made either by Dion Cassius or Herodian, who lived at that time, and give us a very particular account of the exploits of Severus in Britain. However, Spartian speaks of it, and calls it the chief ornament of Severus's reign; nay, he pretends, that, on account of this wall, he was honoured by the senate with the title of Britannicus. There is a great disagreement among authors, both as to the nature of this work, and its fituation. Some writers take it to have been a wall, and others only a ditch, fortified on the Roman fide with a rampart and palifades. Spartian styles it a wall or ditch P. Orosius supposes it to have been a ditch defended by a rampart, and a great number of towers at a small f distance from each other 9. Beda thinks it was a wall, built not with stone, but turf, and supported by a rampart, and sharp stakes driven deep into the ground r. The same writer is of opinion, that it was raised by Severus in the same place where a new wall was built by the Romans about the middle of the fifth century, when they intirely abandoned the island; that is, so far as we can judge from the context, on the isthmus, which he described before, between the friths of Forth and Clydes. Buchanan likewife places this wall on the fame isthmus '; and adds, that, in his time, fome remains

In what place it was built.

> * Dio, l. lxxvi. p. 867.
>
> PAGI, p. 207.
>
> Vit. Sev. p. 71.
>
> P Herod. l. 111. p. 507.
>
> P Oros. l. vii. c. 17.
>
> BUCHAN. rer. Scot. l. i. p. 16.l. 19. p. 116. & l.v. p. 135. n Goltz. p. SS. P. Pagi, p. 207. Vit. Sev. l.i. c. 5. Idem ibid. c. 12. r Bed. hift, Ang.

a of it were still to be seen. On the other hand, Camden maintains Severus's wall to have stood a great way more to the south, that is, between the mouth of the Tyne and Solway frub. The learned Usher is of the same opinion, and alledges very strong reasons to support it w. However, we cannot persuade ourselves, that Severus, after having marched from one end of the island to the other, and obliged the enemies of Rome to yield to him part of their country, should have abandoned to them a considerable portion of the Roman dominions, viz. the countries lying between Northumberland or Cumberland, and the friths of the Forth and Clyde. For that these countries belonged to the Romans before Severus's time, Usher himself owns; and maintains x, that Antoninus built his wall on the above-mentioned ifthmus. We do b not find, that the northern Britons seized any part of the Roman dominions in the reign of M. Aurelius, nor in that of Commodus; for the they passed the wall in the time of Commodus, yet they were driven back by Ulpius Marcellus, and restrained within their ancient bounds, that is, according to Usher, within the two abovementioned friths. Is it therefore probable, that Severus thus curtailed the Roman empire, and abandoned to the barbarians, as they are called by the Roman writers, fuch an extensive country, after having, at immense charge, and with the loss of fifty thousand men, obliged them to yield part of theirs? Besides, Spartian tells us in express words, that Severus's wall reached from sea to sea; and Eutropius, that it was but thirty-two miles in length "; which proves, that it stood on the abovee mentioned isthmus, and could stand in no other part of the whole island. Severus, having ended his wall, retired with his army to Eboracum, now York, where he was feized with a lingering distemper, occasioned, as was believed, by his grief and affliction for the wicked life of his eldest son, who, notwithstanding the extraordinary affection Severus had ever shewn him, had, during the late expedition, with a boldness hardly to be matched, attempted to murder him in the fight of the whole Caracalla army. For while the emperor, at the head of his troops in battle-array, was con-attempts to cluding a treaty with the Britons, and receiving their arms, Caraculla, who stood father. behind him, drawing unexpectedly his fword, in the fight both of the Roman and British army, advanced to stab him, and would have put his wicked design in exed cution, had he not been deterred from it by the outcries of those who stood next to the emperor. Severus, turning about that instant, saw his son with a naked sword in his hand; but without betraying the least surprize, or uttering a single word, pur-fued the business in hand, received the arms of the Britons, and signed the treaty. When he returned to his tent, he fent for his fon; and, in the presence of Papinianus, captain of the guards, and Castor, his chief chamberlain, first reproached him with his black and wicked attempt; then offering him a drawn fword, If your ambition to reign alone prompts you, faid he, to imbrue your hands in the blood of your father, execute your impious purpose rather in this place, than in the fight of the e whole world, and in the presence both of our friends and enemies: if you are not yet abandoned to such a degree as to murder your father with your own hand, order Papinianus to commit the parricide: you are emperor; he must obey you?. We fpeech. THE following year, when Gentianus and Bassus were consuls, the Meate and The Mexice Caledonians, understanding that the emperor was indisposed, and not in a condition and Caledonians revolt. to take the field, without any regard to the late treaty, flew to arms; and affembling their forces, attempted to pass the new wall, and invade the Roman dominions; which so provoked Severus, that he ordered Caracalla to lead the whole army against f the enemy, and entering their country anew, to put all he met to the sword, without distinction of sex or age. The young prince, seeing himself, contrary to his expectation, intrusted with so great a command, made it his whole study to debauch the officers and foldiers, with a defign to depose his father. Many tribunes and cen- Caracalla turions, hearkening to him, publicly declared, before the army fet out from York, attempts to that they would no longer obey an old man, worn out with infirmities, lame, and father. disabled by the gout from marching at their head, and discharging the duties of an emperor. These speeches were soon carried to Severus, who immediately summoning the army to affemble, caused himself to be taken up, and placed upon his do not find, that Caracalla was touched with remorfe, or any-ways affected, by this

w Ush. Britan. eccles. antiquit. p. 606. <sup>2</sup> Dio, p. 868.

* Idem ibid. p. 1024.

♥ EUTROP. 1. viii. c. 10.

t

9

ii 2

in

th

ye th

by 10

h

at live flo

but

to $ 0, cit;

fe!f

Fhi.

karn

Caia

be fo

¥(to:

bad c

Sur.

metra metre to San Greek

16 ibu

fant biji

tribunal; whence, in most bitter terms, he reproached with folly, ingratitude, and a treachery, such of the officers as had seconded the wicked attempts of his son; ordered them all to be beheaded that instant in his presence; and then, addressing himself to the army, struck with terror and dismay at the fight of so many executions, asked them with an imperious and majestic air, whether they were yet satisffied, that the head ruled, and not the feet a? Some writers tell us, that he would at the same time have put his son to death, had he not been diverted from it by the captains of the guards b; others, on the contrary, fay, that the captains of the guards advised him to deliver himself, by the death of his unnatural son, from the dangers that threatened him, but that he could not by any means prevail upon himfelf to follow their advice. After this, his distemper being greatly increased by the b uneasiness of his mind, he was soon reduced to the last extremity; when he sent for his two fons, caused the speech of Micipsa to his children, in Salust, to be read to them, exhorted them to concord and unity, and recommended to them this tyrannical maxim; to inrich the foldiers, and gain their affections, without caring whether they were beloved or hated by the rest of their subjects d. When he found his end approaching, he cried out, I have been every thing, and every thing is nothing c. Then ordering the urn to be brought to him, in which his ashes were to be inclosed, on seeing it, Little urn, said he, you shall contain one, for whom the whole world was too little f. Before he expired, he ordered the golden statue of Fortune, which always flood in the emperor's room, to be carried into the rooms, first of his eldest, and c then of his youngest son 8. As his pains increased, especially in his feet, he called for poison; but no one daring to administer it to him, he is said to have glutted Severus dies. himself with coarse meats, which soon put an end to his life . He died at York on the fourth of February of the year 211. after having lived, according to Dion Cassius, fixty-five years, nine months, and twenty-five days, and reigned seventeen years, eight months, and three days. His body was burnt at York with great folemnity, and his ashes conveyed by his two sons to Rome, in a golden urn, or, as others will have it, in an urn of porphyry. It was received in all the provinces with extraordinary pomp, and deposited at Rome in the stately mausoleum of the emperor Adrian. He was foon after ranked among the gods, with the usual ceremonies, d His charafter. described at length by Herodian k. Severus was, without all doubt, a person of most extraordinary parts; but all his good qualities were quite eclipsed by his excessive cruelty, and infatiable avarice. Some writers endeavour to excuse his cruelty, which they fosten with the name of severity, and pretend, that, without violent remedies, the many evils that had long prevailed in the state, could never have been rooted out. It was faid of him, if Spartian is to be credited, as it had been formerly faid of Augustus, That he ought never to have been born, or never to have died. He was, according to the same writer, greatly esteemed, nay, and generally loved after his death, when no one dreaded his cruelty, and all felt the effects of his excellent regulations. Galen tells us, that his greatest pleasure was to do good to all; and e adds, that he kept constantly by him a great store of treacle, and other expensive remedies, to relieve such as wanted them; by which means he saved the lives of many persons, namely, of Antipater, his Greek secretary; of the son of Piso, to whom Galen inscribed his treatise on treacle; and of a lady of distinction, named Arria, for whom Severus had a particular value, because she applied herself to the study of philosophy, and the reading of Platom. But after all, the most we can say in his commendation is, that Severus deserves to be ranked among the great, but not among the good princes. Of the writers, who flourished in his reign, we shall

Severus

```
<sup>a</sup> Vit. Sev. p. 71. Aur. Vict. b Vit. Caracall. p. 89. c Dio, l. lxxvi. p. 868. d Dio, p. 868. c Vit. Sev. p. 73. c Dio, p. 869. s Vit. Sev. p. 74. b Vict. epit. l Dio, ibid. k Herod. l. iv. p. 540. l Vit. Sev. p. 71. m Gal. de ther. l. ii. p. 457, 458.
```

give an account in our note (N).

it as an elegant and judicious performance. It has been long fince lost. The sophist Antipater, a native of Hierapolis in Asia, wrote likewise the history of Severus's reign, and was for that work first appointed the emperor's Greek secretary, afterwards charged with the care of educating his two sons Caracalla

(N) Among the writers who flourished at this time, we may reckon the emperor himself; for he wrote the history of his own life, which was a kind of apology for his great severity. Sparsian commends it as a sincere and impartial account of the transactions of his reign (59); and Victor speaks of Severus was succeeded by his two sons Bassianus and Geta, whom he had invested is succeeded by with the sovereign power, during his life-time, and by his last will appointed to his sons Carareign jointly after his death. The former, commonly known by the nickname of Caracalla, a Gaulish word for a kind of cassock used in Gaul, and by him first introduced among the Romans, gave, from his infancy, many instances of an extraor-Their different dinary sweet and mild temper; but as he grew up, abandoned himself to all man-tempers. ner of cruelty, and proved in the end a most inhuman and bloody tyrant; whereas the latter, who in his tender years seemed no less void of humanity than his father, and Geta; then honoured with the confulfhip; and lastly, preferred to the government of Bithynia; from which employment he was soon removed, on account of his excessive cruelty (60). His history has not reached our times. Galen, the prince of physicians, was still alive in Severus's time; for he lived, according to Suidas, seventy years (61). He was a native of Pergamus, and the son of one Nico, a celebrated architect and geometrician. He was likewise well versed in the other branches of mathematics, and pretended to understand and teach the Greek tongue in its greatest purity. His son Claudius Galenus was born in the year 131. the fifteenth of Adrian's reign, as appears from F. Labbe, who collected out of Galen's works, and published in 1660. all the passages in which that writer makes any mention of himself (62). He came to Rome, while L. Verus was making war upon the Parthians in the east, being at that time thirty-two or thirtythree years old (63). He staid in Rome about three years, and then returned to his own country; whence, three or four years after, he was invited into Italy by M. Aurelius, that is, about the end of the year 169. He refused to attend that prince into Germany, and continued at Rome, where he is supposed to have spent the remaining part of his life. He left behind him a great many works on different subjects, viz. on physic, rhetoric, philosophy, and some grammatical pieces (64). Jonssus takes the treatise on treacle not to be his, because he does not mention it among his other works (65). The same writer maintains the history of the philosophers, ascribed to Galen, to be nothing else but the sive books of Plutarch upon the opinions of philosophers (66). Some find fault with Galen for crying down all those of his profession, who in his time were in any repute at Rome (67). Diogenes Laertius, the author of the lives of the philosophers comprised in ten books, flourished, according to Vossius, under Antoninus Pius; but, according to Jonssius, whose conjectures seem to us better grounded, under Severus (68). He was a native, as Jonssius conjectures, of Laertes, a small city of Cilitia, and thence took the surname of Laertes. tius. After he had taken great pains to inform him-felf of the different tenets of the various fects of philosophers, he embraced the worst of all, that is, the Epicurean. His work is greatly esteemed by the learned, but in many places strangely corrupted. Casaubon ascribes many of the faults, which are to be found in the work, to the author himself, who, according to him, wanted either memory, judg-ment, or time, to digest the materials which he had collected (69). Before he wrote the lives of the philosophers, he published a great number of epi-grams in all kinds of verses, which he styled Pammetra, that is, all forts of measures (70). native of Laranda in Lycamia, flourished, according to Suidas (71), under Severus, and wrote several Greek poems. Pisander, who, in the reign of the emperor Alexander, wrote some histories, or rather fables, in Greek verse, was his fon. Hermocrates, the fophist, would have proved the most eloquent orator of his age, had he had time to improve his extraordinary talents; but he died in the twentyeighth year of his age. Severus often heard him, and with great pleafure. The emperor obliged him, while he was in the east, to marry the daughter of the sophist Antipater; but he divorced her soon after (72). Julius Titianus, the father of the orator of the same name, who was preceptor to the son of Maximinus, about the year 235. published many pieces mightily cried up by the ancients; and, among the rest, a description of all the provinces of the empire; and a book of letters, in which he imitated the style of Cicero; for he had an extraordinary talent in imitating the different styles of authors, and was thence called the ape of his time (73). C. Julius Solinus, whose description of the earth, under the title of Polyhistor, has reached us, flourished, according to fome writers, under Severus; but others, with Voffins, are quite at a loss about the time in which that author wrote. All we know for certain is, that he lived after Pliny the elder, and before St. Ferom; that is, after the first century, and before the end of the fourth (74). Dodwel observes, that no author quotes him before the fourth century; and concludes, from some conjectures, that he flourished after Cenforinus, who wrote in the year 238 (75). His work is, for the most part, copied, and not very judicioully, from other writers, especially from Pliny the elder. Under Severus flourished Philostratus, author of the life of Apollonius Tyaneus; which work he undertook at the request of the empress Julia, the wife of Severus. Photius commends the elegance and foftness of his style; but thinks his construction not always agreeable to the rules of grammar (76). We have shewn, in the foregoing volume, how little credit his life of Apollonius deserves (77). In that history he promises to clear his hero in another work, from the aspersions of the philosopher Enphrates (78). But, if he was as good as his word, that performance has not reached us. He was, according to Eusebius, a native of Athens, and the fon of Philostratus Verus, who published a great many works, and, among the rest, one against the sophist Antipater (79). Besides the life of Apollonius, Philofiratus wrote four books of pictures, or descriptions, a treatise on heroes, letters on friendship, and the lives of the sophists in four books. All these works have reached our times. Under Severus lived two other writers of the same name, viz. Philostratus, the fon of Nervianus, to whom some writers ascribe the lives of the sophists; and Philostratus, a native of Lemnos, who wrote some descriptions: of these, the former was great nephew, and the latter grandfon by the mother, to the author of the life of Apollonius (80).

(60) Herod l. ii. p. 514. Philostr. soph. 50. Galen. ther. t. ii. p. 458. (61) Suid. p. 590. (62) Gal. vit. Jons. l. iii. c. 11. (63) Gal. prog. c. 3. (64) Suid. ibid. (65) Jons. l. iii. c. 12. (66) Idem ibid. (67) Vide Salmas. not. in Spart. p. 732. (68) Jons. l. iii. c. 12. (69) Diog. Laert. not. Cafaub. p. 18. (70) Hist. Grac. l. ii. c. 13. (71) Suid. p. 211. (72) Philostr. soph. 51. (73) Voss. bist. Lat. l. iii. p. 720, 721. (75) Dod. append. ad dissert. Cyprian. c. 15. (76) Phot. c. 44. (77) Hist. Univers. vol. V. p. 691, &c. (78) Philos. vit. Apoll. l. i. c. 10. (79) Euseb. in Hier. p. 435. (80) Vide Casaub. in Spart. p. 30. Vol. VI. N. 2.

changed, we may fay, by degrees, his temper, and became, in regard of his affa- a bility, moderation, and complaifance towards all, the darling both of the people and foldiery. They shewed, from their childhood, an utter aversion to each other, and were continually quarrelling, even in their common sports and diversions. This natural antipathy increased as they grew in years, notwithstanding all the intreaties, rebukes, and exhortations, both of their father, and their preceptor Antipater, who were continually laying before them the many evils that must necessarily attend the division and disagreement of brothers. But all to no purpose; for Severus no sooner expired, than Caracalla strove to have his brother excluded by the officers of the army from any share in the sovereignty; but the soldiers protesting, that they would equally obey both the fons of Severus, fince he had appointed both to succeed him, b he was forced to acknowledge his brother partner in the empire, and fuffer the foldiers to take the usual oath of allegiance to both. After this, Caracalla led his army towards the borders of the Maata and Caledonians, who had begun hostilities anew; but instead of attacking those warlike nations, he concluded a treaty with them, withdrew his men from the forts erected in their country, and restored to them the lands which Severus had obliged them to yield to him . Before he left Britain, he discharged Papinian, captain of the guards; caused Castor, his father's chamberlain, and chief favourite, to be put to death, together with Evodius, another of the deceased emperor's freed-men, and formerly his own preceptor; and dispatched assassins into Italy to murder Plautilla, who had been his wife, Plautius her brother, c and a celebrated charioteer, of the faction in the circus opposite to that which he

ful treaty with the Britons.

favoured o. Herodian tells us, that, before he left Britain, he dispatched, under various pretences, the phylicians who had refused to poison his father, and all the deceased emperor's friends, especially such as endeavoured to promote a good understanding between him and his brother P. Such was the beginning of the reign of Caracalla. The two brothers left Britain about the middle of the summer, and set out for Rome with their mother Julia, and the ashes of their deceased father. Misunderstand- Caracalla attempted on the road to murder his brother Geta; which attempt increased ing between the their mutual animolities and jealousies to such a degree, that thenceforth they both marched with their separate guards, and with no less wariness than if they had been d in an enemy's country, lodging constantly in different houses, and carefully watching the motions of each other. They were received with great folemnity at Rome, where they performed with extraordinary pomp the obsequies of their father, and then withdrew to the palace, which they divided into two; for it was larger, if Herodian is to be credited, than any city in the whole empire, except Rome. This division between the two princes rent the whole city, nay, and the empire, into factions; infomuch that, to avoid the many inconveniences and diforders thence arifing, a division of the empire was proposed. To this expedient they both hearkened; Geta, who loved a quiet life, declaring, that if Caracalla would but yield to him Asia and Egypt, he would retire to Antioch or Alexandria, and leave him in quiet possession of e the rest of the empire. But this scheme was defeated by their mother Julia, throwing herself at their feet, and begging, with many tears, that they would divide her too between them 4. Towards the close of this year, Caracalla attempted anew to murder his brother, during the feast of Saturn; which occasioned almost an open war between the two princes, and a great deal of bloodshed r.

THE following year, when the two brothers Julius and Caius Asper were consuls, Caracalla, unalterably fixed in his wicked purpose of destroying his brother, and ruling alone; but finding him guarded both against poison and open force, pretended a defire of being reconciled with him, and, by means of their common mother Julia, invited him to an interview in her chamber. Geta readily accepted the invitation, f and repaired, without guards, to the appointed place, not suspecting the least treachery in a proposal which came from his mother, who loved him with great tenderness. But he had no sooner entered her chamber, than some centurions, whom Caracalla had found means to convey privately into an adjoining room, rushing in, Geta murdered sword in hand, fell upon Geta, and dispatched him, with many wounds, in his moin the arms of ther's arms, who, in endeavouring to fave him, was wounded in the hand . Caracalla himself seems to have imbrued his hands in the blood of his brother; for Dion

n Dro, l. lxxviii. p. 882, & feq. Carac. & Get. vit. p. 87, & 91.

o Dro, l. lxxvii. p. 870. & lxxvii. p. 870. & ldem, p. 539—543. Dro, L lxxvii. p. 871. 1. lxxvi. p. 867. * Dio, p. 871. 4 HEROD. l. iii. p. 543.

a Cassius tells us, that he afterwards confectated in the temple of Serapis the sword with which he had murdered him '. Such was the end of this unhappy prince, after he had lived twenty-two years, and nine months, and reigned, from the death of his father, one year, and twenty-three days; for his father died on the fourth of February of the year 211. and he was killed the year following, on the twenty-seventh of the same month. He no sooner expired, than Caracalla, leaving the palace with great haste and precipitation, slew through the city to the camp of the prætorian guards, pretending great fear and difmay, and crying out aloud, that his life was in danger; that a bloody conspiracy had been formed against him; that he must have fallen a victim to the rage of his enemies, had not his innocence prob tected him. Upon his arrival in the camp, he went strait to the place where the ensigns and banners were kept, which was a kind of temple and asylum; and there throwing himself upon the ground, returned thanks to the gods for delivering him from so great and imminent a danger. To the soldiers, who crouded about him, he expressed himself with the same ambiguity; but by degrees let them know, that he was fole fovereign, and in a condition to bestow upon them what wealth and honours he pleased; and that they might immediately feel the effects of his generofity, which he faid was no longer checked or restrained, he doubled their pay, already very high, and added a largess of two thousand five hundred drachma's a man, which Caracalla gains he gave them leave to take that instant out of the public treasury. Thus was the the soldiery with an imexchequer, which his father had, by innumerable murders, and unjust confiscations, mente largels. been filling for the space of eighteen years, emptied in one day. Caracalla having, by this extravagant largels, secured the affections of the foldiery, told them in the end, that his brother Geta had attempted to murder him, but had lost his life in the attempt. Hereupon Caracalla was faluted fole emperor by the whole army, and the unhappy Geta declared a traitor, and a public enemy w. There was at this time another camp in the neighbourhood of Alba, now Albano, where the murder of Geta was highly refented; but Caracalla, hastening thither, soon appealed them, by exaggerating to them the pretended treachery of his brother, and promifing them an immense donative. Caracalla passed that night in the camp of the prætorian d guards, and the next day went to the senate, with a cuirass under his robes, guarded by all his troops, fome of whom he even placed among the fenators, to be ready in case any of them should attempt to revenge the death of Geta. His speech turned His speech in upon the wicked designs of Geta, whom he faid he had slain unwillingly in his own the fenate. defence, leffening the heinousness of his crime by the example of Romulus, and others, who had revenged with death injuries offered them by their brothers. In withdrawing from the fenate, he pronounced aloud the following words: "I give leave to all "those who are in banishment, to return home; I except none, by what crimes soever they may have deserved that punishment "." From the senate he returned to the palace, leaning upon Papinian and Chilo; whence he caused the body of his deceased Performs the e brother to be with great pomp conveyed to the tomb of the Septimian family on the obsequies of his Appian way; and when the funeral coremonies were over, prevailed upon the fenate eaustes him to to rank him with the usual folemnity among the gods v. Finding, upon his return be ranked to the palace, his mother Julia, bewailing with other women the death of her fon, among the transported with rage, he was at first for putting them all to death; but in the gods. end got the better of his passion, and even shewed great kindness to Julia, ordering the same honours to be paid to her as to himself. Spartian, and some other writers, pretend, that she gained his favour by facrificing to him what ought to have been dearer to her than her life. But neither Herodian, nor Dion Callius, charge Julia or Caracalla with any fuch crime; and those, who do, suppose Julia to have been only f step-mother to Caracalla, which is now by all writers agreed to be a gross mistake. We are told, that Caracalla, on hearing the name, or beholding the images or statues of Geta, used to burst into tears; but this affected grief did not prevent his massacring, without distinction of sex, age, or quality, all the friends of Geta 2. Dion Cassius writes, that he began this general massacre by ordering all his domestics, Orders all his to the number of twenty thousand persons, to be inhumanly butchered. It was death friends to be to utter his name; infomuch that no one durst use it thenceforth, even on the stage, massacred. where it was commonly given to flaves. He likewise ordered all the money with

The death of Papinian.

Many illustrious persons

inhumanly

massacred.

his name to be melted down, and the inscriptions erased. Among many illustrious a persons, whom the inhuman tyrant sacrificed to his rage and jealousy, as the friends of Geta, no one was more universally, or more deservedly regretted, than the celebrated Papinian, the greatest civilian, in the opinion of Zosimus 2 and Cujas b, that ever was, or ever will be. As Severus had recommended chiefly to him his two fons, he spared no pains to reconcile them, and often defeated the wicked attempts of Caracalla; on which account he was by him reckoned among the friends of Geta. Besides, the tyrant desiring him, after the murder of his brother, to compose a speech for him, excusing the crime, which he designed to pronounce in the senate, Papinian, whose love for justice, to use the expression of Zosimus, was equal to his knowledge of it, answered with great firmness, It is not so easy a thing to justify a b parricide, as to commit it; and it is a second parricide to defame an innocent person, after baving taken away his life. The emperor, provoked at this answer, ordered his head to be immediately struck off, and likewise his son's, who was then quæstor, and had but three days before exhibited most magnificent sports c. L. Fabius Chilo, another of Severus's great favourites, for whom Caracalla himfelf had a particular esteem, (for he used to style him his true friend, his benefactor, his father) was in the next place doomed to destruction, for having, together with Papinian, endeavoured by all means to promote union and concord between the two brothers. A tribune was fent with a band of foldiers to feize him in his house, drag him to the palace, and there butcher him in the presence of the emperor. But the people, and c the city-guards, whom Chilo had commanded while governor of Rome, moved with compassion in seeing a person of his rank thus ignominiously treated by the insulting foldiery, like a common malefactor, rescued him out of their hands, uttering dreadful menaces against the authors of such outrages; which so frightened Caracalla, that he declared he had given no such orders; and, to appeale the multitude, caused both the tribune and foldiers to be immediately put to death d. He spared Chilo, but vented his rage without controll upon many other illustrious persons, both of the fenatorial and equestrian order, not sparing any for whom either his father or brother had ever shewn the least kindness or esteem. Among these unhappy victims were, a daughter of the emperor M. Aurelius, whom the other emperors had treated d with the utmost respect, but Caracalla ordered to be strangled for shedding a few tears, when news was brought her of the death of Geta; Septimius Severus Afer, the fon of Geta, brother to the late emperor Severus, to whom Caracalla had fent the day before a dish from his own table, as a token of his friendship; Pompeianus, who had been twice consul, had commanded armies in several wars, and was grandson to the emperor M. Aurelius, by the empress Lucilla; Helvius Pertinax, son to the emperor of that name, and therefore greatly beloved by the people, and no less hated by the jealous tyrant, whom he had likewise provoked with a satirical jest; for when the titles of Parthicus and Sarmaticus were decreed to him by the senate, Pertinax moved, that the surname of Geticus might be added to the other two, alluding c not so much to the victory which Caracalla pretended to have gained over the Geta, as to the murder of his brother Geta e. Some of Geta's enemies fared no better than his friends; but the death of no man occasioned greater surprize in the city, than that of Latus, one of Caracalla's most intimate friends, and the first who had advised him to dispatch his brother. He did not even spare the vestal virgins, some of whom he ordered to be strangled for having bewailed the death of Geta. In short, The cruelty of no sex, rank, or age, escaped his cruelty. The people he loaded with taxes in all the provinces of the empire, and at Rome caused great numbers of them to be put to death, sometimes out of revenge, and sometimes only for his diversion; for he delighted in nothing so much as in feats of cruelty, and in bloodshed. The people f having one day rallied, at the Circensian games, a charioteer whom he favoured, he commanded his guards to rush in among the multitude, and put all the delinquents to the fword; but as the foldiers could not in fo great a croud distinguish them from the rest, they fell indifferently upon all, sword in hand, and made a dreadful havock of the disarmed multitude, sparing only such as had money enough about them to redeem their lives f. No prince ever employed more iniquitous means of raising money than Caracalla, or squandered it away with more prodigality. He

C. Vit. Car. p. 88. Dio in excerpt. Val. p. 742. r. p. 87. Herod. l. iv. p. 546. <sup>a</sup> Zos. l. i. p. 637. <sup>b</sup> Cuj. in cod. Theod. <sup>c</sup> Vit. C <sup>d</sup> Vit. Car. p. 86. Dio, l. lxxvii. p. 872. <sup>e</sup> Vit. Car. p. 87. b Cuj. in cod. Theod.

a often used to say, that money ought not to be lodged in private hands, but only in the prince's. Pursuant to his maxim, he impoverished his subjects in all the pro-Loads his subvinces of the empire, loading them with excellive imposts and taxes; for which, jetts with as well as for his extravagant expences, when his mother took the liberty to blame him, he, like a true tyrant, shewed her his naked sword, saying, As long as I bave this, I shall never want. However, he gave away such immense sums, mostly to persons who least of all deserved them, viz. to his guards, bussions, players, gladiators, charioteers, freed-men, &c. that he was in the end obliged to coin false money, which he fpent at home, while he employed what true gold and filver he could extort from his subjects in keeping the barbarians quiet, who were constantly threatb ening him with wars. He shewed on all occasions the utmost contempt for the senate, intirely neglected the administration of justice, took no care of the provinces, and raised to the highest employments the meanest, and in every respect the most infamous and unworthy persons of the empire. Thus he gave the government of Rome to an eunuch, named Sempronius, who was by birth an Iberian, by profession a poisoner and magician, who had been banished by his father Severus, and confined to a defert island. He appointed one Theocritus captain of the guards, who had been first a slave, and afterwards a dancing-master and stage-player. One Epagathus, another manumitted slave, bore likewise great sway at court, and with the other two ruled and controuled both the empire and emperor, setting all things to by his freedc fale, offices, provinces, public revenues, public justice, and the lives of men, both men innocent and guilty h. Caracalla was author of the famous law declaring all the free Declares all subjects of the empire Roman citizens. This constitution is commonly ascribed to the subjects of M. Aurelius; but that it was published not by that prince, but by Caracalla, we the empire Roman citiare told in express terms by Dion Cassius i, whose authority is of far greater weight zens. with us, than that of Aurelius Victor, who was, as we conjecture, led into that mistake by the words of Ulpian, ascribing the above-mentioned law to Antoninus k, though from the context it is manifest, that Ulpian speaks in that place of Antoninus Cara-calla, and not of M. Aurelius Antoninus. St. Chrysostom, whom some writers have followed, supposes Adrian to have been the author of this law!. Tho' the name d and privileges of Roman citizens were by this conflitution made common to all the subjects of the empire, yet the ancient distinction of colonies, of Latin, municipal, and free cities, subsisted long after, as appears from the Theodosian code m and digests n. But to clear up this difficulty, which has puzzled the best civilians, is not the province of an historian.

Caracalla, finding himself generally hated at Rome, on account of his cruelties, resolved to leave the city, and visit, after the example of Adrian, all the provinces of the empire. Pursuant to this resolution, having in the third year of his reign taken upon him his fourth confulship, and named Decius Cælius Balbinus, afterwards emperor, for his collegue, he fet out for Gaul, where he caused the proconsul of the His ernelties e province of Narbonne to be put to death, and made such havock of the people, that in Gaul. he was more hated and abhorred there, than he had ever been at Rome. He did not even spare the physicians, who had taken care of him during a dangerous malady, with which he was seized; but, upon his recovery, caused them to be put to death. In the beginning of the following year, when Messala and Sabinus were consuls, he returned to Rome, bringing with him an incredible quantity of habits made after the Gaulish fashion, which he wore himself, distributed among the people, and would fuffer none to wait upon him but in that dress. From this habit the emperor was Whence the nicknamed Caracalla, or Caracallus, for such was its Gaulish name P. Hence Scaliger name of derives, how rightly we leave the reader to judge, the word cassock, the caracalla Caracalla. f being a kind of cassock. At Rome it was called Antoniniana, from Antoninus, which was one of the emperor's names. His stay at Rome was very short; for this very year the Catti, the Alemanni, whom we find now mentioned for the first time in history, and several other German nations, taking up arms, began to make inroads into the Roman dominions. The Alemanni inhabited at this time the present duchy of Vir-

** Dio in excerpt. Val. p. 758. & l. lxxvii. p. 875.
** Dio, l. lxxvii. p. 877.
** Dio in excerpt. Val. p. 755.
** Digeft. 1. t. 5. l. xvii.
** Cod. Th. 2. t. 21. p. 189, 190. l. iv. t. 9. l. iii. p. 370.
** Digeft. 50. t. 15. l. i. p. 1921. & l. viii. p. 1923.
** Vit. Car. p. 87.
** Dio, l. lxxvii. p. 890.
** Spartian. p. 72. Euses chron. p. 230.

temberg, and were, as appears from their name, a mixed multitude of all the neigh-

Vol. VI. Nº. 2.

K k

bouring

against the Catti and Alemanni.

bouring nations 4. They had entered into an alliance with the Catti, whom we a have frequently mentioned in the foregoing reigns, and made daily incursions into His expedition the Roman territories. Caracalla therefore marched against them, but in that expedition approved himself a better soldier than commander. For tho' he behaved with great courage, and even challenged the bravest of the enemy to a single combat; yet, for want of conduct, he was obliged to purchase a peace with vait sums, and the liberty of retiring with fafety into the Roman dominions. Having asked some women, whom he had taken in the countries of the Catti and Alemanni, which they chose, to be fold for slaves, or put to death, they all preferred death to slavery. The emperor nevertheless ordered them to be fold; but they all laid violent hands on themselves, and some of them after having put to death their children s. It was b no sooner known in Germany, that he had bought a peace of the Catti and Alemanni, than all the nations inhabiting that extensive country flew to arms, threatening him with destructive war, unless with them too he shared his treasures; which he did accordingly, paying them yearly pensions, and by that means reducing himself to fuch streights, that he was obliged, as we have hinted above, to coin false money. When he received the deputies of the barbarians, he fuffered no one to be prefent except the interpreters, whom he caused to be immediately put to death, lest they should divulge what had passed. However, the barbarians themselves, when he was murdered, owned, that he had encouraged them to invade Italy, in case any misfortune should be al him, and to march strait to Rome, which, he said, they might take c with great ease. During his stay in Germany, he caused Gaiobamarus, king of the Quadi, to be treacherously murdered; and having ordered all the youth of Noricum to take arms, and join him, he commanded his troops, on what provocation we know not, to put them all to the fword ". For his pretended victories over the Alemanni, he took the title of Germanicus and Alemanni us w.

THE following year, when Latus was conful the second time with Cerealis, Caracalla, leaving Germany, led his army into Dacia, where he gained fome small advantages over the Geta, and then pursued his march through Thrace to the Helejpont, He passes over which he crossed, not without danger of being shipwrecked; and arriving in Asia, hastened to Pergamus, hoping to be delivered by the god Æsculapius, worshipped d in that city, from all the maladies, fays Herodian, both of his body and mind; but the god, continues that historian, was deaf to his prayers; so that he left Pergamus, after having inriched it with many privileges, as if he designed to bribe the deity, and pursued his journey to Ilium, where he viewed the remains of ancient Troy, and visited the tomb of Achilles, paying extraordinary honours to the memory of that hero, tho' an implacable enemy to the Trojans, from whom the Romans pretended to derive their origin. From Ilium he went to Nicomedia, where he spent the winter. In that city he invited Dion Cassius to sup with him, during the feast of Saturn; for he obliged most of the senators to attend him in all his journeys, to defray his travelling charges, and to build in the cities, where he passed the winter, theatres, e circus's, and amphitheatres, for public sports x. Hittorians observe, that, to gain the affections of the foreign nations, he dreffed after the manner of the countries through which he passed: thus in Germany he assumed the German habit, and chose fuch of the German foldiers as were most strong and active, for his guard. When he entered Macedon, from a German he became a Macedonian in habit and behaviour. For pretending to be a great admirer of Alexander, he adopted, not only the habit in which that conqueror was represented, but his air and mien, affecting an awful and threatening countenance, and bending his head fomewhat to one fide. He ordered several statues to be set up in Rome, to the honour of that hero; and among the rest, some with two faces, one resembling Alexander, and the other himself. He f ordered himself to be styled Alexander, and Antoninus the Great, called a squadron of his army a phalanx, and gave to his officers the names of the commanders of Alexander. He had no sooner entered Asia, than he forgot Alexander, and studied in all things to refemble Achilles, whose tomb he had visited. Thus he travelled, more like a player than an emperor, being the laughing-stock of other nations, and the shame and disgrace of his own. The following year, when C. Atius Sabinus was conful the fecond time, with Cornelius Anullinus, Caracalla, leaving Nicomedia after <sup>9</sup> Vide Vorburg. hist. Rom. Ger. p. 473. & Buch. Belg. l. vi. c. 7. Idem in excerpt. Val. p. 749, 750. Dio, l. Ixxviii. p. 891. <sup>9</sup> Idem in excerpt. Val. p. 749, 750.

His levity.

t Dio, l. Ixxviii. p. 891.
& 754.

w CAR, vit. p. 89. Goltz. p. 93. Birag. p. 293.

* Dio, l. lxxvii. p. 876. " Idem in excerpt. Val. p. 749. * Dio, l. lxxviii. p. 883, 884.

a the fourth of April, (for he celebrated his birth-day there) crossed Bithynia, Afia, and the other provinces, on his journey to Antioch, in which city he was received with extraordinary pomp. During his stay there, he wrote to the senate, that he was well apprifed they did not approve of his conduct; but so long as he had an army at his command, he neither valued their reproaches, nor feared their hatred y. He was very defirous of picking a quarrel with the Parthians, who were involved in a civil war, occasioned by the ambition of the two sons of the late king Vologeses; but they complying with all his demands, he postponed his intended expedition against them, and bent his mind on the reduction of Ofrboene and Armenia, tho' the kings of these two countries lived in perfect amity with the Romans. However, Caracalla, having b invited them to Antioch, as friends and allies of the Roman people, caused them to He treachebe arrested there, and imprisoned, without the least colour or pretence for so doing. roussyleizes and Hereupon Olyppene impediately submitted, and was according to form without the Hereupon O/rhoene immediately submitted, and was, according to some writers, kings of Osthoreduced to a Roman province; tho' others maintain, that it was long after governed ene and Armeby its own princes 4. All we know for certain is, that Caracalla established a Roman nia. colony at Edessa, the capital of Osrboene 2, and that, in the fourth century, the whole country was subject to the Romans. The Armenians, notwithstanding the captivity of their king, made a vigorous resistance; gave a total overthrow to Theocritus the comedian, who was fent against them at the head of a numerous army; bassled all the efforts of Caracal a; and maintained themselves in possession of their ancient libere ties b. From Antioch the emperor proceeded to Alexandria, where he made a dreadful havock of the inhabitants, being highly provoked against them for the many lampoons, which, agreeable to their fatirical humour, they had published on occafion of the death of Geta. He gave private orders to his numerous troops, who were Orders a genedispersed all over the city, to fall upon the inhabitants in the night-time, to enter ral massacre as and pillage their houses, and put all to the sword, without distinction of sex, age or condition. His cruel orders were executed with fuch barbarity, as can hardly be expressed; the whole city floated in blood; every house was filled with carcases; and the return of day discovered in every street the sad monuments of the mighty butchery: but the tyrant, not yet fatiated with blood, commanded the flaughter to d be continued all the day following, that he might have the pleasure of beholding it from the temple of Serapis, where he had passed the preceding night, imploring, during the general massicre, the protection of that deity. When the soldiers were tired with flaughter, Caracalla wrote to the fenate, acquainting them, that he had revenged the affronts offered him by the Alexandrians; but that it was not necessary to specify the number of the dead, nor their condition, since none had perished but fuch as were guilty. Before he left the city, he stripped it of all its privileges; suppreffed the celebrated affembly of learned men; ordered all strangers who lived there, to abandon the place; and that fuch as had escaped the general massacre, who were very few, might not have the fatisfaction of feeing one another, he cut off all e communication of one street with another, by walls built for that purpose, and guarded by the troops he left there. However, as the tyrant died foon after, Alexandria speedily recovered its former splendor, and continued to be the first city of the empire after Rome. FROM Alexandria the emperor returned to Antioch, with a design to make war upon the Parthians, and, by some memorable exploit, deserve the surname of Parthieus, which he seems to have preferred to all others. In order to have some pretence His treachery for declaring war, he fent an embaffy to Artabanes with rich presents, to desire his towards the daughter in marriage, not doubting but the Parthian would deny him his request; which happened accordingly, Artabanes alledging, that his daughter, brought up f after the Parthian manner, could never be reconciled to the customs of the Romans d. Herodian writes, that Caracalla perfifting in his demand, Artabanes at length complied with it; suffered him to enter his dominions; dispatched orders to his governors to receive and entertain him every-where with the utmost magnificence; and went out himself in person to meet him, as he approached the royal city of Ctesis bon, where the nuptials were to be folemnized. Artabanes was attended by the chief nobility of the kingdom, and a numerous body of guards, all unarmed, and in their gayest attire. But Caracalla, abusing the confidence they reposed in him with a treachery

У Dio, l. lxxvii. p. 879. Некор. l. iv. p. 519. Spanii. l. ix. p. 775. b Dio, l. lxxvii. p. 875. * SPANH. l. ix. p. 775. 880., Vit. Car. p. 87. d Dio, l. lxxviii. p. 896.

* Vide Spanh. I. ii. p. 86. & Syncel. p. 359. * HEROD. l. iv. p. 549. Dio, l. lxxvii. p. 879,

Honoured by the fenate with the title of Par-

hardly to be matched, gave the signal to his foldiers to fall upon them sword in hand; a which they did accordingly, and made a terrible flaughter of the unarmed multitude, expecting nothing less than such a reception. However, the king had the good fortune to make his escape unhurt. After this exploit, worthy of such an emperor as Caracalla, the cruel and perfidious monster, inraged that Artabanes had escaped him, wrecked his fury on all the countries through which he passed on his return to Syria, leaving every-where difmal monuments of his barbarous cruelty, and infatiable avarice e. Thus Herodian. But Dion Cassius writes, that Caracalla, upon the Parthian king's refusing him his daughter, entered his dominions, without any further declaration of war; ravaged great part of Media; destroyed several cities; took Arbela; and there demolished the tombs of the Parthian monarchs, infulting their remains in a b most outrageous manner. The same writer adds, that as the irruption was sudden and unexpected, he no-where met with the least opposition, or even saw the sace of an enemy. Spartian indeed speaks of a tumultuary engagement between the Parthians and Romans, in which Caracalla let loose wild beasts against the enemy s. But with us his authority is of no weight, when clashing with that of Dion Cassius. The emperor returned from this memorable expedition to Edessa, whence he wrote boasting letters to the senate, as if he had subdued the Parthians, and reduced all the east. The senate, tho' informed of what had passed, yet decreed him a triumph, and the title of Parthicus, which above all he feemed to covet h. The following year, when C. Bruttius Prasens and T. Messius Extricatus were consuls, a bloody doom at length c overtook this man of blood. He had often rallied as a coward, and threatened with death, Macrinus captain of the guards; besides, about this time a soothsayer declared publicly in Africa, that Macrinus, and his fon Diadumenus, were destined to the empire. Hereupon the soothsayer was immediately sent to Rome, where he repeated and maintained the same thing before Maternianus, captain of the city-guards, whom the emperor, as he reposed in him an intire confidence, had injoined to employ all possible means, even the detestable mysteries of magic, in order to discover, whether any one privately aspired at the empire. Maternianus therefore did not fail to write immediately to the emperor what he had learned of the foothfayer; but the letter being delivered to Julia, whom Caracalla had left at Antioch, with full power to d open and read all his dispatches, (for he himself was still at Edessa, where he had passed the winter) Macrinus, who attended the emperor, was acquainted with the contents of it, before Julia could transmit it from Ant:och to Edessa. This intelligence was conveyed to him by Ulpius Julianus his intimate friend, who delivered the letter to a courier dispatched from Rome strait to the court at Edessa'. Herodian writes, that a pacquet being brought to the emperor, while he was busied in driving a chariot at the public shews, he ordered Macrinus to read the letters, and acquaint him with the contents of them afterwards; and that Macrinus found among the rest the letter of Maternianus. Be that as it will, Macrinus was, as all authors agree, informed before the emperor of what Maternianus had wrote; and therefore being fensible, that he e could not use too much dispatch k, he immediately gained with great promises two brothers, Aurelius Nemesianus and Aurelius Apollinaris, both tribunes of the guards; Julius Martialis, an exempt, whom the emperor had provoked, by refuling him the post of a centurion; Martius Agrippa the admiral; Rhatianus, tribune of the second legion, and several others, who put their design in execution on the eighth of April of this year 217. while the emperor was going on horse-back with a small retinue from Edessa to visit a temple of the moon at Carrba; for being obliged to stop by the way to ease nature, and all withdrawing except one of the prince's domestics, as he was ready to mount again, Martialis, loth to let slip that opportunity, ran hastily to him, gave him with his dagger such a stab in the throat, that he expired immediately, and f returning to the rest, mixed with the croud, before they were apprised of what had passed; but when the emperor's death was publicly known, a Scythian who belonged to the guards, observing Martialis with a bloody dagger in his hand, which, in that confusion, he had not had the precaution to conceal, and thence concluding him to be the author of the murder, shot him through with an arrow. Caracalla was killed after he had lived twenty-nine years and four months, and reigned fix years, two months,

Caracalla murderedi

Macrinus conspires against him.

* Herod. l. iv. p. 551-553.

* Dio, l. lxxviii. p. 881.

* Vit. Car. p. 87.

* Dio, ibid. Herod. ibid. p. 554.

a and four days, from the death of his father (O). The foldiers immediately gathered about the body of the deceased prince, conveyed it to Edessa, and there proceeded, even before they had performed the funeral obsequies, to the election of a new empe-They were in suspense that and the two following days; but on the fourth, the eleventh of April, and the birth-day of Severus, the prætorian guards, who were Opelius Maat Edeffa, at the infligation of the tribunes, who had been privy to the conspiracy of crinus declared Macrinus, declared him emperor; for no one, except his accomplices, imagined him foldiery. to have been any-ways accessary to the death of Caracalla, which they ascribed to Martialis alone, as if he had committed the murder out of private passion and revenge. Macrinus pretended at first to decline such a heavy burden; but was easily prevailed

b upon to submit to it; distributed on that occasion large sums amongst the foldiery; made them ample promises; and granted a general pardon to all persons accused of, or condemned for, crimes of majesty or high treason m. Herodian writes, that the army first chose Adventus, Macrinus's collegue in the command of the prætorian guards, who excused himself on account of his great age ". But, according to Dion Cassius, Adventus only bragged, that, in regard to his seniority, he had a better right to the empire than Macrinus, declaring at the same time, that he willingly yielded it to him. Adventus was an excellent commander; but altogether unqualified for a statesman, exceeding old, no less meanly born than Macrinus, and illiterate to such a degree, that he could not even read P. However, Macrinus created him c senator, appointed him governor of Rome, and the following year chose him for his collegue in the confulfhip.

As for the new emperor Opilius, or rather Opelius Macrinus, he was a native of His birth and Casarea in Mauritania, now Algier, and of a very mean descent. We are told, that preferments. many things concerning his birth, his education, and first employments, were invented by his fuccessor Heliogabalus, and by his orders inserted as true in his life. Hence, without taking notice of what we read in Julius Capitolinus, who was strangely preju-

Dio, p. 891. HEROD p. 556. Dio, p. 894. P Idem ibid. m Dio, l. lxxviii. p. 893-895.

" HEROD. l. iv. p. 535.

(O) The authors who lived under Caracalla, were, D. Severus S.:mmonicus, who wrote a great number of books, which were much admired by Geen; and hence Summonicus was by Caracalla's orders murdered, while he was at supper as a friend to Geta (81). None of his works have reached our times, except fome books in Latin verse on physic, and a few pas-fages quoted by Macrobius out of a book in prose, which he intcribed to the emperor Severus Vossius is of opinion, that he published some historical pieces (83). His library confifted of fixty-two thousand volumes, which his son, who bore the fame name, bequeathed to young Gordian, whose preceptor he had been (84). The emperor Alexinder is faid to have taken great delight in reading the works of Horace, and Serenus Sammonicus, with whom he had been acquainted '85); but this must have been the son. Elius Maurus, whom Spartian quotes in relating the death of Severus (86), wrote in the reign of Caracalla, being then very old; for he had been a flave to Phlegon, the celebrated freedman of the emperor Adrian (87). Vossius ranks him among the Latin historians; because Spartian does not fay, that he wrote in Greek (88). Oppian, the celebrated Greek poet, lived under Antoninus, the fon of Domna; that is, under Caracalla, the son of Julia Domna, as he himself informs us (89), and not under Antoninus the Philosopher, as we read in the chronicle of Eusebius and St. Jerom (90). He was native of Anazarbus, a town of Cilicia, as appears from the short account of his life, which is prefixed to his works (91). His father being banished by Se-

verus to the island of Malea, or to that of Meleda near Ragufa, Oppian accompanied him to the place of his exile, and there composed his poems, which he afterwards rehearfed at Rome, where they were received with extraordinary applause, and pleased the emperor Severus to such a degree, that he recalled his father from banishment, and rewarded the poet with as many pieces of gold as there were verses in hit poem on the art of fishing; whence he used to call those verses, golden verses (92). He inscribed that poem to Antoninus, that is, to Caracalla, about the year 204. according to Scaliger, and the other on the chace to the same prince, after the death of his father Severus (93). The latter poem ought to confift of five books as well as the former, though there are but four in the Paris edition of 1555. and in that of Plantin in 1597, both which editions are evidently imperfect. St. Jerom cries up the poem on the art of fishing as a wonderful performance (94). Scaliger styles it a divine work; but Sozomenus, not so lavish of his praises, calls it only an in-different poem (95). We learn from his life, that besides the two above-mentioned works, he composed several other admirable poems, as the anonymous author styles them (96). He tells us himself, that he described in verse the Parthian war, and the taking of Ciesiphon, no doubt by Severus. He is said to have retired with his father to Anazarbus, their native city, and to have died there of the plague in the flower of his age, being but thirty years old (97). The inhabitants of Anazarbus, his countrymen, erected a statue to him, with a pompous inscription.

(81) Car. vit. p. 86. & Get. vit. p. 92. (82) Voss. poet. Lat. p. 52. & Macrob. saturn. l. ii. c. 12. (83) Voss. hist. Lat. l. ii. c. 2. (84) Gord. vit. p. 159. (85) Alex. vit. p. 124. (86) Vit. Sev. p. 71. (87) Voss. hist. Lat. l. ii. c. 2. (88) Idem ibid. (89) Oppian. de venat. l. i. p. 129. (91) Oppian. vit. (92) Sozom. l. i. p. 394. (93) Oppian. de pisc. l. ii. p. 54. & venat. l. i. p. 129. Euseb. chron. p. 122. (94) Hier. chron. (95) Sozom. ibid. (96) Oppian. vit. (97) Ibid. (86) Vit. Sev. (95) Sozom.

diced against him, we shall chiefly follow Dion Coffius, who flourished under him, a and seems quite free from all personal hatred, and personal affection. According to that writer, he was a person of a most mild and humane temper, which gained him the affections both of the people and foldiery, and covered the meanness of his birth and first employments. He was pretty well versed in the laws, which induced Plantianus to commit to him the care of his estate; that is, to appoint him his steward. Afterwards Severus charged him with the care of the posts in Italy; but soon after banished him, for what transgression we know not, into Africa, where he supported himself with pleading causes of small consequence. He returned to Rome after the death of Severus, when Caracalla gave him an employment in the exchequer, in which he acquitted himself so well, that the same prince named him to succeed the celebrated b Papinian in the command of the prætorian guards. His chief province in that office was to decide causes with the emperor, or in his name; which he did with great equity, when Caracalla himself was not present 9. He married one Nonia Celja, a woman of a very indifferent character, and had by her a fon, born on the nineteenth of September of the year 208. and commonly called by the Latin historians Diadumenus; but by Dion Cassius, by Herodian, and in most inscriptions, Diadumenianus r. With the empire he took the names of Severus and Aurelius, which are still to be seen on feveral of his medals: but on none appears that of Antoninus; whence we conclude Capitolinus to have been mistaken in giving him it. Before he left Edessa, he caused the body of Caracalla to be burnt with the usual solemnity, and sent his ashes, inclosed c in an urn, to his mother Julia at Antioch, who not caring to outlive him, especially after Macrinus had ordered her to leave that city, on account of her bitter invectives against him, and her private intrigues, in order to seize the empire for herself, abstained from all food, and died starved. Her body was sent to Rome, and deposited in the tomb of Caius and Lucius Cafars, the grandfons of Augustus, and from thence conveyed afterwards by her fifter Mela to the mausoleum of Adrian. Macrinus was no fooner declared emperor, than he fent for his fon Diadumenus, who was then at Antioch. The foldiers who attended him, and were intirely addicted to Macrinus, gave him, pursuant to their private instructions, as it were of their own motion, the title of Cæsar; which, upon his arrival at Edessa, was confirmed to him by the whole d declared Caefar. army, his father giving on that occasion another bounty to the foldiery. The new prince did not fail to acquaint the fenate immediately with the death of Caracalla, and his accession to the empire, by a letter, in which he spoke with great reserve of the deceased emperor, neither commending nor discommending him: he only said, that fince the doom which he feemed to have deferved had at length overtaken him, and the army had chosen him to command in his room, he would acknowledge himfelf indebted to the senate alone for the empire, if they thought fit to confirm that Tho' the fenate had heard before the news of the death of Caracalla, yet apprehending it to be only a false report, they had carefully concealed their sentiments; but being now affured of the truth by Macrinus's letters, they loaded him with e dreadful curses; ordered all his gold and filver statues to be melted down, his name to be erased out of all inscriptions; annulled his acts; and declared his memory infamous, styling him no longer Antoninus, but Baffianus, Caracalla and Tarantus, which was the name of a little, deformed and cruel gladiator ". They were fo transported with joy in feeing themselves delivered from the tyranny of Caracalla, that, overlooking the meanness of Macrinus's birth, they declared him emperor without the emperor by the least hesitation, heaping upon him all the honours, which they had ever conferred upon any prince. His family was ranked among the patrician families, his fon proclaimed Casar, and his wife, Nonia Celsa, honoured with the title of Augusta. In their answer to his letter, they earnestly intreated him to punish, according to their f deserts, the ministers of the late tyrant, and utterly to extirpate the whole tribe of informers. Macrinus complied in some degree with their request; for he suffered them to condemn, not to death, but to banishment, three senators, and many others of an inferior rank, and ordered all the flaves and freed-men, who had informed against their masters or patrons, to be crucified. The new emperor in the mean time, leaving Edessa, led his army to Antioch; and there, in the presence of all his

The death of Julia.

Diadumenus

The hatred of the fenate to Caracaila.

Macrinus acsenate.

troops, gave his fon the name of Antoninus; a name highly revered, and, in a man-

F Idem, p. 888. HEROD. p. 566. GOLTZ. p. 100. GOLTZ.

a ner, adored by the foldiery v. On this occasion the whole army demanded with loud cries the deification of Caracalla; a demand which greatly surprised Macrinus, who neverthele is was in the end forced to comply with it, and command the fenate to Caracalla deirank among the gods one, whom he himself had caused to be murdered, and who sed. was deservedly looked upon by all, except the soldiery, as a professed soe to human race, a monster gorged with blood, a parricide, and the most inhuman tyrant that could ever wear and difgrace a diadem. The senate, pursuant to the emperor's orders, immediately decreed him divine honours, a temple, altars, priests, facrifices, and all the apparatus of divinity. The new emperor was even obliged to cause one Aurelianus to be condemned and executed, for having privately removed some of the deceased b emperor's statues '; so great was the authority which the army had, by degrees, usurped both over the senate and prince. WHILE these things passed at Antioch and Rome, Artabanes, king of the Parthians, The Parthian having affembled a powerful army, advanced at the head of it, with a delign to war. invade the Roman territories, and retaliate the injuries he had received. Macrinus, prompted partly by his natural timidity, (for he was not a man of courage) and partly by motives of justice and equity, endeavoured to appease him, by sending back all the prisoners taken by Caracalla, and with them embassadors to propose a peace, on terms equally honourable to both nations; but Artabanes declaring, that he would nearken to no proposals, unless the Romans engaged, by way of preliminary, c to rebuild all the cities they had destroyed, to give up Mejotoamia, and to pay an immense sum, to be employed in repairing the tombs of the Parthian monarchs overturned by Caracalla, and making good the losses his subjects had sustained by the late unjust invasion, Macrinus, ashamed to comply with such high demands, took the field, and met the enemy in the neighbourhood of Nijibis v. Herodian tells us, that the battle which enfued lasted two whole days, night alone putting an end to the contest, and both parties challenging the victory. He adds, that the third day, the two armies, not being able to approach each other on account of the dead bodies, which formed a kind of wall between them, retired to their respective camps 7. But Dion Cassius writes, that the Romans, inured under Caracalla to an idle and effemid nate life, were overcome in two engagements; infomuch that Macrinus, not during The Romans to venture a third, fent embassadors with rich presents for Artabanes, and all the defeated. grandees of his court, and by that means obtained a peace, which cost him, accord. Macrinus coning to our hiltorian, fifty millions of drachma's a. However, the fenate decreed him with the Parthe furname of Parthicus, which he accepted, as appears from some of his medals at thians and Arbut declined the triumph which was decreed him at the same time. As for the Arme- menians. nians, whom Caracalla had likewise provoked, Macrinus appeased them, by restoring their king Tiridates to the throne, and to him those lands which they had formerly possessed in Cap; adocia d. Capitolinus speaks of a war with the people of Arabia, in which Macrinus fignalized his courage, and was attended with great fuccesse; but e of this war no mention is made by any other historian. Macrinus, having thus concluded a peace both with the Parthians and Armenians, returned to Antioch; and there, by means of many excellent laws, endeavoured, as much as in him lay, to reform the abuses which had prevailed in the reign of his predecessor. He declared all the rescripts and decisions of the emperors void and null, unless they were found agreeable to the ancient and known laws of Rome, faying, It was a shameful thing, that the caprices of a Commodus or a Caracalla should be held for laws. He punished crimes with great severity. When any persons, of what rank soever, were convicted Macrinus's seof adultery, he caused the delinquents to be tied together, and thus tied, to be burnt verity against alive. He obliged fugitive slaves to fight like gladiators: fometimes he ordered crif minals to be shut up, and starved to death. He punished with death such informers as could not make good their accusations; when they did, they had the usual reward, that is, the fourth part of the criminal's estate; whence they were called Quadruplatores; but at the same time Macrinus declared them infamous. He revived, according to Capitolinus, who betrays a strange prejudice against him, the punishment of x Dio, l. lxxviii, p. 892. Vit, Macr. p. 95. p. l. iv. p. 557. 2 Dio, ibid. p. 866. W Idem, p. 896. Herod l. iv. p. 561. X Dio, l. lxxviii Macr. p. 96. Dio, ibid. p. 890. Z Herod l. iv. p. 557. de Dio, p. 19. Dio, ibid. p. 900. d Idem, p. 887. y Vit. b Noris. e Vit. Micr. p. 95.

Mezentius, who is faid to have tied the living to the dead, that they might both putrify together. Hence the people, commending once in the circus the mild temper of his fon Diadumenus, publicly repeated the verse of Virgil in commendation of a

Laufus

CO

t

£

g

20 ſu

th

ra

K

tì

in

CO

2D( fun

the

to ſen.

his retu  $Em\ell$

ba ... bailes

f time

marc

ing o

the tr

give

 $H_{6,\gamma_i}$ nii

Min

P 5:

e on

Lausus the son of Mezentius; Dignus cui pater baud Mezentius esset, It was a pity be a bad a Mezentius for bis father. He took from the inhabitants of Pergamus all the privileges which had been lately granted them by Caracalla, and appointed Dion Casfius the historian governor of that city, and of Smyrna 8. A conspiracy being discovered against him, he punished some of the authors of it; but pardoned Arbianus, Thuscus and Gelius, of whom the former is styled duke of Armenia, and the two latter lieutenants of Asia and Arabia; nay, he continued them in their employments, hoping to gain them by that means. We are told by Capitolinus, that Diadumenus wrote on this occasion to his father, and likewise to the empress his mother, complaining of the indulgence which the emperor had shewn them, and begging that they might be executed without mercy (P). But we can hardly persuade ourselves, that Dia- b dumenus, then only nine or ten years old, was capable of writing such letters.

his clemency.

We have hitherto seen nothing in Macrinus blame worthy: however, he was not Raises only per- without his faults; for, in the first place, as he himself was of a mean descent, he sons of a mean deprived of their employments those who were nobly born, and raised to the highest descent, and no posts persons of his own condition, tho', generally speaking, void of all merit. Thus he appointed Adventus, of whom we have spoken before, governor of Rome, and prince of the senate, even before he was a senator, tho' altogether unequal to that high post, being incapable of speaking in public, and so illiterate, that he could not so much as read. He recalled from the government of Pannonia and Dacia, Sabinus and Castinus, men of merit and distinction; and sent Marcius Agrippa, a manu- c mitted flave, formerly banished by Severus for treasonable practices, to succeed the former; and substituted Decius Tricianus, a man of no rank, in the room of the latter. In the foldiers he punished the least transgression or neglect of duty with such feverity, that, instead of Macrinus, he was called by them Macellinus, from the word macellum, fignifying shambles. In the reign of Caracalla, they had been quartered in the cities, where they indulged themselves with impunity in all manner of licentiousness; but Macrinus obliged them to live under tents in the fields, and would not fuffer them to approach or enter any city, in order to inure them to a regular and military life. This they could not endure, the more because the emperor himself wallowed in pleasures at Antioch, while they in the field often wanted necessaries. d They therefore began to regret the loss of Caracalla, to hate the very name of Macrinus, and publicly to reproach him with the meanners of his birth, and former life. At the fame time they were informed, that he had been the chief author of the murder of Caracalla; which incenfed them against him to such a degree, that they only wanted a favourable opportunity to revolt from Macrinus, and appoint another emperor in his room; which they did accordingly the following year, when Macrinus and Adventus were confuls, This revolution was brought about by the contrivance and artifices of Mæsa, sister to the late empress Julia, a woman of great crast, dexterity, experience, and even courage. She had lived at court with her fifter during the reigns of Severus and Caracalla, and had acquired there great knowledge of affairs, e and likewise immense wealth; which Macrinus suffered her to enjoy after the murder of Caracalla, but ordered her to quit the court, and retire to Emesa in Phanicia, her native city. She had two daughters, viz. Julia Soamis, or Soamias, and Julia Mamaa. Of these the latter had a son named Alexianus, and the former one called Varius Avitus Bassianus. When Mæsa retired by Macrinus's orders to Emesa, she took her

He disobliges the foldiers by his excessive feverity.

> f Vit. Macr. p. 96. 8 Dio, p. 897. Diad. vit. p. 100.

(P) The letter which he is faid to have written to his father, was conceived in the following terms: " I cannot be filent on the present occasion, with-" out being wanting to my duty. You were furely
" quite unmindful of your own fafety, when you
" fpared the authors of the late rebellion. Men, whose minds are once exulcerated, will never be " reclaimed by mercy; and friends, when they once begin to hate, are of all enemies the most cruel, the most implacable; besides, they are still in a " condition to do mischief, they have still troops " under their command:

Si te nulla movet tantarum gloria rerum,

Ascanium surgentem, & spes haredis Iuli Respice, cui regnum Italia, Romanaque tellus

" You must put them to death, if you desire to live " in fatety. Your sparing them will encourage others (such is the perverseness of mankind!) to follow their example." In his letter to his mother, he expressed himself thus: "The emperor "my father, by sparing his enemies, shews that he neither loves you nor himself: therefore exert yourself on this occasion, and take care they be executed; for the my father spares them, they " will not, when occasion offers, spare us (98)."

a two grandsons with her, Avitus being then thirteen years old, and Alexianus only nine, and caused them both to be confecrated to the sun, the chief deity of the inhabitants of Emela, who had erected a stately temple to him, under the name of Eleagabalus. Bassianus, the eldest of the two, was appointed pontiff of that deity, and thence called Eleagabalus, or, as he is commonly styled by historians, Heliogabalus; for his name has occasioned great disputes among the learned. As the temple of the fun was but at a small distance from Macrinus's camp, the Roman soldiers, coming frequently to visit the deity of the place, were mightily taken with the comeliness of the young pontiff, who, in his person, was tall and genteel, well-shaped, and had fomething in his air and looks extremely gracious and pleafing. Mæsa, observing her b grandson thus admired by the soldiery, resolved to improve the opportunity, giving out, that Heliogabalus was the son of Caracalla; that she possessed immense treasures, and would willingly inrich with them such as should espouse the cause of the deceased emperor's fon. The foldiers, who were incamped in the neighbourhood of Emesa, believing Heliogabalus to be truly the fon of Caracalla, and allured by the mighty promises of Mas/a, invited her with her grandson to their camp; and, upon their arrival, proclaimed Heliogabalus emperor, by the name of M. Aurelius Antoninus, by some proand invelted him with all the enfigns of fovereignty k. Macrinus, who was then at claimed empe-Antiocb, when informed of this revolt, instead of marching in person to quash it at re once, as he might have easily done, contented himself with sending Ulpius Julianus, Julianus, sent c one of the captains of the guards, with some troops, against them. Julianus attacked betrayed by his their camp with great resolution, and might have made himself master of it the very own men, and first day, the soldiers under his command being mostly Moors, and consequently murdered. greatly attached to Macrinus their countryman; but Julianus checking their ardour, and putting off the affault to the next day, in hopes they would in the mean time submit of their own accord, the besieged raised new works during the night, sustained the affault the next morning with great resolution, and by shewing Heliogabalus on the ramparts, and with him the treasures they had received from Mæsa, induced the Romans who were with Julianus, and highly distatisfied with Macrinus, to murder their own officers, and join them. Julianus betook himself to slight, and lay for d some time concealed; but being at length discovered, one of the soldiers struck off his head, and carried it to the emperor, wrapped up in a linen cloth, and fealed with Julianus's own feal, pretending it to be the head of Heliogabalus; and made his escape while the emperor was unfolding it. Macrinus, perceiving whose head it was, and thence concluding, that he had been betrayed and defeated, hastened to the camp of the Albanians; that is, of the foldiers who had their fixed quarters at Alba, and were then incamped in the neighbourhood of Apamea; acquainted them in a very injudicious speech with the revolt of the troops near Emesa; declared Heliogabalus, his cousin Alexianus, both their mothers, and their grandmother Masa, public enemies; and proclaimed his fon Diadumenus, Augustus, and his partner in the empire, promising e on that occasion to each soldier five thousand drachma's, and paying them of that fum one thousand on the spot. At the same time he wrote to the senate, acquainting them with the revolt of the troops, and the promotion of his fon, and injoining them to promise to the people in his name one hundred and sifty drachma's a man. fenate, by whom Macrinus was greatly beloved, confirmed the title of Augustus to his fon, and declared Heliogabalus a public enemy. From Apamea the emperor returned to Antioch, instead of marching without loss of time against the rebels at Emesa; which city was but at a small distance. He was scarce gone, when the Albanians, and the other troops incamped in that neighbourhood, declared for Heliogatroops revolt.

balus, who thereupon marched strait to Antioch, to attack Macrinus, before he had f time to assemble his other forces. The emperor, upon the news of his approach, marched out of Antioch at the head of the prætorian bands; and the two armies meeting on the confines of Syria and Phanicia, a bloody engagement enfued, in which the troops of Heliogabalus, after a long and vigorous relistance, began in the end to give ground; but were brought back to the charge by Masa, Soumis, the mother of Heliogabalus, and by Heliogabalus himself, who signalized his valour on that occasion in a very eminent manner. The fight being thus renewed with more fury than ever, Macrinus's men would have gained the day, according to Dion Cassius, had they not

HEROD. l. v. p. 562. Dio, in excerpt. Val. p. 111. Macr. vit. p. 96. 1 Dio, p. 902. HEROD. P. 564. Vit. Macr. p. 96.

Vol. VI. No. 2.

M m

been

Macrinus abandous his join Heliogabalus.

Son Diadumenus put to death.

been abandoned by their leader, who, as he was naturally timorous, betook himself a to flight, when he saw the troops of Heliogabalus return to the charge. The prætogagement, who rian guards kept their ground, even after his flight, till Heliogabalus affured them upon his oath, that they should not be discharged, but should enjoy under him all the privileges and exemptions which had been granted them by other emperors; then they declared for him, as the other troops had already done!. Macrinus retired to Antioch, and there giving out that he had gained a complete victory, ordered his fon to shelter himself in the country of the Parthians; and, before the news of his deseat was publicly known, fled himself in disguise, taking with him letters for those who had care of the posts, as if he had been fent by the emperor upon some important affair that required dispatch. Thus he crossed undiscovered the provinces of b Cilicia, Cappadocia, Galatia, and Bithynia. To avoid Nicomedia, he imbarqued at a port in the neighbourhood of that city, called Eribolus, with a defign to go by fea to Chalcedon, and from thence to cross over to Byzantium; but being driven back by a contrary wind to Chalcedon, when he was upon the point of landing at Byzantium, he was there unfortunately taken ill, and discovered by those whom Heliogabalus had fent to pursue him. The foldiers, to whose custody he was committed, put him into a chariot, in order to carry him to Heliogabalus; but he having thrown himself out of it, when he was informed that his fon too had been taken, and by the fall broken Both he and his his shoulder-bone, the soldiers put an end to his pain and his life, by cutting off his fon Diadume- head; which they carried to Heliogabalus, who ordered it to be exposed on the point c of a spear to public view ... Such was the end of Macrinus, in the fifty-fourth year of his age, after he had reigned four months wanting three days; for we reckon his reign ended on the day of his defeat, which was the feventh of June of the year 218. His fon Diadumenus was publicly executed by the new emperor's orders, as a common malefactor, and his head carried about, with that of his father, on the point of We are told, that some of the soldiers, considering his youth, (for he was but ten years old) were for faving him; but the letters, which he was supposed to have written against Arabianus and his accomplices, being produced, they consented to his death. Basilianus, governor of Egypt, and Marius Secundus, governor of Phanicia, (for that province had at this time its peculiar governor) refused to acknow-d ledge Heliogabalus, even after the death of Macrinus; which occasioned several seditions in those countries, in one of which great numbers of the people and soldiery were killed, and among the rest Secundus himself. Basilianus shed to Italy, and lay fome time concealed in the neighbourhood of Brundusium; but was in the end betrayed by one of his old friends, to whom he had written for some relief, and by Heliogabalus's orders executed at Nicomedia, where that prince passed the first winter after his accession to the empire ".

Heliogabalus, immediately after the defeat and flight of Macrinus, entered Antioch, and from thence wrote to the fenate, acquainting them with the defeat of Macrinus, and his accession to the empire, and promising to conform in every thing to the excellent institutions of Augustus and M. Aurelius, and to do nothing without the advice and approbation of the fenate, whose authority should be ever facred to him. However, as he styled himself Augustus the son of Antoninus, that is, of Caracalla, and the grandson of Severus, and likewise assumed the proconsular and tribunitial power, and the titles of Happy and Pius, before they had been conferred upon him by the senate, his letter occasioned a general consternation in the city; nevertheless they confirmed to him all the titles he had assumed; declared Macrinus, tho' by them greatly beloved, a public enemy, and honoured both Masa and Soamis with the title of Augusta. Thus was Varius Avitus Bassianus, commonly known in history by the name of Heliogabalus, raised to the empire. He was the most profligate, im- f pious, inhuman, effeminate and prodigal tyrant that ever difgraced a diadem. His grandmother Mafa, who was a woman of great parts and experience, quite ashamed of his scandalous and unaccountable conduct, strove to the utmost of her power to keep him within fome bounds; but he, utterly despissing her, only hearkened to the wicked counsels of his mother Sommis, and of such as flattered him in his crimes. Hence he may be truly said to have exceeded Nero himself in cruelty, Caligula in prodigality, and the most abandoned princes, who reigned either before or after him, a in all manner of lewdness and debauchery. He did not reign full four years, and in that short time married six wives. His first wife was Julia Cornelia Paula, a lady of His wives. an unblameable character, and sprung from two of the most illustrious families in Rome; but soon after divorced her, and stripped her of the title of Augusta, and all the other honours he had conferred upon her. He then married Julia Aquilia Severa, a vestal virgin, which was accounted by the Romans an enormous crime; but soon put her away to marry Annia Faustina, the grand-daughter of the emperor M. Aurelius, tho' already married to Pomponius Bassus, whom he caused to be murdered. Faustina, and three others, whose names are unknown, were in a short time obliged to give room to Aquilia Severa the vestal, whom he admitted anew to his bed, saying, b That he hoped, as she was a priestess, and he a priest, to have by her an offspring worthy of the immortal gods. But his frequent marriages and divorces did not give fo much offence as his scandalous lewdness, and unheard-of debaucheries. He turned His monstrous the imperial palace into a brothel, filling it with such numbers of prostitutes, for the lewdiefs. conveniency, he said, of his friends and favourites, that it seemed a city, says Herodian, inhabited only by lewd women. With them, and his debauched companions, he passed the greatest part of his time, abandoning himself to the most scandalous and unnatural practices. He often affembled them in one of the halls of the palace, appeared among them in the apparel, and with the air of a profitute; encouraged them in formal harangues to lay afide all modesty, shake off all restraints, and make c it their whole study to find out new methods of satisfying their lustful appetites. In his speeches he addressed them with the title of commilitones, fellow-soldiers; and truly they were the only foldiers worthy of fuch a general. After some time he drove many of the debauched women out of the palace, and took catamites in their room; for he was himself of that infamous tribe, having been publicly married first to Aurelius Zoticus, one of his officers, and afterwards to Hierocles, a flave. He was not ashamed to satisfy his most infamous and unnatural lusts in public, in the face of the fun, and the whole Roman people, putting thereby out of countenance even the most profligate amongst his debauched companions. But to dwell on such abominable scenes of impurity is beneath the dignity of an historian, and only worthy of such a d biographer as Ælius Lampridius, who feems to take particular delight in describing the unheard-of pollutions and abominations of this lewd monster. His prodigality. was as boundless as his lust; for in the short time of his reign he is said to have reduced almost to beggary all the subjects of the empire, and to have left at his death the exchequer quite empty. He suffered nothing to appear at his table, but what was brought from the most distant countries at an immense charge. His palace, his chambers, and his beds, were all furnished with cloth of gold. When he went abroad, all the way between his chamber and the place where his chariot waited for him was strewed with gold-dust; for he thought it beneath him to tread upon the ground like other men. All his tables, chefts, chairs, and fuch veffels as were destined for the meanest uses, were of pure gold. Tho' his cloaths were exceeding costly, and beset with jewels and precious stones, yet he is said never to have worn one suit twice, nor ever to have put on again a ring which he had once used. He was constantly served in gold-plate; but every night after supper distributed among his guests and attendants what had been made use of that day. He often distributed among the people and foldiery, not corn only and money, as other emperors had done, but gold and filver plate, jewels, precious stones, and tickets intitling them to immense sums, which were immediately paid. He caused his fish-ponds to be filled with water distilled from roles, and the naumachia, where fea-fights were exhibited, with wine. His rooms, tables, couches, and galleries where he walked, were daily strewed with roses, f lilies, and all forts of flowers. His banquets and entertainments were expensive almost beyond belief, his favourite dishes being tongues of peacocks and nightingales, and the brains of parrots and pheafants. He fed his dogs with the livers of geefe, his horses with raisins, and his lions and other wild beasts with partridges and pheasants. In short, the whole wealth of the Roman empire was scarce sufficient, says Herodian, to supply the extravagance of one man P. As for his unheard-of follies, we refer our readers to Lampridius, who relates them at length, not thinking them worthy of a place in our history.

Heliogabalus acknowledged emperor by the His character.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Dio, p. 889. Herod. l. v. p. 565. m 96. n Dio, p 905. Heliog vit. p. 102. m Dio, l. lxxviii. p. 889. HEROD. ibid. p. 566. Mact. vicp. 96.

• Dio, l. lxxix. p. 911. HEROD. p. 568. P HEROD p. 569. Vit. Heliog. p. 102.

persons of distinction to be murdered.

To give some account of this strange reign, according to the order of time; a Causes several Heliogabalus, before he lest Syria, commanded several persons, both in the east and at Rome, to be put to death; and among the rest, Julianus Nestor, captain of the guards under Macrinus; Fabius Agrippinus, governor of Syria; Reanus, governor of Arabia; Claudius Attalus, who had governed Thrace in the year 194. and was then governor of Cyprus; and Decius Triccianus, who commanded in Pannonia 9. From Syria, the new emperor marched to Nicomedia in Bithynia, where he passed the winter, and gave many fresh instances of his cruel and inhuman temper, causing, besides many others, one Gannys to be murdered for advising him in a friendly manner to abandon his former vices, and behave like a Roman emperor. Gannys was one of Mæ/a's domestics, but favoured to such a degree by Heliogabalus, on account of his fidelity, and b the zeal he had shewn in his cause, that he designed to marry his mother to him, and declare him Cæsar. However, his finding fault with his vices provoked him to fuch a degree, that he ordered him to be put to death upon the spot, and gave him with his own hand the first blow. In the beginning of the following year, Heliogabalus entered upon his first consulship, having for his collegue one Sacerdos, of whom we find no farther mention in history. Early in the spring the new emperor fet out for Rome, where he was received both by the people and fenate with great demonstrations of joy, tho' no one doubted but he would prove a second Nero or Caligula. The next day, he went to the senate; and taking with him his grandmother, placed her next to the confuls, ordered her name to be fet down among those c of the other senators, and appointed, that she should vote as the rest, and be confulted in all matters of importance. For his mother Soamis he inflituted a fenate, their consultations, debates, and decrees, were the dress and apparel of the Roman matrons, their ranks and dignities, their visits, ceremonies, and other important matters of the like natures. The emperor himself was not employed in affairs of greater moment, being wholly taken up in establishing at Rome the worship of his

Establishes the worship of the

He ranks his grandmother

among the

nace of women. confisting only of women, and declared her their head or president. The subject of god Eleagabagod Heliogabalus, or, as he is styled on the medals of this prince, Eleagabalus. He erected a magnificent temple to him, worshipped him with ceremonies never before practifed at Rome, preferred him to Jupiter himself, and to all the other gods of d the Romans, who, he said, were but the servants of his god; and declared, that he would suffer no other god to be adored at Rome, or elsewhere, but Eleagabalus. In order to this, he profaned all other temples, stripped them of their ornaments, and attempted to convey into the temple of his own god, the perpetual fire of Vesta, the statue of Cybele, the bucklers of Mars, the palladium brought from Troy, as was supposed, by Eneas, and whatever else was looked upon by the Romans as most facred. From Carthage he ordered the goddess Calestis to be brought to Rome, and with her all the rich ornaments belonging to her temple; married her to Eleagabalus, and caused the nuptials of the two deities to be celebrated with great pomp and folemnity. Dion Cassius tells us, that, in honour of his god, he abstained from e hogs-flesh, and caused himself to be circumcised "; and Herodian, that he erected another magnificent temple for him in the country, whither he conveyed him every year in the beginning of the summer. The same author adds, that besides many other victims, he facrificed children to him, mostly sprung from illustrious families, and privately snatched up by the ministers of his cruelty, dispersed all over Italy for that purpose w. Dion Cassius observes, that he caused several illustrious persons to be inhumanly murdered this year; and among the rest, Seius Carus, Valerianus Pætus, Silius Meffala, and Pomponius Baffus, all senators of great distinction, for no other crime, but because he believed they disliked his conduct z. THE following year, Heliogabalus entered upon his second consulship, having for f his collegue Eutychianus, an imperial freedman, and a celebrated buffoon; whence he was furnamed Comazon, which, in the Greek tongue, fignifies waggift, or gay. He had greatly contributed to the rife of Heliogabalus; for at his instigation the troops near Emesa had declared for him; on which account the new emperor immediately declared him captain of the guards, and conferred upon him the confular ornaments. This year he honoured him with the confular dignity; and when his confulship expired, appointed him governor of Rome y. The next year, when Gratus Sabinianus

· Heliog. vit. p. 102, 105, 106. " Dio in excerpt. Val. p. 762.

a and Seleucus were consuls, Masa, foreseeing that the Romans could not long bear with fuch a prince as Heliogabalus, prevailed upon him to adopt his cousin Alexianus, and Alexianus declare him Cæsar, though at that time only twelve, or, at most, thirteen years old. adopted, and The ceremony was performed with extraordinary pomp; and the young prince on created Cæsar. that occasion took the names of Alexander and Severus, the former from the king of Macedon, and the latter from the emperor, his supposed grandfather 2. Heliogabalus treated him at first in a very friendly and obliging manner, hoping to draw him over to his lewd courses; but finding that the excellent youth could not by any means be induced to follow his example, and that he was more beloved both by the people and foldiery than himself, he began to repent his having adopted him, and Heliogabalus gave private orders to those who were trusted with the care of his education, to dis-repents his b patch him. But all their attempts being rendered abortive, by the care and cir-and attempts cumspection of Mamæa, mother to the young prince, and of his grandmother Mæsa, to destroy him. who betrayed all the emperor's fecrets, Heliogabalus, transported with rage, ordered the senate to degrade Alexianus from the dignity of Casar, and annul the late adoption. At the same time he dispatched affassins to murder him; and retiring to an old palace on mount Esquilin, waited there till news was brought him of his death. But in the mean time, the prætorian guards, apprised of the danger that threatened the young prince, flew to the palace, and would have put the emperor himself to death, had he not softened them with mighty promises, abandoned to them all his c debauched companions, and such as were deemed enemies to Alexander; and folemnly declared, that he designed for the future to lead a quite different life, and to redress all the grievances, of which, he faid, they had but too much reason to complain a. The next year he took upon him his third confulfhip; and pretending to be reconciled to Alexander, chose him for his collegue; but being determined at all events, notwithstanding his late protestations, to rid himself of so troublesome a rival, in the first place, he ordered all the senators to quit the city, lest they should thwart his defigns; and then caufing Alexander to be shut up in the palace, gave out, that he was all on a sudden taken ill, and almost past recovery. This report he spread abroad on purpose to discover the disposition of the soldiery, who no sooner heard it, than they slew to arms, and demanded to see Alexander. The young prince was d it, than they flew to arms, and demanded to fee Alexander. accordingly brought forth to them, and by the emperor himself conducted to the camp, where he was received with the greatest demonstrations of joy, while no one took the least notice of Heliogabalus; which provoked the tyrant to such a degree, that he ordered those, who had applauded Alexander, to be punished as traitors. But the rest, rescuing them out of the hands of the executioners, began to croud The soldiers about the emperor, uttering dreadful menaces; which so terrified him, that he muting. attempted to save himself by flight, those who had attended him to the camp endeavouring to disperse the multitude. Hereupon a quarrel ensued between the partizans of the two princes, in which those who favoured Heliogabalus were soon deseated, e and cut in pieces, with Hierocles, that prince's chief favourite, the captains of the guards, and all the ministers who attended him. The emperor himself withdrew, during the contest, into the most filthy place of the camp, and consequently the most worthy of him; where he was foon discovered, and murdered by the enraged fol-Heliogabalus diery, together with his mother Sommis, who had retired thither with him, and held and his mother him the whole time in her arms. Both their heads were flyick off, and after their Sommis marhim the whole time in her arms. Both their heads were struck off; and after their dered. bodies had been ignominiously dragged through the city, and most outrageously insulted by the populace, that of Heliogabalus was, with a great weight fastened to it, thrown from the Emilian bridge into the Tiber b. Such was the deserved end of Heliogabalus, the most wicked and most debauched of all the Roman emperors, in f the eighteenth year of his age, after he had reigned three years, nine months, and four days, from the seventh of June, of the year 218. on which day he deseated Macrinus, to the eleventh of March of the year 222. when he met with his deserved doom. The senate caused the name of Antoninus, which he had assumed and disgraced with his lewd life, to be erased out of the public registers, and all inscriptions; and passed a decree, excluding for ever women from the senate, and loading with curses such as should for the suture attempt to transgress it c.

* Herod. l.v. p. 570. Dio, l. lxxix. p. 914. * Dio, p. 915 b Herod. p. 573. Heliog. vit. p. 106. * Heliog. vit. p. 107. Dio, p. 915. HEROD. ibid. Heliogab. vit. p. 106.

Alexander

His birth and

His mother Julia Mamæa.

Alexander favours the christians.

Upon the death of Heliogabalus, his cousin Alexander, then in the fourteenth year a declared empe- of his age, was proclaimed emperor by the foldiery, and conducted from the camp to the senate, where he was received with all possible demonstrations of joy, and honoured with the titles of Augustus, of father of his country, and all the other marks of distinction peculiar to the imperial dignity. At the same time they offered him the name of Antoninus, and the surname of Great; but he modestly declined them both. He was the fon of Julia Mamæa, or Mammæa, of whom we have spoken above, and of Genesius Marcianus, a Syrian. He was a native of the city of Arca in Phanicia, and born there, according to Lampridius d, in a temple confecrated to Alexander the Great; whence, upon his being adopted by Heliogabalus, he took the name of Alexander. His former name was Bassianus, according to Dion Cassius; but 5 according to Herodian, Alexianus, his grandfather's name. His father dying when he was very young, his mother brought him up with great care; for Julia Mamæa is thought by many writers of great note to have been instructed in the truths of the gospel, and to have embraced the christian religion e: at least, Eusebius styles her a very pious and religious woman f; epithets which we can hardly persuade ourselves a christian bishop would have bestowed upon a pagan. While she was at Antioch, in the year 218. hearing Origen greatly commended on account of his knowledge in religious matters, she shewed a great desire to see him, sent for him from Alexandria, received him with great joy, and kept him some time with her 8. It is not improbable, that she was by him convinced of the truth, and embraced it. Be that c as it will, she brought up her son with extraordinary care, employing only such persons to instruct him as were equally renowned for their probity and learning, and allowing no one to come near him, whom she suspected capable of corrupting his morals. He applied himself, from his infancy, to the study of the Greek and Latin tongues, and was as well versed in the former as any man of his age; but his improvement in the latter was not so great, as appeared from his speeches to the senate, to the soldiery, and to the people ": neither did he admire the Latin eloquence so much as the Greek. He was well skilled in all the other branches of polite learning, and, besides, in the arts of painting, singing, playing upon instruments, &c. From his infancy, he gave innumerable instances of a most mild, humane, and gened rous temper; shewed an utter aversion to bloodshed, and all manner of cruelty; and made it his chief study to please and oblige, not only his parents and relations, but even his domestics. As he paid an intire deference to his mother Mamaa, and grandmother Masa, both women of great experience and extraordinary parts, at His counsellors, their motion, he chose, as soon as he was raised to the empire, sixteen senators for his council, all men of known probity, and long versed in public affairs, transacting nothing without their advice, and constantly conforming to it. Among these were, Fabius Sabinus, generally styled the Cato of his time; Domitius Ulpianus, and Julius Paulus, two celebrated civilians; Antoninus Gordianus, afterwards emperor; Catilius Severus, Alexander's kinfman, and one of the most learned persons of his age; Ælius e Serenianus, a man of extraordinary integrity; and Quintilius Marcellus, a great admirer of the customs and manners of the ancient Romans i. The deference he paid to his mother was so great, that Herodian reckons it among his faults; for tho' he was himself a man of extraordinary talents, of such discernment and penetration, fays Lampridius, that no one ever deceived him, yet he constantly preserved her opinion to his own 1. He gave her name to several buildings, which they still retained in the end of the fourth century 1; and caused her to be honoured with the titles of Augusta, of mother of her country, of the armies, and of the senate, which had been formerly conferred on Julia, the wife of Severus m. As Managa professed, in all likelihood, the christian religion, no wonder that Alexander shewed great favour f to the christians, and would not suffer them to be any-ways molested on account of their religion. Eusebius tells us, that his court was filled with christians "; and Lampridius, that in his private oratory he worshipped Christ and Abraham, and would have caused temples to be erected to the founder of the christian religion, had he not been diverted from it by the answers of the oracles, assuring him, that if he ever suffered Christ to be ranked among the gods, all the other temples would be

d Vit. Alex. p. 114.

Eusen. l. vi. c. 21. e Vide Oros. l. vii. c. 18. Cedren. t. i. p. 256. Abulfar. p. 80. Vinc. l. vi. c. 21.

8 Idem ibid.

Nit. Alex. p. 115.

1 Ammian. l. xxviii. p. 372.

Spon. p. 194. LERIN. C. 23. EUSEB. .. HEROD, l. vi. p. 575. 1 Ammian. l. xxviii. p. 372. p. 241. * HE * Euses. l. vi. c. 28.

a foon abandoned, and the gods neglected o. He feems to have been well acquainted with the morals of the christian religion; for he had constantly in his mouth that golden rule, Do as you would be done by; caused it to be set up over the gates of his palace, and on several public edifices, and observed it himself, if the writers of his life may be credited, with the greatest exactness P. For he made it his chief study to oblige all men, and is faid never to have wronged any. During the first year of his reign, he was wholly taken up in reforming the many enormous abuses, which had prevailed in the court under his predecessor. With this view he banished all the freed-men, flaves, eunuchs, players, and buffoons, who had borne any fway in the late reign; and chose in their rooms persons of blameless characters, and known b integrity. Having by this means reformed the court, he made a strict inquiry into the manners and conduct of the public officers, especially of the governors of provinces, and discharged most of those who had been employed by Heliogabalus. Such Discharges the of them as had oppressed the people committed to their care, were banished; and ministers of the the rest reduced to their former condition, as persons altogether unsit for any public late emperor. office 1. The next year, when L. Marius Maximus and L. Roscius Ælianus were confuls, the emperor's nuptials were celebrated with extraordinary pomp and magnificence. He married Sulpicia Memmia, the daughter of Sulpicius a consular, and granddaughter of Catulus. As the whole empire enjoy'd at this time a profound peace, nothing remarkable happened either at Rome, or in the provinces, in the two following years; in the first of which Julianus and Crispinus were consuls, and in the second Fuscus and Dexter. But the fourth year of Alexander's reign, and during his second consulship, in which he had Quintilius Marcellus for his collegue, Artaxerxes having utterly ruined the Parthian, and re-established the Persian empire, of which The Persian great revolution we have spoken elsewhere, advanced at the head of a mighty army empire re-estaagainst the Romans, with a design to recover Mesopotamia, and the other provinces, which had formerly belonged to the Persian empire. His approach occasioned great consternation in Syria; and many of the Romans quartered in Mesopotamia, abandoning the castles which they garisoned, listed in his army; so that he might with great ease have over-run, not only Mesopotamia, but likewise Syria, had he not attacked d on his march the city of Aira, before which place he lost such numbers of his men, without being able to reduce it, that, dropping for the present his expedition against the Romans, he thought it adviseable to march back into his own country, after having ravaged great part of Media, and made some unsuccessful attempts upon Armenia . The next confuls were Albinus and Maximus; during whose administration nothing happened which authors have thought worth transmitting to posterity: but the following consulship of Modestus and Probus was remarkable for the death of the celebrated civilian Domitius Ulpianus, who being appointed by Alexander cap- The death of tain of the prætorian guards, and endeavouring to establish among them the ancient Ulpian. e discipline, provoked their hatred to such a degree, that, after having in vain solicited Alexander to remove him, they at length murdered him in the emperor's presence. The chief authors of his death were punished with the utmost severity, and the most factious among the guards ignominiously discharged. In the room of Ulpian, the emperor chose one Decimus, and Julius Paulus, a native of Padua, who had been banished by Heliogabalus, on account of his great probity, and was perhaps as well skilled in the laws as Ulpian s. This year several tumults happened at Rome, and in the provinces. The troops quartered in Mesospotamia revolted, murdered their general The soldiers Flavius Heracleo, and went in great numbers over to the Persians. The troops in mutiny in seve-Syria proclaimed one Taurinus emperor, who, as they had conferred that honour upon ral provinces. f him against his will, made his escape; and being pursued by the mutinous soldiery, threw himself into the Euphrates, and was drowned a. Zosimus and Syncellus speak of one Uranus, who, having usurped the empire at Edessa in Ofrboene, was defeated by the troops that remained faithful to Alexander. At Rome the prætorian guards attempted to raise one Antoninus to the empire; but he, declining that burden, withdrew into the country, and never afterwards appeared in the city w. But Ovinius Camillus, a senator, sprung from one of the most illustrious families in Romé, studying to gain the affections of the foldiery, in order to raise himself, by their means, to the empire, Alexander was no sooner informed of his private practices, than he sent Alex. vit. p. 124, 139.

 P Idem, p. 132.
 Idem ibid.
 Excerpt. Val. p. 769.
 HEROD. l. vi. p. 176.
 Vit. Alex. p. 122.
 Idem ibid.
 W SYNCELL. p. 357.
 Zos. p. 639. 9 Idem ibid.

r Dio, l. lxxx. p. 918. & in <sup>1</sup> Dio, l. lxxx. p. 917, 918.

for him to court, and thanked him for offering to take upon him so great a bur- a millus aspiring den, styled him his collegue, took him with him to the senate, allotted him an apartat the empire, then in the palace, caused him to be attired in a far more pompous habit than his own, and treated him in every respect as his partner in the empire. As a war broke out at this time, which required the emperor's presence, Alexander offered the command of the army to Camillus; but he declining it, the emperor defired he would at least share with him the fatigues and the glory of that expedition. Accordingly they both set out from Rome on foot; but Camillus, who was not inured to a military life, being tired, after five miles march, Alexander begged he would pursue his journey on horseback; which he did for two days, when the emperor, perceiving he could no longer bear even that fatigue, ordered a chariot to be provided for him; b which proved so great a mortification to Camillus, that he begged leave to resign the empire, and return home; which Alexander readily granted, affuring him before they parted, that he might live in safety where he pleased. Camillus retired to his country-feat, and there lived unmolested, during the reign of Alexander; but was put to death by some of his successors, for what crime we are no-where told x. The expedition which Alexander is faid to have undertaken this year, was probably against the Germans; for it appears from some ancient inscriptions, that great advantages were gained over them this year, the seventh of the emperor's reign ; and Lampridius tells us, that the Germans were overcome by Varius Macrinus, governor of Illyricum 2. The same year Furius Celsus signalized himself in Mauritania Tingitana, c and Junius Palmatus in Armenia, and were both rewarded with the consular ornaments a.

THE following year Alexander entered upon his third confulship, having Dion Cassius, the second time consul, for his collegue. Dion was in the beginning of this reign in Asia; whence he passed into Bithynia, his native country, with a design to stay some time there with his friends and relations; but he was soon sent into Africa, to govern that province, with the character of proconful. Upon his return to Rome, he was appointed governor of Illyricum, and from thence removed into Upper Pannonia, where he revived the ancient military discipline among the troops, punishing the least neglect of duty with the utmost severity; insomuch that the prætorian d guards, who dreaded his rigour, upon a report, that he was recalled to command them, no sooner saw him appear in Rome, than they began to mutiny, and press the emperor to put him to death. But Alexander, without hearkening to their unjust demand, heaped many honours upon him, often appeared with him in public, and took him this year for his collegue in the consulship: however, fearing the soldiers might offer him some infult, if he appeared in Rome with the ensigns of the consular dignity, he advised him to retire from the city, and pass the time of his consulship in the country, which he did accordingly. Soon after he obtained leave to withdraw into his own country, where he spent the remaining part of his life in quiet and retirement b. It will not be foreign to our purpose to insert here the account e which that writer gives us of the state of the Roman legions at this time, and of the provinces where they were quartered. There were in the time of Augustus twenty-The number of five legions, of which only nineteen were now remaining, the other fix having been the Roman le- either disbanded, or incorporated into some of those that still remained. On the other hand, Nero, Galba, Vespasian, Domitian, Trajan, M. Aurelius, and Severus, raised thirteen new ones; so that the legions at this time were in all thirty-two. Of these, three were quartered in Britain, one in Upper and two in Lower Germany, one in Italy, one in Spain, one in Numidia, one in Arabia, two in Palestine, one in Phanicia, two in Syria, two in Mesopotamia, two in Cappadocia, two in Lower and one in Upper Mæsia, one in Noricum, and one in Rhætiac. Our author does not inform f us where the two remaining legions were quartered, nor how many men each of them contained; but Lampridius feems to infinuate, that each legion confifted of five thousand men d. From this distribution of the legions, it appears, that the Romans

Dion Cassius hated by the foldiery on as. count of his severity.

* Vit. Alex. p. 130, 131. Not. Cafaub. p. 172. & Salmas. p. 230. F Birag. p. 323. 2 Vit. p. 134. 2 Idem ibid. 5 Dio, L lxxx. p. 918. 6 Dio, l. lv. p. 564. 4 Alex. vit. p. 131.

at this time looked upon the Caledonians, the Parthians, or rather Persians, and the nations beyond the Danube, as their most formidable enemies, and were not so apprehensive of any invasion on the side of Germany, as they had been in former times; for now there were but three legions in that country, whereas in the reigns of Augustus

a and Tiberius, the banks of the Rhine had been guarded by no fewer than eight legions, which were deemed the main strength of the empire . This year Alexander, who did not spare his greatest friends, when manifestly convicted of abusing the confidence he reposed in them, caused Vetronius Turinus, one of his chief savourites, to be put to death for a crime of that nature. The emperor had a particular efteem and kindness for Turinus, and often consulted him in private, as he was a man of extraordinary abilities, about affairs of the greatest importance. This honour and deference, which the emperor feemed to pay to him, the crafty courtier resolved to turn to his own advantage, and accordingly gave out, that Alexander transacted nothing without his advice; that he had gained an absolute sway over him; and that it was b in his power to raife whom he pleased to the first employments in the empire. By this means he accumulated immense wealth in a short time, all who wanted any Vetronius favour or preferment, recurring to Turinus, whose interest was not to be gained with- Turinus abuses out rich presents. He often did not so much as mention to the emperor the persons placed in him whom he pretended to recommend; but nevertheless, when they happened to obtain, by the emperor. by means of others, what they demanded, he affumed the whole merit of it to himself, and exacted a proportionable acknowledgment, which in those days was called felling smoke. The emperor, who was a man of great penetration, began to suspect his favourite of such practices; and therefore a person, in whom he could confide, foliciting him one day for a favour, he told him he would grant him his e request, provided he privately addressed Turinus, as if he wanted his recommendation. Turinus, glad of this opportunity, promised to employ all his interest in his behalf, and foon after told him, that he had already recommended him to the emperor, who, he was fure, would grant him the defired favour the very first time he had an opportunity of recommending him anew, which he hoped would be very foon. He added, that he deserved to be rewarded for his trouble; and the petitioner referring that to his discretion, he not only exacted a large sum for what he pretended to have done, but obliged him to promise, in the presence of witnesses, a far more considerable one, to be paid as soon as he obtained his request. The emperor, who was informed of the whole, immediately granted the favour; which Turinus no d sooner knew, than he obliged his client, tho' he had never once mentioned his name to the emperor, to make good his word, and pay the promifed fum, pretending, that by his means alone he had obtained what he defired. Hereupon Alexander caused a diligent inquiry to be made into his former conduct, when it appeared, that he had received large sums, not only from those who had obtained any preferment, but from such too as had had law-suits, and often from both parties; which fo provoked the emperor, that he accused him to the senate, who sentenced him to death; and the sentence was put in execution in the following manner: The criminal How punished was, by the emperor's orders, tied to a gibber, and suffocated with the smoke of by the emperor. green wood, and wet stubble, kindled round him, the public crier in the mean time e proclaiming, He who sold smoke, dies with smoke? The following year, L. Virius Agricola and Sex. Catius Clementinus being confuls, the emperor retired into Campania, and there spent this and the sollowing year, when Pompeianus and Pelignianus were confuls 8. The next confuls were Lupus and Maximus; during whose administration, Artaxerxes, the restorer of the Persian monarchy, having reduced all the neighbouring countries, unexpectedly invaded the Roman dominions at the head of a mighty army, ravaged Mesopotamia, and advanced to the very confines of Syria. Hereupon Alexander, following the advice of his council, dispatched embassadors with a letter to that conqueror, exhorting him not to engage the two empires in a long and dangerous war, without provocation, and putting him in mind of the vicf tories gained over the eastern nations by Augustus, Trajan, L. Verus and Severus. But Artaxerxes, puffed up with his late successes, despised the remonstrances of Alexan-Artaxerxes der, and pursued his ravages in Mesopotamia, laid siege to Nisibis, and entering Cap-invades the Roman domi-padocia, destroyed all with fire and sword. Hereupon the emperor resolved to march nions. against him in person; and accordingly, to the great grief both of the senate and people, left Rome in the spring of this year 232. the eleventh of his reign; and bending his march through Illyricum, where he was joined by the troops quartered Alexander in that province, arrived at Antioch about the beginning of the autumn; whence he haftens to fent a fecond embaffy to Artaxerxes, hoping that his prefence would add fome weight Antioch. Haughty em. bassy of the Persian monarch.

Marches against the Persians. His care of the military disci-pline, and of the foldiery.

to the reasons he had formerly alledged. But the haughty Persian, deriding the a peaceable temper of the Roman emperor, chose four hundred of the tallest men in his army, and fent them, well mounted, and richly apparelled and armed, in quality of embassadors, to acquaint the Romans, and their emperor, that the great monarch Artaxerxes ordered them to retire forthwith from Syria and Afia, and all the countries between the Euphrates and the Ægean sea, which had formerly belonged to the Persians. Alexander heard their message with great temper, and then caused the embassadors to be stript of their rich armour and apparel, and sent under a guard into Phrygia, where he allotted them houses and lands to cultivate. After this, he began to Alexander pre- prepare for war in good earnest, ordered the legions quartered in the different provinces Pares for war. of the east to join him with all possible expedition, caused a great number of war- b like engines to be got ready, and dispatched officers into all parts to raise new levies. In imitation of Alexander the Great, whose name he bore, and for whom he had a particular veneration, he armed some companies of foot with shields covered with gold and filver, and formed fix legions into a body of thirty thousand men, which he called his phalanx. These distinguished themselves, during the war, in a very eminent manner, and were, when it was ended, rewarded for their tervices with double pay i. Lampridius tells us, that the emperor being informed soon after his arrival at Antioch, that some of his foldiers were gone to  $\bar{D}$  aphne, and there bathed with the lewd women of that dissolute place, he immediately ordered them to be arrested, and laid in irons. Hereupon the whole legion, to which they belonged, c A legion muti- beginning to mutiny, Alexander went out to them, and, without betraying the least fear, told them, that as the ancient discipline was the main and only support of the empire, he was refolved to maintain it at all events, and punish with the utmost feverity, nay, with death, those disorders and debaucheries which had been allowed in the late reign. At these words, the whole legion began to utter their rage in horrible cries; but Alexander, with an air of authority, Silence, said he, I command filence; keep these clamours to terrify the Persians, the Sarmatians, and the Germans: you have learnt of those, who taught you the art of war, that you are to frighten the enemy with that savage noise, and not your emperor, who, at the expences of his people, maintains, cloathes and pays you. Forbear therefore these unseasonable clamours, which are only sit for battle, lest I disband you all, or institut upon you a more severe punishment. Hereupon the uproar increasing, and some of the boldest even menacing him The intrepidity with their swords; Reserve your menaces, said he, for the enemy; them you may frighten, of Alexander. but not me, who despise your impotent rage: should you murder me, the republic will not be at a loss to find me a successor, who will punish you according to your deserts. As the mutiny still continued, he cried out with a loud voice, I disband you all; citizens, lay down your arms, and be gone. With these words the whole legion was thunderstruck; they obeyed, quitted their arms, laid down even their military garments, and retired in filence, while the emperor's guards took up their standards, and carried them, together with the arms of the disbanded legion, to the camp. However, & before the emperor set out against the Persians, he restored them, upon the intercession of several persons of distinction, to their former rank, after having punished with death their tribunes, for having suffered the soldiers under their command to transgress with impunity the military laws, and for neglecting to suppress the tumult k. This legion signalized themselves above the rest in the Persian war, and shewed more concern for the death of Alexander than any other !. AT length Alexander took the field at the head of a numerous army, observing in all his marches and motions such order and discipline, that his camp seemed a well governed city, his foldiers citizens, and his officers fo many fenators m. He punished with great severity such as offered the least injury to any of the inhabitants of the f countries through which he marched. One of his foldiers having injured an old woman, he not only disbanded him, but obliged him to maintain her, as her slave, with his labour, fo long as she lived. Others he punished for very small offences with death, causing the public crier to repeat during the execution, Do as you would be done by. It was death for any officer, of what rank soever, to detain the least part of his foldiers pay or allowances. But notwithstanding his great severity, no emperor was ever more beloved both by the officers and foldiers, as no one ever rewarded

b HEROD. l. vi. p. 579. m Idem, p. 130.

<sup>1</sup> Alex. vit. p. 131.

k Vie. Alex, p. 133.

<sup>1</sup> Idem, p. 136.

a them with more generofity, when they complied with their duty; took more care of them when fick or wounded; or fupplied them on all occasions more plentifully with provisions. He kept constantly in his cabinet certain registers, in which were marked the names of all the officers and foldiers, the provinces where they were quartered, the time of their fervice, the dates of their commissions, the names of the persons at whose recommendation they had been preserred, their exploits, if they had performed any, their good and evil qualities, &c. These registers he frequently perused, and by that means became acquainted with most of the officers and soldiers of his different armies, often mentioned their names, and preferred only persons of merit a. When they were fick, he visited them in their tents, even the common b foldiers, supplied them with chariots, and suffered them to want nothing that could any-ways relieve or comfort them in their fickness. If they were not in a condition to pursue their march, he recommended them to the care of persons of known integrity and good nature, whom he rewarded with great generofity for their trouble, whether the foldiers died or recovered o. He was always ready to hearken to the complaints of the meanest in the army against their tribunes and other officers, punishing them, when guilty, according to the quality of their crime, without any favour or distinction P. He frequently distributed large sums among them, ascribing chiefly to their poverty the disorders they committed. They were all so well clad and armed, says Lampridius, and the cavalry so well mounted, that nothing gave a more true c idea of the grandeur of the Roman empire, than the army of Alexander Severus 9. In his marches he caused provisions to be got ready before-hand at the several places where the army was to incamp; whereas before his time each foldier used to carry with him subsistence for seventeen days. In the enemy's country, where he could not use that precaution, he caused the necessary provisions to be carried on horses, mules and camels; which gained him the affections of the foldiery, and at the same time rendered his marches so quick and expeditious, that he is said in most of his wars to have surprised the enemy. In his garb and dress he little varied from the common foldiers, and his diet was the same with theirs. He constantly dined and supped in public with his tent open, and in the fight of the whole army, and visited, before d he withdrew to repose, each quarter in the camp. Thus, partly with a seasonable He is both feverity, partly with his affable and obliging behaviour, he re-established the ancient feared and bediscipline among the troops, which had been intirely neglected in the reign of Helio-foldiery. gabalus; and gained, by his firmness and intrepidity, such an authority over them, as to disband whole legions; which no emperor had offered to do since the time of Julius Casar'. With an army thus disciplined, the emperor marched early in the spring of this year 233. against Artaxerxes, who, slushed with his former successes, would hearken to no terms, however reasonable; but advanced towards the frontiers of the Roman dominions at the head of an army confisting of an innumerable multitude of foot, and one hundred and thirty thousand horse, with eighteen hundred chariots e armed with scythes, and seven hundred elephants bearing towers on their backs, filled with archers, after the Persian manner. Of this war Herodian gives us the The success of following account: Alexander, having divided his army into three bodies, ordered his expedition against the one to enter Media, another to march into the country of the Parthians, and led him-Parthians. felf the third, which confifted of the flower of the army, at an equal distance from the other two. They were all to meet at an appointed place; but Alexander, either through want of courage, or yielding to the intreaties and tears of his mother, instead of pursuing his march, and entering the enemy's country, halted in Mesopotamia; fo that the body which had marched through the country of the Parthians were intirely cut off, while they waited the arrival of the emperor at the appointed place, and the f other obliged to retire, and repass in the depth of winter the mountains of Armenia, in which painful march great numbers of them died either with cold or hunger. The body which Alexander commanded was greatly diminished by sickness, and the emperor himself was seized with a dangerous malady, which almost brought him to the point of death ". Others write, that Alexander was betrayed by some of his own people, and obliged to fave himself and his army by flight. But most historians affure us, that he gained a complete victory over the Persians; and Lampridius quotes the very words of Alexander to the fenate on that occasion. According to him, the n Idem, p. 120. 121. 9 Idem, p. 132. o Idem, p. 130. P Idem, p. 119. 121. F. 134. 1 Idem, p. 117. 1 Idem, p. 133. HERODIAN. I. vi. p. 580. 1 HEROD. ibid.

emperor entered the enemy's country, without fo much as acquainting before-hand a his officers with the rout he intended to take. He was foon met by Artaxerxes, at the head of the most numerous army that had ever been seen in those parts; whereupon a battle ensuing, the emperor distinguished himself in a very eminent manner, encouraging the foldiers more by his example than by words; exposed himself to the enemies darts and arrows like a common foldier; visited, during the engagement, both the wings of his army; flew through the ranks; and, in short, discharged every duty of a valiant foldier, and experienced commander w. The numerous army of Artaxerxes was utterly routed, and that conqueror obliged, notwithstanding his former victories and conquetts, to five himself by a shameful flight. The particulars of this engagement we may learn from Alexander himself, who, on his return to Rome, gave the b fenate an account of this memorable expedition in the following speech: "Conscript

His Beech to she lenate.

" fathers, we have overcome the Persians, and there is no need of great eloquence " to acquaint you with the particulars of the victory. The enemy came with feven " hundred elephants, the greatest number ever seen together in the field. These " carried towers upon their backs, filled with archers and arrows. Three hundred " of the elephants we took, two hundred we killed upon the fpot, and eighteen we " have brought hither with us. They had eighteen hundred chariots armed with " feythes, of which we took two hundred. We have cut in pieces an army of one " hundred and twenty thousand horse, and ten thousand men armed cap-a-pé, with " whose spoils we have inriched our troops. We took a great number of prisoners, c

" whom we have fold. The country of Mesopotamia, lying between the Tigris and " the Euphrates, which my predecessor Heliogabalus had neglected, we have recon-" quered, and brought again under subjection. We have put the most potent king "Artaxerhes, as he is styled, to flight; the country of Persia beheld him slying for " the first time. In the place where the Romans formerly lost their enfigns and stand-

Disagreement amongst authors about ards, the Persians have now lost theirs. You see, conscript fathers, what we " have atchieved; the subject needs no eloquence to adorn or set it out; the army is " returned rich, and loaded with booty. It is incumbent upon you to appoint pub-" lie thanksgivings for so signal a victory, that we may not seem ungrateful to the "gods, who have bleffed our arms with fuch fuccess "." This speech, Lampridius d affures us, he copied out of the journals of the fenate, and found it, word for word, in the works of many historians; and therefore he cannot conceive how Herodian this expedicion. could write, that Alexander lost his army by famine, cold and sickness; which, he fays, is contradicting all the records, memoirs and histories of those times. Julius Capitolinus tells us, that Herodian hated Alexander, and therefore gave an unfaithful and detracting account of his Persian expedition y. However, he is sollowed by Zonaras 2 and Cedrenus 2. But Aurelius Victor, Festus, Eutropius, St. Jerom, and Syncellus, abandon him in this particular, and follow Lampridius. All the oriental historians write, that Alexander was utterly defeated, and obliged to purchase a peace, by yielding to the Persian all the countries lying between the Euphrates and the frontiers of Palestine h. But, after all, Lamprid us relates so many particulars of this victory, and appeals with such confidence to the journals of the senate, and the historians of those times, that we cannot help preferring his authority to that of the oriental historians, and of Herodian himself. After this victory Alexander returned to Antioch, with a design to pursue the war with fresh vigour the following year; but in the mean while being informed, that the Germans had invaded the Roman dominions, and at the same time that Artaxerxes had disbanded great part of his army for want of provisions, he resolved to quit the east, and return to Rome, apprehending greater evils from the Germans than from the Persians. Accordingly, having erected several forts in Mesopotamia, and lest numerous garisons to defend them, he set out from Antioch 1 in the spring of the following year, when Maximus and Urbanus were consuls; and Alexander re- arriving fafe at Rome, was there received by persons of all ranks with the greatest turns to Rome, demonstrations of joy imaginable. He entered the city in triumph, his chariot being drawn, not by four white horses, as was usual, but by four of the clephants which he had taken. When the ceremony was over, he went to the senate, where he made the speech we have related above. From the senate he repaired to the capitol, and there confectated some of the Persian spoils to Jupiter Capitolinus. Then turning to a id triumphic

w Vit. Alex. p. 130, 131. * Liem 1010. y Vit. Maxim. p. 143. 2 ZOMAR. p. 125. * CEDREN. p. 256. * Alex. vit. p. 139. FEST. p. 553.

a the people, I have overcome the Persians, said he, and the army is returned loaded with booty. I promise you a largess, and propose to exhibit to-morrow the Circensian sports. From the capitol he marched to the palace on foot, followed by his triumphal chariot, and attended by the senate, the equestrian order, and such crouds of people, all crying, Rome is safe, while Alexander is safe, that with much-ado he reached the palace in four hours. The next day he exhibited the Circensian sports, gave the promised largess, and, in honour of his mother, established a fund for the maintenance of the children of the poor citizens, who were thence called the children of Mamæa d.

In the mean time news being brought to Rome, that the Germans and other norb thern nations had passed the Rhine and the Danube in great numbers, the emperor, to He leaves the inexpressible grief of the senate and people, left the city, and hastened with his Rome to victorious army into Gaul, to stem this furious torrent. We are told, that a woman, by the Germans, profession a Druid, meeting him on his march, cried out to him in her language, You may go; but hope not for victory, nor trust your own soldiers. The historian does not inform us whether or no Alexander heard and understood her; but he affures us, that Alexander feared neither death, nor the omens that were thought to presage it, whereof he gives us the following instance: A celebrated astrologer, by name Tbrasybulus, the emperor's particular friend, having one day told him, that his fate was to fall by the hand of a barbarian, he was transported with joy, not doubting but he should die in c the field, which, he faid, was a death worthy of an emperor, observing to the astrologer, that many great men had ended their days by a violent death, and naming among the rest Alexander the Great, Pompey, Julius Cafar, Demosthenes, and Cicero . In the beginning of the following year, when Severus and Quinctianus were confuls, Alexander advanced with his army to the banks of the Rhine; but finding the enemy had repassed that river upon the news of his approach, he ordered a bridge to be Wio retire at built over it, with a design to attack them in their own country, as soon as the season his approach. would allow him to take the field f. Herodian, who always paints Alexander as a weak and timorous prince, tells us, that he fent embassiadors to the Germans with proposals of peace, which he even offered to purchase at any rate; and adds, that during d the time of this shameful negotiation, he diverted himself with driving chariots, and fuch-like unprincely exercises; which provoked the soldiers, and occasioned his ruin 8. But Lampridius clears the emperor from these ill-natured aspersions, and ascribes the The Gaulish discontent of the soldiery, that is, of the legions quartered in Gaul, to their licentilegions computers, and to the severity of Alexander, which they could not endure after having ousness, and to the severity of Alexander, which they could not endure, after having verity of Alexbeen, under Heliogabalus, long inured to idleness, and all manner of debauchery. ander. Among these troops was one Maximinus, by nation a Goth, whom Alexander, in regard of his valour, had preferred to the command of a body of Pannonians; but he, unmindful of his duty, and of the obligations he owed to the emperor, instead of e attempting to appeale the licentious and discontented soldiery, fomented under-hand the tumult, and, by his feditious speeches, inspired the multitude with contempt for Alexander, as one who was governed by a woman, meaning Mamæa, and consequently unfit for carrying on the war with vigour h. The emperor was then either at Mentz or Sicilia, which most geographers take to be the present village of Siclingen in the neighbourhood of Mentz, or that of Ober-Wesel on the Rhine, in the territory of Treves, between Boppart and Bingen. As Alexander had but a small body of troops with him, Maximinus resolved to lay hold of that opportunity, and to dispatch him, not doubting but the troops under his command, whom he had gained with mighty promifes, would, upon the death of that prince, proclaim him emperor. He imparted his They are encoudefign to some of the most bold and resolute among his men, who, animated with the raged by Maxi-hopes of great preferments, readily engaged to put it in execution, and immediately minus

```
d Vit. Alex. p. 133, 134.
85. 589. h Idem ibid.
                                                                                        # HEROD. l. vi. p.
                                  e Idem, p. 135, 136.
                                                                f Idem, p. 137.
585, 589.
   Vol. VI. Nº 2.
                                                          Pр
                                                                                                     and
```

fet out for the place where the emperor then was, which they contrived to reach about an hour after mid-day, when those who attended the emperor, were withdrawn to refresh themselves, according to the Roman custom, with a short sleep after dinner. They no sooner appeared, than the few soldiers who were upon guard, betook themselves to flight, having probably been gained over before-hand by Maximinus. Mamæa, alarmed at the unexpected noise and tumult, ran out, attended by the captains of the guards, to appeale it; but the affassins, having first murdered both her Alexander is assassinated.

and them, entered with their drawn swords the emperor's tent, who, as he was un- a armed, and left quite alone, threw his imperial mantle over his face, and received, without uttering a fingle word, the many blows with which they dispatched him. deriding him the whole time as a child unfit to be at the head of an army, and inveighing against his mother, as one whose only care was to amass riches b. Such was the unfortunate and undeferved end of Alexander Severus, after he had lived, according to the most probable opinion, twenty-six years, five months, and nineteen days, and reigned thirteen years and nine days. The loss of no prince was ever more regretted by the senate, the people, and the soldiery, than that of Alexander, who, by his wise administration, had gained the affections of all ranks of men. The senate immediately decreed, both to him and to his mother Mamæa, divine honours, appointed b them altars, priests and facrifices, and instituted, in honour of the deceased emperor, an annual feast, which was still kept in the time of Constantine the Great, on the first of October, Alexander's birth-day . The foldiers were no sooner apprised of his death, than they put to the fword all those who had been any-ways accessory to it, except the chief author of it, Maximinus, who, by perfuading the foldiery that he had His character. no hand in the murder, escaped for the present the deserved punishment. Alexander was, according to the testimony of all the ancients, Herodian alone excepted, one of the best and wisest princes that ever swayed a sceptre, and would, had he lived longer, have intirely reformed those abuses, which, after his death, involved the empire in endless calamities. He was sparing of the public money, liberal of his own, kind and gene- c this native ato to all good men; but an irreconcileable enemy to the wicked, especially to such bed the public. as were convicted of having plundered the provinces, and oppressed the people committed to their care. These he never spared, tho' his friends, savourites and kinsmen; but sentenced them to death, and caused them to be executed, notwithstanding their quality, or former fervices, like common malefactors. Eucolpius the historian, one of Alexander's chief favourites, tells us, as quoted by Lampridius d, that he could not even bear the fight of such public robbers; insomuch that one Septimius Arabinus, who had been tried for that crime, but acquitted by favour of Heliogabalus, coming one day with other fenators to wait upon the emperor, Alexander, on feeing him, cried out in a violent passion, O ye immortal gods? is Arabinus still alive, and a senator! d Does he even presume to appear in my presence! Surely he takes me to be as wicked as bimself! After this, he caused it to be proclaimed by the public crier, that if any one guilty of the same crime ever presumed to appear in his presence, he should immediately receive his deserved punishment, notwithstanding the pardon granted him by his predecessor. He used to say, that it was not a sufficient punishment to deprive corrupt magistrates and governors of their places; but that, as the trust reposed in them was great, they ought to pay for the breach of it with their lives.

> He banished one of his secretaries for giving to his council in writing a salse account of an affair, and caused the sinews of his fingers to be cut, that he might never write cified on the road which led from the city to the villa, where he frequently refided, that by the fight of the body, which was left on the cross, his other slaves might be deterred from the like practices f. He never pardoned any crime committed against the public; but suffered no one to be condemned, till his cause was thoroughly heard, and his offence evidently proved. The first thing he did after his accession to the empire, was to discharge all the officers, ministers and governors employed by Heliogabalus, and appoint in their room persons of known probity. He retrenched all the pensions which that prodigal prince had settled on his freed-men, on buffoons, stageplayers, charioteers, gladiators, &c. faying, that the emperor was but the steward of the people, and therefore could not, without the utmost injustice, thus wantonly f squander away their revenues upon persons no-ways useful to them. No prince ever

One of his slaves, convicted of having received a bribe, he caused to be cru-

His deference to the senate.

> * Idem, p. 135. Vict. epit. Zos. l. i. p. 639. Herod. l. vi. p. 587. Alex. vit. p. 119.
>
> * Idem ibid.
>
> f Idem, p. 124. 6 Alex. vir. p. 136. 4 Alex. vit. p. 119.

> paid greater deference to the senate than Alexander. He was the first emperor who allowed the senators to sit when they came to wait upon him. He appointed no governors or magistrates without advising with them, and never failed to prefer such as they recommended to him. He admitted none into the senate without the concurrence and approbation of all the members of that venerable body, asking the opinion of each in particular, and examining with great strictness into the manners and former conduct

a conduct of the person who was to be admitted. If upon this inquiry he was found unworthy of a place in the fenate, such of the fenators as had recommended him, were themselves degraded, and such as had given testimony of his probity, condemned, as in cases of perjury, to lose their estates, and banished for ever. He never admitted either freed-men or their children to the equestrian order, which he used to call the nursery of the senate. He appointed, that the captains of the guards He bestows the should no longer be chosen out of the equestrian, but only out of the senatorial order; of the guards that no one should have the power of judging a senator, but who was himself a senator; only on senafor the captains of the guards had been long the ordinary judges of the fenators in tors. cases of treason 8. Thus, by degrees the captains became the most powerful officers b in the state, and their office more considerable than even that of the consuls, which in the end ruined the authority of the senate. In the administration of justice Alexander Impartial in never took upon him to decide any law-suit, without consulting his council, which the administration of the most learned civilians in Rome, whom he obliged to give their opinions in writing, after having allowed them time to examine and weigh matters at their leifure, that they might not pronounce sentence without due premeditation. Thus were all matters of jultice determined by persons of known integrity, and well skilled in the laws. In military affairs he consulted only such persons as had acquired experience by their long fervice, and were well acquainted with the fituation of places, or men versed in history, inquiring of them what had at any time been done on the c like occasions by his predecessors, or other great captains. He is said never to have Prefers only given any public office out of favour or friendship; but to have employed such only persons of merit as were both by himself and the senate judged the best qualified for the discharge of the trust reposed in them. He preferred one to the command of the guards, who had retired into the country on purpose to avoid that office, saying, that with him the declining fuch honourable employments was the best recommendation to them. He would not suffer any employments to be fold, saying, He who buys, must sell in his turn; and it would be unjust to punish one for selling, after he has been suffered to buy. In appointing governors of provinces he observed a commendable custom, which was to publish their names, and encourage all persons to declare, either in public or d private, whether they had any thing to lay to their charge : Since Jews and Christians, faid he on this occasion, use such commendable methods in the choice of their priests, it is reasonable we should proceed with the like care in the choice of restors of provinces, who are intrusted with the lives and fortunes of so many persons. As he punished with the utmost feverity those who betrayed their trust, so he rewarded with great generosity such as had answered the good opinion he entertained of them, and either raised them to employments of greater profit, or, if they chose to retire, presented them with houses and lands, faying, that fince corrupt governors inriched themselves at the expence of the people, good governors ought to be inriched at the expence of the prince . He was an utter enemy to all pomp and shew, and extremely modest in his apparel, Alexander an e telling those who found fault with him on that account, that a prince ought to be enemy to all distinguished from the rest, not by his apparel, but by his gallantry, and virtuous pomp and shew. The rich presents sent him by foreign princes he bestowed on the temples; but fold all the jewels, employing the money accruing from them to the relief of the The embaffadors of an eaftern prince having presented the empress with two pearls of an extraordinary fize, Alexander ordered them to be fold; but no one being found rich enough to purchase them, he consecrated them to serve as pendents to a statue of Venus, that the empress might not seem by wearing them to encourage luxury in others. He kept such a small number of slaves and treed-men, whom he caused to wear a particular habit, in order to put them in mind of their f condition, that when he gave any public entertainment, he was obliged to use those of his friends, nay, and to borrow their plate; for he fold all the gold, and most of the filver-plate belonging to the palace, to defray the necessary charges of the government, without burdening the people. He reduced the imposts with which Helioga-Reduces the balus had loaded both Rome and the provinces, to the thirtieth part, and suffered taxes. feveral cities to apply even that towards the repairing of their public buildings. He lent money without interest to the poor, wherewithal to purchase houses and lands, allowing them time to pay the capital with the product of their lands. He was fo far from filling the exchequer at the expence of the people, that he could not abide

His public morks.

His learning.

necessary evils, and never suffered any of them to continue in his office a full year. He a filled at a vast charge the public granaries, which, upon his accession to the empire, he found almost empty; distributed weekly great quantities of oil and corn amongst the poor citizens; and allotted funds for the maintenance and education of their children. He would not suffer the money levied upon the public profittutes and catamites to be returned into his private coffers, as other emperors had done; but allotted it towards the repairing of the theatre, the circus, and the amphitheatre. He built granaries in all the quarters of the city, for the use of those who had none of their own. Of these public and common granaries frequent mention is made by the ancients. He caused baths to be likewise erected in each quarter of the city, and at his own expence furnished them with wood, and oil for the lamps in the night; b whereas before his time they were never opened till the rifing, and were shut again at the fetting of the fun. He built a great many fine houses for such of his friends and ministers as had served him faithfully, and lived without reproach . He furnished the governors of provinces at their first setting out with money and other things which were thought necessary; that is, according to Lampridius, with twenty pounds weight of filver, eight mules, two horses, two gowns, an hundred pieces of gold, one cook, one coachman, and one concubine, if the person he named was not married!. He founded a great many free schools in Rome, and took particular care of the children of noble, but decayed families. He imbellished Rome with an incredible number of stately buildings; repaired most of the ancient structures, leaving c upon them the names of their first founders; and erected in the great square of Nerva statues in honour of most of the emperors his predecessors, with inscriptions on columns of brass, containing succinct accounts of all their memorable actions m. Alexander was a great encourager of learning, took great delight in conversing with learned men, and spent all the time he could spare from public affairs in reading the Greek and Latin authors, especially Plato's commonwealth, Tully's offices, the works of Horace, of Virgil, whom he used to style the Plato of the poets, and of Serenus Sammonicus, another poet, whom we have mentioned above n. He was himself well versed in all the branches of polite literature, and described in verse the exploits of fome of his predecessors. He applied himself chiefly to the study of judicial aftro- d logy, which was by his orders publicly taught at Rome, and pretended to be thoroughly acquainted with the science of the soothsayers and augurs, both as to entrails of facrifices, and the flight and chirping of birds P. He often went to hear the poets and orators declaim in the public schools; but would not allow them to write any thing in his praise. In short, Alexander, to end the history of his reign with the words of Aurelius Victor, made it his whole study to encourage virtue and learning, to reform abuses, to restore the military discipline, and to discharge with the greatest fidelity and difinterestedness each duty of an excellent prince. His endeavours were attended with such success, that the empire would have still retained its former lustre, had those who succeeded him firmly maintained what he had so wisely established. e Some of his predecessors, namely Trajan, Antoninus, and M. Aurelius, performed perhaps greater things; but were older when they came to the empire, than Alexander was at the time of his death 4. Of the writers who flourished in his reign, the reader will find a fuccinct account in our note (Q).

1 Idem, p. 124, 130. k Idem, p. 127. Idem, p. 130. m Idem, p. 123. n Hist. Univers. Vol. VI. p. 129. not. (O). Vit. Alex. p. 123. P Idem ibid. 4 Aur. Vict. in vit. Alex.

(Q) Lampridius, in his life of Alexander, often quotes Acholius, Septimius, and Eucolpius, but seems to prefer Septimius to the other two (99). They flourished under Alexander, and wrote the history of that prince's reign. Vossius ranks them among the Latin historians, tho' none of their works have reached our times; and Lampridius does not inform us, whether they wrote in Greek or Latin (100). Acholius lived in the time of Alexander, but died long after; for he was admissionum magister, that is, in the modern phrase, master of the ceremonies, to the emperor Valerian, who began his reign in the year 253. eighteen years after the death of Alexander (1). He even wrote the life of Valerian, and confequently outlived him; nay, Vossius is of opinion, that he was still alive in the reign of Aurelian, who was raised to the empire in 270(2). Eucolpius not only lived in the time of Alexander, but was highly favoured by that prince (3). A treatise on government, ascribed to Eucolpius, was translated out of Greek into English above a hundred years since, in which the reader will find a particular account of a supposed conference between the emperor Alexander and Origen. But as some circumstances of that conference are inconfiftent with what we read in the best historians, we are inclined to ascribe that piece to some modern Greek writer, and to look upon the whole as a mere table (4). Gargilius Martialis wrote likewise the history of the reign of Alexander, and is ranked by Vopifeus among those historians who wrote with more exactness than elegance(5). Servius, and other writers, quote a treatife on gardening by one Gargilius Martialis (6); but whether this be the historian, or another author of the same name, we cannot take upon us to determine. Marius Maximus wrote the history of the emperors from Trajan to Alexander, and is often quoted by the Augustine writers. M. Valois takes him to be the fame person with L. Marius Maximus, who had been conful, and was preferred by Macrinus to the government of Rome in the year 218 (7). Ammianus Marcellinus observes, that at Rome, in the fourth century, when learning was utterly neglected, many, who never looked into any other book, read with great attention the fatires of Juvenal, and the history of Marius Maximus (8). Capitolinus commends his fincerity and exactness (9); but Vopiscus, whose judgment is of great weight with the learned, styles him, of all historians, the most redious and long-winded, and finds fault with him for filling his books with fables (10). The life of Alexander was likewise published by Aurelius Philippus, his father's freed-man (11). Julius Granianus, who instructed Alexander in rhetoric, left some declamations, which were still extant in the time of Lampridius (12). Besides the celebrated civilians Ulpianus and Paulus, of whom we have made mention above, Forentinus, Ælius Marcianus, Hermogenes or Hermogenianus, Callistrata, and D. Claudius Venuleius Saturninus, whose names are famous in the pandects, were all Papinian's disciples, and flourished under Alexander; as did likewise Herennius Modestinus, who was preceptor to Maximinus, the son of the emperor of that name, and wrote feveral books of jurisprudence, and, among the rest, one in Greek, on the excuses of guardians. He was honoured with the confulfhip by Alexander, but was still alive in the reign of Gordian, which began in 239 (13). In the time of Alexander, flourished, as we suppose, the sophists, who are mentioned by Philostratus in the end of his work; for he wrote soon after that prince's reign (14). Among these was Aspasius, who attended the emperor into the east, afterwards taught at Rome, and was in the end preferred to be one of the emperor's fecretaries, and charged with the province of drawing up his rescripts, which he did in a bombastic and obscure style. He was a native of Ravenue (15). Canisus published in 1602, the work of an anonymous christian writer, composed, as the author informs us, in the thirteenth year of Alexander's reign, and the 236th after the birth of our. Saviour. But he counts two hundred and fix years fince our Saviour's death, supposing him to have lived only thirty years. This work is an ill-digested abridgment of geography and chronology, and, in the opinion of the learned, full of anachronisms, and other faults. The transcribers of Canifius's copy have left out the chronological table of the Roman emperors, which is twice promised in the preface (16). Father Labbé, who has published the same author, found in his copy the above-mentioned table, which is far from being exact (17). It ends with the thirteen years and nine days of the reign of Alexander (18); whence it is plain, that the author put the last hand to it in the beginning of the reign of Maximinus. In father Labbe's edition of this work, the author promises a catalogue of the bishops of Rome, and the time of their respective episcopacies; but that catalogue is wanting in the manuscript. The author was perhaps a native of Rome, and a priest; for in father Labbe's edition, he addresses himself to a deacon, whom, he says, he designs to instruct; which, in the primitive church, no ecclessation of an inferior rank, and much less a layman, would have taken upon him to do. Of this writer Vessius takes no notice.

(99) Vit. Alex. p. 119, 131, 136. (2) Voss. hist. Lat. l. ii. c. 4. p. 182. (100) Vide Voss. hist. Lat. p. 719. (3) Alex. vit. p. 119.

(1) Aur. Vict. p. 213.

But the most famous of all the writers, who flourished under Alexander, was the celebrated historian Dion Cussius, called also Cassius Cocceius or Cocceianus. He was a native of Nices in Bithynia, and probably related to Cocceianus Dion, a citizen of Prusa in the fame province, in whose behalf Pliny the younger wrote to Trajan (19). Under Trajan flourished another Dion of Prusa, a famous sophist, commonly known by the name of Dion Chrysostomus, who wrote several works, which have reached our times (20). The historian was the son of Apronianus, who was governor of Cilicia about the year 183. when the two brothers Quintilii were put to death by Commodus's order (21). He was likewise for some time governor of Illyricum (22). His son was at Rome in the reign of Commodus, at least towards the latter end of it (23). He was senator in the year 192. the last of the reign of Commodus, and named prætor for the ensuing year by Pertinax, who had a particular kindness and esteem for him (24). He was appointed conful by the emperor Severus (25), attended, after that prince's death, his son Caracalla into the east (26), and spoke with him, for the last time, at Nicomedia, about the latter end of the year 215 (27). Macrinus named him to the government of Smyrna and Pergamus, which he held under Heliogabalus, and was still in Asia in the year 221 (28). From Asia, he went into Bithynia; whence he was recalled, and appointed governor, first of Africa, afterwards of Illyricum, and lastly of Pannonia; in which governments he acquitted himself so well, that Alexander, upon his return to Rome, honoured him with a second consulfaip in the year 228 (29). When the time of his consulfhip expired, he obtained leave to return into his own country, where he passed the remaining part of his life in retirement. Dion Cassius wrote in eight decades, that is, in eighty books, the Roman history, from the landing of Eneas in Italy, to the reign of the emperor Alexander (30). In the time of Severus, he wrote a book on the dreams, and other prodigies, which seemed to prefage the rife of that prince; which being well received by the emperor, Dion dreamt the following night, that his genius commanded him to undertake the writing of history. Accordingly he immediately began that of the reign of Commodu:; and being encouraged by Severus, and others, to whom he read what he had done, to apply himself to the writing of history, he undertook that of Rome (31), and spent ten years in collecting the necessary materials for fo great a work, and twelve more in composing it (32). He is very minute in his history of the emperors to the death of Heliogabalus; but gives us only a fummary account of the eight first years of Alexander, having been, as he himself informs us, most part of that time absent from Italy (33), and consequently not so well acquainted with what passed at Rome. He had, it seems, begun his history before the death of Plansianns, that is, before the year 204. and ended it soon after the year 229 for he takes no notice of Alexander's war with the Persians. His account of the public transactions, from the reign of Commodus to that of Alexander, is very particular and minute; for he then began to write, not what he had learnt of others, but what he had himself seen and observed. He assures us, that no one capable of writing a hiof the emperors to the death of Heliogabalus; but He assures us, that no one capable of writing a hiftory was better acquainted than himself, both with the public and private transactions; which is not at all incredible in a person of his rank. His style, according to Photius, is sublime, and answerable to the greatness of his subject; his terms expressive, his phrase elegant, his periods full and well-founding, and the whole worthy of the best historians of ancient Greece. He proposed Thucydides for his model, and does not, in the opinion of Photius, fall much fhort of that excellent writer (34). Vossius, however, blames him for crying down the greatest men of antiquity, namely, Cicero, Brutus, Cassius, and Seneca; but others clear him from that censure, and think he acted the part of an unbiassed historian, in discovering the faults (for no man is without faults) even of those whom he himself most admired (35). He blames only what in them was blame-worthy, and commends what to him feemed commendable Others think him too diffuse in his accounts of dreams, prodigies, and other things of that nature, beneath the dignity of an historian. He wrote, as we have observed above, the Roman history in eighty books; but of that great work only a small part has reached us. For the first thirty-four books have been long fince intirely loft; and of the thirty-fifth only some fragments are remaining: the following books, from the end of the thirty-fifth to the fiftyfourth, are thought to be intire; but the next fix are, in some places, strangely maimed and corrupted. Of the twenty last, we have only some fragments published by Fulvius Ursmus and M. Valois. However, that great loss has been in some degree supplied by John Xiphilin, who was patriarch of Confaminople in the eleventh century, and epitomized Dion's history from the thirty-fifth book to the end. This epitome is greatly efteemed by the learned, and thought to be very exact. The history of Zonaras may likewise be called an abridgment of Dion's work; for he copied, as he himself owns, most of his history from Dion, and followed him with great exactness. These abridgments have been of great with the compiling of our history. For in use to us in the compiling of our history; for in them are to be found the most material transactions of the Romans, from the period where Tacitus's history ends, to the time of the emperor Alexander: from that prince to Conflantine, the history of the emperors is more perplexed, and less certain. For Herodian wrote with more elegance than exactness; and Lampridius, and the other Augustine writers, scarce deserve the name of historians. They wrote in the beginning of the fourth century; and Amelius Vic-tor and Eutropius only copied them about the close of the same century. Zosimus, who wrote at the end of the fifth century, shews, by the mistakes of which he is guilty in the very beginning of his work, that he either made use of bad memoirs, or did not understand the good ones. Dion Cassius, besides his Roman history, published a particular history of Trajan, the life of the philosopher Arrian the disciple of Episterns, itineraries, the history of the Persians, and that of the Geta (36). The latter was known to fornandes, who copied from it what he writes of Telephus, king of the Geta in the times of Achilles and Uly [es (37).

(4) Vide Selden. in Eutych. Ægypt. &c., not. p. 174, 175. Londin. ann. 1642. (5) Vopisc. Prob. vit. p. 234. (6) Vide Casaub. not. p. 168. (7) Ammian. not. p. 364. Spon. p. 114. (8) Ammian. l. xxviii. p. 372. (9) Vit. Alb. p. 64. (10) Vide Voss. hist. l. ii. c. 3, p. 178. (11) Vit. Alex. p. 118. (12) Idem ibid. p. 115. (13) Alex. vit. p. 137. & Casaub. not. p. 178. Maxim. vit. p. 148. Cod. fusiin. l. ii. tit. 12. leg. 11. p. 197. (14) Philos. soph. lix. p. 622. (15) Idem, p. 623. (16) Canis antiq lect. tom. ii. p. 594. (17) Labbé bibl. nov. tom. i. p. 308. (18) Idem, p. 309. (19) Plin. l. x. epist. 87. p. 612. (20) Suid. p. 753, & 765. (21) Dio, l. lxix. p. 788. & l. lxxii. p. 820. (22) Idem, l. xix. p. 413. (23) Idem, l. lxxii. p. 818. (24) Idem ibid. p. 820, 827. & l. lxxiii. p. 835. (25) Idem, l. lxxvi. p. 869. (26) Idem, l. lxxviii. p. 883, 884. (27) Idem, l. lxxix. p. 909. (28) Idem, p. 915. (29) Idem, l. lxxx. p. 917. (30) Suid. d. p. 753. (31) Idem, l. lxxii. p. 828. Phot. c. 71. p. 105. (32) Idem, l. lxxii. p. 829.

o. (34) Phot. c. 71. p. 103. (37) Jornan. de reb. Gothic. c. 9. (33) Idem, I. lxxvi. p. 860. (36) Suid. J. p. 714.

(35) Voff. hift. Grac. 1. ii. c. 15. p. 238.

C H A P. XXIII.

The Roman history, from the death of Alexander Severus, to the captivity of Valerian, when the empire was usurped by thirty persons at once, commonly called the thirty tyrants.

Maximinus Maximinus.

HE murder of Alexander occasioned a great tumult and confusion in the army; a during which the Pannonian troops, under the command of Maximinus, prodeclared emps- claimed him emperor; and the rest, finding no other appeared to claim or dispute that title, followed their example, and took the usual oaths to Maximinus, after he had solemnly declared, that he had been no-ways concerned in or accessary to the death of Alexander. The new emperor immediately declared his fon Maximinus, Cafar and prince of the Roman youth, invested him with the tribunitial and proconfular power, honoured him with the title of Augustus, and took him for his partner in the sovereignty. The senate, whom he took care to acquaint as soon as possible with his assumption to the empire, not daring to oppose the choice of the soldiery,

a confirmed it; fo that Maximinus was, without the least opposition, acknowledged emperor by the senate, the people, and the army . He was, according to Syn- His extraction cellus', a native of Thrace; according to Herodian, Capitolinus, and Jornandes, and preferborn in a village on the confines of that province, and the country of the bar-ments. barians. His father, by name Micea, or Micea, was a Goth; and his mother Ababa, or Abala, an Alan. He is styled in the ancient inscriptions C. Julius Verus Maximinus. He was of a very mean extraction, and in his early youth a shepherd, but of a gigantic stature, being eight foot and a half tall, and withal exceeding well shaped, all his limbs answering his stature in symmetry and proportion. Of his His mighty strength, wonderful things are related by the ancients, viz. that he was often seen strength. b to draw a loaded waggon, which two oxen could scarce move, to tear up trees by the roots, to crumble pebbles between his fingers, &c. Besides, he was so bold and courageous, that he took delight in expoling himself to the greatest dangers: whence he was called, for his courage and valour, Achilles, Hettor, and Ajax; for his strength, Hercules, Antaus, and Milo; but at the same time, for his savage cruelty, Busiris, Phalaris, and Cyclops. He was first known to the emperor Septimius Severus on the following occasion: That prince having exhibited, as he passed through Thrace, some military games and exercises in honour of his second son Geta, and proposed prizes for the conquerors, Maximinus, at that time about twenty years old, begged leave of the emperor, partly in the Latin, and partly in the Thracian language, to c enter the lifts, and try his skill with the rest. The emperor, admiring his size, matched him, not with the foldiers, as he was a barbarian, but with some of the strongest slaves in the camp, whom he overcame, sixteen one after the other. Hereupon the emperor ordered him to be lifted among the horse. A few days after, as the emperor was visiting the different quarters of the camp on horseback, Maximimus, accosting him, began to run by him. The emperor, to try whether he could run as well as he could wrestle, put his horse upon a sull gallop, and rid round the camp, Maximinus keeping close by him the whole time, till both he and his horse were quite spent. Then turning to him, Thracian, said he, art thou now disposed to wrestle? I am, answered Maximinus, as much as you please. The emperor immed diately difmounted, and ordered some of the strongest soldiers, and best wrestlers in the army, to enter the lifts with him, of whom he overcame and threw down seven, as if they had been fo many children; which fo pleased the emperor, that he prefented him with a golden collar, placed him among his guards, and heaped many favours upon him, appointing him extraordinary allowances, the common pay not being sufficient to support him. For he used to eat, according to Julius Capitolinus, forty, according to Ælius Cardus, a more ancient historian, fixty pounds weight of flesh a day; and to drink eight amphoræ of wine, that is, six gallons, without ever eating or drinking to excess ". He was preferred by Caracalla to the post of a centurion, but quitted the army upon that prince's death, being unwilling to ferve e under Macrinus, the chief author of the murder, and retired to his own country. When Heliogabalus came to the empire, he offered his service to him; and being admitted again into the army, he was, by the interest of his friends, raised to the rank of a tribune; but always declined, under some pretence or other, attending the emperor, who had disobliged him with an impure jest, alluding to his mighty strength w. He had even absented himself from Rome, not being able to bear the fight of that lewd monster; but returned thither when he understood that Alexander was raised to the empire, and was by that prince received with the greatest demonstrations of kindness and esteem, recommended by him to the senate, created sena- He is greatly tor, and honoured with the command of a new-raifed legion, which the emperor favour f thought him well qualified to instruct in the military exercises. In that office he Alexander. acquitted himself so well, that Alexander preserved him to a higher command, and, at the breaking out of the German war, charged him with the care of disciplining the new-raised troops, consisting chiefly of Pannonians. We are told, that Alexander had even some thoughts of marrying his sister Theoclia to the son of Maximinus, who, in most inscriptions, is styled C. Julius Verus Maximinus. He was a youth of extraordinary beauty, in stature almost equal to his father, well shaped, brave, courageous, but proud and haughty to fuch a degree, that, upon his being proclaimed

F Max. vit. p. 142. Sync. p. 361. F Herod. l. vi. p. 585. Max. vit. p. 138. Jornand. 1egn. c. 22, Herod. l. vi. p. 585. Max. vit. p. 138, 139. W Max. vit. p. 139, 140.

Augustus,

Augustus, and his father's partner in the empire, he suffered his soldiers not only to a kifs his hand, but his knees and feet, which his father could never endure. he was killed with his father in the year 238, he was betrothed to Julia Fadilla, the great niece of Antoninus Pius .

His cruelty after his accespire.

Maximinus no fooner faw himfelf invested with the fovereign power, than he difmiffed all those who had been employed by Alexander in places of trust, and appointed creatures of his own in their room, selected for the most part out of the very dregs of the people. He made it his chief study to gain the affections of the foldiery; reign with unheard-of cruelties. All those who had been intimate with dlexander,

The conspiracy of Magnus.

The Ofthor. nians revols.

Quartinus betrayed and murdered.

Maximinus gains several victories over the Germans.

Dacians and

. . . .

but chusing rather to be feared than loved by the rest of his subjects, he began his or shewed the least concern for his death, were by his orders inhumanly massacred; b the senators, whom he had created, degraded; and such officers as he had raised, under various pretences, discharged, and most of them banished. Bing ashamed of the meanness of his extraction, he caused all those who knew his parents, or any of his family, to be privately murdered, tho' many of them had relieved him when in a low condition, and by their interest raised him in the army. His cruelty was heightened by the conspiracy of Magnus, a consular of an illustrious family, and great merit. He conspired with several of Alexander's old soldiers to break down the bridge which that prince had built over the Rhine, after Maximinus had passed it, and abandon him to the enemy. But the conspiracy being discovered, all those, whom Maximinus only suspected to have been privy to it, were inhumanly massacred, to the number c of four thousand, without being tried, or even examined; which induced many to believe, that the plot was only a contrivance of Maximinus, to rid himself of those who gave him umbrage v. A few days after the conspiracy of Magnus, the Ofrhoenians, who ferved in the army, and had been always greatly attached to the late emperor, no longer doubting that he had been affaffinated by Maximinus's orders, openly revolted, proclaimed T. Quartinus emperor, and attired him, much against his will, with the imperial purple, and all the enfigns of fovereignty. But foon after one Macedo, who had been the chief author of the revolt, and pretended great friendship for Quartinus, murdered him while he was reposing in his tent, and carried his head to Maximinus, who, instead of rewarding him according to his expectation, d caused him some time after to be executed for rebelling against his prince, and betraying his friend 2. The Ofrhoenians returning to their duty after the death of Quartinus, the following year, when Severus and Quintianus were consuls, Maximinus entered Germany at the head of a mighty army, ravaged the country far and wide, burnt the enemy's habitations, carried off their corn and cattle, and took an incredible number of prisoners. Several battles were fought in the woods and marshes, in each of which the emperor killed many of the enemy with his own hand, discharging every duty of a gallant foldier, and experienced commander. He chose always to fight at the head of his troops, and often grappled with the enemy hand to hand like a common foldier. Having, in one encounter, to encourage his men, rushed sword e in hand into the midst of the enemy, he was surrounded on all sides, and had been either killed or taken, notwithstanding his extraordinary strength, in which he placed too much confidence, had not his men, animated by the example of their general, hastened to his rescue. He took care to transmit an account of his victories to the fenate, telling them among other things, that he had laid waste the enemy's country four hundred miles round; destroyed near one hundred and fifty of their villages; taken an incredible number of prisoners; and fought more battles, than any of the ancients had ever done 2. He ordered his exploits to be represented in painting, and hung up in the squares and public places at Rome. For these victories the senate decreed both to him and his fon the title of Germanicus; which is still to be seen on f feveral of his medals b. From Germany he marched into Illyricum, and having passed the winter at Sirmium in Pannonia, where he entered upon his first consulship, and took Africanus for his collegue, early in the spring he led his army into the countries Overcomes the of the Dacians and Sarmatians, gained several victories over those barbarous nations, and obliged them to submit to such terms as he was pleased to impose upon them. He had nothing less in view, than to extend the borders of the empire to the northern ocean; which he would have easily accomplished, says Herodian c, had he not been

> 7 Idem, p. 142. Herod. l. vii. p 589. 2 1 ibid. 6 Goltz. p. 101, 102. Birag. p. 329. <sup>2</sup> Herod. l. vii. p. 590. p. 592.

> > inter-

Vol. VI. No. 2.

a interrupted by a civil war, and great disturbances at home, occasioned by his unheardof cruelty, and infatiable avarice. He encouraged informers, feigned plots, and His cruelty. condemned, without distinction of quality, sex, or age, all who were accused, seizing their estates, and reducing the richest families in Rome to beggary. Persons of the greatest distinction were inatched away from their friends and relations, and, upon various groundless accusations, carried into Pannonia, to be judged by the emperor, who never failed to condemn them either to death or banishment, and to feize their estates, whether the crimes laid to their charge were proved or no. Not satisfied with the wealth of so many illustrious families, he began to plunder the temples, to strip the public buildings of their ornaments, and to seize on the public money in the cities allotted for the maintenance or diversions of the people. This b alarmed the populace, and disposed them to a general revolt, which first broke out The people in in Africa, about the middle of May of the ensuing year, when Perpetuus and Corne-Africa revolt. lianus were consuls, on the following occasion: Two young men of great distinction, being condemned by the emperor's receiver in that province, who oppressed the people in a most tyrannical manner, to pay a fine, which would have reduced them to beggary, conspired to save their fortunes, by destroying him; and accordingly, having gained some soldiers of the legion quartered there, they fell upon him unexpectedly, and cut in pieces both him and such of the foldiers as attempted to defend him. This murder, they well knew, the emperor would never forgive; and therefore, c well apprifed, that the only means of escaping the punishment due to their crime, was to create a new prince, they openly revolted, and with the concurrence of the people, who could no longer bear the tyrannical government of Maximinus, proclaimed Gordianus, at that time proconsul of Africa, emperor in his room. Gordianus was Gordian prodescended of an illustrious family, possessed of immense wealth, and universally be-claimed empeloved both at Rome and in the provinces, many of which he had governed, on account ror in Africa. of his extraordinary merit and virtues; but as he was stricken in years, being at this time eighty and upwards, when the people broke unexpectedly into his house, and faluted him with the title of Augustus, he threw himself upon the ground, and begged with many tears they would fuffer him to fpend the poor remains of his life in quiet, d and chuse some other more able, on account of his age, to deliver the state from the tyrannical yoke under which it groaned. But the people, and at their head one Mauricius, a person of great authority among them, continuing unalterable in their former resolution, Gordianus was in the end constrained to accept the ensigns and title of emperor; which he had no fooner done, than, to the inexpreffible joy of all the Africans, he took his fon, who bore the fame name, was then his lieutenant, and had been conful, for his partner in the empire. From Thydrus, a city of no small note in Byzacene, not far from Adrumetum, where this happened, Gordianus marched to Carthage, and made his entry into that city arrayed with the imperial purple, amidst the loud acclamations of the people, saluting him with the title of Gordianus e Africanus. From Carthage he wrote to the senate and people of Rome, acquainting He writes to them with what had happened in Africa, and assuring them, that he had accepted of the senate, the empire against his will, and was ready to resign it, if they did not think fit to confirm his election. In the decrees which he fent with his letters, and ordered to be publicly fet up with the approbation of the fenate, he gave leave to all exiles to return home, banished the informers, promised large sums to the people, and to the soldiery a greater largess than any emperor had ever given. At the same time he wrote to all the great men in Rome, most of whom were his particular friends, encouraging them to exert themselves on the present occasion, and join him in rescuing Rome from the insupportable tyranny of Maximinus, which was the only motive that had prompted f him in his old age to submit to so heavy a burden as the empire. In his letter to Junius Syllanus, then consul, he charged that magistrate to dispatch without delay Vitalianus, who commanded the body of the prætorian guards that had been left in Rome, and was greatly attached to Maximinus, being of a no less cruel and savage temper than that tyrant. Syllanus, upon the receipt of this letter, sent the quæstor, attended by some resolute men, with letters to Vitalianus, which he pretended to have just received from Maximinus, injoining them to draw him aside, and dispatch him while he was perufing them; which they did accordingly, and then gave out, that what they had done was by Maximinus's orders: which was believed; for thus he used to treat even his best friends. After this, the consul Syllanus assembled at his house g the prætors, ædiles and tribunes of the people, and, attended by them, went to the fenate, and there read, on the twenty-seventh day of May, the letters which Gordia- a nus had written both to them and to him. Hereupon the senate, in great transports of joy, declared, without the least hesitation, the two Gordians emperors, the two peror, and de-clare Maximi- Maximins public enemies, and decreed a great reward to such as should kill either of them. At the fame time they named to the prætorship of the ensuing year a third Gordian, grandson to the elder, tho' then only but twelve years old. These proceedings however were kept fecret, till fuch time as the fenate had taken the necessary measures for quashing at once the party of the Maximins in Rome; which was no fooner done, than they gave out, that they were both killed, and that the two Gordians reigned in their room. The edicts of the latter were publicly hung up, and their images carried to the camp, with their letters to the foldiery, who being, after the b death of Vitalianus, destitute of a leader, readily submitted to the Gordians. As for the people, transported with rage against Maximinus hardly to be expressed, they immediately ran and pulled down all his statues and monuments, uttering dreadful imprecations against the bloody tyrant and his son. At the same time the senate enacted a decree, sentencing to death all the friends of Maximinus, and the ministers of his cruelty. Hereupon such of them as had not the good luck to escape, were Miximinus at massacred without mercy by the enraged multitude, dragged through the streets, and thrown into the common fewer. Several innocent persons perished with the guilty, many laying hold of that opportunity to dispatch their private enemies or creditors. Sabinus, governor of Rome, endeavouring to put a stop to these disorders, had his c brains dashed out with a blow from one of the mob, and his body was left for some time in the public street d.

Who acknowledge him emperor, and denus a public enemy.

dered.

The friends of

The senate all

In the mean time it being publicly known, that Maximinus was still alive, the to a manrevolt senate issued a second decree against him, declaring anew both him and his son public from Maximi- enemies, and at the same time dispatched persons of the greatest interest and authority into all the provinces, with letters to the proconfuls, presidents, lieutenants, tribunes, &c. exhorting them to join in the common cause, and exert themselves in defence of their common liberties, against a raging tyrant, and public enemy (S). They likewise chose twenty senators, who had all been consuls, and sent them into different parts of Italy, with orders to guard night and day all the roads, ports and d harbours, that no account of what had passed at Rome might be transmitted to Maximinus before the arrival of Gordian. The letters of the senate were received in most cities and provinces with incredible joy, and a dreadful flaughter was made of the officers and friends of Maximinus. Only a few places continued faithful to him, and either delivered up to the tyrant, or massacred, the deputies of the senate. At Rome persons of all ranks and ages, even the women and children, crouded to the temples, beseeching the gods, that they would never suffer the bloody tyrant to approach the city o. Maximinus, who was at this time either in Thrace or Sarmatia, soon received intelligence of what had passed at Rome, and in Africa, notwithstanding all the precautions of the senate; nay, a copy of the decree of the senate, declaring him a public e enemy, and fetting a price upon his head, was transmitted to him; upon the reading of which he flew into such a passion, as can hardly be expressed or conceived: more like a wild beast than a human creature, says the author of his life, he beat his head against the wall, threw himself upon the ground, tore his royal robes, drew his fword, and, after having uttered dreadful menaces against the senate, fell upon those who stood next to him, and would have killed his son, had he not quickly withdrawn, for having refused to quit him, and live at Rome; which the father advised him to do upon their first coming to the empire, and which would, in his

His rage upon the news of the revolt.

d Gordian. vit. p. 153, & seq. Max. vit. 143, & seq. Herod. l. vii. p. 595-598. e Herod. l. vii. p. 599. Max. vit. p. 141.

(S) The letter which the senate wrote on this occasion, was conceived in the following terms: " To all proconfuls, presidents, lieutenants, com-" manders, tribunes, free towns, cities, villages and " castles, the senate and people of Rome, whose de-" liverance from the tyranny of the cruel monster " Maximin is begun by the Gordians, greeting: By the favour of the gods we have for emperor
Gordian, a person of the greatest merit and vir-

&quot; tue. We have proclaimed him emperor, and, " for the greater security of the state, his son in conjunction with him. It is incumbent upon "you to concur with us in procuring and promoting the public welfare and fafety; in oppoling the wicked defigns of those who threaten us; " and in pursuing to death the cruel tyrant Maxi-" min, and his friends; for we have declared him " and his son public enemies (33)."

a opinion, have kept the senate and people in awe, and prevented the present revolt. In short, such was his sury and rage, that his friends, looking upon him as a man bereft of his understanding, with much-ado snatched his arms from him, and carried him to his room. Being returned to himself, he spent some days in deliberating with his council about the most proper measures to be pursued at such an important con-Then affembling his army, he acquainted them with the state of affairs, pretending to be under no apprehension, and promising to distribute among them the estates of the senators, and African rebels. Having ended his speech, he gave his foldiers a great bounty, and without loss of time began his march towards Italy. He marches for The troops not shewing so much ardour and forwardness as he expected, he wrote Italy.

b to his fon, who was marching with a separate body at some distance, to join him with all possible expedition, left the army should, in his absence, attempt upon his life. At the same time he dispatched persons to Rome, to publish there in his name a general pardon with respect to all past injuries, and with them letters to Sabinus, not being yet apprised of his death, in which was inclosed a copy of the decree declaring him a public enemy; for he supposed Sabinus, who had absented himself that day from the senate, to be altogether ignorant of what had passed there f. While Maximinus was marching towards Italy, the face of affairs was quite changed in Africa: A fenator, by name Capelianus, had been appointed governor of Mauritama by Maximinus, with a confiderable body of troops under his command, to make c head against the Moors not subject to Rome, who infested with daily incursions the Roman territories. But Gordianus, to whom he had ever been a declared enemy, and whom he had on all occasions opposed, immediately discharged him, and named another in his room. Capelianus, who was an officer of great valour and experience, initead of obeying the orders of the new emperor, affembled all his forces, levied Capelianus feveral companies of Moors, and having with incredible dispatch drawn together a raises forces very considerable body of well disciplined and resolute men, marched at the head of Gordians. them strait to Carthage. His approach alarmed the city. The inhabitants however betook themselves to their arms, and marched out under the conduct of Gordianus the younger to meet the enemy. Hereupon a bloody engagement enfued, in which d Gordianus's raw and undisciplined troops performed wonders; but were in the end put to flight, and most of them cut in pieces either in the battle or the pursuit. Gordianus himself was killed in the field, which, together with the loss of the battle, Their death. and the approach of the enemy, reduced the father to such despair, that he strangled himself with his own girdle s. Such was the end of the two Gordians, after having reigned, according to the most probable opinion, one month and six days. They were sprung from two of the most ancient and illustrious families in Rome. Gordianus Extraction and the father, styled in most medals and inscriptions M. Antonius Gordianus, was the son preferments of of Macius Marullus, descended from the Gracchi, and of Ulpia Gordiana, of the dians. family of the emperor Trajan. His father, grandfather and great-grandfather had e been confuls, and he himself twice discharged that honourable office, first with the emperor Caracalla in 213. and the second time with Alexander Severus in 229. His wealth was answerable to his quality; for he possessed, according to Julius Capitolinus, more land in the provinces, than any private man in Rome i. The same writer observes, that he was the first private person who had a consular habit of his own, the rest, and even some of the emperors, contenting themselves with the common robes that were lodged in the capitol k. He was well-shaped, of a comely and majestic aspect, and thought to resemble the emperor Augustus. He was highly esteemed by the emperor Alexander, who returned public thanks to the senate for preferring so deserving a person to the government of Africa, styling him in the letter which he f wrote on that occasion, a nobleman of great magnanimity, eloquence, justice, moderation, integrity, goodness, &c. He was exceeding kind to all his relations, and paid such respect to his wife's father, Annius Severus, that he never presumed, before he was prætor, to fit down in his presence, and never failed waiting upon him once a day, even when he was consul. He was very sober in his diet, modest, but proper in his dress, and regular in all his actions, without ever being guilty of any excess, or discomposed by any passion 1. He was well versed in all the branches of literature, especially in poetry, and wrote in his youth several poems, which were greatly f Gord, vit. p. 157, 158. Herod. p. 601. Max. vit. p. 141. E Herod. Gord. vit. p. 158. Max. vit. p. 145. h Vide Perav. doct. temp. p. 337. 152. k Idem, p. 152. I Idem, p. 152, 153. # HEROD. 1. vii. p. 602, 603.

337. i Gord. vit. p. 151,

esteemed,

esteemed, and, among the rest, one intituled Antoniniades, describing in thirty books a the lives and wars, the public and private actions of Antoninus Pius and Marcus Aurelius, or Antoninus Philosophus. He wrote likewise in prose the praises of the Antonini. His chief entertainment was to read Plato, Aristotle, Cicero, Virgil, and the other ancient authors. No one ever gave greater fatisfaction to the people, or difcharged the public offices with more generofity, than Gordianus. During the year of his ædileship, he exhibited public shews once a month, sometimes five hundred couple of gladiators at a time, and never less than one hundred and fifty. He caused an incredible number of wild beafts to be brought to Rome, for the diversion of the people, from the most distant parts of the empire. In one day a thousand bears were hunted and killed, and, in his other shews, such numbers of wild beasts of all kinds, as had b never before been seen in Rome; which gained him the affections of the people, intirely addicted to diversions of that nature. After his second consulship, he was immediately fent into Africa in quality of proconful; which office he discharged with such justice, equity and moderation, that he was universally adored, and more beloved by the people than any governor had ever been before him, some calling him a Scipio, tome a Cato, fome a Mutius Scavola, a Rutilius, a Lalius. He married Fabia Orestilla, the daughter of Annius Severus, and grand-daughter of the emperor M. Aurelius, and had by her a daughter named Macia Faustina, who was married to Junius Balbus a consular; and a son, styled in the ancient inscriptions and medals M. Antonius Gordianus m, with the title of ponlifex; whereas his father is distinguished with that of c pontifex maximus. The fon was killed in the year 237, the forty-fixth of his age n, and confequently was born in 191. the twelfth of the reign of Commodus. He had an extraordinary memory, and was well versed in polite literature, having had Serenus Sammonicus for his preceptor, who bequeathed to him his famous library, confisting of fixty-two thousand volumes. He wrote several pieces both in prose and verse, which shewed, says Capitolinus, that he had a fine genius, but neglected to cultivate and improve it. He was well skilled in the law, and one of Alexander's chief counsellors. He was univerfally beloved on account of his obliging carriage, and extraordinary fweet temper; but loved his pleasures, and spent most of his time in baths, gardens and groves. He kept constantly twenty-two concubines, and is said to have had by d each of them three or four children; whence he was called the Priamus, and fatirically the Priagus of his time. Ælius Cordus writes, that he could never be prevailed upon to marry, and confequently had no lawful iffue. On the other hand, Dexippus tells us, that he married, and had by his wife Gordian, afterwards emperor P. But, according to Herodian, the emperor was not his, but his fifter's fon. But of him hereafter. Gordian, of whom we are now writing, was highly favoured by Heliogabalus, as a young man addicted to his pleasures, and by that prince raised to the quæstorship. Alexander preferred him, as he was a man of known integrity and great abilities, to the prætorship, and soon after honoured him with the consular dignity. In the reign of Alexander or Maximinus he was sent into Africa, in e quality of lieutenant to his father, who took him for his partner in the empire, and, upon his death, put an end to his own life in the manner we have related above. To refume now the thread of our history. The difmal tidings of the death of the ever, as they dreaded above all things the cruel effects of Maximinus's resentment, and expected to find no mercy at the hands of fo barbarous a tyrant, they refolved not to submit to him, but to defend themselves to the last. The senate therefore, affembling in the temple of Concord, chose two new emperors, M. Clodius Pupienus Maximus, and Decimus Calius Balbinus. The former was a person of low birth, but extraordinary merit. His father was, according to fome, a cart-wright, according f to others, a lock-smith; but the son raised himself, chiefly by his courage and valour, to the first employments in the empire. He served first in quality of a private soldier; but was foon preferred, as he distinguished himself on all occasions, to the post of a centurion, then to that of a tribune, and not long after to the command of several legions, in which he acquitted himself so well, that he was admitted into the elaimed empe-The rife and preferments of Pupienus.

Pupienus and Baibinus pro> m GOLTZ. P. 102. n Vit. Gord. p. 158. · Idem, p. 160. P Idem ibid.

fenate, created prætor, honoured with the consulship, and successively appointed governor of Bithynia, Greece and Narbonne Gaul. From Gaul he was sent to command the troops in Illyricum, where he gained great advantages over the Sarmatians, and two Gordians in Africa, threw the whole city into the utmost consternation. How-

the

a the forces in Germany, where he was attended with equal success against the Germans. Upon his return from Germany, he was made governor of Rome, in which place he acquitted himself with such prudence, integrity and discretion, that he was both esteemed and beloved by persons of every rank and condition. He appeared always grave and serious, and shewed no great complaisance to any one; but was just, merciful, and never guilty of the least action that savoured of inhumanity, but on the contrary always ready to forgive. He addicted himself to no party, was steady and inflexible in his resolutions, and, without trusting to others, examined every thing himself with great care and attention. In short, the senate entertained fuch an high opinion of his extraordinary merit and virtues, that, in declaring him b emperor, they folemnly protested, that, in the whole empire, they knew no person better qualified than he for sustaining the name and dignity of a prince 1. He is commonly called Pupienus by the Latin historians, and by the Greek writers Maximus, which has strangely perplexed Capitolinus, who, after a long descant, concludes, that they were two names of one and the same person: this trouble he might have saved himself by only looking upon one of that prince's coins. Balbinus was descended The extraction of an illustrious family, and pretended to derive his pedigree from Cornelius Balbus and employ-Theophanes, a celebrated historian, and a man of the first rank in the island of Lesbos, binus. who was made free of Rome by Pompey the Great. The present emperor had been twice conful, and had governed without blame several provinces, viz. Asia, Africa, c Bithynia, Galatia, Pontus, Thrace, and Gaul. He had likewise commanded armies; but being somewhat timorous, he was thought better qualified for civil than military affairs. He possessed immense wealth, lived with great splendor, was addicted to pleasures, but at the same time universally beloved on account of his integrity, (for he injured no man but himfelf) his humanity, sweet temper, and obliging behaviour. He was an excellent orator, no mean poet, and had an uncommon talent in making extemporary verses r.

Maximus and Balbinus being, with the unanimous consent of the senate, raised to the fovereignty, and invested with the tribunitial and proconsular power, went, at the breaking up of the assembly, to the capitol. But while they were offering there d the usual facrifices, the populace rose, and, armed with stones and clubs, declared, The people that they would not obey the new emperors, and demanded, with great clamour, mutiny. a prince of the Gordian family. Maximus and Balbinus, backed by some young knights, attempted to open themselves a way through the croud, sword in hand; but were in the end, in spite of all their efforts, obliged to send for young Gordian, then only twelve years old, who was received by the populace with loud shouts of joy, and carried to the capitol; where the senate, to appeale the multitude, declared Young Gordian him Cafar, arrayed him with the habit peculiar to that dignity, and in that attire declared Cafar. shewed him to the people, who thereupon dispersed, and retiring quietly to their houses, suffered the new emperors to take possession of the palaces, where they e began to discharge the functions of sovereignty with deifying the two Gordians. When that ceremony was over, they appointed Sabinus governor of Rome, and Pinarius Valens, uncle by the father to Maximus, commander of the prætorian guards; and then, without loss of time, began to levy what forces they could, and make the necessary preparations for taking the field against Maximinus, who, upon the news of their election, quickened his march, breathing nothing but ruin and destruction. As most of the provinces had espoused the party of the senate, troops were fent from all parts to reinforce the army of Maximus, who being charged with the conduct of the war, as the more able commander, fet out from Rome soon after Maximus his election, leaving the prætorian guards, and part of the new-raifed forces, to marche f defend the city, and awe the populace. After his departure, the senate dispatched against Maximinus.

the most considerable men of their body into the different parts of Italy, with orders to fortify all the cities, and supply the inhabitants with arms; to remove all manner of provisions into the fortified towns, and either to reap or destroy the corn in the fields; to mow the grass, and lay waste the whole country, through which Maximinus was to march with his numerous army. At the same time, they sent circular letters into all the provinces, declaring such as should lend him the least assistance, traitors, rebels, and public enemies. Maximus had scarce lest the city, when dreadful disturbances arose there, occasioned by the temerity of two senators, Gallicanus a and Mecanas, who seeing two soldiers of the prætorian guards enter the hall, where the fenate was affembled, quitting their places, rushed upon them unexpectedly, and dispatched them with their daggers; for in those distracted times most senators wore daggers under their robes. Hereupon the other foldiers of that corps, who were waiting at the door mixed with the populace, betook themselves to slight, but were pursued by Gallicanus, who encouraged the mob to fall upon them as spies and partizans of the tyrant Maximinus. Some of them were wounded, but the rest shut themselves up in their camp, where they were attacked the same day by Gallicanus at the head of the multitude, (whom he had supplied with arms) and of all the gladiators he could draw together. The guards sustained the attack with their usual b resolution, repulsed the assailants, and falling upon them in their retreat, cut great numbers of them in pieces. This flaughter ferved only to inspire the multitude with new rage; and the senate espousing their quarrel, ordered the new-levied forces, which Maximus had left to maintain peace and tranquillity in the city, to march against the prætorian guards; which they did accordingly, and attacked the camp with great tween the pra- fury, but were, after repeated assaults, in which great numbers of them perished, and the people. Obliged to give over the attempt, and retire. The incensed multitude, finding all their efforts thus baffled, bethought themselves at last of cutting the conduits that conveyed water into the camp; which reduced the foldiery to fuch despair, that, throwing the gates of the camp open, they rushed unexpectedly upon the multitude, c sword in hand, and drove them, after a long dispute, in which much blood was shed on both sides, into the city, where the combat began anew, the people discharging from the tops of their houses showers of stones and tiles upon the soldiery, who in revenge set fire to their shops and store-houses, which consumed the greatest part of the city, an incredible quantity of valuable effects, and many persons of all ranks'. Herodian does not inform us how the tumult ended; but Capitolinus writes, that the temples were profaned, the private houses pillaged, the streets covered with dead bodies, &c. that the emperor Balbinus attempting to appeale the tumult, and part the combatants, was dangerously wounded on the head; but at length, having fent for young Gordian, and shewed him to the people in his purple robes, the fury d of both parties asswaged at once, hostilities ceased, the people retired to their houses, and the soldiers to the camp. So great was the esteem, respect and veneration, both of the people and foldiery, for one sprung from the Gordians, who had lost their lives in the defence of the people of Rome ".

<sup>9</sup> Max. & Balb. vit. 166, 167. r Idem, p. 168, & seq. HEROD. l. vii. p. 604. Max & Balb. vit. p. 145.

Dreadful disturbances in Rome.

Dreadful diforders committed in the city.

A battle be-

Maximinus pursues his march into Italy.

His foldiers begin to mutiny.

Maximinus fummons the city of Aquilcia to surrender.

THE next year, when Annius Pius, or, as others call him, Ulpius, and Pontianus, were confuls, Maximinus early in the spring pursued his march towards Italy, having with him, we may fay, all the forces of the empire. Being arrived at the foot of the Alps that part Italy from Illyricum, he found the city of Hemona or Æmona abandoned by its inhabitants; which inspired him with hopes of certain victory; for he thence concluded, that no place or city would dare to withstand him. Herodian e calls Æmona the first city of Italy; but he ought rather to have styled it the last of Pannonia; for in that province it is placed by all the ancient and modern geographers. Sanson supposes it to have stood where the present city of Laubach stands, the capital of Carniola; others place it in the neighbourhood of Igg, in the same country. Maximinus, leaving Æmona, passed the mountains without meeting with the least opposition; which heightened his joy and confidence. But his men, who expected to be refreshed, after passing the mountains, with plenty of all manner of provisions in Italy, finding the country laid waste far and wide, and themselves destitute even of necessaries, began to mutiny. Maximinus punished the ring-leaders of the tumult with great severity, which only served to exasperate the rest. However, he pur- f fued his march; and being informed, that the city of Aquileia had thut its gates against a party, which he had sent to take possession of the place, he marched thither in person with all his forces, not doubting but the inhabitants would submit upon the approach of so formidable an army. But Crispinus and Menophilus, two confulars of great resolution and intrepidity, to whom the senate had committed the defence of the city, answered the tribune fent by Maximinus to summon them to furrender, that they were determined to hold out to the last, and rather forfeit their lives, than betray their trust, or yield to such a cruel, bloody and faithless tyrant.

a At the same time, to animate the inhabitants, who began to waver, they gave out, that Apollo, the tutelar god of the place, had affured them of victory; which difpelled all fear, fo that every-one began to prepare for a vigorous defence. In the mean while, Maximinus having spent some time in passing the river Sontius, now Isonzo, about fixteen miles from Aquileia, approached the city; and having caused all the vines and neighbouring groves, which were a great ornament to the place, to be cut down, he began to batter the walls with an incredible number of warlike engines, and to harass the belieged with repeated assaults, which they sustained with The inhabifuch resolution and intrepidity as can hardly be expressed. Even the women and tants sustain children appeared on the ramparts, and bore their share in the common danger; the a siege with b women especially signalized their zeal by yielding their hair to be employed in tion. making strings for the bows, and other warlike machines. The senate, out of gratitude, after the death of Maximinus, caused a magnificent temple to be erected, which they consecrated to Venus calva, or Venus the bald: on a medal of Quintia Crispilla, wife to the emperor Maximus, is to be seen a temple with that legend, and the figure of a bald woman w. The foldiers of Maximinus, in the beginning of the fiege, shewed great ardour; which however began to abate, when they found the inhabitants firmly determined to undergo all labours and hardships, rather than submit. Maximinus, highly provoked at their backwardness, and besides enraged at the bitter reproaches uttered by the inhabitants against him and his son, as often as they c approached the walls, caused several of his officers to be publicly executed, ascribing the coolness of the soldiers to want of courage in them. This exasperated the foldiers, already inclined to mutiny for want of provisions, of which, and even of water, there was great scarcity in the camp. Besides, a report was spread, that the whole empire was arming against Maximinus, and ready to fall upon those who supported him in his tyranny. Hereupon the Albanians, that is, the soldiers belonging to the The soldiers of camp in the neighbourhood of Alba, took a sudden resolution to dispatch the author mutiny, and of so many calamities; and, without farther deliberation, went strait at noon-day to murder him the tent of Maximinus, dispatched both him and his fon with many wounds, cut and his fon. off their heads, and fent them to Rome, and threw their bodies into the river. With d them were killed Anolinus, their captain of the guards, and all their chief ministers and friends x. Such was the end of the reign, or rather of the tyranny, of the two Maximins, after it had lasted three years, and a few days, the father being then in the fifty-fifth year of his age, and the fon in the twenty-first. The Pannonians, Thracians, and some other troops, heard the news of their death with regret, but did not attempt to revenge it. Thus the whole army presented themselves unarmed before the gates of Aquileia, acquainted the belieged with the death of Maximinus, and defired to be admitted into the city. It was not thought adviseable to open the

the usual oaths to Maximus and Balbinus Y. An express was immediately dispatched to Rome with these joyful tidings, who His death occapassing through Ravenna, found the emperor Maximus there busy in assembling his some great joy forces, in order to march against the tyrant. But when he understood, that both the at Rome. Maximins were killed, that their army had submitted, and sworn fidelity to him and his collegue, transported with joy, and laying aside all military preparations, he repaired to the temples to return thanks to the gods for fuch fignal and unexpected fuccess. In the mean time, the express pursuing his journey, and often changing horses, reached Rome the fourth day, distant from Aquileia about two hundred and f eighty miles, which no one, fays our historian, had ever done before. Upon his arrival, he found Balbinus and Gordian affifting with the people at the public sports in the theatre, where he delivered his letters to the two princes; which he had no fooner done, than the whole multitude cried out with one voice, Maximinus is killed; and rising up, left the theatre, and crowded to the temples, whither Balbinus and Gordian followed. The fenate immediately affembled; and after decreeing feveral honours to the three princes, appointed facrifices to be offered in all the temples, and a day of public and solemn thanksgiving for their happy delivery. Balbinus, who gates to them; but after they had adored the images of Maximus, Balbinus, and Gordian, placed for that purpose on the ramparts, a great quantity of provisions was fent to their camp; for they were almost famished: and the next day they all took

w Vide DE MENESTRIER medailles des emper. & imperatr. p. 145. à Dijon, 1642. * HEROD. L viii. p. 614. 7 HEROD. l. viii. p. 626, 627. Max. vit. p. 146.

used to tremble at the very name of Maximinus, offered an hecatomb, which was a never done but upon some very extraordinary occasion, and caused the same sacrifice to be offered in all the cities of the empire . Those who brought the heads of the two Maximins, arrived at Rome soon after the courier; for they made what haste they They were met every-where by crouds of the people, and received with the greatest demonstrations of joy. They entered Rome with the heads stuck upon two lances, that every one might see them; and no sight was ever more pleasing. They repaired again to the temples, offered new facrifices, and seemed no less transported with joy, than if they had been delivered from imminent death or captivity. The two heads were abandoned to the rage of the populace, and, after many infults, burnt in the field of Mars. The names of the Maximins were, by a decree of the b fenate, erased out of all inscriptions, their statues overturned, and their bodies ordered to be left unburied. The emperor Maximus hastened from Ravenna to Aquileia, where he was received with loud acclamations, and acknowledged emperor by the army of Maximinus, among whom he distributed large sums, and then sent them back to their respective quarters, retaining with him only the prætorian guards, and a small body of Germans, in whom chiefly he confided. During his stay at Aquileia, the fenate, to do him honour, fent a deputation to him, confifting of twenty of their body, who had been all consuls, prætors, or questors. With them he set out from Aquileia; and arriving at Rome with a numerous and splendid retinue, was turns to Rome. there received at the gates by Balbinus, Gordian, the senate in a body, and all the c The wife admi-people, and conducted in triumph to the palace b. The two emperors governed nistration of the with great prudence and moderation, enacted excellent laws, administered justice with the utmost impartiality, maintained the military discipline with due rigour, paid great respect and deserence to the senate, and conducted themselves in all things with such wisdom, equity and moderation, that they were in a manner adored both by the senate and people. But the happiness and tranquillity, which they enjoyed under these excellent princes, were short-lived. The Carpi, a people beyond the Danube, passing that river, ravaged the province of Massia. The Goths, provoked perhaps by the death of Maximinus, invaded the Roman territories on the side of Scy-Romans with thia; and the Persians, who had continued quiet since the year 233. when Alexander d made war upon them, threatened the eastern provinces. It was therefore agreed among the princes, that Maximus should march against the Persians, Balbinus against the Goths and the Carpi, and Gordian remain in the mean time at Rome. But while great preparations were making for the intended expeditions, the prætorian guards, distatisfied to see princes, who had been created by the senate, so much applauded, and provoked at the bitter invectives which were daily uttered against Maximinus, and reflected no small dishonour upon them, who had raised him to the empire, began to mutiny, and complain with one another, that the right of naming the emperors, guards mutiny. which had hitherto proved so advantageous to them, was snatched out of their hands, and transferred to the senate. Besides, they grew jealous of the Germans, whom e Maximus had brought to Rome with him, with a design, as they imagined, to discharge the prætorian guards, as Septimius Severus had formerly done, and to take the Germans in their room. Being thus prejudiced against the two emperors, they refolved to dispatch them, and resume their pretended authority, by setting up another in their room. Having taken this resolution, they only waited for an opportunity of putting it in execution, which foon offered; for the Capitoline games being celebrated a few days after, and most of the emperors guards and domestics reforting thither, the discontented and mutinous soldiery marched strait to the palace, where the two princes were left almost alone. Maximus, informed of their arrival before they had entered the palace, was for calling the Germans to his affiftance, f but was therein opposed by Balbinus. For these two princes were not, for all their great qualities, free from private jealousies. Balbinus was piqued at the extraordinary honours which the senate had heaped upon his collegue, as if the death of Maximinus, and bleffings thence accruing, had been chiefly owing to him; and befides, looked upon him as one greatly inferior to himself in birth and nobility. On the other hand, Maximus, knowing himself to be by far the better soldier, and abler commander, tacitly claimed on that score the chief authority. These mutual jealousies, though

Maximus retwo emperors.

The Carpi, Goths, and Perfians, threaten the Fealousses between the emperors.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Max. vit. p. 169, &c. <sup>a</sup> Max. vir. p. 169. Herod. p. 617. 6 Max. & Balb. vir. p. 167, 171. Max. & Balb. vit. p. 170.

b Herod. l. viii. p. 620.

a prudently concealed, and rather gueffed at by others, than feen, bred fome mifunderstanding between them, and occasioned in the end the ruin of both. For Balbinus, not giving credit to what he was told of the designs of the prætorian guards, but rather suspecting that his collegue intended to employ the Germans against him, would not suffer Maximus, to whom they were greatly attached, to send for them. This occasioned a warm dispute, and gave time to the prætorian guards to break into the palace, and disperse such of the emperors friends and domestics as offered to oppose them. When they came to the apartment where the two princes were, they rushed upon them with a fury hardly to be expressed, tore in pieces their imperial robes, dragged them out of the palace with a design to carry them to their camp, b wounded and insulted them in a most outrageous manner. But, while they were hurrying them through the city to the camp, being informed, that the Germans had taken arms, and were advancing to rescue the princes out of their hands, they killed They are both them both, and leaving their bodies in the street, retired to the camp, carrying killed. with them young Gordian, whom they proclaimed emperor, giving out, to appeale Gordian prothe populace, that they had killed those whom the people had at first rejected, and claimed empefet up in their room the person whom they had demanded. The Germans, informed ror. that the emperors were killed, retired, without committing any hostilities, to their quarters without the city. Thus Gordian remained in peaceable possession of the empire d., Maximus and Balbinus had reigned about one year and two months.

Or the descent and birth of Gordian we have spoken above. He was, according to Herodian, the son of Junius Balbus, by the sister of Gordian the younger, from whom he borrowed the name of M. Antonius Gordianus, as he is styled in all the ancient inscriptions. He was about thirteen years old when he came to the empire, and consequently must have been born in the year 225. the fourth of Alexander's reign. He was a youth of a gay temper, comely aspect, and exceeding sweet dis- His excellent polition, which gained him the love of all who approached him. Capitolinus tells qualifications. us, that he was beloved by persons of all ranks more than any prince had ever been before him. The senate used to style him their son, the soldiers their child, and the people their darling. He was addicted to study and learning, and well d instructed in most branches of polite literature. He had all the necessary qualifications for forming an excellent prince; but as he wanted experience, and such a mother to direct and advise him as Mamæa, in the beginning of his reign, he fell into the hands of one Maurus, and fome other crafty freed-men and eunuchs, who playing booty, and abusing the confidence he reposed in them, persuaded him to do many Is deceived and things, which he ever after regretted. They soon drove all good men from the imposed upon by court, raised to the first employments persons altogether unworthy of them, plun- his ministers. dered the exchequer, and did all the mischief which wicked and avaricious ministers are capable of doing f. In the beginning of the year, the young prince entered upon e his first consulship, to which he had been named in the reign of Maximus and Balbus, and took for his collegue Aviola. This year he entertained the people with magni ficent sports, in order to make them forget their past heats and animolities. The following year, when Sabinus was conful the second time with Venustus, Sabinianus revolted in Africa, and caused himself to be proclaimed emperor; but the governor of Mauritania reduced the rebels to such straits, that they delivered up Sabinianus to him, acknowledged their fault, and submitted. All the partizans of Sabinianus were pardoned 5; but what was his fate, we are no where told. The next year, the emperor took upon him his second consulship, having Pompeianus Civica for his collegue. The young prince married this year Furia Sabina Tranquillina, the daughter of Misitheus, who was immediately honoured with the title of Augusta; but whether he had any children by her, history does not inform us. The emperor chose Missi- Missitheus, theus for his father-in-law, purely on account of his great wisdom, integrity, and captain of the learning; and appointed him captain of the guards, that he might have a person of guards, and fahis extraordinary talents with whom to advise, not daring to trust to his own judg- the emperor. ment. Misitheus had no sooner taken possession of that important employment, than he acquainted the emperor with the missemeanour of Maurus, and base practices of the other freed-men and eunuchs, who were thereupon all discharged, and banished the court. From a letter of Misitheus to the emperor, quoted by Capitolinus, it

d Herod. p. 621. Max. & Balb. vit. p. 170.
f Herod. l. viii. p. 621. Gord. vit. p. 160-164. e Herod. l. vii. p. 605. Оссо. Goltz, Онирн. &сс. g Gord. vit. p. 161. Zos. l. i, p. 640.

Vol. VI. No 3.

Sapor, king of

runs the Ro-

in the east.

appears, that the young prince had been strangely missed, and grossy imposed upon a by that infamous crew (T); and from the emperor's answer to it, that he was sensible of his former misconduct, and desirous to correct his faults; to know the truth, and to employ only fuch persons as would speak it without flattery or disguise (U). He respected Missibeus as his father, gave him that title, ordered him to call him his fon, and returned thanks to the fenate for distinguishing his father-in-law with the titles of father of princes, and guardian of the republic 2; titles which he well deferved, being one of the few ministers who are said to have had nothing in view but the glory of their prince, and the welfare of the state b. This year happened a dreadful earthquake, which overturned a great many cities, and destroyed an infinite number of people . The following year, when C. Vettius Aufidius Atticus and b C. Asinius Prætextatus were consuls, Rome was alarmed with news from the east, where the Persians, under the conduct of Sapor, son and successor to Arraxerxes, the restorer of the Persian monarchy, had entered the Roman dominions at the head of a mighty man dominions army, reduced all Mesopotamia, with the cities of Nisibis and Carrbæ; and entering Syria, committed most dreadful ravages in that province, putting all to fire and sword. Capitolinus writes, that he had made himself master of Antioch itself, and threatened to over-run the other provinces, most of the Romans, who defended them, having, through fear, lifted themselves in his army. Gordian resolved to march in person against so formidable an enemy; and accordingly, having caused the temple of Janus to be opened, according to the ancient custom, which had been c long omitted, and perhaps was never after practifed, he fet out from Rome this year 242. the fourth of his reign, with a numerous and well-disciplined army; and taking his rout through Masia, deseated in that province the Goths and Sarmatians, who disputed his passage, and obliged them to abandon their conquests, and return to their respective countries d. However, he was overcome in a tumultuary engagement by the Alani, in the celebrated plains of Philippi in Macedon, or, as others will have it, of Philippopolis in Thrace o. But the barbarians neglected, it seems, to improve their victory, and withdrew; for Gordian pursued his march unmolested through Thrace, and passing the Hellespont, arrived safe in Asia. To this passage perhaps alludes the ship, which is to be seen on some of his medals bearing no date f. d From the Hellespont he marched through Asia into Syria, where he gained signal advantages over the enemy, of which historians give us but a confused account. How-He is defeated ever, they all agree, that he overcame the Persians in several battles; that he re-by Gordian, covered the cities of Nisibis and Carrbæ, and obliged the mighty Sapor, with his powerful and numerous army, to abandon the Roman dominions, and retire with retire.

* Gord. vit. p. 161. b I. b Idem, p. 163. e Idem, p. 162. d Idem, p. 163. · Idem,

(T) This letter was conceived in the following terms: "It is with the greatest pleasure I congratulate ' you upon the alteration of times. Every thing was " formerly bought and fold by the eunuchs, and fuch " as pretended to be your friends, but were in reality " your greatest enemies. I am glad that this blot is " removed from your reign; the more, because you " are glad of it yourfelf; which will convince the " world, that the disorders hitherto complained of " ought not to be imputed to you. All posts in the army have been disposed of to persons no-ways " qualified for them; others have been denied the re-" wards due to their fervices; innocent persons have " been condemned, and fuch as were guilty faved;
the public revenues misapplied, the exchequer plun-"dered, &c. But these, and many other disorders, will no longer be imputed to you, but to those who entered into cabals to deceive you, to remove from " the court all persons of virtue, honour, and integri-" ty, and to introduce in their room men as wicked as themselves, that they might make you a property to their evil designs. But now your eyes are opened, you have begun to reform the state, and many disorders have been already redressed. I reckon it my greatest happiness to be father-in-law to so good a prince; a prince who, without trusting to

" others, examines into every thing himself, and has ba-" nished from his court those, who, consulting not his " honour, but their own interest, led him astray (34)." (U) The emperor returned to his father-in-law the following answer: "If the immortal gods had "not protected the Roman empire, I had been de-" luded, and, together with the empire, utterly ruined by flaves and cunuchs. I am now fully convinced, that Felix ought not to have been trusted with the command of the guards, nor Serapammo with that of the fourth legion. But not to mention all my errors, I own that I have done many things amiss, and now return thanks to the gods for having by your means discovered many things to me, which have been hitherto maliciously concealed from me. Maurus entering into a confederacy with Gaudiawas, Reverendus, and Montanus, who confirmed whatever he faid, imposed upon me; so that, whatever they approved or condemned, I accepted or rejected, relying intirely upon their integrity. Unhappy therefore is that prince, who has not such about him, as will tell him the truth without disguise. For as he cannot immediately know "what passes among his people, he must understand it by the relation of others, and take his measures " according to their information (35)."

(34) Gord. vit. p. 161.

(35) Idem ibid.

fhame

a shame and disgrace into his own country, whither he pursued him as far as Ctesiphon 8. These successes were chiefly owing to the wise counsels and directions of the brave Missitheus, as the emperor himself with great modesty acknowledged in a letter which he wrote to the senate upon his arrival at Nisibis in Mesopotamia. In that letter he first acquaints the senate with the advantages he had gained over the barbarians in Macedon and Thrace; then coming to his victories over the Persians, he tells them, that he had delivered the Antiochians from the Persian yoke, recovered Carrba, and other cities, and was arrived at Nisibis, whence he designed to proceed to Ctesiphon, provided the gods, adds he, continue their protection to us, and preserve Missibeus, my father, and captain of the guards, by whose wise conduct we have atchieved b these, and hope to atchieve still greater things. It is incumbent upon you, conscript fathers, to appoint public processions, to recommend us to the gods, and to return thanks to Missitheus. Upon the receipt of this letter, the senate decreed a triumph Gordian is to the emperor, and a triumphal chariot to Missibeus, with a pompous inscription, decreed a tristyling him the father of princes, captain of the guards, and the guardian of the repub- Militheus a This inscription, which was placed on the basis of his triumphal statue, is triumphal still to be seen at Rome almost intire. But the happiness which the whole empire state. enjoyed under the government of Gordian, and the wise administration of Missibeus, was short-lived. The latter died the following year, in the consulship of Arrianus Missibeus dies. and Papus, and by his last will lest the Roman people his heirs. We are told, that c Missibeus being ill of a flux, the physicians prescribed him a remedy to stop it, which, by the contrivance of Julius Philippus, of whom hereaster, was exchanged, and another administered in its room, which, as it had a quite contrary effect, put an end to his life. Upon his death, Philip was appointed captain of the guards, and commander in chief under the emperor of all the forces of the east; for of him Gordian did not entertain the least suspicion i. The following year, when Peregrinus and Amilianus were confuls, the emperor entered the Persian dominions, in order to pursue the war, which he had so successfully begun. Plotinus, the celebrated philosopher, listed himself in his army, hoping by that means to have an opportunity of conferring with the Persian and Indian philosophers k. The philosopher d was then in the thirty-ninth year of his age, which, according to the chronology of Porphyrius, the author of his life, answers the present year, the 243d of the christian zera, and sixth of Gordian's reign.

Philip no sooner saw himself raised to the important post of captain of the guards, Julius Philipthan he began to aspire at the sovereignty itself. As the soldiers were greatly attached pus, captain of to the young prince, in order to lessen their affection to him, he sometimes led them his room. into places where no provisions could be found; at other times sent in his name the vessels, which attended the army, loaded with corn, another way, hoping that the troops, diffressed for want of necessaries, would, notwithstanding their attachment to Gordian, begin to mutiny; which they did accordingly, the most turbulent among e them, whom Philip had gained, whispering about in the mean time, that Gordian, a youth only nineteen years old, was not fit to command such powerful forces; that they wanted fuch a general as Philip, whom long experience had taught how to govern an empire, how to command an army 1. Gordian however advanced against Sapor, and meeting him in Mesopotamia, gave him a total overthrow on the banks of the Aboras, or Aburas, and obliged him to take shelter in the heart of his own dominions m. But while the young conqueror was pursuing the advantages of his victory, Philip, who had already gained the chief officers of the army, led the troops through barren and defart countries, where, through want of provisions, which they ascribed to want of experience in Gordian, they openly mutinied, and demanded, He induces the f that Philip might reign in conjunction with Gordian, as his guardian and governor. Soldiers to mu-The virtuous young emperor, unwilling to shed Roman blood, granted them their timy. request, and took Philip for his partner in the empire, who seeing himself upon the level with his fovereign, foon began to usurp an authority over him, and to dispose of all employments, as if he had been sole emperor. This Gordian could not bear, and therefore attempted to depose him; but Philip's party prevailing, he was himfelf deposed, and in the end murdered by the usurper. Capitolinus writes, that Gor-Gordian dedian, finding himself reduced to a private life, offered to serve under Philip as cap- Posed,

&lt;sup>1</sup> Idem, p. 162. Zos. l. i. p. 641. г. <sup>m</sup> Амміан. l. ххііі. <sup>8</sup> Gord. vit. p. 162. Aur. Vict. Eutrop. <sup>b</sup> Idem, p. 160. <sup>1</sup>
<sup>k</sup> Porphyr. vit. Plot. p. 2. <sup>1</sup> Gord. vit. p. 163. Zos. l. i. p. 641.

And Sain.

His tomb and epitaph,

tain of the guards, and even condescended to beg his life; at which demand, Philip a began to relent; but afterwards, considering how dear the young prince was to the senate and people of Rome, and not doubting but they would use their utmost efforts to reinstate him in the sovereignty, he commanded him to be slain 1. Other writers take no notice of these particulars, which, if true, betray great meanness and want of courage in Gordian; but only tell us, that Philip caused him to be murdered, and reigned in his room. His death happened, according to the most probable opinion, founded on the authority of the code o, about the beginning of March, after he had lived nineteen years, and reigned five years and eight months. He was killed on the furthest borders of Persia, in the place where his tomb was still to be seen in the year 363. beyond the Euphrates, and the Aboras, between the cities of Cercusa, which b stood near the conflux of those two rivers, and that of Dura, which stands very near the latter, and is about twenty miles distance from the former river. The place was called Zantha or Zaithe P. There the soldiers erected to the memory of the deceased emperor a stately tomb with the following epitaph in the Greek, Latin, Persian, Hebrew, and Egyptian tongues, that it might be read by all nations; To the deisied Gordian, who conquered the Persians, Goths, and Sarmatians, suppressed the civil discords, subdued the Germans, but could not overcome the Philips. The last words allude, according to Capitolinus, to his having been overcome by the Alani in the plains of Philippi, and his being killed by Philip 4. But we can hardly perfuade ourselves, that this epitaph was put up during the life and reign of the emperor Philip. The same writer adds, that Licinius, who pretended to derive his pedigree from Philip, caused this epitaph to be taken down. Victor the younger writes, that the body of Gordian was interred in that tomb; but Eutropius and Festus assure us, that it was conveyed to Rome, where the deceased prince was with the usual ceremonies ranked among the gods. The senate granted this extraordinary privilege to the Gordian samily, that they might for ever be exempted from taking upon them, unless it were by their own choice, guardianships, embassies, or any other public duty whatever r. All those, who had imbrued their hands in the blood of this excellent prince, perished soon after . Capitolinus writes, that they dispatched themselves with the same swords which they had employed against him '(W). d

<sup>2</sup> Gord. vit. p. 163—165. ° Cod. Just. l. ix. tit. 2, leg. 7, p. 813, &c. P Ammian. l. xxiii. p. 244—246. Zos. l. iii. p. 716. Noris epist. p. 287. <sup>9</sup> Gord. vit. p. 165. F Gord. vit. p. 165. F Gord. vit. p. 165.

(W) The writers who flourished under Gordian were, Censorinus, who wrote, or rather sinished, his famous book, intitled de die natali, in the sirst year of that prince's reign, the second of the 254th olympiad, the 991st of Rome, when the Capitoline games were celebrated the thirty-ninth time (36). All these particulars give great light to chronology. He wrote the above-mentioned book, designing it as a present to one of his friends, by name D. Cerellius, against his birth-day. Thence he takes occasion to treat of the birth of man, and to make many learned observations on days, months, and vears. This work was known to, and greatly esteemed by, Apollinaris Sidonius, and Cassiodorus, of whom the latter quotes a book, written by Censorinus, on accents; but of that work only some fragments have reached our times, quoted by Priscian, who styles Censorinus a very learned grammarian (37). He is, by the best critics, looked upon as the most exact writer of his time (38). Censorinus himself quotes, as a work of his own, a book intitled indigitamentorum, in which he took particular notice of all the gods, who, in the opinion of the pagans, contributed to the life of man (39). Herodian wrote, in eight books, the history of the emperors, from the death of M. Aurelius to that of Maximus and Balbinus. He assures nothing but what he himself had seen; so that he must have died very old; for his work comprehends the space of sixty-eight or seventy years (40). All we know of his life is, that he was at Rome in the latter end of the reign of Commodus (41), and had feveral employments under the fucceeding emperors (42). As for his history, Photius commends his style as noble and sublime, and at the same time clear, and free from all affectation (43). Capitolinus, who in many places only translates and copies him, bestows great encomiums upon his writings, but at the same time censures him, and with a great deal of reason, as too favourable to Maximinus, and highly prejudiced against Alexander (44). Voffins, and others, approve of this censure (45); whence, in our history of the reigns of these two princes, we have pre-ferred the authority of Capitolinus to his. He omits the dates, and many other things, which would have cleared up great difficulties in history and chronology, and feems to have been quite unacquainted with geography, as appears from the account he gives us of the rout, which he supposes the emperor Alexander's forces to have taken, when that prince marched against the Persians. Under Gordian likewise flourished Arrian, a Greek historian, quoted by Capitolinus in his history of the reigns of Maximinus and

(36) Cenfor. de die natal. c. 8. p. 131, 132. & c. 21. p. 155. (37) Vide Voss. hist. Lat. l. ii. c. 3. (38) Vide append. ad Cyprian. dissert. c. 9. (39) Censor. c. 3. p. 17. (40) Herod. l. i. p. 465. & l. ii. p. 514. (41) Idem, l. i. p. 484. (42) Idem ibid. p. 465. (43) Phot. c. 99. p. 276. (44) Maximin. vit. p. 142. Alex. vit. p. 134. (45) Voss. hist. Grac. l. ii. p. 239.

Gordian;

Philip was by birth an Arabian, being born in Bostra, a city of Arabia Petraa. Birth and ex-He was of a very mean descent; for his father is said to have been a samous captain tradition of Phisotrophers in that country w. In the ancient inscriptions have been a samous captain lip. of robbers in that country w. In the ancient inscriptions he is styled M. Julius Pbilippus, and his wife Marcia Otacilla Severa. He had a fon, named likewise Philip, born in the year 237. and consequently seven years old when his father came to the empire. The emperor himself was at that time, according to the chronicle of Alewandria z, about forty; but Aurelius Victor supposes him to have been much older. Whether or no Philip was the first christian emperor, has been the subject of great Whether the disputes among the learned. The affirmative seems to us by far the most probable, first christian being maintained by the following verteers with Farman Change and Dispute the following verteers with the being maintained by the following writers, viz. Jerom, Chrysoftom, Dionysius of Aleb xandria, Zonaras, Nicephorus, Cedrenus, Rufinus, the chronicle of Alexandria, Syncellus, Orofius, Jornandes, the anonymous writer published by Valesius, with Ammianus Marcellinus, the learned cardinal Bona, Abulfaragius, Vincentius Lirinensis, and Huetius. The arguments which some modern critics have alledged in favour of the opposite opinion, are not of weight enough with us to bear down the authority of fo many eminent writers; nay, most of them have but little or no force in themselves, and only prove, that Philip was guilty of several actions highly discountenanced by the christian religion; such as his murdering his sovereign; his styling him a god; his affifting at the public shews, which were always attended with idolatrous ceremonies, and his being deified after his death. But in all times there have been christians, whose lives were a disgrace to their profession; and in that number some rank the present emperor, tho' there are not wanting writers of no small account, who, bating the murder of Gordian, for which, they fay, he atoned by submitting to a public penance, think he did nothing inconfistent with the principles of the religion which he professed: and truly we are no-where told, that he demanded of the senate the apotheosis of Gordian. He used indeed, as we read in Capitolinus, to honour that prince, when he mentioned his name, with the title of divus, the deified Gordian; but that title was given even by Constantine after his conversion, and by other christian emperors, to the princes who had reigned before them, as appears from their rescripts. Philip is said by Villor the younger to have been present at the public shews that were d exhibited on occasion of the thousandth year of Rome; but that he assisted at the religious or rather idolatrous ceremonies, which usually preceded the sports, we find no-where recorded. His being deisted after his death was no crime in him, but a kind of compliment paid by the senate to most emperors: the same honour was conferred upon Mamæa the mother of Alexander; and yet no one pretends to infer from thence, that she was not a christian. But to proceed to the history of this prince's reign: Upon the death of Gordian, Philip was acknowledged emperor by the whole army, on the fourteenth of March of the year 244. The new prince no sooner saw himself invested with the sovereign power, than he declared his son Cæsar, and took He takes his son him, the but seven years old, for his partner in the empire. He then wrote to the for his partner in the empire. e senate, acquainting them with the death of Gordian, which he falsely ascribed to a natural distemper, and with his own election y. Some authors write, that the senate Gord. vit. p. 163. Zonar. p. 229. Vict. epit. p. 164.

* Chron. Alexand. p. 630. 7 Gord. vit.

Gordian (46); and Ælius Junius Cordus, often quoted by the Augustine historians (47). He wrote the lives of the emperors, from Trajan to the two Gordians; but filled his history, according to Capitolinus, with many impertinent and trifling accounts, telling his readers how many fuits of cloaths each emperor had, what number of courtiers and domestics, c. 48). Vossius places him among the Latin hiflorians, with Alins Sabinus, who wrote the life of Maximinus, Vulcanius Terentianus, author of the lives of the three Gordians, in whose times they lived, and Curius Fortunatianus, who wrote the history of the reign of the two Maximins (49). Some pretend, that the history of Fortunatianus is still extant, and lodged in the emperor's library; nay, that it was formerly printed in Italy. To this Fortunatiamus, Vossius ascribes the three books on rhetoric, which have reached our times, under the name of Curius Fortunatianus Consultus, and are deservedly esteemed by the learned (50). In the reign of the emperor Constantine were still extant some books of epigrams by Fabilius a Greek grammarian, and one of the preceptors of Maximians the younger, and various poems written by Toxotius, a fenator of the family of Antoninus Pius. He married Junia Fadilla, formerly be-trothed to young Maximinus, and died soon after he had discharged the office of prætor (51).

. vit. p. 150. (47) Voss. hist. Lat. l.ii. c. 3. p. 179. Macrin. vit. 60. (49) Voss. bist. Lat. l. ii. c. 3. Max. vit. p. 150. Gord. (51) Maximin. vit. p. 148. (46) Voss. ibid. l. iv. p. 17. Maximin. vis. p. 150. $\mathbf{p}\cdot 93\cdot (48) \text{ Gord. vis. p. 152, 160.} (49) \text{ vis. p. 160.} (50) \text{ Voss. ibid.} (51) \text{ Maxim}

believing, or pretending to believe him, confirmed without hesitation the choice of

Vol. VI. Nº 3.

Uu

the

the foldiery; while others pretend, that the senate did not acknowledge Philip, till a M. Marcius and L. Aurelius Severus Hostilianus, two senators of great distinction, whom they successively created emperors, were snatched away by sudden deaths '. He concludes a Philip, desirous to return to Rome, immediately concluded a peace with the Persians, peace with the and led back his army into Syria. Zonaras writes, that he yielded to Sapor Mesopo-Persians. tamia and Armenia; but soon after broke the treaty, and recovered, to the great satisfaction of the Romans, both countries. Be that as it will, he arrived at Antioch before Easter, which, according to Eusebius b, was celebrated this year on the fourteenth of April, and went with the empress to affift at the prayers and sacred ceremonies that were performed by the primitive christians the night preceding that great festival. But Babylas, who was then bishop of Antioch, and afterwards suffered mar- b tyrdom under Decius, apprised of his coming, went out to meet him; repro ched him with the murder of his sovereign; declared him unworthy of being admitted into the congregation of the faithful; and stopping him with his hand, protested, that he would by no means fuffer him to enter the facred place, unless he made a public confession of his fins, and ranked himself among the penitents. The emperor with great humility submitted to both, and was thereupon by the holy bishop admitted into the This St. Chryfostom c, and several other writers, relate as a thing altogether certain; but Eusebius speaks of it as what in his time was said to have happened a. It was probably on this occasion that Origen wrote both to Philip and to his wife Severa, which St. Jerom mistakes for his mother, commending their piety, and putting them C in mind of their duty . Both these letters were still extant in St. Jerom's time 1; that is, about the end of the fourth century. From Syria the emperor set out for Rome, where he was received with the usual demonstrations of joy by the senate and people, whose affections, tho' they at first seemed averse to him, he soon gained by his mild administration, and obliging behaviour 8. He appointed his brother Priscus commander in chief of the troops in Syria, and Severianus, his father-in-law, of the forces in Masia and Macedon, persons but ill qualified for those important posts h. As the works of Trebellius Pollio, and others, who wrote the lives of Philip and his successors to Valerian, have not reached our times, we cannot help borrowing many things of Zosimus; but we think it incumbent upon us to acquaint our readers, that he was a d professed and implacable enemy to the christian religion, and therefore omits no opportunity of blackening the character of Philip, and crying up his successor Decius, by whom the church was most cruelly persecuted.

He gains the affections of the people at Rome

He submits to beranked in among the pe-

the church

mitents.

Defeats the Carpi.

THE following year the emperor entered upon his first consulship, having Titianus for his collegue; and soon after, leaving the city, marched against the Carpi, who, passing the Danube, had invaded Masia, and laid waste great part of that province. The emperor defeated them in two battles, and obliged them to repass the Danube, and fue for peace; which he readily granted, and returned to Rome 1. The next year, when Prasens and Albinus were consuls, nothing happened at Rome, or in the provinces, which historians have thought worth transmitting to posterity, except the burning by accidental fire of the theatre of Pompey, and another stately building called Centum Columnæ, or the Hundred Pillars. In the beginning of the following year the emperor entered upon his fecond confulship, having his fon for his collegue, whom he honoured with the title of Augustus, and invested with the tribunitial power 1. Both princes retained the fasces all this and the following year, to celebrate with the greater The thousandth pomp and magnificence the thousandth year of Kome, begun on the twenty-first of year of Rome. April of the year 247. of the christian æra, and fifth of Philip's reign, according to the computation of Varro, which was then, and is still, followed by most historians and chronologers. Extraordinary rejoicings were made at Rome, shews of all kinds exhibited for ten days together, and an incredible number of wild beafts, referved by Gor- f dian for his triumph over the Persians, killed, and distributed among the people 1. Orofius writes, that the pious emperor turned this extraordinary folemnity to the honour of Christ and his church m. We wish he had informed us in what manner. This year the emperor published an edict truly worthy of a christian prince, forbidding under Unnatural lust the severest penalties all manner of unnatural lust, and those infamous practices which suppressed at Rome.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Zonar, p. 229. Onuph. p. 260. Cedren. p. 257. <sup>2</sup> Zonar. ibid. Chrysos. de S. Babyla, contra Gentil. tom. 1. p. 656, 657. Parif. ann. 1636. <sup>3</sup> Idem ibid. c. 36. Vincent. Lirin. c. 23. Rufin. c. 26. <sup>4</sup> Hier. v. Aur. Vict. Zos. l. i. p. 646. <sup>4</sup> Idem, p. 642, 643. <sup>4</sup> Idem, p. 642, 643. <sup>4</sup> Idem, p. 260. Goltz. p. 107. <sup>1</sup> Pagi, p. 247. Spanh. l. iii, p. 147. <sup>28</sup> O b Eusen. 1. vi. c. 34. d Eusen. l. vi. c. 34. f Hier. vit. illust. vir. c. 54. p. 285.

i Idem, p. 641. k Onuph. p. m Oros. l. vii. c. 10.

a had long prevailed in Rome, being countenanced by the wicked, and tolerated by the good princes ". The following year, when M. Æmilianus was the second time conful with Julius Aquilinus, the eastern provinces, no longer able to pay the taxes with which they were loaded, nor bear with the haughty conduct of Priscus their governor, (we follow Zosimus for want of a better guide) openly revolted, and pro- several rebels claimed one Papianus, or Jotopianus, emperor; but he was foon killed, and with his lions. death put an end to the disturbances on that side o. At the same time the provinces of Masia and Pannonia revolted, continues Zosimus, and set up one P. Carvilius Marinus, who was but a centurion. Hereupon Philip, in great consternation, besought the fenate either to enable him to quash the rebellion, or to depose him, it they were b diffatisfied with his conduct. This unexpected speech surprised the senate; but Decius, while the other fenators continued filent, addressing the emperor, told him, that he had no reason to fear Marinus, whose presumption, as he was unequal to any great undertaking, would foon prove his ruin. What Decius had foretold, happened a few days after, when Marinus was killed by those very persons who had raised him to the empire. Hereupon Philip, recalling his father-in-law Severianus, obliged Decius, much against his will, to accept of the government of Massia and Pannonia in his room. He no fooner appeared there, than the foldiers proclaimed him empe- Decius declarror, and forced him to accept the fovereignty, by threatening to put him to death, if ed emteror by he declined it. Fear therefore getting the better of his fidelity, he fuffered himself illyricum. c to be arrayed with the imperial purple, and the foldiers to fwear allegiance to him P. Zonaras tells us, that he immediately wrote to Philip, affuring him, that he defigned to refign the fovereignty as foon as he reached Rome q. But Philip, without relying upon fuch promifes, marched with all possible expedition against the usurper, hoping to surprise him. His son he left at Rome, with a detachment of the prætorian guards, to keep the city in awe. Decius, having timely notice of his march and approach, received him with his troops in battle array. Hereupon a battle enfued, in which great numbers of Philip's men were cut in pieces, and the rest obliged to retire to Ve- Philip overrona, where he himself was killed by the army , whether by his own, or by that of come and killed Decius, we are not told. The news of his death no fooner reached Rome, than the d prætorian guards dispatched his son, who was then in their camp. Such was the end of the emperor Philip, after he had reigned five years and some months; for he was proclaimed emperor on the fourteenth of March of the year 244. and killed after the seventeenth of June of the year 249, as appears from the dates of his laws s. Both he and his fon were, according to Eutropius, ranked among the gods; which, however injurious to the memory and religion of Philip, shews, that his administration was not displeasing to the senate, tho' he had succeeded Gordian, a prince so much and so universally beloved. Eusebius, and Dionysius of Alexandria, who was raised to that fee in his reign, tell us, that under him the christian religion was publicly preached; The christian that it flourished and increased more than it had done under any other prince; And religion flowe no wonder, adds the former writer, without explaining himself any further; but mean-him. ing, as to us seems plain from the context, that he professed it himself a. Gregory of Nyssa writes, that, in the reign of Philip, all the inhabitants of the city and territory of Neocæsarea in Pontus being converted to christianity, the idols were every-where overturned with their altars and temples, and churches erected in their room to the honour of the true God w. Of Philip the fon authors observe, that he was of such a grave, or rather melancholy temper, that no one could, by any contrivance, ever make him laugh or fmile; and add, that his father one day breaking out into a loud laughter, he could not help turning away his face, and expressing his displeasure with a more grave and reserved look than usual *. Both he and his mother Marcia Otacilia f Severa, professed, according to St. Jerom, and the chronicle of Alexandria, the christian religion; nay, Petrus de Natalibus reckons the two Philips among the martyrs of the church a, upon the authority of Orofius, who writes, that Decius put them to death, either because they were christians, or that he might, when they were removed, persecute the christian religion. But the authority of Orosius, who lived

h Alex. vit. p. 121. Aur. Vict. O Zos. l. i. p. 642. P Idem ibid. & p. p. 229. T Zos. l. i. p. 643. Aur. Vict. Zonar. p. 229. Cod. Just. p. 489. & I. viii. tit. 56. leg. 1. p. 804, &c. Euseb. l. vi. c. 36. p. 232. 238. W Greg. Nyss. vit. Greg. Thaumat. tom. 3. p. 563. Vict. epit. Chron. Alexand. p. 630. Pet. de Natal. catalog. fanct. c. 92. p. 218. " Idem, c. 41. p. 7 HIER. chron. OROS. l. vii.

many ages after, is of no great weight with us, unless confirmed by that of more a ancient writers. Eusebius says, that Decius persecuted the church out of hatred to Philip :, but we cannot from thence conclude, that he put Philip to death on account of his religion. Of the authors who flourished under him, we shall speak in our note (X).

The birth and descent of De-

His cruel persecution of the church

Upon the death of Philip and his son, Decius was acknowledged emperor, first by the foldiery, and foon after by the fenate and people, who wanted both strength and courage to dispute the election of the new prince. He was a native of Bubalia, or Budalia, a borough in the territory of Sirmium in Lower Pannonia, and, according to the chronicle of Alexandria d, raised to the empire in the fifty-seventh, but, according to Victor the younger, only in the forty-seventh year of his age. He had b by his wife Herennia Etruscilla four sons, viz. Decius, Hostilianus, Etruscus, and Trajan. The name of Messius was common to them all; whence we may conclude, that it was the name of the family. The emperor is styled in the ancient inscrip-His character. tions Caius Messius Quintus Trajanus Decius. He was, according to Zosimus his panegyrift, descended of an illustrious family, and endowed with every good quality e. Victor the younger styles him the best of princes, and Vopiscus equals him to the most renowned commanders of antiquity. He was no sooner invested with the sovereignty, than he declared his eldest son Cæsar, and prince of the youth. The same title he soon after bestowed upon his three other sons s. In the very beginning of his reign he raised the most dreadful and bloody persecution that had ever oppressed the church, c prompted thereunto by his hatred to the deceased emperor, and his zeal for the cause of declining paganism, which he saw fatally undermined by the wonderful progress of christianity. Concluding therefore, that the one could not be supported but by the utter ruin of the other, he enacted most cruel edicts against all who professed the christian religion; pursuant to which, the christians were in all places driven from their habitations, stripped of their estates, dragged to execution like public malefactors, and racked with the most exquisite torments cruelty itself could invent. The laws of nature and humanity were trod under foot; friend betrayed his friend, brother his brother, and children their parents; every one thinking it meritorious to betray a christian, and procure his death. It is easier, says Nicepborus, speaking d of this persecution, to count the fand on the sea-shore, than the martyrs who suffered under Decius. The tyrant vented his rage chiefly upon the bishops, of whom many were seized, inhumanly racked and executed, and among the rest Fabian bishop of Rome, Babylas bishop of Antioch, and Alexander bishop of Jerusalem. Great numbers of christians betook themselves to barren mountains, rocks, and deserts, chusing

> e Euses. l. vi. c. 39. d Chron. Alexand. p. 632. e Zos. l. i. p. 641. f AUREL. VICT. 8 GOLTZ. p. 109. ONUPH. p. 261. Occo. p. 454. p. 223.

(X) Under Philip flourished Nicagoras, a celebrated fophist of Athens. He was the son of one Mnefeus, an orator, and wrote the lives of illustrious men (52). Philostratus reckons him and Apsinas among the great men of his time, with whom he was in timately acquainted (53). Minucianus, the fon of Neagoras, published a book of rhetoric, on which Perphyrius wrote comments (54), and a small treatise on syllogisms, which has reached our times (55). Apsmas sourished at the same time, and is greatly commended by Philostraius, on account of his exactness in writing, and extraordinary memory (56). He was a native of Phænicia; but spent great part of his life at Athens; and is thence by Suidas called an Athenian (57). Onasimus, the Athenian fophist, whom we must distinguish from another of the same name and profession, born in Cyprus or Sparta, was the fon of Applicas, and father to another Apfinas, who feems to have flourished under Constantine (58). Suidas mentions a third sophist of this name, who flourished under Maximian; but was a native of Gadara on the confines of Palestine and Syria, and attained to the rank and title of consular (59). Major, an Arabian sophist, flourished likewise under Philip, and published thirteen books of rhetoric (60), none of which have reached us. Syncellus mentions one Theopompus a philoso-pher, who became very famous at Cherones in Bacotin (61); but of him no notice is taken either by Suidas, or any other writer. Asmins Quadra-tus wrote the Roman history in the Ionic dialect, from the foundation of the city to the reign of Alexander, fays Suidas (62); but he must have brought it down to the fifth year of Philip's reign, which was the thousandth of Rome; for his book was intituled the XILIGI, or the thousand years (63). This work is quoted by Stephanus the geographer, by the Augustine writers, by Zosimus, and by Xiphilin; but has been long fince loft. He likewise wrote the history of the Parabians, often quoted by the ancients, and that of Germany. Of the former Stephanus cites the ninth book; and Agathias, speaking of the latter, tells us, that he was a native of Italy, and wrote with great exactness (64).

(52) Suid. p. 223. (53) Philof. foph. lix. p. 629. (54) Suid. p. 573. (55) Porphyr. vit. c. 6. p. 51. Jonf. l. iii. c. 14. (56) Philof. p. 623. (57) Suid. p. 523. (58) Idem ibid. (59) Idem ibid. (60) Eufeb. prap. evang. l.x. c. 3. p. 464. (61) Syncel. p. 362. (62) Suid. p. 1484. (63) Vost hist. Grac. l. ii. c. 16. p. 239. (64) Agash. l. i. p. 17.

a rather to live amongst wild beasts, than men who had divested themselves of all reason and humanity. Among these was the celebrated hermit Paul, who, withdrawing into the deferts of Egypt, led there a folitary life for the space of ninety years at least, and became the father and founder of the order of anchorets. This persecution did not rage, at least with its first violence, above a year, as appears from the epistles of St. Cyprian, the emperor and magistrates being, by the invasion of feveral barbarous nations, diverted from fearching after the christians; for about the end of the first year of Decius's reign, when he was conful for the second time with Vicius Gratus, the Scytbians, that is, the Goths, having passed the Danube, under the conduct of their king Cniva, invested with seventy thousand men the city of b Eusterium in Lower Masia; but meeting there with a vigorous opposition from Gallus, who was afterwards emperor, they raifed the fiege of Eusterium, and fat down before Nicopolis, another city in the same province. Against them Decius dispatched his eldest son, at the head of a numerous and well disciplined army; who, falling upon them unexpectedly, cut thirty thousand of them in pieces, and obliged the rest to roung Decius; retire beyond mount Hamus, which parted Masia from Thrace. However, they gains great foon recruited their army, and entering Thrace, laid siege to Philippopolis on the advantages Hebrus. Young Decius hastened to the relief of the place, but while his room over the Goths. Hebrus. Young Decius hastened to the relief of the place; but while his troops were refreshing themselves, after a long march, in the neighbourhood of Berea, a city of e the same province, Cniva, coming unawares upon them, cut the whole army in But his army is pieces, and obliged the young prince to fave himself by flight into Masia. Cniva in the end inthen returned before Philippopolis; and having made himself master of the place, put the inhabitants, to the number of one hundred thousand souls, says Ammianus k, without distinction of fex or age, to the sword, ravaged Thrace, and laid waste great part of Macedon, where L. Priscus, probably brother to the late emperor, commanded at that time; but he, instead of opposing, joined the enemy, and caused himself to be proclaimed emperor. Hereupon Decius, who had staid at Rome to confecrate the walls of the city, which he had ordered to be built, or rather repaired, immediately fet out for Pannonia; where, in the beginning of the following year, d he took upon him his third confulship, and honoured with that dignity his eldest son, styled in the inscriptions of this year Q. Herennius Decius Casar; whence it is manifest, that the emperor had not yet conferred upon him the title of Augustus m. Decius overcame the Goths, says Zosimus, in several engagements, obliged them to quit The Goths are the booty they had taken, and drove them out of the Roman dominions. What the emperor. that author writes is confirmed by feveral medals, mentioning his conquests in Dacia, and victories over the Carpi, who had probably joined the Goths o. Priscus was declared by the senate a public enemy, and slain; but where, or in what manner, history does not inform us. From Thrace the emperor wrote to the senate, acquaint- The office of ing them, that he designed to re-establish the office of censor, an ancient magistracy censor re-estae of great authority, and leaving to them the choice of a person fit for the discharge of so great a trust. This employment, famous in the times of the republic, had been abolished by the emperors, who discharged the functions annexed to it, without assuming the title; for, since Domitian's time, the title of censor had been quite laid aside, and neglected by most of the princes who reigned before him P. The last private persons who discharged that office, were Paulus Amilius Lepidus, and L. Munatius Plancus, in the year of Rome 732. the tenth of Augustus's reign, and twenty-second before the birth of Christ. The senate, upon the receipt of the emperor's letter, assembled in the temple of Castor and Pollux; and there, instead of waiting till their votes were asked, cried out with one voice, as soon as the letter f was read, Let Valerian be censor; let him censure and correct the faults of others, who Valerian chosen bas no faults of bis own. Of Valerian, who was raised to the empire two years after, censor. we shall speak in a more proper place. He was then in Thrace with Decius; who, upon his receiving the decree of the fenate, caused it to be publicly read; exhorted Valerian not to decline an office, to which he had been named by the republic with fuch extraordinary marks of esteem and distinction; and explained to him the nature and importance of his new employment, with the authority and power annexed to h Hier, vit. Paul. p. 237. Euseb. l. iii. c. 39. Lact. persec. c. 4. Greg. Nyss. vit. Thaum. p. 567.

Cyp. dist. xi. c. 53. Optat. l. iii. p. 71. Hilar. in Cons. p. 113. Cyp. epist. 52. 1 Cyp. epist.

36, &c. k Ammian. l. xxxi. p. 446. 1 Zos. l. i. p. 644. Jornand. de reb. Goth. c. 18. p. 637.

Nol. VI. No. 3. X X Condition

it, which, he faid, extended over all persons civil and military, of what rank and Decius gains new advantages over the Goths.

Young Decius is killed,

And likewise the emperor.

condition foever, except the governor of Rome, the confuls for the time being, the pontiff styled rex sacrorum, and the superior of the vestal virgins, so long as, mindful of her vow, she preserved herself undefiled. Valerian, says the author of his life, earnestly befought the emperor not to lay a burden upon him, to which he was in every respect unequal 4; but does not tell us whether he was in the end prevailed upon to submit to it. Soon after the emperor marched against the Goths, overcame them, and reduced them to fuch streights, that they offered to set at liberty all the prifoners they had taken, and relinquish their booty, provided he would suffer them to retire unmolested. But the emperor, bent upon cutting off at once the whole nation, and delivering Rome from to troublesome an enemy, without hearkening to their proposals, sent Trebonianus Gallus with a strong detachment, to cut off their b retreat; and pursuing them close with the rest of the army, came up with them before they reached the Danube, and engaged them a second time. The Goths, knowing that all lay at stake, fought like men in despair. Young Decius fignalized himself on this occasion in a very eminent manner, and is said to have killed many of the enemy with his own hand; but being in the end mortally wounded with an arrow, he fell from his horse in the sight of the whole army. The emperor, seeing him fall, cried out to his foldiers, without betraying the least concern, We bave lost but one man; let not, fellow-foldiers, so small a loss discourage you. Having uttered these words, he rushed into the midst of the enemy; but, instead of revenging the death of his fon, he was himself surrounded on all sides, overpowered, and killed. Thus c Zosimus :, and Jornandes '. But Aurelius Victor and Zonaras tell us, that Gallus, who kept a private correspondence with the Goths, advised them to encamp behind a morass, in which the emperor, while he attempted to pass it, pursuant to the tr acherous counsel of the same Gallus, perished with his son, and the greatest number of the army, partly suffocated in the mud, and partly destroyed by the showers of arrows, which the barbarians discharged upon them, while they could neither advance nor retire'. The same writers add, that the bodies of the two princes could never be found. Eusebius a, and the chronicle of Alexandria w, only say, that the two Decii were killed by the treachery of one of their own officers. Lastantius writes, that Decius, having engaged the Carpi, was by them furrounded, cut in pieces with d great part of his army, and left unburied a prey to the ravens and wild beafts. Thus, concludes that writer, an enemy to God, and a persecutor of his church, deserved to perish x. St. Jerom likewise y, St. Cyprian 2, and Constantine the Great 2, ascribe the unhappy end of Decius to divine vengeance. With him perished, according to Eusebius, three of his sons, viz. Decius, Etruscus, and Trajan b. He had reigned two years and some months c, and was, after his death, ranked among the gods with the usual ceremonies.

The Roman army cut in pieces.

Gallus proclaimed emperor.

THE Goths, after the death of Decius, pursued their victory, and made a dreadful havock of the disheartened army. Such of the Romans as escaped the general slaughter, fled to the legions commanded by Gallus; who, by pretending a great concern e for the unfortunate end of Decius, and the defeat of his army, and feigning to march against the barbarians, gained the hearts of the soldiery, and was by them, with loud shouts of joy, proclaimed emperor. He immediately declared his fon Volusianus, Casar; married him to Herennia Etruscilla, the daughter of the deceased prince; and, to remove all suspicion of his being any-ways accessory to the misfortunes which had befallen him and his army, he adopted Hostilianus, his only surviving son; conferred upon him the title of Augustus; invested him with the tribunitial power; and named him conful for the enfuing year d. Caius Vibius Trebonianus Gallus, as he is styled in the ancient inscriptions, was, according to Villor the younger, a native of the island of Meninx on the coast of Africa, called afterwards Garba, and at present f Gerbi and Zarbi. Of his family no mention is made by the writers who have reached us; and all we know of his employments is, that he commanded the troops on the frontiers of Masia in 250. and in the present year 251. He was, according to the chronicle of Alexandria, fifty-seven; but, according to Victor the younger, only forty-five, when raised to the empire. Hostilia Severa, honoured on some medals

<sup>9</sup> Valer. vit. p. 173, 174.

F Zos. l. i. p. 643.

B Euseb. chron. p. 236.

W Chron. Alexand. p. 251.

LACTANT. persecut. c. 4. p. 4, 5.

HIER. in Zach. xiv. p. 285.

CONSTANT. Orat. 2pud eum. Euseb. oper. c. 24. p. 600.

Euseb. l. vii. c. 1. p. 250.

GOLTZ. p. 108.

GOLTZ. p. 111.

ZONAR. p. 644.

a with the title of Augustae, is supposed to have been his wife. His son is styled in fome inscriptions C. Vibius Volusianus, and in others Annius Gallus Trebonianus. His election was no fooner confirmed by the fenate, than, instead of revenging the death of Decius, and the overthrow of his army, he concluded a dishonourable peace with He concludes A the Goths; suffered them to retire unmolested with all their booty and prisoners, dishonourable among whom were many Romans of great distinction; and even engaged to pay them Goths. yearly a considerable sum, provided they continued quiet in their own country 8. After this ignominious peace, he returned to Rome; and, in the beginning of the following year, entered upon his first consulship, having his son for his collegue. He began his reign with reviving all the edicts, which had been published by his He perfecutes b predecessor against the christians, and which he caused to be put in execution the christians. with the utmost rigour. At the same time a dreadful plague, breaking out in Ethiopia on the confines of Egypt, spread in a short time over all the provinces of the empire, and swept away incredible numbers of people, especially at Rome, where it raged with great violence. Some authors write, that it carried off among the rest Hostilianus, the son of Decius, soon after he had been honoured with the title of Augustus ; but Zosimus affures us, that Gallus caused him to be put to death, and then gave out, that he was dead of the plague. The fame year was remarkable for a general drought, a great famine, and wars kindled in most parts of the empire. M. Aufidius Perpenna Licinianus took upon him the title of Augustus; but this revolt c was foon quashed k; in what manner, we are no-where told. The Goths, the Borani, the Carpi, the Burgundi, or Burgundiones, a people dwelling on the banks of the Danube, broke into Masia and Pannonia; the Scythians over-ran Asia; and the Persians, entering Syria, laid waste that province, and even made themselves masters of Antiocb 1. Amilianus, who commanded in  $M\alpha fia$ , overcame the barbarians in a pitched battle, and obliged them to quit the Roman dominions. Elated with this fuccess, and despissing Gallus, who was wallowing in pleasures at Rome, while his generals were exposing their lives in defence of the empire, he caused himself to be Emilianus proclaimed emperor, and was faluted by the troops under his command, whose proclaimed emaffections he had gained, with the titles of Augustus, and father of his country. This feror in Moestia. d rouzed Gallus from his lethargy, who immediately ordered Valerian to march with the Gaulish and German legions against this new rival. But Amilianus, without giving him time to affemble his troops, marched strait to Italy, and, by long marches, arrived in a short time at Interamna, now Termi, about thirty-two miles from Rome. There he was met by Gallus, and his son, at the head of a considerable army; but the troops of the latter, despising their leaders, slew them in the fight of Emilianus's Gallus is killed army, and proclaimed him emperor. Such was the end of the emperor Gallus, after by his own men. he had reigned a year and fix months ... Mention is made on some medals of the apotheosis of Volusianus "; whence we may conclude, that Gallus was likewise deified. No fooner was the news of their death brought to Rome, than the fenate confirmed e the election of the foldiery, and honoured the new prince with the usual titles. Æmi-Æmilianus lius Æmilianus, as Aurelius Victor calls him, or C. Julius Æmilianus, as he is styled on proclaimed emthe ancient coins, was by nation a Moor, and of a very mean descent. He had ferved from his youth in the Roman armies, and raised himself to the first employments in the state; for he had been conful before he came to the empire . In the letter which he wrote to the senate after the death of Gallus, he promised to drive the Goths out of Thrace, and the Persians out of Mesopotamia and Armenia; to comport himself in every thing as the lieutenant of the republic; and to leave the exercise of the fovereign power to the senate P. Aurelius Victor writes, that he governed with great moderation; wherein he disagrees with Zonaras, who tells us, that he acted more f like a foldier than a prince, and did many things highly unbecoming an emperor 4. Be that as it will, the troops, which Valerian was leading to the affiftance of Gallus, hearing in Rhatia that he was dead, refused to submit to the new prince, and proclaimed their own general emperor; who thereupon quickening his march, passed the mountains, and entered Italy at the head of a very numerous and well disciplined army. Emilianus's army no sooner understood, that Valerian, of whom they entertained a mighty opinion, had been proclaimed emperor by the troops under his com-

He is killed by his own men. and Valerian peror in his room.

mand, than they fell upon their own leader, and dispatched him, to avoid, says a Zonaras, a civil war, and the shedding of the blood of their fellow-citizens r. Emiproclaimedem lianus was killed at Spoletum, now Spoleti, or at a bridge in that neighbourhood; which Villor the younger pretends to have been thence called The bloody bridge. He died in the forty-fixth year of his age, after a short reign of three, or, at most, of four months. Eusebius does not even rank him among the emperors, and is therein followed by the chronicle of Alexandria, and that of Nicephorus, in which Valerian is placed immediately after Gallus. Aurelius Victor writes, that Æmilianus died a natural death ". In his reign C. Virius Paulinus was governor of Rome, and comes domesticorum w. This is the first time we find the latter employment, which in the fourth century became very famous, mentioned in history. Pancirollus takes b the words domestici and protectores to be synonymous terms. The province of the latter was to guard the prince's person, and, under the christian emperors, to carry the great itandard, with the cross. They were superior in rank to the prætorian guards, and diffinguished with particular badges peculiar to them. This corps confisted of three thousand five hundred men before Justinian's time, who is said to have increased them to the number of five thousand five hundred. They were divided into feveral bands of horse and soot, called scholæ, and commanded by some person of great distinction, styled comes domessicorum x. From several inscriptions of this time, we learn, that the word comes was already a title of dignity; so that the title of comes, or count, does not, as fome imagine, owe its original intirely to Con- c

His descent, employments. and character.

Æmilianus being killed, according to the most probable opinion, in the month of August of the year 253. the senate, with great joy, confirmed the election of Valerian, and conferred upon his son Gallienus the title of Casar. Valerian was descended from one of the most illustrious families in Rome, had commanded armies, and discharged with great reputation the chief employments of the empire, both civil and military. He was adored by persons of all ranks, on account of his integrity, prudence, modesty, and extraordinary accomplishments; for he was well versed in all the branches of learning, and had ever lived tree from the vices, which generally prevailed in those dissolute times; a friend to virtue, an enemy to all d wickedness and tyranny, a great admirer of the customs of the primitive Romans, and no ways inferior to those among them, who were most cried up for their love of virtue, and aversion to vice; infomuch, that if every person in the empire had been allowed the liberty of naming to the fovereignty whom he pleafed, no one, fays the historian, would have thought of chusing any but Valerian y. Thus he was univerfally judged worthy of the empire before he attained it; but was afterwards found no-ways equal to such a mighty charge; whence most writers ascribe to his want of activity, prudence, and resolution, the many calamities which befel the empire in his and his fon's reign z. Before his accession to the empire, he was prince of the fenate, which gave him a right to vote before all the confulars. Afterwards e he commanded the third legion, and was by degrees raifed to the first posts in the army. He attended Decius in his wars with the Goths, and was, while he continued with him in Thrace, named by the senate to the censorship, in the manner we have related above. In the ancient inscriptions he is styled P. Licinius Valerianus; to these names Victor the younger adds that of Colobius; and Onuphrius quotes an inscription, in which he is named P. Aurelius Licinius Valerius Valerianus 2. He married two wives, and had by the first, whose name is not mentioned in history, Gallienus, who succeeded him in the empire. By his second wife, named by some writers Mariniana b, he had Valerian, who was twice conful, viz. in 258. and 263, and honoured, either by his father, or by his brother Gallienus, with the title of Casarc. f He had other fons; for Gallienus is said to have married his brother's fons, and to have styled himself the brother of many princes d. Valerian began his reign with great affections of all applause, and behaved himself so as to gain the affections both of the senate and people, paying the utmost respect to the former, and easing the latter of the heavy taxes, with which they had been loaded by his predecessors. He enacted many excellent laws, and by that means suppressed most of the disorders, which in those

He gains the

Idem ibid. * Eusen l. vii. c. 10. p. 255. W AUR. Vict. in Æmil. w Onuph. in fast. p. 262. × Pancir. vit. p. 173. 2 Vict. epit. Eutrop. Zos. l. i. p. 640. 369. C Val. vit. p. 175. Goltz. p. 114. d Idem ibid. y Valer. BiRAG. p.

unhappy

a unhappy times prevailed, not only at Rome, but all over the empire. Authors obferve, that he employed only men of merit, and that most of those whom he preferred to the command of his armies, were afterwards raifed to the empire k. In the beginning of the following year 254. he entered upon his fecond confulship, having his fon Gallienus for his collegue. Zosimus writes, that this very year, the first of his reign, he took Gallienus for his partner in the empire, being prompted thereunto by the danger to which the empire, invaded on all fides by the barbarians, was then The empire inexposed 1; for the Germans and the Franks committed great devastations in that part valed on all of Gaul which bordered on the Abine; the Goths and the Carpi invaded the provinces fides by the of Massia, Thrace and Macedon; and the Persians, passing the Euphrates, over-ran b Syria, Cilicia, and Cappadocia. Aurelian, at that time tribune of a legion quartered in Mentz, fell upon the Franks, while they were ravaging the neighbouring country, killed seven hundred of them, took three hundred prisoners, whom he fold for flaves, and obliged the rest to quit their booty, and retire ". The country of the Franks, now for the first time mentioned in history, was bounded on the north by the ocean; on the west by the ocean and the river Rhone; and on the south by the Weser: according to which description, they possessed the modern countries of West-phalia, Hesse, and some adjacent states. They were a motley multitude, consisting of various German nations dwelling beyond the Rhine; who, uniting in defence of their common liberty, took thence the name of Franks, the word frank fignifying in their language, as it still does in ours, free. Among them we find the following nations mentioned, viz. the Astuarii, Chamavi, Brusteri, Salii, Frifii, Chauci, Amstvarii, and Catti P. The Franks are sometimes called Sicambri, because they inhabited the country formerly possessed by that nation, which was intirely cut off by Augustus, as we have related in the foregoing volume. The following year, Valerian being conful the third time, and Gallienus the second, a great victory was gained in The Germans Germany by the latter, who thereupon affumed the title of Germanicus Maximus, as defeated by appears from feveral medals of this year as but what pation he overs me what has Gallienus. appears from feveral medals of this year 9; but what nation he overcame, whether the Franks or the Alemanni, who inhabited the countries lying between the Rhine, the Maine, and the Danube, history does not inform us. The next confuls were d Maximus and Glabrio, during whose administration, Gallienus, with a body only of ten thousand men, defeated, if Zonaras is to be credited, three hundred thousand Alemanni in the neighbourhood of Milan; overcame the Heruli, a Gothic nation, and with great fuccess made war upon the Franks. We wish that writer had given us a more distinct account of these mighty exploits. In Gaul, Posthumius, a commander of great prowefs and experience, gained great advantages over several German nations, who had invaded that province. The following year, Valerian being conful the fourth time, and Gallienus the third, a violent persecution broke out against The christians the christians, Macrianus, a celebrated magician of Egypt, having seduced the em-persecuted.

e peror, who had been hitherto a great patron of the christian religion, by persuading him, that the affairs of the empire would never prosper, till the pagan rites were reftored, and the religion of the christians, so odious to the gods, utterly abolished. This perfecution, commonly reckoned the eighth, raged throughout the whole empire with no less fury than that under Decius had done. Persons of all ranks, says Dionysius of Alexandria, without distinction of sex or age, were dragged to the tribunals, hurried to execution, and racked with the most exquisite torments, which the implacable hatred of their enemies could invent. This persecution lasted three years; that is, from the present year 257. to the year 260. when Valerian was taken prisoner by the Persians. The same year, Aurelian being sent to succeed Ulpius Crif nitus in the command of the troops in Illyricum and Thrace, drove the Goths out of The Goths de-those provinces, took an incredible number of them prisoners, and pursuing them feated by Aubeyond the Danube, laid waste their country, and returned to Messa loaded with Sarmatians by booty. At the fame time Probus, passing the Danube, made war with great success Probus. upon the Sarmatians and Quadi, and rescued out of the hands of the latter Valerius Flaceus, a youth of a noble descent, and nearly related to the emperor, who rewarded Probus with a civic crown; which, in the times of the republic, was given to fuch k Aur. vit. p. 211. Trebel. Pollio. hift. trigint. tyrann. c. g. p. 189. Prob. vit. p. 234. l. i. p. 646. Tvit. Aur. p. 211. Adrian. Voles. rer. Francicar. Buch. p. 209. ibid. P Vite Adrian. Vales. not. Gall. p. 201. & Buch. p. 210. Birag. p. 3. Zonar. vit. Gallien. p. 235. Trebel. Pol. in vit. trigint. tyrann. p. 184. O BUCH. 9 Birag. p. 367, & 371. p. 184. Aurel. vir. r Zonar. vit. Gailien. p. 235.

The Perlians over run feveral provinces.

The Scythians

Valerian defeated by the Persians, and taken prisoner.

as had faved the life of a citizen u. About the latter end of this year, the emperor, a leaving Rome, fet out for the east, to make head against the Persians, who had invaded Mesopotamia and Syria, and committed dreadful ravages in those provinces. He reached Byzantium in the beginning of the following year, when Memmius Tuscus and Baffus were consuls; and there held a council, at which affisted all the chief officers of the empire, to deliberate about the measures to be taken with respect to the Persian war; for Sapor, king of Persia, had already seized all Armenia, made himself master of Nisibis and Carrbæ in Mesopotamia; and thence advancing into Syria at the head of a mighty army, had ravaged that province, and taken Antioch itself. His guide in this expedition was one Cyriades, descended of an illustrious family, but abandoned from his youth to all manner of wickedness; infomuch that, b not able to bear the reproaches and wholfome admonitions of his father, he fled from home, and retired into Persia, carrying thither with him a great quantity of gold and filver, which he had purloined. There he entered into the fervice of the Perfian king, stirred him up to make war upon the Romans, and served him as a guide, being well acquainted with the countries, in his marches through Mesopotamia, Armenia, and Syria. Sapor, after he had taken and plundered Antioch, returned into Persia, to discharge his army of the immense booty, with which they were incumbered, and left Cyriades governor of the conquered countries, who thereupon assumed the title of  $C\sigma / ar$ , and foon after that of Augustus, and was acknowledged as emperor by most of the eastern provinces w. At the same time the Borani, a Scythian nation, c crossing the Euxine sea, surprised and plundered the cities of Pytus in Bosporus, and Trapezus in Pontus; and thence advancing to the neighbourhood of Byzantium, croffed over into Asia, and surprised the cities of Chalcedon, Nicea, Apamea, Prusa, and feveral other places, which they plundered, and then returned with an immense booty into their own country, before Valerian could come up with them x. The following year, when Secularis and Bassus were consuls, Valerian marched from Cappadocia, whither he had pursued the Scythians, into Syria, recovered Antioch, and thence advanced into Mesopotamia, where he met Sapor, engaged him, but, by the treachery of Macrianus, who perfuaded him to engage in a disadvantageous post, lost the flower of his troops in the engagement, and was himself taken prisoner y. d Thus Zonaras, Aurelius Victor, Eutropius, and Agathias; but Zosimus writes, that Valerian having, after the battle in which he was defeated, been prevailed upon to confer in person with Sapor, was by that treacherous prince seized, and carried into Persia. Be that as it will, all authors agree, that he was taken prisoner, carried in triumph by Sapor into Persia, and there insulted in a most outrageous manner by that haughty conqueror; who, after having shewn him loaded with chains in all the chief cities of his empire, treated him with greater indignities than the meanest slave, making him his foot-stool whenever he mounted on horseback 2. He was taken in the year 260. the seventieth of his age, and sixth of his reign, and was still alive in the year 263. nay, the chronicle of Alexandria tells us, that he did not die till the C year 269. After his death, his body was flayed by Sapor's orders, and preserved in falt, and his skin dressed, dyed red, and exposed in a temple; where, to the eternal ignominy of the Roman name, it was shewn to all foreign princes and embassadors, as a lasting monument of the power of the Persian monarch. Agathias writes, that Valerian was flayed alive :; but is therein contradicted by all the ancient historians. We are told, that nothing grieved the unhappy Valerian in his deplorable condition fo much, as to fee himself intirely neglected by his son Gallienus, who was fo far from pressing the Persian king to set him at liberty, or offering to ransom him, that, on the contrary, he expressed no small joy when news was brought him of his captivity, tho' most foreign princes, nay, even those who had assisted Sapor in his f wars against the Romans, did all that lay in their power to prevail upon him to grant the Roman emperor his liberty; but the haughty Persian was too much elated with his success, to be terrified with the menaces of his enemies, or to hearken to the intreaties of his friends.

w Vit. trigint. tyran. p. 18 p. 234. Vict. epit. Eutrop. fest. Agath. l. iv. p. 153. persecut. c. 5. Oros. l. vii. c. 22. Vit. Valer. p. 175. * Zos. l. i. p. 648. y Zonar. Euseb. orat. Conft. c. 24. Lact. w Vit. trigint. tyran. p. 185. <sup>a</sup> Agath. l. iv. p. 233.

C H A P. XXIV.

The Roman history, from the captivity of Valerian to the resignation of Dioclesian.

a THE news of the defeat of the Roman army by the Persians, and the captivity of Valerian, no sooner reached the barbarous nations at war with Rome, than they flew to arms; and pouring on all sides incredible multitudes into the Roman The empire interritories, threatened the empire, and Rome itself, with utter destruction. The Goths vaded on all and Scythians ravaged anew Pontus and Asia, committing every-where dreadful deva-fides by the stations: the Germans, that is, the Alemanni, and the Franks, having over-run Rhatia, entered Italy itself, and advanced as far as Ravenna, putting all to fire and sword: the Quadi and Sarmatians seized on great part of Dacia and Pannonia; and other barbarous nations, invading Spain, made themselves masters of Tarraco, and other important places in that province b. Gallienus, who was then in Gaul, hearing that b the Alemanni and Franks had entered Italy, and were advancing towards Rome, flew to the defence of the capital, and obliged the enemy to retire. Whether they were overcome in battle, as some authors write, or marched back upon the news of his approach, as we read in others, is uncertain. The barbarians, who had invaded Dacia and Pannonia, were driven back by Regillianus, who commanded there, and is faid to have gained several victories over them in one day. While Regillianus was employed against the barbarians, whom he had pursued into Massia, Ingenuus caused himself to be proclaimed emperor in Pannonia, and was acknowledged by Ingenuus the inhabitants both of that province, and of  $M\alpha fia$ ; for he was a man of great causes himself valour and experience in war, and universally beloved both by the people and solto be proclaimed emperor;

c diery. Gallienus no sooner heard of his revolt, than he marched from the neighbourhood of Ravenna, where he then was, into Illyricum, engaged Ingenuus, and put him to flight. Some authors write, that Ingenuus was killed after the battle by But is defeated his own foldiers, while others tell us, that he put an end to his own life, to avoid and killed by that means falling into the hands of fo cruel an enemy as Gallienus, who used his victory with a barbarity hardly to be equalled, commanding his foldiers to put The cruelty of all the inhabitants of Mesia they could meet with to the sword, whether they had Gallienus. taken up arms in favour of the usurper, or no; as appears from the following letter, which he wrote to Verianus Celer, one of his officers: " I shall not be satisfied with "your putting to death fuch only as have borne arms against me, and might have d" fallen in the field: you must in every city destroy all the males, old and young: " fpare none who have wished ill to me, none who have spoken ill of me, the " fon of Valerian, the father and brother of princes. Ingenuus emperor! tear, kill, "cut in pieces without mercy: you understand me; do then as you know I would do, who have written to you with my own hand d." Pursuant to these cruel orders, a most dreadful havock was made of that unhappy people, and in several cities not one male child left alive. The troops, who had formerly ferved under Ingenuus, and the inhabitants of Masia, who had escaped the general slaughter, provoked by these cruelties, proclaimed Q, Nonius Regillianus emperor. He was a Dacian by Regillianus nation, descended, as was said, from the celebrated king Decebalus, whom Trajan emperor. f had conquered, and had by several gallant actions gained great reputation in the Roman armies. Claudius, who was afterwards emperor, wrote the following letter to him, congratulating him upon the victory he had gained over the Quadi and Sarmatians in Mæsia: "Happy is the republic in having at this time such a com-" mander as you; happy Gallienus, tho' no one dares speak truth to him, nor blame " or commend men according to their deferts. Bonitus and Celsus, two of the prince's " life-guard-men, have given me an account of your gallant behaviour in the neigh-" bourhood of Scupi, where you gained several victories over the barbarians in one "day. In ancient times you would have been thought worthy of a triumph; but

b Zos. l. i. c. 650. C Trig. tyrann. vit p. 188. d Idem ibid. c. 8.

46 at present I would have you to conquer with more caution, mindful of a certain a Posthumius revolts in Gaul.

" person, to whom your victories may give umbrage, &c." After he was proclaimed emperor, he gained very confiderable advantages over the Sarmatians, but He is murdered was foon murdered by his own foldiers, and the people of Illyricum, who had raifed by his own men. him to the empire, but not long after his affumption, began to dread the effects of Gallienus's cruelty. The Roxolani, who served under him, revolted the first; and their example was foon followed by the rest of the army, and the people of Illyricum. Aurelius Vistor writes, that he was overcome in battle by Gallienus. The same year M. Cassius Labienus Posthumius revolted in Gaul. He was meanly born, but endowed with extraordinary parts, and reckoned one of the best commanders in the whole empire. Valerian, when he fet out for the east, committed to his care b both his fon Gallienus, and the troops that were left in the western provinces, declaring, that he loved and efteemed Pollhumius above all officers of his army. When he appointed him governor of Gaul, and commander of the troops on the Rhine, he wrote on that occasion a letter to the inhabitants of Gaul, in which he expressed his efteem for Posthumius in the following terms: "You will, I hope, be convinced that " I have particular regard for you, fince I have fet over you fuch a man as Postbu-" mius. He is one whom I esteem above the rest, and think the most worthy of all " to represent the prince. If I am deceived in the opinion I entertain of him, I will " not pretend to know any man t." When Gallienus, upon the news of his father's captivity, and the invasion of the Franks and Alemanni, set out for Italy, he left c his eldest fon Saloninus, named also Valerian, then an infant, at Cologn, under the tuition, fome fay, of Postbumius, and others of Sylvanus, ordering all things to be transacted in his name. Soon after the emperor's departure, Postbumius having deseated fome German nations, who had invaded Gaul, Sylvanus obliged him to fend all the booty to him, and the young prince; which provoked the foldiery to fuch a degree, that they revolted, and proclaimed Posthumius emperor, who marching without loss of time to Cologn, besieged the place, and reduced the inhabitants to such threights, that The fon of Gal- they were forced to deliver up to him both Sylvanus and Saloninus, whom he caused to lienus murder- be immediately put to death. Thus Zosimus 8: but Trebellius Pollio ascribes the revolt, and the death of the young prince, to the Gauls, who hating Gallienus, and not able d to brook the government of a child, stirred up the soldiers to murder him, and proclaim Postbumius emperor h, who was with great joy acknowledged, not only in Gaul, but in Spain and Britain . He reigned seven years, during which time he drove all by Grul, Spain, the Germans out of Gaul, and even built several forts in their country, restored peace and tranquillity to that afflicted province, and governed with fuch equity and moderation, that he was universally adored, and honoured with the titles of The restorer of Gaul, The defender of the emfire; for had he not repulsed the Germans, they would, Gul from the in those distracted times, have over-run with great ease the whole empire k. On several of his medals mention is made of his victories over the Germans, that is, according to Adrianus Valesius, over the Franks; and on some he is styled Germanicus Ma- e ximus a. He had by his wife Junia Donata, perhaps the daughter of Junius Donatus, who was governor of Rome in the year 257, and this year conful, at least one son, styled on the ancient coins C. Junius Cossius Posthumius. The emperor Valerian appointed him tribune of a band or company of Vocontii, that is, of Dauphinois. His father afterwards created him Casar, took him for his partner in the empire, and honoured him with the title of Augustus n. He was thought to have equalled in eloquence Quintilian, whom he studied to imitate; whence his declamations were inserted among those of that excellent writer o; and the nineteen declamations, which pass under the name of Quintilian, but seem not altogether worthy of him, are by some modern critics ascribed to young Posthumius P. Gallienus, tho' greatly f concerned for the death of his fon, whom he immediately caused to be ranked among the gods, did not march in person against the usurper till some years after.

Posthumius and Britain.

eastern provinces.

During these disturbances in the west, Sapor king of Persia, elated with his over-run and late success, over-ran most of the eastern provinces, laid waste Mesopotamia, and plunder all the entering Syria, took Antioch the third, or, at least, the second time, and levelled

> Zos. p. 651. h Trig. tyrann. k Trig. tyrann. vit. ibid. Birag. R Trig. tyrann. 9 BIRAG. p. 382.

a with the ground all the public buildings of that stately metropolis. From Syria, he led his army into Cilicia, took and plundered the city of Tarjus, the capital of that province; and advancing from thence into Cappadocia, made himself master of Cæfarea, and cut all the inhabitants, to the number of four hundred thousand, in pieces, for having opposed him under the conduct of one Demostheres, a man of great resolution and intrepidity, who, after the city was taken, opened himfelf a way, fword in hand, through the midst of the enemy, and made his escaper. Thus the Perfian over-ran all the provinces of the eaft, committing every-where most dreadful ravages. Agathias tells us, that he filled up deep valleys with dead bodies, and took pride in passing over them on horse-back from one hill to another'. To the capb tives, whom he was pleafed to spare, he allowed only what food was barely sufficient to keep them alive, and ordered them to be drvien once a day in herds to water like fo many cattle. In the mean time, the Roman troops, who had difperfed upon the captivity of Valerian, rallying, chose for their leader Calliflus, or rather Balifla, who had been captain of the guards to Valerian, and was a man of great address, intrepidity, and experience in war. He without loss of time transported his forces in boats into Cilicia, and obliged the Persians to raise the siege of Pompeiopolis, a maritime city of that province, when it was upon the point of submitting. From Cilicia he flew with great celerity into Lycaonia, and there made a dreadful havock of Baliffa cuts the Persians, whom he found bussed in plundering the open places, and no-ways upon many of them c their guard. He took from them all their booty and captives, made a great many prisoners, and among the rest the wives of Sapor. From Lycaonia he retired with his booty and captives, before the Persians could draw together their dispersed forces; and embarking his army on the vessels and boats he had assembled, landed some of his men at Sebaste, and others at Corycus, two cities on the coast of Cilicia, and in both places furprised and cut in pieces above three thousand Persians ". Balista was well feconded in his attempts by Odenatus, whose name is famous in the history of Odenatus of these times on account of the many victories he gained over the Persians, and his Paimyra. faving the Roman empire in the east. All authors agree, that he was a native of Palmyra, a city of Phanicia, about one day's journey from the Euphrates; but some d writers call him a citizen and decurion, while others style him prince of that place. Procopius gives him the title of prince of the Saracens, who dwelt in the neighbourhood of the Euphrates, and were allies of the Romans w. Zosimus tells us, that his family had been long before diftinguished with particular marks of honour by the Roman emperors, and that he had troops of his own x. As Palmyra was at this time a Roman colony y, Odenatus was prince, not of that city, but probably of the Saracens, who dwelt in that neighbourhood. As he had been accustomed from his infancy to the manly exercises of hunting, he bore with great chearfulness and alacrity the toils of a military life'. Of his wife Zenobia, we shall have occasion to fpeak hereafter. Odenatus was scarce known till the captivity of Valerian, when, e dreading the power of that mighty conqueror, as he lived in amity with the Romans. he wrote to him a most respectful and submissive letter, protesting, that he had never borne arms against the Persians, and at the same time sent him several camels leaded with rich presents. But Sapor, highly provoked at the arrogance of such an infig-How treated nificant person, as he expressed himself, in presuming to write to him, tore his letter, by Sapor. ordered his presents to be thrown into the river, and, with a threatening voice, told his embaffadors, that he would teach their mafter the respect a man of his mean condition owed to his lord and fovereign; that he would exterminate and utterly destroy him, his whole family and country; adding, that if he came and threw himself • prostrate at his feet, with his hands tied behind his back, he might perhaps by that f submission atone in some degree for his temerity and presumption. Odenatus, resenting, as it became a man of his spirit, this vile treatment, swore he would pursue the Persians to the last with fire and sword, and either bring down the pride of their mighty monarch, or perish in the attempt a. With this view, he immediately declared for the Romans; and joining Balista with all his forces, bore a great, if not He stilles with the chief share, in the above-mentioned exploits; for to him Trebellius Pollio ascribes the Romans, the taking of Sapor's wives b. The Persian, greatly concerned for that loss, and

```
r Zonar. p. 234.
                                        * Agath. l. iv. p. 134.
* Zonar. p. 234.
* Zonar. p. 382.
* Procop. p. 97.
* Zos. p. 651.
* Norts. de epoch. Syromaced.
funn. c. 14.
* Petr. Patr. in excerpt. de legat. p. 29.

* Trig. tyr.
SYNCELL, p. 225. WIRELED, p. 102. * Trig. tyrann. c. 14.
      Vol. VI. Nº 3.
                                                                                               Z z apprehending
```

And gains great advantages over the Pertians.

Olenatus a Tumes the title of king of Palmyra.

and befieges Cteliphon.

The rife of Macrianus.

He is proclaimed emperor.

apprehending it might be attended with others still greater, (for Odenatus and Balista a purfued him close) resolved to retire; and accordingly bent his march towards the Euphrates. But as he was marching through the province of Euphratesiana, at a small distance from Palmyra, Odenatus, falling upon his rear, made a dreadful havock of them, and obliged the rest to repass the Euphrates with great hurry and confusion. Many perished in the river; and Sapor was glad to compound with the Roman garifon in Edessa, which city he had never been able to reduce, for the liberty of returning into his own country, by yielding to them all the Syrian money he had amassed in the plunder of so many cities c. Zonaras writes, that Odenatus found among the Persian captives, and likewise among the dead, many women attired and armed like men 1. After these victories, Odenatus assumed the title of king of Palmyra, which b he likewise gave to his eldest son Herod, as he did that of queen to his wife Zenobia. Gallienus, to reward his eminent services, appointed him commander in chief of all the Roman forces in the east; which trust he discharged with great fidelity, and was attended with better fuccess than any of the Roman generals. For the following year, 261. when Gallienus was conful the fourth time with Petronius Volusianus, Odenatus, not fatisfied with having driven Sapor out of the Roman dominions, entered Mejo viamia, and there recovered the cities of Nisibis and Charra. From Mejopotamia he advanced into the very heart of the Persian dominions, being extremely defirous of crowning his other exploits with the deliverance of Valerian. Sapor met him at the head of a mighty army; whereupon an engagement enfuing, the Per- c Defeats Sapor, fians were utterly defeated, and Sapor with his children obliged to shelter themselves within the walls of Ctesiphon, the metropolis of the Persian dominions. Thither Odenatus pursued them, and laid close siege to the place, after having destroyed with fire and sword the neighbouring country to a great distance. The Persian lords, alarmed at the danger that threatened their prince and country, armed all their vasfals, and slew from the most distant parts of the kingdom to Ctesipbon. Many battles were fought under the walls of that metropolis, which ferved only to increase the number of Odenatus's victories; many Persians of great distinction were taken prisoners, and sent by the conqueror to Gallienus: Sapor on one side, and the brave Odenatus on the other, exerted their utmost efforts, the latter to deliver Valerian, and d the former to avoid the like doom, which now threatened him . But here Trebellius Pollio, after having raifed our expectation, drops at once both Odenatus, and the fiege of Ctefiphon; and giving himself no farther trouble about either, leaves us quite in the dark as to the iffue of fo glorious and important an undertaking. The reader may thence judge of his abilities in the capacity of an historian. All we know for certain is, that Sapor was not taken, nor Valerian rescued from his cruel bondage. Some writers feem to infinuate, that the revolt of Macrianus, which, according to most historians, happened this year, obliged Odenatus to raise the siege of Ciesiphon. Macrianus was of a mean descent; but had by his courage, and experience in war, raifed himself from the low station of a common soldier to the highest e p its in the army. He was exceeding rich, and had married a lady of great diftinction, by whom he had two fons Macrianus and Quietus, who had been raised to the rank of tribunes by Valerian, and were efteemed two of the best officers of the whole army. The father is styled by Dionysius of Alexandria, the chief of the Egyptian magicians 8; whence we conclude him to have been by nation an Egyptian, and greatly addicted to the study of magic. As the abominable mysteries of that art were abhorred, and deservedly cried down by the christians, Macrianus thence became their implacable enemy, and inspired Valerian, with whom he bore great sway, with an irreconcileable hatred to them, which occasioned the eighth persecution, as we have hinted above h. Some authors write, that abusing the confidence Valerian f reposed in him, he betrayed that prince to the Persians; but others clear him from that imputation. Be that as it will, about a year after the captivity of the unhappy emperor, he revolted from his fon; and having gained over Balista, was by his means acknowledged emperor by most of the troops, who had served under Valerian, but despised Gallienus. He immediately took his two sons for his partners in the empire, and appointed Balista his captain of the guards. Trebellius Pollio, of all writers the least exact, to fay no more, does not inform us in what country Macri-

d ZONAR. p. 235. c Petr. Patr. ibid. p. 25. e Vit. Gall. p. 179. Zos. p. 651. 1 Trig. tyrann. p. 174. p. 175. Trig. tyrann. c. 13. EUSEB. l. vii. c. 10. h Idem ibid.

a anus was created emperor, nor where, or how long he reigned; and as to the other historians, Zonaras is the only one among them that takes any notice at all of him. That writer tells us, that the inhabitants of Afia received him with extraordinary marks of joy k. Dionyfius of Alexandria gives us room to think, that he was acknowledged in Egypt; and that his and his fons reign ended before the ninth year of Egypt fubmits Gallienus, that is, before the August of the year 2621. During his usurpation hap- to him. pened, in all likelihood, at Alexandria the diffurbances described by that writer, who was bishop of the place. Fury and discord, says he, raged there to such a degree, Great diffurthat it was more easy to pass from the east to the most remote provinces of the west, bances at Alethan from one place of Alexandria to another: the inhabitants had no intercourse but by letters, which with great difficulty were conveyed from one friend to another:

- b it was more dangerous to cross the street, than the most tempestuous seas, the most dry and inhospitable deserts: the port resembled the shore of the red-lea, strewn with the carcasses of the drowned Egyptians; the sea was dyed with blood, and the Nile choaked up with dead bodies m. The war was attended with a general famine, and the famine by a dreadful plague, which daily swept off great numbers of people, informuch, that there were then in Alexandria fewer inhabitants from the age of fourteen to that of eighty, than there used to be from forty to seventy p. Of such perfons a register, it seems, was kept; and a certain quantity of corn distributed among
- Macrianus no fooner faw himfelf invested with the fovereignty, than he marched with all the forces he could affemble into the eaft, fays Polito, that is, as we conjecture, from Egypt into Syria. He engaged several times, and defeated the Persians; but looked upon P. Valerius Valens as a far more formidable enemy. Valens had been fent by Gallienus into Achaia, or Greece, with the title of proconful; but hearing there, that Macrianus had been proclaimed emperor, he affumed the fame title, Valens pro-Hereupon Macrianus immediately detached Piso, with a competent force, to sup-claimed empepress this new usurper. But Piso, finding him upon his guard, and ready to receive and Piso in him, retired into Thessaly, and there assumed the title of emperor, with the surname Thessaly; but of Thessalicus, as appears from his medals. But he did not long enjoy that empty they are both d and seducing title, being soon after murdered by some soldiers sent by Valens for killed.

that purpose. Valens himself was slain a few days after by his own men; and his death, as well as that of his rival, was known at Rome before the twenty-fifth of June P. Pifo, who was descended from one of the most ancient and illustrious families of Rome, was univerfally lamented there on account of the merits of his anceflors, as well as his own. He had been highly efteemed by the emperors, nay, and by Valens himself, who upon hearing the news of his death, What account, said he, shall I give to the gods, the insernal judges, of the death of Piso? The Roman empire has not a person equal to Piso. Upon the news of his death, it was moved in the The character fenate, that divine honours might be decreed to him as to a lawful prince; nay, of Pifo.

e some writers tell us, that he was actually ranked among the gods with this remarkable elogium, That there never was a better man, nor a man of more firmness and constancy. However that be, he was decreed a statue with a triumphal chariot: the statue was still to be seen in the time of Constantine; but the chariot had been taken down, to make room for the famous baths of Dioclefian, and was never after fet up again 1. About the same time that Macrianus usurped the empire in the east, Manius Acilius Aureolus was forced by the army, which he commanded in Illyricum, Aureolus made to take upon him the fovereignty; for the foldiers every-where abhorred Gallienus, emperor in and would only obey emperors fet up by themselves. Aureolus from Illyricum marched into Italy, and made himself master of Milant. Gallienus, after various unsuccessful f attempts to suppress him, was in the end obliged to come to an accommodation with him, and accept of his affiftance against Posthumius, as we shall relate hereafter. He was, according to Zonaras, a native of Dacia, of a mean descent, and in his youth a shepherd; but listing himself afterwards in the army, he was soon raised from the rank of a common foldier to the command of a body of horse. He distinguished himself in a very eminent manner under Gallienus, in the battle against Inge-nuus; for some authors ascribe to him the whole glory of that victory. This year

```
1 Euses. l. vii. c. 23.
  k ZONAR. p. 236.
                    ° Birag, p. 388. P. T.
C. 10. p. 189. Vict. epit.
```

m Idem ibid. c. 21. " Idem ibid. 9 Trig. tyr. vit. c. 20. p. 194. r Idem. Scythians.

Bithynia plun- 261, the Scythians breaking anew into Bithynia, laid waste the whole country a second a time, levelled with the ground feveral cities, plundered Nicomedia, and returned unmolested into their own country with a great booty, and many captives i. At the same time, that no part of the empire might be exempt from some signal calamity, the island of Sicily, less exposed than other countries to the ravages of the barbarians, was milerably haraffed by a band of robbers, who roving up and down, committed dreadful devastations, and kindled a kind of fervile war, which was not suppressed without much difficulty and bloodshed k. The following year, Gallienus being conful the fifth time with Faustianus, the empire was in many places afflicted by other calamities, befides the wars and commotions we have mentioned. The fun was overcast with thick clouds, and a great darkness continued for several days b together, attended with a violent earthquake, and dreadful claps of thunder, not in

The empire afflicted with a plague, famise, earthquakes, &c.

Hoo plunder the temple of Diana as Ephe-

the air, but in the bowels of the earth, which opened in many places, and fwallowed up great numbers of people, with their habitations. The fea, fwelling beyond measure, broke in upon the continent, and drowned whole cities; the plague raged with great violence in Greece, Egypt, and especially at Rome, where it swept off for fome time five thousand persons a day. The books of the Sibyls were consulted, public processions ordained, facrifices offered to Jupiter the author of health, &c. But all to no purpose; nay, to their other calamities were added the incursions of New irruptions the Goths in great swarms into Greece, and of the Scythians into Asia. The former of the Stythi- having made themselves masters of Thrace, over-ran all Macedon, and laid siege to C Theffulonica, the capital of that province, which threw all Greece into the utmost confidential continuity troops were dispatched to guard the streights of Thermopyla, so famous in hillory; the Athenians rebuilt their walls, which had lain in ruins ever fince the time of Sylla; the inhabitants of Peloponnesus shut up the ishmus from sea to sea; new levies were made; the troops quartered in that province drawn together, &c. But, in the mean time, Macrianus arriving in Greece on his march into Italy, fell upon the barbarians while they were attempting to enter Achaia, put them to flight, and obliged them to retire into their own country, whither they carried however great part of their booty 1. At the same time the Scythians, that is, another party of Golbs, croffing the Hellespont under the conduct of one Raspa, committed dreadful d ravages in Afia, burnt feveral cities there, and plundered the celebrated temple of Diana at Ephefus, fo much respected by the pagans, and so famous for its rich ornaments, and immense wealth m. Thus was the destruction of the most illustrious monuments of paganism begun by the Goths, who were themselves pagans; and we shall see them in the two following centuries complete what they now begin. In this irruption they ruined the city of Chalcedon, destroyed the poor remains of ancient Troy, and the famous Ilium; and repassing the Hellescont, laid waste all Thrace, and returned to their own country with an immense booty n.

In the mean time, Macrianus having fettled the affairs of Syria, left there his younger fon Quietus, with Balista, to guard that province against the Persians; and e fet out for Italy, with his eldest fon Macrianus, at the head of forty-five thousand men, to try his fortune against Aureolus in Illyricum, and Gallienus at Rome. He was met by the forces of the former either in Illyricum, or on the borders of Thrace; Micrianus and whereupon a battle enfued, in which Macrianus and his fon being killed, their whole army submitted to Aureolus, and were incorporated in his troops of. The news of defeated and their defeat and death was no fooner heard in the east, than most cities there revolted from Quietus, who thereupon that himself up with Balista in the city of Emesa, whither Aureolus, to complete his victory, fent ruffians to dispatch him. But before their arrival, Odenatus had befreged the place; which fo terrified the inhabitants, and the garifon, that they killed Quietus, threw his head over the walls, and then I fubmitted to Odenatus. Macrianus and his children being thus cut off, Gallienus was acknowledged anew in Egypt and Syria; for Odenatus, tho' master of almost all the eastern provinces, acted, or at least pretended to act, in his name P. He had no fooner withdrawn his troops from before Emefa, than Balista, whom he had Bilifia affumes spared on account of his advising the inhabitants to murder Quietus, assumed the the title of em- title of emperor, and put such numbers of the citizens of Emeja to the sword, no olus.

f Gall. vit. p. 177. " JORNAND. ibid. k Idem ibid. P Gall. vit. p. 179. Trig. tyran. c. 14.

<sup>1</sup> Idem ibid. m Idem, p. 177, 178. JORNAND. rer. . ZONAR. p. 236. Trig. tyran. c. 10. Gall. vit. p. 176.

a doubt for refusing to acknowledge him, that the unhappy city was almost turned into a defert 4. We shall have occasion to speak of him hereaster; for he seems to have reigned at Emesa three years. About the same time Emilianus, styled on the ancient medals Tiberius Cestius Alexander Amilianus, commander of the legions And likewise in Egypt, took upon him the title of emperor, hoping, by thus openly revolting Emilianus. from Gallienus, who was no lefs abhorred in Egypt than in the other provinces, to appeale the populace of Alexandria, who had rifen upon a very trifling occasion, and invested the house where Æmilianus lodged, threatening him with present death, He no fooner proclaimed himself emperor, in opposition to Gallienus, than the rage of the incenfed multitude affwaged, and the whole city of Alexandria, with loud b acclamations, acknowledged him for their fovereign. He immediately feized all the corn in the public granaries, and by that means occasioned a famine in several provinces. He visited in person the most distant parts of  $E_{2y/t}$ , redressed many grievances, repulfed with great vigour the neighbouring barbarians, which procured him the name of Alexander, and was preparing for an expedition into India, when the troops fent against him by Gallienus arrived in Egypt f, as we shall relate hereafter. This year Gallienus, agreeing with Aureolus, marched into Gaul with him and Claudius, who fucceeded him in the empire, to make war upon Polithumius, who Gallenus had reigned three years undisturbed. As Postbumius was greatly beloved, and vigo-makes man rousily supported by the Gauls, the war lasted some years. Gallienus was defeated uson Posthumus in the first general engagement of this year, and Posthumius in the second, after having lost the flower of his troops. But Aureolus, who was fent to pursue him, having fuffered him to escape when he might have easily taken him, he levied new forces, and began the war with fresh vigour 8. Gallienus however, quitting Gaul the following year, when Albinus and Dexter were confuls, returned to Rome, and from thence hastened into the east, where he wreaked his rage on the city of Byzantium; The Byzanbut upon what provocation, Trebellius Pollio, who describes the miserable condition times stangelto which that place was reduced, has not thought proper to acquaint us. All we tered by Gallienus. know is, that Gallienus, as foon as he appeared before it, loft all hopes of ever being able to master it; but being nevertheless admitted, the day after his arrival, d within the gates, upon terms, without any regard to the agreement, he caused the garison, and all the inhabitants, to be put to the sword. Not one person, says Trebellius Pollio, was left alive in the place ". Vorburgius ascribes this slaughter to the foldiers of Gallienus; and pretends, that the emperor left Gaul, and halfened into the east, on purpose to revenge the saughter of the Byzantines, and punish the cruelty of the foldiers. From Byzantium, Gallienus returned to Rome, where he celebrated the tenth year of his reign with extraordinary pomp, and a kind of triumph, in which were led mock-captives, dressed like Gotbs, Sarmatians, Franks, and Perfians. During this shew, some persons of humour, mixing with those who personated the Persians, viewed with great attention their faces, examined their e drefs, and feemed to betray great furprize. Being in the end afked, what they wanted? We are looking, faid they, for the emjeror's father; which so incensed Gallienus, that he commanded them immediately to be burnt alivek. This year a new tyrant saturnings flarted up, by name P. Sempronius Saturninus. He was a man of great parts, and affirmes the renowned for his victories over the barbarians. History does not inform us where title of empeor how long he reigned; but only tells us, that he performed great things while murdered by he was emperor, and was, on account of his feverity, put to death by the fame his foldiers. foldiers who had raifed him to the empire. When he was first proclaimed emperor by the troops under his command, he told them, that they had loft a good captain, and made a bad prince. Towards the end of the year, Theodotus, a native of Egypt, f dispatched by Gallienus against Æmilianus, who reigned in that country, overcame him in a pitched battle, took him prisoner, and fent him to Rome; where he was, by Æmilianus the emperor's orders, strangled in prison, according to the ancient custom of putting defeated, taken captive princes to death. The emperor, to reward Theodotus, designed to make and strangled, Egypt a proconfular province, and honour him with that proconfulship; but was diverted from it by the priests alledging a prediction, which had prevailed even in Cicero's time, viz. that Egypt would recover its ancient liberty, when the fasces appeared there m. The faices were carried, as is well known, before the proconfuls.

d Gall. vit. p. 176. g Gall. vit. p. 178. Zon. p. 236. k Gall. vit. p. 179. Trig. GOLTZ p. 115. f Trig. tyr. c. 21.
VORB, hift. Rom. Germanic. p. 539. f Trig. tyr. c. 21. h Gail. vit. p. 178, 179.

VORB. hift. Rom. Ger. vit. c. 22, p. 196.

m Idem ibid. c. 21, p. 195. k Gall. vit. p. 179. Vol. VI. No 3. Α¢ sieged and taken.

Bruchium be- At this time happened, as we conjecture, the siege of Bruchium, described by Euse- a bius; Emilianus himself, or his partizans, having probably taken shelter there after the battle. Bruchium, or, as Eusebius styles it, Pyruchium, was a quarter of the city of Alexandria near the sea, on the side of the Pharos, and, as it were, the citadel of that metropolis. There stood the royal palace, the place where the Egy tian sen e or council met, the public granaries, the museum, and the celebrated library of the Egyptian kings, containing once feven hundred thousand volumes, of which four hundred thousand were burnt in Julius Casar's time. The Roman army, under the command of Theodotus, having taken the rest of the city, laid siege to this quarter, and in the end reduced it by famine". This year the Scythians made a new irruption into Asia, but were with great flaughter driven back into their own country b

Gallienus de-

Balista murdered.

into Gaul.

Posthumius takes Victori nus for his partner.

The Isaurians rewolt.

Celsus made emberor in Africa, and foon after mur dered.

by the Roman forces quartered in that province o. THE next confuls were Gallienus the fixth time, and Saturninus. This year Gallitus his parener nus, by the advice of his brother Valerian, and his kinsman Lucillus, to reward the in the empire. brave Odenatus for the many victories he had gained over the Persians, took him for his partner in the empire, honoured him with the titles of Cafar, Augustus, and emperor, and all the badges of fovereignty, and caused money to be coined with his name, on which he was represented leading the Persians captive. The title of Augusta was given to his wife, and that of Casar to his children P. This action of Gallienus was highly applauded by the fenate, by the people of Rome, and the whole empire; for to his valour was intirely owing the prefervation of the eastern provinces, c over-run and forely haraffed by the Persians. This year, 264. Balista, who had held some provinces in the east ever fince the death of Macrianus, and his children, was at last killed, according to the most probable opinion, by a foldier fent by Gallienus goes Odenatus for that purpose q. Gallienus, in the spring of this year, left Rome, and marched a fecond time in person against Posthumius, who still reigned in Gaul. At his approach, Postbumius withdrew into a strong hold, which the emperor immediately invested, but soon after raised the siege, having received a wound in the back with an arrow while he was viewing the walls. On feveral medals of this year, notice is taken of a victory gained by Gallienus in Gaul, and he is styled the restorer of that province'. However Postbumius still maintained himself in possession of d great part of that country; and this year being hard pressed by Gallienus, he chose for his collegue M. Aurelius Piauvonius Victorinus, as he is styled on the ancient coins, of whom we read the following character in Julius Aterianus, a writer of those times: No one, in my opinion, ought to be preferred to Victorinus, who reigned fome time in Gaul; he equalled Trajan in bravery, Antoninus in clemency, Nerva in gravity, Vespasian in managing the public money, and Pertinax and Severus in his care of the military discipline: but his unbridled lust drowned all his good qualities, and cast fuch a blemish upon his reputation, that no one dares to record the virtues of a man, whom all own to have deserved the doom which in the end overtook him'. Of this doom we shall speak in its proper place. The next year, Valerian, the empe-e ror's brother, and Lucillus, his kinfman, being confuls, the Isaurians, revolting in Asia Minor, chose for their leader C. Annius Trebellianus, who took upon him the title of Augustus, caused money to be coined with his name, and reigned some time in Isauria and Cilicia; but was in the end drawn by Causifoleus, the brother of Theodotus, from among the rocks and mountains, where he had taken refuge, into a plain, and there defeated and killed. The Isaurians ranked him after his death among the gods; and refusing to submit to Gallienus, whose cruelty they dreaded, maintained themselves a free people in the very heart of the Roman empire, at least till the time of the emperor Conftantine, and committed dreadful ravages in Afia. Minor and Syria ". While Gaul, Pontus, Thrace, and Illyricum, were held either by f a domestic or foreign enemy, Africa too had its tyrant, viz. T. Cornelius Celjus, set up by Vibius Passienus, proconsul of Africa, and Fabius Pomponianus, who commanded on the frontiers of Libya. He was but a tribune, and led at that time a retired life in the country. A lady, by name Galliena, nearly related to the emperor, bore a great share in this revolt. Celsus was a man of great integrity, and worthy of the rank to which he was raised; but he held it a short time, being killed the seventh day after his election. The inhabitants of Sicca, who had continued faithful to Gal-

n Eusen. l. vii. c. 31. p. 285. P Gall. vit. p. 179. Gol. Tz. p. 115. o Gall. vit. p. 178. Trig. tyrann. vit. c. 17. p. 193. Gall. vit c. 5. p. 186, 187. Idem, c. 25. p. 198. r Gall. vit. p. 177. * BIRAG. p. 376, 377. Trig. tyrann.

a lienus, threw his body to the dogs, and crucified him in effigie, which, as our historian observes, had never been practifed before . Among the other misfortunes of this unhappy reign, we may reckon the loss of all the conquests of Trajan, that is, of the whole province of Dacia, seized by the Goths, and other northern nations; and the dreadful ravages committed by the Franks in Spain. Victor is of opinion, Spain planthat they entered that province on the side of Gaul P; but Adrianus Valesius proves, dered by the from the panegyric of Nazarius on Constantine, that they conveyed themselves thither Franks. by sea 9. Be that as it will, all authors agree, that they entered Spain, ravaged the country far and wide, and took by storm, plundered, and almost utterly destroyed, the city of Tarraco, which, for the space of a hundred and fifty years, b bore the marks of what it suffered at this time. Some of the Franks from Spain croffed over into Africa'; but what was the iffue of that rash undertaking, we are no-where told.

THE following year, Gallienus being consul the seventh time, with Sabinillus, the brave Odenatus, entering the Persian territories, put all there to fire and sword, over-Odenatus came Sapor in several battles, besieged a second time, and, according to Syncellus, gains great made himself master of Ctesiphon. But in the mean time the Goths entering Asia advantages over the Perby the Euxine sea, over-ran Lydia, Bithynia, Phrygia, Troas, Cappadocia, and Gala-sians. tia, laying waste the country, plundering the towns, and carrying off an immense booty, and an incredible number of captives. The next year, Paternus and Arcec filaus being consuls, Odenatus, leaving Ctesiphon, hastened back to the relief of Asia; but the Goths, not thinking it adviseable to wait his arrival, reimbarqued at Heraclea in Pontus, and returned home, loaded with booty. Many of them however were drowned, being overtaken in the Euxine sea by the Roman sleet. All authors agree, that Odenatus was killed about this time, but differ both as to the place and manner He is murof his death. According to Syncellus, he was killed at Heraclean; according to dered. Zosimus, at Emesa w. Trebellius Pollio writes, that he was murdered by one Mæonius, his cousin, who was proclaimed emperor in his room, but soon after put to death. Syncellus ascribes his death to another Odenatus, who was himself murdered by the guards . Some writers suppose Zenobia herself to have assisted the conspirators underd hand, being provoked against her husband for preferring his eldest son Herod, by a former wife, to the children he had by her v. It is certain, that Herod was killed with his father, who, according to some writers, had taken him for his partner.

Such was the end of Odenatus, deservedly ranked by historians among the greatest princes that ever reigned in the east. God, says Trebellius Pollio, was angry with the Romans, since he took Valerian from them, and did not long preserve Odenatus 2. He had begun, as appears from some medals a, the fourth year of his reign. He left behind him three fons by Zenobia, Herennianus, Timolaus, and Vabalath, or, as he is styled on some medals, Hermias Vhaballat b. As they were very young at the time of their father's death, Zenobia governed in their name with the title of queen of the His wife Zenoe east, arrayed them with purple robes, and other enfigns of the imperial dignity; and bia governs in in that attire, presented them, after the death of their father, to the armies, and the the name of the presented them, after the death of their father, to the armies, and the the name of the presented them. affemblies of the people c. It is uncertain whether they were put to death by Aurelian, or died before d. From their medals it appears, that Herennianus reigned at least two years, Timolaus three, and Vhaballat seven . Zenobia did not, it seems, tread in the footsteps of her busband, and keep up, as he had done, a good understanding with Galienus. For we find, that Heraclianus, whom the emperor, upon the news of the death of Odenatus, had fent into the east to make war upon the Perfians, was this very year defeated by Zenobia, and obliged to return to Rome. Towards the end of the year, one L. Ælianus assumed the title of emperor at Mentz; f but was foon overcome by Posthumius, who reduced the rebellious city, but would not give it up to be plundered by his foldiers, who thereupon mutinied, and, transported with rage, murdered their brave leader, with young Posthumius, his son. Posthumius Trebellius Pollio ascribes his death to Lollianus, who had revolted from him and mardered in caused himself to be proclaimed emperor. Lollianus, styled on the ancient coins Gaul, and Lollianus Spurius Servilius Lollianus, was meanly born, but had raised himself in the army declared emis-

O Idem, c. 28. p. 198. P Aur. Vict. in Gall.

1. vii. p. 223. Hier. chron. Eutrop. Vict.

SYNCELL p. 382. W Zos. p. 651. Trig. tyr. c. 14, 16. SYNCELL. p. 382. Y Trig. tyrann. c. 16. p. 193. Idem, c. 14. p. 192. Goltz. p. 115. Idem, p. 116. Birag. p. 386.

Trig. tyrann. c. 26. p. 192. Idem ibid. Goltz. p. 116. Idem, p. 117.

Victorinus and his fon murdered.

ed emperor, raised to the empire in his F00773.

by his gallant conduct. He reigned in that part of Gaul which bordered on the a Rhine, while Victoriaus, whom Postbumius had taken for his partner, held the rest. But he did not long enjoy the fovereignty, being murdered on account of his feverity by his own foldiers, flirred up by Victorinus, who, upon his death, became fole mafter of all Gaul, but was foon after mortally wounded at Cologn, by one whose wife he had debauched. Before he died, he named his fon L. Aurelius Victorinus his fucceffor, tho' then an infant. But the Gauls, not able to brook the government Marius declar- of a child, murdered him, and fit up in his room one M. Aurelius Marius, originally an armourer, but a man of great valour, and extraordinary strength. He was and murdered; killed the third day of his reign by a foldier, who had formerly worked under him. The affaffin ran him through with his fword, telling him, that it was of his own b making 8. Upon his death, the troops in Gaul proclaimed P. Pivefus or Petuvius Tetricus emperor. He was a Roman senator, had been conful, and was at this time governor of Aquitaine. He was acknowledged in Spain and Britain, as well as in Gaul, and held those provinces with the title of emperor till the fourth year of Aurelian's reign, when he was taken and led in triumph by that prince h, as we shall relate hereafter. He immediately conferred the title of Cæsar upon his son C. Pacuvius Pivejus Tetricus, who was then but an infant. All these usurpers in Gaul, viz. Posthumius, Lodianus, Victorinus, Marius, and Tetricus, were fet up by Victorina, or Victoria, the mother of Victorinus, who had a great interest in Gaul, and bore an irreconcileable hatred to Gallienus. She was honoured, probably by her son Victo- c rinus, with the titles of Augusta, and The mother of the armies. As she was a woman of masculine courage, and possessed of immense wealth, which she liberally distributed among the foldiers, she gave the empire of Gaul to whom she pleased, and bore under all the usurpers, who were but her creatures, an absolute sway. She died during the usurpation of Tetricus; but whether a natural or violent death, is uncertain; for fome writers feem to infinuate, that she was privately dispatched by his orders '. THE same year the Scythians, that is the Goths, ravaged anew the provinces of

The irruptions of the Goths. And the Heruli.

Alia, Bithynia, Pontus, and Cappadocia, and thence carried back with them an immense booty; while the Heruli, passing from the Palus Maotis into the Euxine sea d with five hundred veffels, landed at Byzantium, and Chrysopolis, now Scutari, under the conduct of one Naulobat. At the latter place they were attacked and defeated by Venerianus, who was himfelf killed in the engagement. Notwithstanding their defeat, instead of returning to their own country, they crossed the Bosporus; and fteering their course towards Cyzicus, surprised and plundered that great and wealthy city, with part of Afia, and the islands of Lemnos and Scyros in the Architelago. Then they failed towards Greece; and landing there, befreged and burnt Albens, Corinth, Sparta, and Argos, and laid waste all Achaia; but were in the end attacked and defeated with great flaughter by the Athenians, under the conduct of Dexippus the historian. However, in their retreat, they committed dreadful devastations in e Baotia, Acarnania, Efirus, and Thrace k. Gallienus, who was just then returned from Gaul, where he had been making war upon Lollianus, leaving Aureolus at Milan, hastened into Illyricum; and coming unexpectedly upon the barbarians there, gave them a total overthrow. Naulobat, their leader, was obliged to yield himfelf to the emperor's mercy, who treated him with great humanity; and, to gain the affections of the barbarians, even honoured him either with the confulfhip, or the confular ornaments 1. Aurelius Victor, Eutropius, St. Jerom, Orofius, and Trebellius Pollio, fpeak of a great victory gained by Gallienus in Illyricum over the Goths, meaning no doubt the Heruli; for all the northern nations are by some writers styled Goths, by others Scythians. After this victory, Gallienus hastened back to Italy, leaving f Marcianus in Illyricum, to pursue the war with the Heruli; which he did with no less courage than success, cutting off great numbers of them, and obliging the rest to quit their booty, and abandon the Roman dominions. The revolt of Aureolus was what obliged Gallienus to return in great haste to Italy. For Aureolus, not fatisfied with the power which he already enjoyed, took advantage of Gallienus's absence to march with all the troops under his command towards Rome, with a defign to depose Gallienus, and cause himself to be proclaimed sole emperor; for Wo are deteated by Gallienas.

ŧ

g Trig. tyrann. c. 7. p. 187. h Idem ibid. c. 23. p. 196. l Idem, c. 30. p. 184. Syncell. p. 382. Zos. p. 651. l Gill. vit. p. 181. Syncell. ibid. 1 Idem, c. 30. p. 200. k Gall. vit. p. 184. SYNCELL. p. 382. Zoc. p. 651. p. 208. Gall. vit. ibid. m Claud. vit.

a some writers tell us, that Gallienus had already taken him for his partner in the em- War between pire; while others style him only the emperor's general. Gallienus, hearing of his Aureolus and Gallienus. march, and suspecting his design, lest Illyricum, and reaching Italy in a few days, came up with him, defeated him in a pitched battle, and obliged him to shelter himfelf within the walls of Milan; which city Gallienus immediately invested. This happened in the beginning of the year 268, the fifteenth of Gallienus's reign, when Paternus was conful the second time with Marinianus. All authors agree, that Gallienus was killed during this siege, but differ both as to the manner and authors Gallienus murof his death. The most probable opinion is, that Marcianus, who was returned dered. from Illyricum, Heraclianus, and Cecrops, a native of Mauritania, and commander of b the Dalmatian cavalry, no longer able to bear his tyrannical government, conspired against him, and alayming the camp in the dead of the night, as if Aureolus were fallying out with all his forces, killed him in the dark, with his fon Gallienus, and his two brothers, Valerian and Egnatius. The foldiers, hearing the emperor was dead, and suspecting he had been murdered, began to mutiny; but Marcianus distributing large sums among them, twenty pieces of gold a man, (for Gallienus always carried immense treasures with him) the mutiny was appeased, and the whole army declared Gallienus a tyrant, and took the usual oaths to Claudius, whom the conspirators proposed to them as the best qualified man in the whole empire to sustain the name and dignity of a Roman emperor . Such was the end of Gallienus, in the thirty-fifth year of his age, according to the most probable opinion, after he had reigned fifteen years, seven before, and eight after the captivity of his father Valerian. The senate declared him a public enemy, ordered most of his friends, ministers and And most of relations to be thrown down headlong from the Tarpeian rock, and caused his name his ministers to be erazed out of all public inscriptions. He was one of the most wicked princes condemned by mentioned in history, and is said to have equalled Nero in cruelty, and Heliogabalus the senate. in lewdness. He passed his whole time in the company of the most infamous prostitutes in Rome, and laying aside all care and thought of the public, suffered the Roman dominions to be over-run by the barbarians, and the empire to be rent in pieces by the many usurpers who started up in his time, shewing no more concern for & the loss of a province, to use the expression of Trebellius Pollio, than for that of an old garment. He exerted his cruelty chiefly against the soldiers, of whom he is said to have sometimes ordered three or sour thousand to be put to death in one day. He excluded all senators from military employments, and would not even suffer any of that illustrious body to appear in the camp, or among the foldiers. Notwithstanding all his vices, he was a great encourager of learning, being himfelf well versed in all the branches of polite literature, especially in oratory and poetry. His historian tells us, that on occasion of the marriage of his brother's fon, he made an extemporary epithalamium, which far excelled those that were written at the same time, after many days study, by the best Greek and Latin poets then in Rome P. After his death, Claue dius caused him, though universally abhorred both by the senate and people, to be Gallienus gedeified with the usual ceremonies. His body was in all likelihood conveyed by Clau-nerally apprordius's orders to Rome; for Ammianus Marcellinus speaks of his tomb on the Appian way, about nine miles from the city 4. Of the few writers who flourished under him, n Gall, vit. p. 181. o Idem ibid.

we shall speak in our note (Y).

P Idem, p. 180.

9 Ammian. p. 472.

(Y) Palfurius Sura wrote the hiltory of the reign of Gallienus (65); and this is an we amount of Galeftinus, and Maonius Aflyanax, quoted by fome all flourished under Gallienus; for of the transactions of his reign they speak as of things happening in their time (66). Vossus ranks them among the Lasin historians (67). Suidas mentions one Ephorius of Cama, who wrote the history of Galenus, or rather, as others read, Gallienus, in twenty-seven books (68). Vosfius places him among the Greek historians, and takes him to have been a native of Cuma in Afia (69). He wrote other histories; but none of them have reached us (70). Trebellins Pollio quotes a passage out of one Julius Aterianus, much to the credit and reputation of Victorinus, who usurped the empire in Gaul (71). The same writer quotes another passage out of one Gallus Antipater, who wrote the history of Aureolus, and probably of the other tyrants: but he feems to have entertained a very bad opinion of him; for he calls him a flave to bonours, and the diffrace of historians, though the passage he quotes, does not, in our opinion, deserve such a severe cen-sure (72). Under Gallients flourished likewise Lufure (72). Under Gallients flourished likewise Lu-percus of Beryins, a celebrated grammarian, who wrote several grammatical pieces, and was in many things preferred to Herodian (73).

(65) Gall. vis. p. 183. (66) Valer. vis. p. 175. Trigins. syrann. c. 11. p. 190. hift. Lat. p. 182. (68) Suid. p. 1111. (69) Voss. hist. Grac. l. ii. c. 16. p. 240. l. i. c. 7. p. 37. (71) Trigins. syrann. c. 5. p. 187. (72) Claud. vis. p. 203. (Voss. bist. Grac. l. ii. c. 16. p. 240. Voss. Voss. Voss. Voss. No. 23. Bbb (67) Voff. (73) Suid. p. 58. A٩ claimed empe-

His extraction and preferments.

As foon as the tumult occasioned by the death of Gallienus was appealed, the a Claudius pro- foldiers, with loud acclamations, proclaimed Claudius emperor. The news of what had happened at Milan reaching Rome on the twenty-fourth of March, the senate immediately affembled; and the letter which Claudius wrote to them being publicly read, they unanimously confirmed the election of the army, proclaimed Claudius emperor, and heaped upon him all the honours which had ever been conferred upon any prince, repeating forty times, That they had always wished to have Claudius, or such a person as Claudius, for emperor. He was a native of Illyricum, born, according to some, in Dardania, according to others, in Dalmatia. Of his father and ancestors, Trebellius Pollio owns, that he knows but very little, though, faster his accession to the empire, some slattering genealogists pretended to derive his pedigree b from Dardanus and the Trojans s. On most medals he is styled M. Aurelius Claudius . He had no children, but two brothers, Quintillus, who succeeded him, and Crispus, the father of Claudia, who married Eutropius, and had by him Constantius, the father of Constantine the Great. The name of Constantine was, it seems, peculiar to the family of Claudius; for one of his fifters was called Constantina, a name hitherto never mentioned in history. The present emperor is by all writers, even by Zosimus, an avowed enemy to Constantine, cried up as one of the best princes that ever swayed a sceptre. He was highly esteemed by the emperor Valerian, who first gave him the command of the fifth legion, and afterwards, at the request of the senate, appointed him general of all the troops in Illyricum, which comprehended Thrace, c Masia, Dalmatia, Pannonia, and Dacia. The same emperor designed to raise him to the consulship, and give him the command of the prætorian guards. Gallienus stood in great awe of him; and being informed, that Claudius disapproved of his conduct, he did all that lay in his power to attach him to his interest, sent him rich presents, and wrote to one Venustus, his particular friend, charging him by all means to gain Claudius, and remove from him all jealousies and suspicions a. In his letter he flyled Claudius his friend and kinsman. Claudius attended him in his wars against Postbumius in Gaul, and the Heruli in Illyricum, and was fent by him, after the revolt of Aureolus, to defend the city of Ticinum or Pavia. But in the mean time Gallienus being killed, he was, though, according to some writers, not privy to the conspi-racy, proclaimed emperor w. His election was no sooner confirmed by the senate, than he attacked Aureolus, encamped at a small distance from Milan, utterly descated the troops under his command, and took the usurper himself prisoner. He designed to grant him his life; but the foldiers killed him without his orders. The emperor raised a monument to his memory, caused his body to be honourably interred, and ordered a bridge to be built over the Adda, at the place where he had been killed; which, from his name, he called Pons Aureoli, The bridge of Aureolus; whence the present village of Pontirolo on the Adda, between Milan and Bergamo, in all likelihood, took its name x. After the death of Aureolus, the troops that had served under him acknowledged Claudius, who, without loss of time, led them and the rest of his & army against the Germans, who had broken into Italy, and were advanced as far as the lake Benacus, now Lago di Garda, near Verona. There the emperor deseated them in a pitched battle, cut incredible numbers of them in pieces, obliged those who outlived the general flaughter to fave themselves by a precipitous flight into their own country, and returning to Rome, where he was received with the greatest demonstrations of joy imaginable, passed the remaining part of the year in settling affairs there; which he did with great prudence and justice, redressing all grievances, and suppresfing the many abuses and disorders which had prevailed in the late reign.

The Germans defeated by Claudius.

Aureolus defeated and killed.

He marches against the Goths, and other northern mations.

In the beginning of the following year he entered upon his second consulship, having Paternus for his collegue, and foon after fet out from Rome, to make head f against the Goths and other northern nations, who, to the number of three hundred and twenty thousand fighting men, besides women, servants and children, had invaded the Roman dominions, and committed every-where most dreadful ravages, laying waste whole provinces, burning cities, and putting all to fire and sword. The emperor came up with them, as they were retiring, loaded with booty, through Upper Masia. As he was upon the point of engaging them, he wrote with his own hand the following letter to the fenate: "I am, conscript fathers, in fight of the r Claud. vit. p. 203. * GOLTZ. p. 117. BIRAG. p. 402. Claud. vit. w ldem, p. 203. p. 207.

&quot; enemy,

a " enemy, and ready to engage them: they are three hundred and twenty thousand " ftrong. If I overcome them, you will not, I hope, be ungrateful. If I should of not be attended with success, you will remember, that I fight after the reign of Gallienus. The whole empire is quite spent and exhausted, partly by him, and partly by the many tyrants, who, during his reign, usurped the sovereignty, and laid waste our provinces. We want even shields, swords, and spears. The provinces of Gaul and Spain, the main strength of the empire, are in the hands of 66 Tetricus. Our archers, to our great shame, are with held from us by Zenobia. Whatever therefore we perform successfully in our present circumstances, must be accounted great." But, notwithstanding these disadvantages, Claudius advanced And gains a b boldly against the barbarians, and, after a long and obstinate dispute, gained one vidtory over of the greatest victories mentioned in history; for no fewer than three hundred thou-them. fand of the enemy were killed or taken prisoners. The emperor himself gave the following account of this memorable victory, in a letter, which he wrote after the battle to Junius Brocchus, governor of Illyricum: " We have utterly defeated an " army of three hundred and twenty thouland Goths, and destroyed their fleet, " consisting of two thousand sail. The fields and shores are covered with swords, 66 shields, and dead bodies. We have taken such numbers of captives, that, not to mention the men, two or three women will fall to the share of each soldier in our victorious army ... Among the prisoners were many princes, and persons c of great distinction. All the provinces of the empire were filled with captives, who were employed to till the ground, and every city could shew you, says Pollio, glorious monuments of the fortune and courage of the brave and invincible Claudius y. For this victory the emperor took the surname of Gothicus 2. While Claudius was thus employed against the barbarians, Zenobia, having overcome Probus, who com- Zenobia redni manded some troops in Egypt, reduced that province, and, after a long siege, took ces Egypt. and utterly destroyed Bruchium, the citadel of Alexandria. Probus, finding he could not by any other means escape falling into the hands of the victorious queen, dispatched himself with his own sword. The following year, when Antiochianus and Orphitus were consuls, the emperor, having nothing to sear from the barbarians, d resolved to march against Zenobia, who held all the provinces in the east; but was prevented by a violent plague which broke out in his army, and made a dreadful havock of his men. The emperor himself was in the end seized, and carried off by The death of the raging distemper at Sirmium in Pannonia, in the fifty-sixth year of his age, after Claudius. he had reigned, according to the most probable opinion, two years and one month b. In him centred, says Trebellius Pollio, the moderation of Augustus, the valour of Trajan, the piety of Antoninus, and all the virtues of the good princes who had reigned before him . He may be truly faid to have re-established, during his short, but glorious reign, the tottering empire, and to have restored it to its former lustre.

The senate not only bestowed divine honours upon him after his death, but hung up Extraordinary in the place where they affembled, a shield of gold, on which was engraved his honours con image. This shield was still to be seen in the reign of Constantine the Great. The ferred on him people erected to him at their own expence two statues, one of gold ten foot high, and people of which they placed by that of Jupiter in the capitol, and another of filver in the Rome. forum, weighing fifteen hundred pounds, and representing the emperor in his triumphal robes d. Claudius, and not Gallienus, as Spanhemius pretends e, was the last emperor, who assumed on his medals the titles of bigb pontiff and tribune of the people f. Upon the death of Claudius, the senate and people of Rome proclaimed his brother His brother Quintillus emperor, who was then at Aquileia, in which city he was murdered by his Quintillus profoldiers, after a short reign of seventeen days, for attempting to restore with too claimed emperor; but dies f much severity the discipline of the primitive times. Thus Trebellius Pollio 8. But soon after. Zosimus, and Zonaras, tell us, that Quintillus, hearing Aurelian had been acknowledged emperor by the army in Pannonia, and finding his own troops ready to revolt; by the advice of his friends, caused his veins to be opened, and by that means put an end to his life and reign. Most writers speak of him as one in every respect equal to his brother. Upon his death, the senate readily confirmed the election of Aurelian raised Aurelian, and honoured him with the title of Augustus. He was, according to most to the empire.

His extraction writers, a native of Sirmium in Pannonia, of a mean descent, but universally admired a and preferments.

Concludes a

Goths.

nations;

and put the emperor to flight:

beace with the

He defeats se-

on account of his extraordinary strength and courage. He had distinguished himfelf in a very eminent manner under the emperors Valerian, Gallienus, and Claudius, in their wars with the barbarians, of whom he is faid to have killed with his own hand forty-eight in one engagement, and in feveral others nine hundred and fifty; whence fongs were made upon his exploits, and fung publicly by the youth on festival days. As there were two Aurelians at the fame time in the army, and both tribunes, the foldiers used to distinguish the present Aurelian with the surname of Manu ad ferrum, that is, Hand to the fourd; fo ready was he on all occasions to draw his fword, and encounter the enemy k. He was a most strict observer of the military discipline, and used to punish with the utmost severity the least neglect of duty, b and the least injury offered by his soldiers to any of the inhabitants of the provinces, through which he marched. He was, when proclaimed emperor, commander in chief of the cavalry, to which post he had raised himself from the low station of a common foldier. From Sirmium, where he was faluted emperor by the whole army, after the death of Claudius, he hastened to Rome, and was received there, both by the senate and people, with extraordinary demonstrations of joy; but, before he could fettle affairs in the metropolis of the empire, he was obliged to return in great haste to Pannonia, the Goths, notwithstanding their late most dreadful overthrow, having anew broken into that province. Aurelian engaged them, and the battle lasted without any confiderable advantage on either fide, till night, when the enemy c repassed the Danube, and the next day sent embassadors to sue for peace; which Aurelian readily granted them, being informed, that the Alemanni, the Juthonga, whose country bordered upon Rhatia, and the Marcomanni, threatened to invade Italy itself, and were committing dreadful ravages and devastations in several parts. Against them therefore Aurelian led the flower of his army, and meeting them in veral German Vindelicia, which comprehended all the present Bavaria, and great part of Suevia, he put them to flight, and cut off great numbers of them, as they attempted to pass the Danube. Hereupon they fent embassadors to the emperor, offering to renew their ancient alliance with Rome, provided they were allowed to return unmolested into their own country; for Aurelian had cut off their retreat, and detached part of d his army to guard the banks of the Danube. The emperor, elated with his victory, would hearken to no terms; which threw the enemy into the utmost despair. After Who neverthe. various consultations and debates among themselves, they resolved at length to enter less enter Italy, Italy, fince they could not return to their own country; and accordingly, finding the passes unguarded, (for Aurelian apprehended no attempt of that nature) they advanced, before the emperor came up with them, as far as Placentia. There Aurelian attacked them; but, after having lost most of his troops, was put to slight, and utterly deseated. The barbarians, pussed up with so signal a victory, pursued their march, not doubting but they should be able to take Rome itself, as the Gauls had formerly done. But in the mean time Aurelian, having rallied his dispersed troops, and rein- ¢ forced them with the legions quartered in Illyricum, came unexpectedly upon the enemy in the neighbourhood of Fanum Fortuna, now Fano, and gave them a dreadful overthrow. Such of them as escaped from this first battle, were slain in two others, But are in the one of which was fought near Placentia, and the other in the plains of Ticinum. Thus end all cut off. was the whole multitude cut off to a man m. To this day is to be feen at Pesaro, a city about five miles from Fano, a monument erected by the inhabitants in memory of the victory gained there by Aurelian over the Germans . While the emperor was preparing to return to Rome, news was brought him, that the Vandals had passed the Danube, under the conduct of two of their kings, and several other princes. This obliged him to haften to the defence of the threatened provinces. The Vandals f retired upon his approach; the emperor however pursued and overtook them before they reached the Danube, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and obliged the rest to fue for peace; which he readily granted them, upon their delivering to him as hostages the sons of their two kings, and several other persons of great distinction. He incorporated two thousand of their best men in his army, and ordered the rest to be supplied with provisions at the public expence, till they reached the Danube . Aurelian, having thus happily ended the wars with the Goths, Germans, and Vandals,

The Vandals defeated.

k Aurel. vit. p. 210, 211. 1 Idem, p. 2
h GRUTER, p. 276. DEXIPP. legat. p. 12. 1 Idem, p. 211. Idem, p. 215, 216. Dexipp. legat. p. 7-11.

a returned to Rome, and, in the beginning of the following year, entered upon his first consulship, having for his collegue Numerius Ceionius Virius Bassus. As several disturbances had happened in Rome during his absence, he punished the authors of them with great feverity, and fuch too as were accused of having blamed his conduct in the German war. Trebellius Pollio tells us, that tho' he was in other respects an excellent prince, he often suffered his passion to get the better of his reason, and punished with excessive rigour faults, which an humane prince would have overlooked. He put several senators to death, upon the deposition of a single witness; Aurelian and often gave ear to the accusations of persons, who deserved no credit; which estranges the much lessened the reputation he had gained by his exploits in the field, and estranged minds of the from him the minds both of the senate and people P. The emperor Julian charges people with his him with having put many persons to death unjustly q; and Ammianus Marcellinus severity. writes, that he was glad of any pretence to condemn the rich, being in great want of money to carry on the war, and pay his troops r. This year, with the confent and approbation of the fenate, he undertook the repairing the walls of the city, which he likewise extended; so that they were near fifty miles in compass. great work was not accomplished till the latter end of the reign of Probust.

THE following year, when Quietus and Voldumianus were consuls, Aurelian, having fettled affairs in Pannonia, Italy, and at Rome, left the city anew, and fet out for He marches the east, to make war upon the celebrated Zenobia, who, to the great difference of against Zenobia. c the empire, had held for several years most of the eastern provinces. This queen, one of the most illustrious women mentioned in history, is styled on several medals Septimia Zenobia 1; whence some writers conclude her to have been allied to the family of the emperor Septimius Severus. She pretended to derive her pedigree from Her extraction, the Cleopatra's and Ptolemies of Egypt, and her family was reckoned one of the most conduct, and conspicuous in the east. She was well versed in all the branches of polite literature, administration. understood thoroughly the Egyptian, Greek and Latin languages, and, in the knowledge of history, excelled most men of her time. She is even said to have compiled an abridgment of the Egyptian and Oriental historians, which was in great request among the learned w. St. Athanasius writes, that she professed the fewish religion x, d and is therein followed by Abulfarajius y. She married the celebrated Odenatus, prince of Palmyra, and afterwards partner in the empire with Gallienus. She had great share in the many signal victories gained by her husband over the Persians, and is faid to have been no less courageous than that brave commander, and equally experienced in military affairs. Upon his death, she arrayed her three fons, Herennianus, Timolaus, and Vbabalat, in purple, caused them to be acknowledged by all the eastern provinces as joint emperors of Rome, and obliged them to conform to the Roman customs, and use not the Greek, which was spoken by other eastern princes, but the Latin tongue. As they were under age, she governed in their name, with the title of queen of the east, for the space of five, or, as others will have it, six years, discharging each duty of an excellent prince, and experienced commander, with all the prudence and intrepidity of a man. She shewed great wisdom in her counsels, was steady in her resolutions, kind and generous to persons of merit, but inexorable when severity was judged necessary. She lived with all the grandeur of a queen, imitating the pomp and magnificence of the Persian monarchs, and causing all those who approached her to fall prostrate before her, after the manner of the Persian court. She often appeared at the head of her troops, armed with a helmet, and, arrayed with the imperial robes, harangued them, and marched with them feveral miles on foot, using a horse, and sometimes a chariot, when the marches f were long, but seldom a litter. In imitation of the Roman emperors, she gave magnificent entertainments, not fcrupling on these occasions to drink plentifully with the officers of her army, and the Perfian and Armenian embaffadors, though otherwise very fober and temperate z. In the reign of Gallienus, she deseated Heraclianus, as Her exploses. we have related above, and, by his overthrow, remained in peaceable possession of all Syria and Mesopotamia, to which she added Egypt, while Claudius was taken up with the Gothic war. Not satisfied with these acquisitions, in the reign of Aurelian, she seized on great part of Asia, and attempted to reduce Bithynia 2. Aurelian, desirous ed it to be put to death.

* AMMIAN. 1. XXX. p. 431. P Aurel. vit. p. 116. epit. Aurel. vit. p. 216. Zos. p. 219. ATHAN. folit. p. 857. p. 655. Zos. p. 655. Vol. VI. No 3.

Aurelian defeats the Goths, and kills one of their kings.

Takes Tyana ia Cappadocia.

Zenobia's army defeated.

Zenobia defeated a second time.

Palmyra besieged.

to put an end to her usurpation, ordered all his forces to affemble in Illyricum, and a fetting out from Rome early in the spring of this year 272, bent his march through Thrace, where he engaged and put to flight several barbarous nations, who had made irruptions into that province. He even passed the Danube, and in an engagement with Caunabaud, a Gothic prince, flew him and five thousand of his men 2. Having thus defeated the Goths, he pursued his march to Byzantium, and croffing the Bosporus, entered Bithynia, which was held by Zenobia, according to Vopiscus, but immediately submitted. From Bithynia he advanced into Cappadocia, where the inhabitants of Tyana shut their gates against him; which so incensed Aurelian, that he swore he would not leave a dog alive in the place. His soldiers attacked it with great fury; but were in their repeated affaults repulsed with confiderable loss b by the inhabitants, till one of them, by name Heraclammon, betrayed his country and fellow-citizens to the enemy. We are told by Vopiscus, that the ghost of the famous Apollonius Tyaneus, appearing to Aurelian, warned him not to destroy the place of his nativity; and that the emperor, moved by this apparition, would not fuffer his foldiers to offer the least injury to the inhabitants, answering them, when they put him in mind of his vow not to leave a dog alive in the place, that they might kill, if they pleased, all the dogs, provided they spared the inhabitants. This answer was received with great applause by the soldiers themselves, who were no less pleased, fays Vopiscus, with the humour of their general, than if he had abandoned to them suffers the per- all the riches of that opulent city b. Heraclammon, who betrayed the place, was the c for who beiray- only person whom the emperor suffered to be put to death. Concerning him he wrote the following letter to Mallius Chilo, who was, it seems, the emperor's particular friend: "I have taken Tyana, and suffered the person, by whose favour, and, as " it were, good offices, I took it, to be cut in pieces by my foldiers. I have spared " the rest; but could not endure such a traitor. Would he ever have been faithful " to me, who betrayed his own country? He was rich, I own it; but his estate I " have given to his children, that no one might accuse me, as if I had put him to "death for the sake of his wealth". From Tyana Aurelian led his army strait to Antioch, defeated the troops of Zenobia in the neighbourhood of that city, and entered, as it were, in triumph the metropolis of Syria. This victory however cost him dear; d for the Palmyrenians (so the troops of Zenobia are styled by historians) fought with incredible bravery, and the Romans owed the victory rather to art than valour; for observing the enemy's cavalry heavily armed, they betook themselves to flight; and facing about unexpectedly, when they were quite spent with the long pursuit, put them easily in disorder, and gained a complete victory d. From Antioch Aurelian purfued his march to Emefa, whither Zenobia had retired with her army, confifting of seventy thousand men. Under her commanded one Zabas, or Zabdas, a man of great courage and experience, who had fignalized himself in the Persian wars in the time of Odenatus. After feveral skirmishes with various success, both armies came to a general engagement, in which the Roman horse were put to slight at the first e onset; but their infantry attacking the enemy both in the front and flanks, left naked and exposed by the departure of their cavalry, who were pursuing the Romans, obliged them, after a long and obstinate dispute, to give ground, and shelter themselves behind the walls of Emesa; which place however they abandoned at the approach of the victorious army, and withdrew with Zenobia to Palmyra, whither Aurelian purfued them close, though strangely harassed in his march by the Syrian robbers, who cut off great numbers of his men. He immediately invested the place, hoping to carry it by repeated affaults; but all his efforts proving unfuccessful, he began to batter it with an incredible number of warlike machines. The belieged, animated by the example of their queen, not only repulsed the aggressors with showers of f arrows, darts and stones, but rallied them from the walls, without sparing the emperor himself. Aurelian owned in one of his letters, that he had never engaged a more brave and resolute enemy; and mentioning Zenobia, says, that she did not behave like a timorous woman, but fought with all the boldness of a man in despair. "It is incredible, adds he, what thick showers of arrows, darts and stones she discharges "upon us; she harasses us night and day with fire from her engines, &c. However, "I hope the gods, who have never yet failed to fecond our endeavours, will not on "this occasion abandon the cause of the Roman people." The emperor, at length quite * Aur. vit. p. 216.

b Idem, p. 217.

a ldem, ibid.

d Zos. p. 655.

tired

a tired out with the toils and fatigues of fo long a fiege, wrote a letter to Zenobia, exhorting her to furrender, and promising her her life. To this letter Zenobia returned the following answer: "No man ever before you made such a demand. It is not fiver to Aure-" by letters, but valour, that you must induce me to submit. You cannot but know, lian, requiring "that Cleopatra chose rather to die, than live under Augustus, notwithstanding the her sosumie." mighty promises he made her. I expect daily the Persians, Saracens, and Ar-"menians, who are all hastening to my relief; and what will then become of you and your army, whom the robbers of Syria have put to slight? You will then lay " afide that pride and presumption with which you command me to surrender, as if you were the conqueror of the universe"." Aurelian, piqued with this answer, b immediately ordered a general affault; but was repulsed with great loss, and obliged to give over the attempt. However, he defeated, a few days after, the Persians, who came to the relief of the place; and what by menaces, what by mighty promises, prevailed upon the Armenians and Saracens to join him against the queen, whom they were come to affift. Zenobia, finding herself disappointed as to the succours, which the had long expected, and despairing of being able to hold out much longer with her own forces, resolved to withdraw privately from the city into Persia, and there solicit in person more powerful supplies. Accordingly she set out in the dead of the night with a small retinue on fleet camels, carrying with her part of her jewels and treasures. But Aurelian, who was very watchful, having had timely notice of her slight, detached a party of horse after the fugitive queen; who coming up with her as she was ready to cross the Euphrates in a boat, seized her, and carried her back to Aure-Zenobiaraken, lian, who from that moment began to look upon himself as the conqueror and sole Aurelian. lord of the east. When she was brought into his presence, he asked her, What had prompted her to take up arms against, and insult over, the emperors of Rome? To this question the queen replied, with no less intrepidity than address, That she looked upon him indeed, who knew how to conquer, as emperor; but as for Gallienus, Aureolus, and fuch as resembled them, she had never thought them worthy of that terms what soever; but others sued for mercy, and, upon the emperor's promising The city of Palto grant them their lives, opened their gates to the conqueror, who spared the inha- myrajubmits. bitants, but stripped the city of all its wealth, and appointed one Sandarion governor of the place, with five hundred archers and other troops under his command 8. After this, the emperor returned to Emesa, carrying with him the captive queen, whose death the foldiers demanded with loud clamours; but the emperor thought it beneath him to spill the blood of a woman, the more because she had with great care desended the eaftern provinces against the Persians, and other neighbouring nations, ready to feize them during the domestic disturbances that prevailed in every part of the empire h. The emperor likewise spared Vhaballat, the queen's youngest son i. As for the other two, Herennianus and Timolaus, Pollio tells us in one place, that it is uncertain whether they died a natural or violent death k; and elsewhere, that they were led in triumph with the queen their mother 1. All writers agree, that Aurelian caused many persons of distinction to be executed at Emesa for siding with Zenobia, and ordered others to be thrown over-board when he croffed over from Chalcedon to Thrace. Among the former was the celebrated philosopher Longinus, of whom The fame of this victory foon reached the most distant nations, and they all strove, with solemn embassies, and rich presents, to gain the friendship of the con- All the eastern queror of Zenobia. Among these are mentioned the Blemyes, the Auxumites, the inha- and southern f bitants of Arabia Felix, the Bastrians, Iberians, Albanians, Saracens, Armenians, Ethio-nations court pians, Indians, Persians, and even the Seres or Chinese. Hormisdas, or, as Eutychius Aurelian.

THE city of Palmyra still held out, and some were against submitting upon any calls him, Hormoz al Horri, who had succeeded his father Sapor in the kingdom of Persia, sent to the emperor, amongst other presents, a chariot, covered all over with gold, filver, and precious stones of an inestimable value, and a scarlet mantle of such a lively colour, that the Romans had never seen any but what came infinitely short of it. Aurelian, and after him Probus and Dioclesian, taken with its extraordinary brightness and beauty, sent, but to no effect, persons into the east, on purpose to discover the art of dying to such an extraordinary perfection m. Aurelian, having * Aur. vit. p. 218. f Ti 1 Zos. p. 661. Birag. p. 385. 8 Aur. vit. p. 219. h Idem 1dia. 2 168. l Idem, c. 23. p. 196. F Trigint. tyran. c. 29, p. 199. 8 Aur 385. k Trig. tyran. c. 26. p. 198. m Aur. vit. p. 218.

Palmyra revolts; but is retaken, and all the inhabitfword.

The revolt of Firmus.

umph.

thus recovered and fettled in peace the eastern provinces, returned by Chalcedon and a Byzantium into Europe, carrying with him his illustrious captive. He defeated, on his march through Thrace, the Carpi, who had broken into that province; but at the same time he was informed, that the inhabitants of Palmyra had revolted, put the Roman governor and garifon to the sword, and proclaimed a kinsman of Zenobia, named Achilleus, or, as Zosimus calls him, Antiochus, their sovereign. Upon this ants put to the intelligence, the emperor, with great expedition, hastened back into Syria, and arriving at Palmyra before the inhabitants had any notice of his march, he took the city without opposition, and put all the inhabitants to the sword, without distinction of sex, age or condition 1. He had not yet quitted the east, when news was brought him, that Egypt had revolted, and fet up for emperor one Firmus, or rather Firmius, b as he is styled on such of his medals as have reached our times o. He was a native of Seleucia in Syria; but possessed an immense estate in Egypt, and carried on an advantageous trade with the Saracens, the Blemyes, a people of Ethiopia, and the inhabitants of India; for he used to brag, that with his gains only upon paper and glue, he could maintain a whole army. Vopiscus relates wonderful things of his strength and appetite. He was greatly attached to Zenobia, and, to keep up her party and interest, assumed the title of Augustus, made himself master of Egypt, and stopped the corn which it used to send yearly to Rome. Aurelian marched against him with that expedition which was peculiar to him, and being attended with his usual success, overcame the usurper, stormed a strong-hold to which he sled, and having taken c him prisoner, caused him to be publicly executed P. Having thus suppressed all troubles in the east, he returned the second time to Europe, with a design to recover and reunite to the empire the provinces of Gaul, Spain, and Britain, which were still held by Tetricus. This he easily compassed, Tetricus himself, no longer able to bear the continual diforders and mutinies of his troops, inviting him privately into Gaul 9. However a battle was fought near Chalon on the Marne; during which, Tetricus voluntarily yielding to Aurelian, his troops, destitute of a leader, were cut in pieces. Thus was Gaul, after it had been held for the space of thirteen years by different tyrants, united anew to the empire. Towards the end of this year, when Tacitus, afterwards emperor, and Placidianus, were consuls, Aurelian returned to Rome, where d he was received with the most magnificent triumph the city had ever beheld. There were four royal and stately chariots: the first, which had belonged to Odenatus, was intirely covered with filver, gold and jewels; another, equally rich and magnificent, was a present to Aurelian from the king of Persia; the third was Zenobia's own chariot; and the fourth, which was drawn by four stags, had been taken by Aurelian from a Gothic prince. In the latter the emperor himself made his entry. These chariots were preceded by twenty elephants, and great variety of wild beafts from different countries. Next came eight hundred couple of gladiators, followed by an incredible number of captives of different nations, with their hands tied behind their backs, viz. Goths, Alans, Roxolans, Sarmatians, Franks, Suevians, Vandals, Alemans, & Blemyes, Auxumites, Arabians, Eudamonians, Indians, Bastrians, Iberians, Saracens, Armenians, Persians, such of the Palmyrenians as had outlived the late slaughter, fome Egyptians taken in the late rebellion of Firmius, and ten Gothic women, whom Aurelian had taken fighting in the habit of men. These were followed by Tetricus in a scarlet robe, and his son, whom he had taken for his partner in the empire. Next to them marched Zenobia, whose uncommon beauty, noble stature, and majestic mien, attracted the eyes of the spectators, and seemed to eclipse the grandeur and lustre of the emperor himself. She was bound with chains of gold, which other persons bore up, apparelled with the richest tissues and robes, and so loaded with pearls and precious stones, that she was often obliged to halt, being ready to sink funder so great a burden. Zenobia was followed by the emperor's triumphal chariot, the senate in a body, the people of Rome with their various standards, and the victorious legions, horse and foot, in rich and splendid armour, with crowns of laurel on their heads, and branches of palm-trees, the fymbol of victory, in their hands. The senate however, in the midst of the public rejoicings, betrayed no small concern to tee Tetricus, one of their own body, who had even been conful, led in triumph. In the capitol Aurelian facrificed to Jupiter the four stags that had drawn his chariot, in a compliance with a vow he had made, when he took them. From the capitol, he went to the palace, attended by the senate, and such crouds of people, that the day was far spent before he could reach it. The next and several following days, he diverted the people with plays, races in the circus, shews of gladiators, combats of wild beafts, fea-fights in the naumachia, and all forts of entertainments r. He treated his illustrious captives with great humanity and kindness. To Zenobia he gave lands His humanity and possessions in the neighbourhood of Tibur, now Tivoli, sufficient to maintain her towards Zenoaccording to her rank. On that estate she lived, says Trebellius Pollio, like a Ro-bia, and her man matron, with her children, that is, according to Zonaras, with her daughters, children; whom Aurelian took under his protection, and married to persons of the first quality b in Rome. The same writer adds, that Aurelian himself married one of them; which may perhaps be as true as what Syncellus had written before him, viz. that the emperor gave Zenobia herself in marriage to an illustrious senator'. Be that as it will, it is certain, that her descendants lived still at Rome in great splendor about the latter end of the fourth century ". Baronius takes the holy bishop of Florence, Zenobius, who was contemporary with St. Ambrose, to have been of her family w. As for her fon Vaballat, he retired into Armenia, where Aurelian gave him, it feems, a small principality; for he coined money, and is styled on some of his coins, which are still to be seen, Vaballat of Armenia, and on others, Vaballat king of the Verimi, probably an obscure people of Armenia. The emperor shewed no less kindness to c Tetricus, than to Zenobia. To make some amends for the injury he had done him, And towards by leading him like a captive in triumph, he heaped many honours upon him, Tetricus, and ftyling him his collegue, his fellow-foldier, and even honouring him fometimes with his fon. the title of emperor. He appointed him governor of Lucania, telling him pleafantly, that it was more to his reputation to govern a province of Italy, than to reign beyond the Alps v. He treated with the fame humanity and good-nature young Tetricus, whom he had led in triumph with his father, fuffering him to continue in the senate, and leaving his estate untouched, which he transmitted to his posterity, who lived at Rome, under the succeeding princes, in great splendor, esteemed and revered by persons of all ranks. In the house of the Tetrici, on mount Calius, was d still to be seen, in the time of Constantine the Great, a most beautiful piece, reprefenting in mosaic work the father and son delivering up a sceptre and crown to Aurelian, and Aurelian restoring to them the senatorial robes, and investing them in their former dignity 2. THE next consuls were, Aurelian the second time, and C. Julius Capitolinus. This year the emperor continued at Rome; and being now diverted by no foreign or domestic wars, he applied himself wholly to the suppressing of several abuses, which had prevailed in the time of Gallienus, and which Claudius had not been able to obviate, during his short reign. He made several regulations, which gained him the affections of the people, whom he had estranged from him, in the beginning of his e reign, with his cruelty, to which he had naturally a great bias. To the bounties of several reguthe emperors his predecessors, who had established funds for distributing bread and lations made oil among the people, he added a certain portion of hogs-flesh to be given with by Aurelian. the bread and oil; and increased the latter largess by the addition of an ounce to each pound. He even designed to establish a fund for distributing a certain quantity of wine among them; but was either prevented by death from putting his design in execution, or, as others write, diverted from it by the captain of the guards, who told him, that if he allowed the populace wine, they would next expect geese and chickens2. When he left Rome to make war upon Zenobia, he promifed to give to each man among the people a crown weighing two pounds, if he returned conqueror. f The people thought he meant crowns of gold; but when they challenged his promile, the emperor caused loaves to be made of the finest flour in the form of crowns, each weighing two pounds, and distributed them daily among the people so long as he lived, as he frequently did money and cloaths. He appointed, that Egypt should supply the city of Rome yearly with a certain quantity of glass, paper, linen, and feveral other things, that were either the natural growth, or manufactured in that country b. He caused wharfs to be built along the banks of the Tiber, and the * Trig. tyrann. c. 29. p. 198. Zon. p. 240.

OGOLTZ. P. 119. SPANH. l. vii. p. 599. * Aur. vit. p. 220. Zos. p.

* Synceli. p. 385.

* Birag. p. 407. Goltz. p. 116.

* Eutrop.

* Aurel. vit. p. 225.

* Idem, p. 224. r Aur. vit. p. 220. t SYNCELI. p. 385. w Baron, ad ann. 274. " HIER. chron. Aur. Vict. epit. 2 Trig. tyr. c. 23, 24. p. 196, 197.

He twilde a magnificent (mn.

temple to the

chanel of that river to be cleanfed, and dug deeper. But nothing more obliged a His generosity, persons of all ranks, than his generously remitting whatever was owing this year by private persons to the exchequer, and his publicly burning in the forum of Trajan all the papers, bonds, and registers, relating to such debts. At the same time he published an act of oblivion with respect to all crimes committed against the state to that day. From that time forward he punished with the utmost severity such as accused others, without being able to make good their charge . He enacted many wholfome laws, by which he is faid to have purged Rome of all protested lewdness, irreligion, and wicked arts. Finding that eunuchs began to be fold at a very great rate, he fixed the number which each person might keep of such slaves, according to their different ranks. He enacted most severe laws against adultery, and punished b with death one of his own domestics guilty of that crime. He would suffer none to keep women free-born for concubines. His domestics, freed-men, and slaves, he kept in great awe, causing them, as he was naturally inclined to cruelty, to be inhumanly beaten in his presence for the smallest faults, and delivering them up, when guilty of transgressing the laws, to the civil magistrates d. He designed to forbid all tiffue of gold, and gilding, pretending, that in nature there was as great a stock of gold, as of filver; and, that the former metal, if such a prohibition should take place, would become as common as the latter. This prohibition however was not published by him, but by his successor Tacitus, who is supposed to have suggested it to him . About this time be built and confecrated a most magnificent temple c to the fun, of which frequent mention is made in history, and embellished it with most rich and costly ornaments, and with an infinite quantity of gold, pearls, and precious stones. It was one of the most stately and magnificent structures in Rome. The gold veffels belonging to it weighed fifteen hundred pounds. He likewise inriched the capitol, and most of the temples in the city, with presents of great value fent him by foreign princes f. He extended the jurisdiction of the pontiffs, increased their revenues, and established funds for the repairs of the temples, and the falaries of the inferior ministers. Towards the end of the year, a dangerous sedition A great sedition in Rome. was raised in Rome by the persons employed in the mint, who having, by a notorious breach of trust, coined a great quantity of false money, to avoid the punish- d ment due to their crime, joined in a body, and, under the conduct of one Felicissimus, formerly a flave, but appointed by Aurelian one of the receivers of the exchequer, raifed fuch disturbances, that the emperor was obliged to order his troops to march against them, whom they received drawn up in battle-array on mount Calius, killed feven thousand of them; but were in the end, tho' they fought with all the boldness of men in despair, overcome, and punished with the utmost severity, not to fay, cruelty. After this the emperor called in all the false coin, and gave true money in its room s. Soon after this fedition, he put several senators to death, and likewife the fon, or, as others will have it, the daughter of his own fifter, for faults not specified in history, but only faid not to have deserved such a severe punish- e ment ". Towards the close of this, or the very beginning of the following year, when Aurelian was conful the third time, with Marcellinus, some disturbances happened in Gaul, which obliged the emperor to quit Rome, and haften thither. All we know of this expedition is, that Gaul was restored to its former tranquillity, and that the emperor, marching from that province into Vindelicia, obliged the barbarians, who had made an irruption on that fide, to repass the Danube'. A modern writer k is of opinion, that the emperor, before he left Gaul, rebuilt the city of Orleans, which at least ever fince the fifth century has been called by the Latin writers Aureliani urbs, and urbs Aurelianorum: its ancient name was Genabum or Cenabum. Gregory of Tours tells us, that he likewise either built or fortified the city of Dijon, at present f the capital of Burgundy. From Vindelicia the emperor marched into Illyricum; and there finding the province of Dacia in the hands of the barbarians, who had to the barba- feized it in the reign of Gallienus, he did not think it worth his while to recover a vince of Dicia country, which he was well apprifed he could not maintain in the midst of so many barbarous nations. He therefore withdrew the Roman troops from the few forts

Aurelian marches into Gaul, to appease some disturbances there.

He abandons

d Idem, p. 224.

8 Aur. vit. p. 222. Zos. p. 665.

k Le Maire, antiq. e Idem ibid. & Tacit. vit. p. 230. f Aur. vit. 22. Zos. p. 665. h Aur. vit. ibid. Aup. Vicr. p. 217, 222. Zos. p. 661. 8 Aur. vit. pepit. Aur. vit. p. 221. Zos. p. 240. k Le Maire, antiq. d'Oriens, c. 3. p. 9. p. 172.

they still held beyond the Danube, and gave to the inhabitants, who had been driven

a driven out by the barbarians, part of Masia and Dardania to settle in. Thus out of these two countries he formed a new province, called by some the Aurelian Dacia, by others New Dacia, to distinguish it from Trajan's Dacia, which lay beyond the Danube. The metropolis of this new province, which, according to Sanson, comprehended the most distant parts of Bulgaria and Servia, was Sardica, now known to us by the name of Sofia, but called by the inhabitants Triadizzam. The Goths, it feems, possessed themselves of the country, which the emperor had abandoned. From Illyricum, the emperor marched into Tbrace, with a defign to pass the winter there; and early in the spring to cross over into Asia, and lead his army against the Persians, upon what provocation, history does not inform us. But while he was wholly bent upon this war, death overtook him, and put a period to this, and his b other vast designs. Historians give us the following account of his unhappy end. He suspected Mnessbeus, one of his freed-men and secretaries, of some extortion, and A constitute. had threatened to punish him. Hereupon Mnost beus, probably conscious to himself formed against of the crime laid to his charge, and well acquainted with the emperor's cruel and him. inflexible temper, refolved to be beforehand with him. Accordingly, counterfeiting his matter's hand, he wrote a roll of the names of the chief officers in the army, and among the rest his own; and shewing it to those whose names he had set down, he told them, that he had found it in the emperor's closet; that they were all doomed to destruction; and that only by some desperate attempt they could avert their imc pending ruin. They all believed him, and, prompted partly by fear, partly by indignation, to fee their fervices thus rewarded, took, without hefitation, the resolution fuggested to them by Mnessbeus; and a few days after, as the army was marching to a place named Canophrurium, that is, the new-caftle, half way between Byzantium and Heraclea, they fell upon the emperor fword in hand, while he was attended only by a fmall guard, and dispatched him with many wounds. Vopiscus writes, He is murderthat he fell by the hand of Mucapor, who, it feems, was a man of rank, fince he ed. is styled general; and a letter is still extant written to him by Aurelian, wherein the emperor gives him an account of the vigorous opposition he met with from Zenobia at the siege of Palmyra. The emperor must have been killed about the d latter end of January; for his death was known at Rome on the third of February of this year 275. so that he had reigned five full years; and lived, according to the most probable opinion, sixty-three . His death did not remain unpunished; for the officers, who had killed him, finding, foon after his death, that they had been imposed upon by Mnestbeus, threw him to the wild beafts, and built a magnificent temple and tomb to the honour of the deceased emperor in the place where he had been killed, the whole army folemnizing his obsequies with the utmost pomp and magnificence. All those who had had any hand in his death were either cut in pieces on the spot by the enraged soldiery, or afterwards executed under his successors Tacitus and Probus. His death was much lamented by the senate, who, at the request e of the army, ranked him among the gods; but more by the people, whom he had obliged with more bounties and largeffes, than any of his predeceffors had done. Aurelian is commonly styled the restorer of the empire, which, after the evils it had His character. fuffered by the captivity of Valerian, and indolence of Gallienus, began to revive under Claudius, and was by Aurelian restored to its former strength and lustre. He delivered Italy from the incursions of the Alemanni, rescued the east from the shameful yoke of a woman, humbled the Persians, still elated with the captivity of Valerian, re-united Gaul to the empire, and restored to Rome, Thrace and Illyricum, over-run and oppressed by the barbarians. His arms were dreaded, and his frindship courted, by the most distant nations. He was a prince of great bravery, prudence, and f generofity; but as his excessive cruelty over-balanced all his other good qualities, he is by Vopiscus, and most other writers, ranked not among the good, but the useful princes. In the beginning of his reign, he seems to have countenanced the true religion P; but being afterwards feduced by wicked counfellors, he resolved utterly to extirpate the christian name, and had already taken up the pen to sign the bloody letters and edicts drawn up against them, when a sudden slash of lightning struck the pen out of his hand, and filled both him, and all about him, with terror and difmay. However, as the effects of fear, which stops the hand without changing the heart, are but short-lived, he returned to his former resolution, and published a against us, says Lastantius, edicts of blood and slaughter, which served only to draw vengeance from heaven upon his own head 9; for before his edicts reached the more distant provinces, he was affassinated in the manner we have related above. Hence this is not by the ecclefiastic writers reckoned one of the ten general persecutions, tho' feveral champions of the faith fuffered martyrdom in the provinces, where his edicts were published. Of Aurelian, Victor the younger observes, that he appeared in public with a diadem on his head, which no emperor had dared to do before him. Jornandes writes, that Dioclesian was the first Roman emperor who presumed to wear that royal ornament'. But that he, and not Victor, was mistaken, appears from one of the duke of Arfchot's medals, on which Aurelian is represented with a crown b on his head refembling our ducal crowns. The fucceeding princes followed his example; but the diadem was not commonly worn till the time of Constantine. Of the writers, who flourished under this prince, we shall speak in our note (Z).

<sup>m</sup> Aur. vit. p. 222. Lactan. perfec. c. 9. p. 8. Syncell. p. 385. <sup>n</sup> Aur. v. p. 221. Aur. Vict. epit. Zos. p. 661. <sup>p</sup> Euseb. l. vii. c. 30. p. 282, 283. n Aur. vit. p. 218. o Idem,

4 LACT. persec. c. 6. p. 6. Euseb. ibid. I JORN. reg. c. 23. p. 445. Croii ducis, tab. 63. Antwerp. ann. 1604. SPANHEM. l. viii. p. 681, 683.

Arschotana numism.

(Z) Under Aurelian flourished two celebrated philosophers, Longinus and Amelius. The former, named Cassius Longinus, and likewise Dionysius, which name is prefixed to his treatise on the sublime, is by most writers thought to have been a native of Athens (74). From Vopiscus it appears, that he could not write in the Syriac tongue (75); and consequently, that he was not by birth a Syrian, as some have afferted. His family, it feems, came originally from that country (76); for his mother Frontonides was lifter to Fronto of Emesa in Phanicia, who taught rhetoric at Athens in the reign of Severus, published many works, and dying in that city, bequeathed his estate to his nephew (77). Longinus, when he was yet very young, travelled with his father into several countries, which gave him an opportunity of becoming acquainted with all the great philosophers of those times. In one of his works, which Porphyrius, his epitomizer, his conveyed to us, he names feveral philotophers of different fects, among whom the most famous are Plotinus, his disciple Amelius, Ammonius, a christian philosopher, and one Origenes. Longinus was a long time the disciple of the two latter (78). He protessed and taught the philosophy of Plato, and had the celebrated philosopher Porphyrius for his disciple, who tells us, that he and some other philosophers were seasted at Athens by Longinus on Plato's birth-day(79). Longinus was not only a great philosopher, but the best critic and orator of his age, and so well versed in the various branches of literature, that he was commonly styled a treasure of knowledge, and a living library (80). He was a man, fays Eunapius, of an extraordinary discernment in discovering beauties and faults in the writings of others, and therein surpassed all men (81). He was charged, fays that writer, without telling us by whom, to write critical differtations on the works of the ancients, and his judgment was preferred to what others had written on the same subject before him (82). He taught Zenobia the Greek tongue, espoused her cause with great warmth against Au-relian, and was supposed to have dictated the letter which that princess wrote to the emperor during the siege of Palmyra. That letter so provoked Aurelian, that, upon the reduction of the place, he caused the supposed author of it to be put to death; which he suffered with great firmness and intrepidity, comforting those who were affected with his misfortune. This base revenge restected no small diffionour on Aurelian 83); for the loss of so great a man was looked upon as a public calamity (84). He left many works behind him very useful, says Zosimus (85), to such as desire to be instructed in the sciences, and which were admired by all the world. He must have begun to write very early, if what Porphyrius afferted be true, viz. that Origen, who died in 253, read with application his works (86). Eusebius quotes a passage out of one of his works, shewing the absurdity of the opinion of the Stoics concerning the foul (87). Porphyrius mentions a work of his upon vehemence, inscribed to Por-phyrius himself, and to one Cleodamus (88); and the preface of another upon the Supreme Being, addressed to one Marcellus, wherein he confuted the opinions of Plotinus and Amelius (89), quoting a work, which he had written against Porphyrius himself for his having preferred the opinion of Plotinus to what he had learnt of him concerning ideas: in the same preface he made mention of a long letter, which he had written to Amelius against some particular sentiments of Plotinus, and upon Plato's opinion touching justice (90). Porphyrius gives us the abstract of a letter, which Longinus wrote to him about the year 270. defiring him to fend him the works of Plotinus, and to leave Sicily, where Porphyrius then was, and come to him in Phanicia. Porphyrius adds, that if his affairs had allowed him to go thither, Longinus would have better understood the sentiments of Plotinus, and faved himself the trouble of confuting them (91). The same writer quotes three other works of Longinus, viz. on principles, or first causes, on the love of antiquity, and on men of letters (92). Suidas mentions several philological pieces published by Longinus (93); but takes no notice of his treatise on the sublime, the only intire work of Longinus which has reached our times, and fully answers the great idea which the ancients raise in us of its author. Cacilius, who flourished in the time of Augustus, wrote a treatise on the sublime; but contented himself only with shewing in what true sublimeness consisted, without prescribing any rules leading us to the attainment of it, which is the chief subject of Longinus's treatise, handled in a manner worthy of fo great a writer. Among the inflances he aliedges of those who have written in a style truly sublime, and suitable to the greatness of

As all the chief officers in the army had been concerned in the death of Aurelian, the foldiers, by whom he was greatly beloved, not able to prevail upon themselves their subject, he speaks of Moses thus: The Jewish legislator, who was no common man, having filled his mind with sublime notions of the grand ur and power of God, expressed them at the beginning of his laws in a flyle answering the mighty subject; God said, Let there be light, and there was light; let the earth appear, and it was so (94). Longinus inscribed this work to one Posthumius Terentianus, his intimate friend, and a man of letters, whom some writers take to be the sime person with Terentianus Maurus, who published several works, some of which have reached our times. But of him we have spoken in the reign of Domitian (95); for he flourished, according to Vossius, under that prince.

Amelius, against whom Longinus wrote, was a philosopher of greet expenses the plant.

philosopher of great note among the Platonies (96). Suidas says he was of Apamea, but Porphyrius assures us, that he was born in Hetruria: perhaps his family came originally from Apamea in Syria, and settled in Hetruria. Cyrillus of Alexandria supposes Amelius and Gentilianus to have been two distinct perions; and quotes for that Porphyrius, who tells us in express terms, that Amelius was likewise called Gentilianus (97). He was disciple to Plotinus, and greatly attached to him; for he lived twenty-four years with him at Rome, from the third year of Philip to the first of Claudius, that is, from the year 246. to the beginning of 269 (98). He had studied before under Lysimachus, a stoic philosopher (99). He was at Apamea in Syria at the beginning of the year 270. when Plotinus died. He was a very laborious man, and is faid to have composed an hundred volumes, containing only what he had heard of Plotinus in the frequent conferences that philosopher had held with him and others of the same sect (100). In the year 263, he had not yet published any thing of his own; but before the death of Plotinus, he wrote forty books against magic, and the heretics called Gnostics (1). He composed one in three days time, shewing in what chiefly the doctrine of Plo-sinus differed from that of Numenes. This piece he inscribed to Porphyrius by a letter, which is still extant (2). To him he likewise addressed some other works, to clear up the difficulties he met with in the doctrine of Plotinus. Amelius and Plotinus were, in the opinion of Longinus, the only philosophers who, in his time, published works worth perusing (3). The tenets of these two philosophers were the same, but Amelius explained them more, perhaps too much, at length; and hence probably it was that his works were greatly neglected and undervalued by the Platonics themselves about the latter end of the following century (4). Eusebius (5), Theodoret (6), and Cyrillus of Alexandria (7), produce a passing out of his works, whereas he appears the beginning of St. his works, wherein he quotes the beginning of St. folm's gospel. Theodoret calls him the chief of the school of Porphyrius, that is, of Plotinus, whose tenets were held by Porphyrius (8). Suidas writes, that Porphyrius was instructed by him in the principles of the Platonic philosophy (9). About the same time flourished one Androclides, author of a piece upon the fophists, who made extemporary speeches: in that work he mentions Porphyrius; whence Suidas concludes him to have flourished at the same time. He was the son of one Synesius of Philadelphia in Lydia (10).

Some historians too flourished under Aurelian, viz. Callicrates of Tyre, whom Vopifeus styles the most learned of all the Greek historians of his time (11); and Theoclius, or Theon, of Chios, as some critics conjecture (12). Both these historians wrote the life of Aurelian; but dwelt, it seems, too much on most trifling incidents (13). Nicomachus, another Greek historian, wrote at the fame time; for Votifens tells us, that he copied from him the letter which Zenolia wrote to Aurelian; that Zenobis dictated it in the Syria: language; and that Nicomachus translated it into Greek, in which language it was fent to Aurelian, who had written to her in Vossius takes this to be the the same dialect (14). Nicomachus who transcribed, as we read in Sidonius (15), and corrected the life of Apollonius Tyaneus, in contronting it with the original of Philostratus (16). Aurelianus Festivus, a freedman of the emperor Aurelian, wrote the history of his reign, or at least part of it, with the life of Firmus, who usurped the title of emperor in Egypt (17). Vossing ranks him, Cornelius Capito'inus, who wrote the history of Zenobia, and Gellius Fuscus. who wrote the life of Tetricus, tyrant of Gaul, among the Latin writers, no doubt, on account of their names; for Vopiscus, who quotes the two former, and wrote in the reign of Constantius Chlorus, tells us, that some Greek, but no Latin author had undertaken before him to write the history of Aurelian's reign (18). Erennius Dexipous, by birth an Athenian, by profession an orator, the son of another Dexippus, flourished under Aurelian, and was reckoned one of the greatest orators Greece had ever produced (19). His style, says Photius, was grave and majestic; his words expressive; his phrases proper, and well-suited to the subject; so that he may he called a fecond Thucydides; but in clearness he far excels the first (20). Thus he was a man of far excels the first (20). Thu' he was a man of letters, yet he fought with success at the head of his countrymen against the Goths, or Heruli, in the year 267 (21). He wrote the history of the Roman emperors from Alexander to Claudius, with no lets concifenels, flys Capitolinus (22), than fincerity; whence he is often quoted by him, and Trebellius Pollio, who flyle his history the history of the times. He wrote a separate history of the was of the Romans with the scythiaus, which he initial Scythica. This Photius preferred, for the elegance of fly e. to all his other works (23). He likewise wrote in all his other works (23). He l'kewife wrote in four books the history of the successors of Alexander the Great (24). Voffus attribes to him the book on Arifotle's categories, which has reached our times (25). But others maintain, that Dexippus, the author of that work, was disciple to Iamblichus, who flourished in the reign of Julian the apostate (26). We ought perhaps to distinguish likewish Dexippus, the author of some comedies (27), from the historian, tho' Vossius confounds them (28), (94) Long. c. 8. p. 20. (95) Vide Hift. Univers. vol. V. p. 693. (96) Euseb. prapar. l. xi. e. 18. p. 540. (97) Cyrill. in Jul. l. viii. c. 6. p. 283. Plot. vit. p. 5. (98) Plot. vit. p. 3. 6. (99) Idem, p. 13. (100) Idem, p. 3. (1) Idem, p. 10, (2) Idem, p. 31. (3) Idem, p. 14. (4) Euseb. prap. l. xi. c. 11. c. 9. p. 140. (5) Idem ibid. (6) Theod. de curand Gracor. affect. p. 500. (7) Cyr. in Jul. l. viii. p. 283. (8) Theod. ibid. (9) Suid. a, p. 198. (10) Idem, a. p. 261. (11) Vir. Aurel. p. 209. (12) Vide Vost. hift. Grac. l. iv. c. 17. p. 485. (13) Aur. vit. p. 210. (14) Idem, p. 218. (15) Sidon. l. viii. epist. 3. p. 214. (16) Vost. ibid. l. ii. c. 16. p. 214. (17) Firm. vit. p. 244. (18) Aur. vit. p. 209. (19) Suid. S. p. 659. Eunap. c. 2. p. 21. (20) Phot. c. 82. p. 200. (21) Gallien. vit. p. 181. (22) Capit. p. 150. (23) Phot. c. 82. p. 200. (24) Idem ibid. p. 201. (25) Vost. p. 243. (26) Johns. l. iii. p. 299. (27) Suid. p. 1516. (28) Vost. kijt. Grac. l. ii, a. 16. p. 243. s. 16. p. 243.

Tacitus unanimousty chosen by the senate.

to name any of them in his room, wrote to the senate, acquainting them with the a The army refer death of the emperor, and referring to them the choice of a new prince. When their the election of a letter was read, Tacitus, who was at that time prince of the senate, and voted the new prince 1?
the senate, and first, declared, that he was for referring the choice of a new emperor to the army, as the senate, and the senate to the the army had done to the senate: For what disputes, said he, and disturbances will inevitably ensue, should not the army approve of the person whom we name? The senate acquiesced to his proposal; but the soldiers referred the choice a second and a third time to the fenate, as the fenate did to the foldiers; fo that the empire, by this reciprocal exchange of compliments, and commendable dispute between the senate and army, remained near eight months without a head, and nevertheless no usurper started up during that time; no disturbances happened, either at Rome or in the provinces. b But the barbarians in the mean time, taking advantage of the inter-regnum, began to put themselves in motion. The Germans, that is, the Lyges, the Franks, the Burgundiones, and the Vandals, broke into Gaul; the Goths threatened Illyricum; and every one expected, that the Persians, against whom Aurelian had declared war, would not continue long quiet. These things Velius Cornificius Gordianus, then conful, laid before the fenate on the twenty fifth of September, and earnestly pressed them to proceed, without further delay, to the election of a new prince. He concluded his speech by telling them, That the empire could no longer subsist without a head, and that the army would either accept the prince whom they chose, or, rejecting him, chuse another. There had been some talk before of raising Tacitus to the c empire, who thereupon had withdrawn into Campania, and lived there two months in retirement; but being recalled by the fenate, he was present at this meeting held on the twenty-fifth of September; and after the conful Gordianus had ended his speech, he rose up to deliver his opinion the first, as prince of the senate; but before he had uttered a fingle word, the whole affembly cried out with one voice, We salute you, Tacitus, emperor: to you we commit the care of the state, and the world. Take the empire given you by the authority of the senate: your rank, your character, your past conduct, deserve it. He attempted to excuse himself in regard of his great age (for he was then feventy-five); but they all cried out, That other emperors, stricken in years, had governed with great applause; that they wanted not a soldier, but an emperor; not d a strong body, but a vigorous mind; and that he had a brother, who would bear with him part of the burden. After this was taken the suffrage of each senator in particular, when Metius Falconius Nicomachus, the eldest consular, after having in an elegant speech bestowed the highest encomiums upon Tacitus, inlarged in a very affecting manner on the many evils attending the administration of young and unexperienced princes, and conjured Tacitus, by the love he bore his country, not to leave the empire to his fons, who were yet children, but to name for his successor a person, whom he judged equal to so great a trust, if the state were, by the immutable decrees of the Fates, deprived of him before his children attained to maturity of age. He added, that to dispose of the senate, the people of Rome, and the whole empire, in e the same manner as he disposed of his houses, lands and slaves, was repugnant to the laws of justice and equity; and that nothing would so much commend his name to all future ages, as to shew at his death, that he loved the republic above his family and iffue. When Metius had ended his speech, the senators all to a man cried out, Tacitus is emperor. The decree was accordingly drawn up, investing him with the fovereign power, and figned by all the senators, even by Tacitus himself. From

> THE present emperor, named on his coins M. Claudius Tacitus, but, by Vopiscus, f Aurelianus, or Aurelius Tacitus, acknowledged Cornelius Tacitus, the celebrated historian, for his kinfman; and therefore, to fecure his inimitable performance against the injuries of time, he ordered ten copies of it to be transcribed every year, and to be lodged in the public libraries, and in the cabinets of the learned; but notwithstanding his care, only a small part of what that excellent historian wrote, has reached our times. The emperor, as we have hinted above, was stricken in years, but had several children, who were very young. Florianus, named on the ancient coins M. Annius Florianus, was only his uterine brother. All we know of his preferments is, the senate they all went to the field of Mars, where Ælius Cesetianus, then governor of Rome, declared to the foldiers and people assembled there, the election of Tacitus, which was received with the usual acclamations ".

a that he had been consul, and was, at the time of his election, prince of the senate. His prefer-He was a man of learning, of a mild temper, an enemy to all pomp, and a great ments admirer of the manners of the primitive Romans. When he was created emperor, he gave his immense estate to the public, allotting part of it for the repairing and beautifying the temples. What ready money he had by him, he distributed among the foldiers. He fet at liberty all the flaves he had at Rome, and caused his house to be pulled down, in order to build public baths in the place where it stood. His temperance and regularity, his œconomy and care of the public money, his impartiality in the administration of justice, are much commended by the authors of his life. In the first speech he made to the senate, he declared, that he would transact b nothing without their consent and authority; and then proposed the two following laws, which were received with great applause, and confirmed by a decree; viz. that Two of his whoever should mix metals with a baser fort, should forfeit his estate and life; that law: flaves should not be admitted as witnesses against their masters, even in cases of treafon. In the same speech he desired the consulship for his brother Florianus; but the fenate did not think fit to grant him his request; which he was so far from resenting, that, on the contrary, he seemed highly pleased with the liberty they had taken, faying, I am glad they know bim. From the very beginning of his reign he applied himself to the suppressing of several abuses which still prevailed in Rome. By one edict he put down all the brothel-houses; by another he ordered all the public baths c to be shut up at sunset; and by a third prohibited all sorts of gold tissue and gilding. He respected the memory of the good emperors, and caused a temple to be built to their honour, and facrifices to be offered to them on their several anniversaries. He paid a particular regard to Aurelian, and prevailed upon the senate to decree him a statue of gold, to be set up in the capitol, and others of silver, to be placed in the fenate, in the temple of the fun, and in the square of Trajan b. The senate, overjoyed for the recovery of their ancient right of creating emperors, ordered public processions, vowed hecatombs, appeared in white garments, seasted their friends, and wrote letters to all the states and cities in alliance with Rome, acquainting them, that they were at length restored to their former authority; that the kings and d princes of the barbarians were to apply to them; and that all appeals from the proconsuls were to be made, not to the emperor, or the captain of the guards, but to the governor of Rome, from whom they might appeal to the fenate c. The new prince was fcarce well fettled in the empire, when news was brought him, that incredible multitudes of barbarians were advancing from the Palus Maotis through Colchis, pretending to have been invited by Aurelian to affift him in his intended expedition against the Persians. Tacitus immediately left Rome, and arriving in Thrace, Tacitus where he was received by the army with the greatest demonstrations of joy imagin-marches able, passed from thence over into Asia, deseated the barbarians, and obliged them against the to return into their own country d. The following year the emperor entered upon and deseats e his fecond confulship, having Æmilianus for his collegue; and having passed the them. winter in Cilicia, was preparing to return to Italy, when he was, according to some writers, seized with a violent distemper, which, in a few days, put an end to his His death. life; but, according to others, killed by his own foldiers. He died at Tarjus in Cilicia, or, as others write, at Tiana in Cappadocia, after a short reign of about six months. Upon his death, his brother Florianus, whom he had appointed captain of the guards, caused himself to be proclaimed emperor, and was acknowledged in Florianus asall the provinces of Europe and Africa; but the legions quartered in Syria, Phani- Jumes the emcia, Palestine, and Egypt, declared for Probus, whom Tacitus had appointed com-pire; but is mander of all the forces in the east. Hereupon a civil war was kindled in the bowels his own men. f of the empire, while the barbarians were ready to invade it on all fides. Florianus gained at first some advantages over his competitor; but as the troops under his command were more addicted to Probus than to him, they began to mutiny, and, at the approach of Probus, who was refolved to put the whole to the iffue of a general engagement, fell upon their own leader, cut him in pieces, after he had reigned about two months, and joined Probus. This happened in the neighbourhood of Tarsus in Cilicia. The death of Florianus was no sooner known in Europe and Africa, than the armies every-where proclaimed Probus emperor, and the senate readily Probus proconfirmed their election, honouring the new emperor with the titles of Augustus, daimed empe-

* Zonar, p. 240. Zos. p. 662. * Ticit. vit. p. 230. father

b Idem, p. 232.

e Idem, p. 231, 232.

preferments.

He delivers Gaul from the barbarians, and reduces great part of Germany.

He overcomes the Logi, the Burgundians, and the Vandals.

father of his country, high pontiff, &c. and investing him with the tribunitial and a proconfular power; for they all entertained a great opinion of his justice, equity, moderation, &c. and looked upon him as a person in every respect qualified for the discharge of so great a trust: and truly, if Vopiscus is to be credited, he was one of the best and greatest princes that ever swayed a sceptre. That writer prefers him to Irajan, Adrian, Antoninus, Alexander,, Claudius, nay, and to Augustus himself. His character. He was, says he, an excellent commander, an able statesman, a friend to virtue, an enemy to vice, generous, affable, good-natured, and, in short, endowed with every good quality commendable in a prince m. He was a native of Sirmium in Pannonia. Extraction and His father, by name Maximus, was, in his youth, by profession a gardener; but afterwards lifting himself among the troops, he was raised to the post of tribune, and b married a woman of rank, by whom he had one fon, the present emperor, and a daughter, of whom we find no farther mention in history. Probus entered into the army when very young, and having distinguished himself on many occasions under Valerian, Gallienus, Claudius, and durelian, he was by these princes raised to the highest posts of the army, and employed, always with success, in the many wars which they waged with the barbarians n. He was about forty-four years old, according to the chronicle of Alexandria, when preferred to the empire. His election was no sooner confirmed by the senate, than he left Cilicia, and returned to Europe. He passed the winter in Pannonia, and having there taken upon him his first consulship, and named M. Aurelius Paulinus for his collegue, he fet out in the spring for Gaul, c where the Franks and other German nations had committed dreadful ravages. He is faid to have fought in that province many successful battles, to have killed near four hundred thousand of the barbarians, and to have obliged the rest to quit the booty they had taken, and fave themselves by slight beyond the Rhine. Having thus restored Gaul to its former tranquillity, he passed the Rhine at the head of his victorious army, and made war upon the enemy in their own country, with greater fuccess than any of his predecessors had ever done, as appears from the account which he himfelf transmitted to the senate in the following letter: " I return thanks to the immortal " gods, conscript fathers, who have given manifest tokens of their approving your " choice in raising me to the empire. Germany, that wide and extensive country, d " is intirely subdued. Nine kings of different nations have thrown themselves pro-" strate at my feet, or rather at yours. All the barbarians now plough and sow for " you, nay, and fight for you. Return therefore thanks to the gods for fo fignal a conquest. Four hundred thousand of the enemy have been cut in pieces; sixteen "thousand have been incorporated in our troops. We have recovered fixty great cities which they had taken, and delivered Gaul from the yoke under which it " grouned. The crowns of gold, with which the cities of Gaul have presented me, "I have transmitted to you, to be consecrated, and, by your hands, offered to the great Justier, and to the other gods and goddesses. We have not only recovered "the booty which they had taken, but inriched ourselves with their spoils. The e " fields of Gaul are ploughed with the cattle of the barbarians; their sheep are " inclosed in our folds, and our magazines are filled with their corn: in short, we " have left them nothing but the bare foil. I have had fome thoughts of reducing "Germany to a Roman province; but the republic, exhausted with so many wars, " is not perhaps at present in a condition to maintain the additional troops which " must be raised for that purpose "." Vopiscus adds, that he drove the enemy beyond the Elb and the Necker, and built a great many forts in the country lying between those rivers and the Rhine, which he might have easily reduced to a Roman province; but did not think it adviseable to burden the republic with new troops, which he must have raised, and lest there, to keep those warlike nations in awe. Zosimus tells f us, that one of the battles, which he fought with the Logi, a German nation, probably the same people whom Tacitus calls Lyges, lasted two days, the armies being parted only by night; that the victory inclined sometimes to the Romans, and sometimes to the Germans, who fought with incredible bravery; but that the former at length prevailed, by the bravery of Probus, and not only gave the enemy a total overthrow, but took their king, by name Semnon, prisoner, with his sons, and the flower of their nobility; whom however the emperor afterwards fet at liberty, upon their restoring to him all the booty and prisoners they had taken 9. The same writer

a adds, that in another engagement with the Burgundians and Vandals on the banks of the Rhine, he took their king Igillus prisoner, with many others of those two nations, whom he transplanted into Britain, where they proved very serviceable to the Romans upon all feditions and infurrections 9. They fettled perhaps in Cambridgeshire; for Gervasius Tilburiensis mentions an old vallum in that county, which he calls Vandels.

burg, and fays, it was the work of the Vandals r. THE following year the emperor entered upon his fecond confulship, having Lupus for his collegue, and early in the spring set out from Gaul; and bending his march through Rhatia, he arrived in Illyricum, whence the Sarmatians, who had made an irruption into that province, withdrew, upon the news of his approach, leaving b their booty behind them. From Illyricum he pursued his march into Thrace, where he was met by deputies from all the Gothic nations, fent by their respective states and The Gothis fine princes to sue for peace, and court his friendship. Having thus settled peace and for peace. tranquillity in all the provinces of Europe, he passed over into Asia, and entering Isauria, which had revolted from Rome, as we have related above, after many dangerous conflicts with the Isaurian robbers, and Palsurius their leader, whom he took and put to death, he intirely reduced that country, transplanted the inhabitants into Isauriareduced. distant provinces, and divided Ifauria among his veterans, upon condition that they should send their sons, as soon as they attained the age of eighteen, to serve in the army, left, trufting to their rocks and mountains, they should follow the example of c the ancient inhabitants, and turn robbers. From Isauria the emperor marched into Syria, where he entered upon his third confulship, having Paternus for his collegue, and early in the spring led his army against the Blemyes, a barbarous nation, dwelling between Egyft and Ethiopia, who had made themselves masters of Coptos and Ptolemais in Thebais, and fruck terror into the neighbouring countries. Probus de- The Blemyes feated them with great flaughter, recovered the above-mentioned cities, took a great defeated. number of the barbarians prisoners, and sent them to Rome, where their extraordinary figure, fays Vopijeus, raifed great admiration in the Roman people ". Pliny had described them many years before, as a people without heads, and having their mouths and eyes in their breasts w. Some writers think, that the shortness of their d necks gave rife to this fable. The king of Persia, Varranes II. alarmed at the same of the victories gained by Probus over fo fierce and warlike a nation, fent embaffadors to him, with rich presents, to sue for peace; but the emperor, not satisfied with The Persians their proposals, refused the presents, and sent back the deputies; which so terrified see for peace. the king, that he concluded a peace with Probus upon his own terms. The eastern provinces being thus fettled in peace, the emperor returned to Thrace, where he allotted lands to one hundred thousand Bastarnæ, a Scythian nation, of whom we shall have frequent occasion to speak hereaster. They all remained faithful to him; but the Gepidæ, Juthungi, and Vandals, to whom he allotted lands in the same province, revolted while the emperor was engaged in domestic wars, which broke out the fole lowing year. From Thrace the emperor returned to Rome, and there triumphed Probus triover the Germans and Blemyes s, and diverted the people, for feveral days together, umphs. with all forts of shews, combats, and entertainments. And now no foreign nation daring to attempt an invalion, peace reigned throughout the whole empire; but this general tranquillity was foon disturbed by domestic broils, which first broke out in the east, where Sext. Julius Saturninus, as he is styled on the ancient coins, was proclaimed emperor. He was, according to some, a native of Mauritania, according Siturninus reto others, of Gaul, and had distinguished himself in many wars; for he is said to volts. have restored tranquillity to Gaul, to have recovered Africa from the Moors, and appealed the disturbances that had long prevailed in Spain 1. The emperor Aurelian

f had appointed him commander of the troops quartered on the frontiers of the eaftern provinces, and at the same time ordered him never to set foot in Egypt, fearing, fays Vopiscus, as he was well acquainted with the ambitious temper of the Gauls, and the strange inclination of the Egystians to novelty, lest he might be prompted by them to assume the sovereignty. Notwithstanding this prohibition, Saturninus being led by his curiosity to visit Egypt, he no sooner appeared at Alexandria, than he was by that turbulent and restless people proclaimed emperor. He declined at first that dignity, and quitting Alexandria, returned in great haste to Palestine; but afterwards

865. F Vide CAMD. Britain. p. 136. & Buch. Belg. l. vii. p. 218. Prob. 1 Idem ibid. Prob. 1 Idem ibid. Prob. 1 Idem ibid. Prob. Vit. p. 239. Saturn. vit. p. 244. Zos. p. 663. Goltz. p. 116. Birag. p. 309.
No. 3. F f f 9 Idem ibid. p. 865. vit. p. 239. Y Idem, p. 240.

and killed.

Proculus revolts.

Is betrayed by the Franks, and put io death.

Bonosus proclaimed emperor. Is overcome, hands on him-

dered.

apprehending, that what had already happened might give Probus no small umbrage, a and occasion his ruin, he suffered himself to be proclaimed emperor, shedding many tears amidst the acclamations of the soldiery and populace q. Zonaras writes, that Probus, who had a great kindness for him, not believing he had revolted, caused the person to be punished who brought him the first news of his rebellion. He afterwards wrote several kind letters to him; but his soldiers threatening him with death, if he hearkened to, or complied with the emperor's offers, he was forced to reject them. Hereupon Probus dispatched some troops against them, which being joined He is overcome by others in the east, engaged Saturninus, put him to flight, and obliged him to shelter himself in the citadel of Apamea, which they took by storm, and put the whole garison, together with Saturninus, to the sword. The emperor, who designed b to pardon him, shewed no small concern for his death r. The following year, Messala and Gratus being consuls, two usurpers started up in Gaul, Proculus and Bonosus. The former was a native of Albingaunum, now Albenga, subject to the republic of Genoa. His ancestors had been famous robbers, and had, by their robberies, acquired immense wealth; for Proculus is said to have armed two thousand slaves of his own when he revolted. In his youth he had been himself a robber; but entering afterwards into the army, he had fignalized himfelf by many noble exploits. He was tribune, and had the command of feveral legions, when he took upon him the title of emperor, prompted thereunto chiefly by his wife, called first Viturgia, and afterwards Sampso, a woman of great ambition, and a manly courage, c and by the inhabitants of Lions, who had been treated with great severity by Aurelian, and apprehended the like treatment from Probus. He was proclaimed emperor at Cologn, and acknowledged, according to Vopiscus, in Narbonne Gaul, Britain, and Spain. The same writer tells us, that he defeated the Alemanni in several battles; but was himfelf at last overcome by Probus, and forced to take refuge among the Franks, from whom he pretended to derive his origin. The Franks promifed him their affistance; but, instead of performing their promise, they betrayed him to the emperor, by whom he was punished according to his deferts . Bonosus, or, as he is styled on the ancient coins, Q. Bonosius, was descended of a Spanish family, but born in Britain. His father kept a public school, and taught children the first d rudiments of the Latin tongue. The fon entered early into the army, and raised himself by degrees from the low rank of a common soldier to the post of general, and was employed as such to guard the frontiers of Rhatia; but having suffered the Germans to surprise and burn the Roman fleet on the Rhine, his dread of being punished for this neglect, prompted him to assume the sovereignty, and cause himself to be proclaimed emperor by the troops under his command. He maintained himfelf in that dignity longer than was expected, and fought feveral battles with Probus; but being at length reduced to great streights, he chose rather to strangle andlays violent himself, than to fall into the hands of the conqueror. Authors observe of him, that he could drink as much as ten men, without being in the least disordered; and that e by drinking with the embassadors of the barbarians, he often discovered the secrets with which they were intrusted. Vopiscus tells us, that the emperor Aurelian married to him a princess of the royal blood of the Goths, by name Hunila, whom he had taken prisoner, that Bonosus might, by her means, become acquainted with the great men among the Goths, and discover, in drinking with them, their secret views and designs. Hunila was a woman of great wit, beauty, and virtue; and therefore Probus, upon the death of her husband, not only spared her, and the two fons she had by Bonosus, but settled an annual pension upon the mother, and suffered the children to enjoy their paternal estate ". Zosimus w and Zonaras x speak of the The governor of revolt of the governor of Britain, whom they do not name; and tell us, that the f Britain revoles, emperor complaining of him to a Moor, named Victorinus, upon whose recommendation he had preferred him to that government, the Moor begged, and obtained leave to go into Britain, and try whether he could bring back his friend to a fense of his duty. Upon his arrival, he was received by the usurper with great demonstrations of kindness; which he requited by murdering his old friend in the night-time. His death put an end to the revolt in Britain. We are not told whether or no Probus approved of this treachery.

> F Idem ibid. F Idem, p. 662. ZONAR. p. 246. 9 Sat. vit. p. 249. F Ide id. W Zos. l. i. p. 663. 1 Idem, p. 245-247. * Bonof. vit. p. 247. Idem

THE following year the emperor entered upon his fourth confulfhip, having Tiberianus for his collegue. The whole empire now enjoyed a profound tranquillity; all domestic troubles were happily appealed, and foreign enemies awed by the fame of Probus's mighty atchievements. However, that the troops might not abandon them- How Probus felves to idleness, he took care to employ them in many useful works, saying, That employed his fince they were maintained by the public, they ought either to fight or labour for the of peace. public. As Hannibal therefore, to find some employment for his soldiers, had formerly filled Africa with olive-trees planted by them, fo Probus, for his valour styled by many a fecond Hannibal, employed his troops in planting vines on the hills of Gaul, Pannonia and Mæsia, allowing, says Vopiscus, the Gauls, Pannonians, Spaniards, and Britons full liberty to cultivate as many vineyards as they pleased; which had been denied them ever fince the time of Domitian v. The emperor Julian writes, that Probus, during his short reign, either rebuilt or repaired seventy cities z. As the city of Sirmium, the place of his nativity, flood in a low marshy ground, he employed great numbers of his foldiers in digging a canal to convey the waters into the sea. This incensed them against him, and their rage was heightened by the appreheafion they were under of being foon difbanded; for the emperor had faid, That he hoped in a fhort time there would be no occasion for foldiers or armies. This they could not bear, and therefore the following year, when Probus was conful the fifth time with Vistorinus, they attacked him with great fury, as he was marching from c one town in Illyricum to another. The emperor had time to retire into an iron tower of an extraordinary height, which he himself had built, to observe from thence the foldiers while they were at work. But thither the incenfed multitude pursued him, and having eafily formed the place, as it was defended by the prince alone, dispatched He is murdered him with many wounds, after he had lived fifty, and reigned fix years and four by the mutimonths. His death is a scribed by many to Carry, who succeeded him is a scribed by many to Carry, who succeeded him is a scribed by many to Carry. months. His death is afcribed by many to Carus, who succeeded him in the empire, and was then captain of the guards; but Vopiscus endeavours to clear him from that imputation. The whole army raised a stately monument to the honour of the deceased prince, with the following epitaph: Here lies the emperor Probus, whose life and manners answered his name. He subdued all the barbarous nations, and conquered the tyrants d who started up in his time. The loss of so good a prince was greatly lamented, not only by the fenate and people of Rome, but by the barbarians themselves, who dreaded his valour, and revered his probity, clemency, and justice. His fucceffors honoured his memory with all possible marks of respect and esteem, ranking him among the gods, confecrating temples to his name, celebrating with great pomp his anniversity, &c. He was, without all doubt, one of the best, as well as of the greatest princes, that ever reigned at Rome . After his death, his family withdrew from Rome, probably not to give umbrage to his successors, and settled in the neighbourhood of Verona b. As for the sew writers who slourished in his reign, we refer the reader to our note (A). Upon the death of Probus, Carus, then captain of the prætorian guards, was, by Carus prothe unanimous confent of the army, raifed to the empire, as a person in every respect claimed empewell qualified to succeed so good a prince, so great a warrior. The senate were ror. well pleased with the election of Carus; but dreading the vicious and cruel temper of his fon Carinus, were unwilling to confirm the choice of the foldiery. However, apprehending the power of the army, and defirous to maintain the peace and tran-

```
y Prob. vit. p. 240.
```

* JUL. CÆS. p. 17.

a Prob. vit. p. 241. b Idem ibid.

(A) Under Probus flourished Turdulus Gallicanus, who wrote a kind of journal, often quoted by Vo-pifcus in his life of Probus, who styles the author of it a man of honour and sincerity (29). He likewise cites M. Salvidienus, from whom he copied the speech made by Saturninus, when he put on the purple, and assumed the title of emperor (30); which prompts us to believe, that Salvidients wrote the history of that usurper. Onesimus published the life of Probus, done, according to Vopifcus, with great exactness (31), and likewise that of the emperor Carus (32). Vossus ranks them all three among the Latin historians (33), and mentions a Greek historian, by name Onasimus, a native of Sparta or Cyprus, who lived, according to Suidas, under Constantine, and was both a tophist and historian. Perhaps Onesimus and Onasimus were one and the same perfon, there having passed but twenty-four years be-tween Probus and Constantine. Suidas ascribes to Onasimus several philological and other works (34).

About the same time flourished another sophist, named likewise Onasimus, but who was a native of Athens (35).

```
(29) Prob. vit. p. 233. (30) Saturn. vit. p. 245. 2) Idem ibid. (33) Voss. hist. Lat. l. ii. c. 4. p. 184.
```

(31) Bonof. vit. p. 246. & Car. vit. p. 250. (34) Suid. p. 523. (35) Idem ibid.

quillity

and preferments.

quillity established by Probus, they at last acknowledged Carus, and conferred upon a him the usual titles and honours b. Of his family and ancestors we know but very little. Some fay, that he was by birth a Roman, but by descent an Illyrican; others, that he was born in Illyricum, but of Carthaginian parents. In a journal quoted by Vosifcus, he is styled a native of Milanc. The two Victors, Eutropius, and several others, will have him to have been born in Narbonne. The emperor himself pretended, that his ancestors were originally Romans d. He raised himself by degrees to the chief employments in the state, both civil and military. He had been conful; for the confulfhip, which he took after his accession to the empire, is called his second confulfhip. Probus, after having employed him in most of his expeditions, appointed him captain of the guards, in which office he gained the affections of the foldiers to b fuch a degree, that, upon the death of Probus, they all agreed to raise him to the empire in his room. That prince entertained a mighty opinion of the prudence, justice, and integrity of Carus, as appears from a letter quoted by Vopiscus, which he wrote to the fenate in his behalf, defiring them to reward his eminent fervices, by erecting to him an equestrian statue, and building him a house at the public charge, for which the emperor himself promised to supply the necessary marble. Carus was no fooner fettled in the empire, than he gave the title of Casar to his two fons Carinus and Numerianus, of whom the former was a youth intirely abandoned to all manner of wickedness, and the latter endowed with every good quality requisite in a prince. Some writers pretend, that at the fame time he declared them his partners c in the empire, giving them equal power and authority with himself; but on the medals of this year 282. the first of Carus's reign, his two sons are only styled Cæsars. The Sarmatians no sooner heard of the death of Probus, than they broke into Illyricum and Thrace, over-ran those countries, and threatened Italy itself. Hereupon Carus, drawing together his forces, marched against the barbarians, and coming, after several skirmishes, to a general engagement with them, cut sixteen thousand of them in pieces, took twenty thousand prisoners, and obliged the rest to abandon the Roman dominions, and retire into their own country, whither he would have purfued them, had he not been informed, that the Persians were ready to invade the eaftern provinces with a mighty army, under the conduct of their king Varranes II. d a warlike prince, who had lately fignalized himself against the Segetani, and intirely reduced that brave and powerful people. Upon this intelligence, Carus, committing the care of the western provinces to his eldest fon Carinus, and taking with him Numerianus, left Thrace, and croffing over into Afia, marched strait to Antioch, and thence into Mejopotamia; which the Persians, who, it seems, had already seized that province, abandoned at his approach. From Me'opotamia he advanced into Persia, laid waste the country far and wide; and meeting with no opposition, as the Persians were then engaged in a civil war, he besieged and took the famous cities of Seleucia fians, and takes and Ctesiphon, with Cocke, which was a place of great strength on the other side the Tigris, and, as it were, the citadel of Ctesiphon 8. For these conquests he took the

Defeats the Sarmatians.

He creates his

two fons Cæ-

fars.

Gains great advantages over the Per-S-leucia and Ctetiphon.

His death.

he was preparing to pursue his conquests beyond that city, which the Romans, as was pretended, were by an ancient oracle forbidden to do. Junius Calpurnius, one of the emperor's fecretaries, gave the following account of his death, in a letter which he wrote to the governor of Rome: "While Carus, our truly dear prince, lay fick in his tent, a violent storm broke out, attended with dreadful stashes of lightning,

44 and claps of thunder. Day was all on a fudden turned into night, and the air f

" darkened to such a degree, that we could not discern one another. While we " were under the utmost consternation, frightened and dismayed, after a clap of thunder more loud and terrible than all the rest, we heard one cry out, The emperor " is dead. Soon after, his chamberlains, distracted with grief, set fire to his tent; "which gave rise to the report, that he was killed with lightning; but it is certain, that he died of his illness." Thus one of his secretaries, whose letter Vopiscus produces, to confute those who ascribed the emperor's death to divine vengeance, for furname of Perficus, which we read on most of his coins h. He was bent upon utterly ruining the Persian monarchy, and would, in all likelihood, have succeeded in that great defign, the Perfians being then divided among themselves, had he not been prevented by death, which overtook him in the neighbourhood of Ctesiphon, while

d Idem, p. 249. C Idem, p. 242. DII 115. BIRAG, p. 419. SPANH, l. v. p. 419. <sup>b</sup> Car.vit. p. 243. <sup>c</sup> Idem ibid. <sup>d</sup> Ide a Car.vit. p. 250. Greg. Naz. orat. iv. p. 115. F BIRAG. P. 426.

a his attempting to extend his conquests beyond Ctesiphon i. However, the two Vistors, Eutropius, Rufus, Festus, Apollinaris, Sidonius, St. Jerom, Eusebius, Georgius Syncellus, and Zonaras, write, that he was killed, and his tent burnt, with lightning. He had begun the fecond year of his reign, and his death happened between the eighth of December of this year 283. and the twelfth of January of the year enfuing; for his name is prefixed to all the laws that were published till the eighth of December, and those of Carinus and Numerianus to a law dated the twelfth of January of the year 284 k. He reigned, according to the most probable opinion, a year and four months. He was conful when he died, and had his fon Carinus for his collegue in that dignity. Upon the death of Carus, his fon Numerianus was immediately faluted by the whole Numerianus b army with the title of emperor. As to his other fon, Carinus, he was then in Gaul, proclaimed emand had been raised by his father to the sovereignty before he set out for the Persian peror. war. Numerianus, grieved beyond expression for the death of his father, broke up his camp, and began to retire. As his eyes, weakened with the great quantity of tears he had shed, could not bear the light, he caused himself to be carried in a close litter. Arrius Aper, his father-in-law, and captain of the guards, who had free access to him, laid hold of that opportunity to murder him privately, with a design He is murdered to raise himself to the empire. The body of the deceased prince he left in the litter, telling the foldiers who wanted to fee their emperor, that he could not endure the air, and striving in the mean time to gain them over to his own interest. e body was thus carried three days; but as it began in the end to be offensive to the smell, the crime was discovered sooner than Aper expected, and he immediately seized, no one doubting but he had been the author of the murder. Upon the death of Numerianus, the army with one voice proclaimed Dioclesian emperor. Such was Dioclesian the unhappy end of Numerianus, after he had reigned about eight months. He was raised to the killed near Heraclea in Thrace, as he was leading his army back into Italy. All the empire. ancients speak of him as a prince endowed with every good quality becoming a person of his rank. He was an excellent orator, and is faid to have once fent such an eloquent speech to the senate, that a statue was decreed him, to be set up in the Ulpian library, with this inscription, To Numerianus Cæsar, the most eloquent orator of his age. In d poetry he far surpassed all the writers of his time, and lest several pieces behind him, both in verse and prose, which were mightily cried up by the learned 1. He had often declared in public, and it was probably of him that Calphurnius, a celebrated poet of those times, said, That he diverted himself with pleading, while he was still in his mother's arms m; that is, when he was very young. Both he and his father Carus were ranked among the gods, had temples and divine honours decreed them, &c. It appears from some medals, that the latter had impiously assumed the title of god before his death. Some writers flourished in his time, of whom in note (B). Dioclesian was descended of a mean and obscure family in Dalmatia, being, accord- His extractions ing to some, the son of a notary, and of a slave, according to others; nay, Victor preferments, e the younger tells us, that he was himself in his youth slave to a senator, named &c.

k Cypr. an. p. 45. Cod. Just. l. v. tit. 71. leg. 7. p. 509. l. viii. tit. 56. leg. lef. c. 1. p. 9. 1 Num. vit. p. 251. m Calph. eclog. i. ver. 45.

(B) Vopiscus tells us, that the life of Carus and his children was written before the year 300. by Fa-bius Cerilianus, whose diligence and exactness he commends (36); and that of Carinus in particular, by Fulvius Asprianus, whose scrupulous exactness, and too great care to amit nothing, rendered his work extremely tedious (37). Aurelius Apollinaris likewise wrote the life of Carus, probably in Iambics; for he was a poet, and is said to have taken delight in that kind of verse (38). Vossius ranks these three among the Latin Writers (39). A few eclogues, and part of a poem on the chace, by M. Olympius Nemesianus, has reached our times. likewise wrote some pieces on fishing and naviga-tion, and was highly esteemed in those days (40). He is supposed to have been a native of Carthage, where his works, in the time of Hinemar, were publicly read in the schools (41). He inscribed his poem on the chace to Carinus and Numerianus, after the death of their father; that is, after the year 284. He had not yet, at that time, been at court, nor seen Rome (42). Four other eclogues have reached our times, supposed to have been written by T. Calphurnius, or Calpurnius, a native of Sicily, and to have been inscribed to Nemesianus. In the first mention is made of declamations made by a prince, supposed to be Numerianus, almost in his infancy (43). Scaliger takes the sports that were ex-hibited by Carinus and Numerian to be the subject of the last ecloque (44). Perhaps Junius Calphurnius, fecretary to Carus, and the above mentioned poet, were one and the same person.

(36) Car. vis. p. 249, 250. (37) Idem, p. 254. (38) Idem, p. 251. (39) Voss. hist. Lat. l. ii. e. 4. p. 184. (40) Nemes. p. 508, 511. Car. vis. p. 251. (41) Voss. poet. Lat. p. 53. (42) Nemes. cyn. ver. 64. p. 509. & ver. 77, 81. (43) Calpur. p. 501. (44) Scalig. in Euseb. chron. p. 253. Vol. VI. No 3.

Anulinus, who afterwards gave him his liberty o. The name, both of his mother, a and the place of his birth, was Dioclea; whence he was called Diocles till his accession to the empire, when he gave his name a Latin found and termination, calling himself Dioclesianus P. He entered early into the army, and by degrees raised himself to the first military employments. We are told, that while he yet served in an inserior post, a woman, by profession a Druid, in whose house he lodged, upbraiding him with covetousness, he answered her in jest, I shall be more generous when I am emperor. You are joking, Diocles, replied the Druid; but I tell you in good earnest, that you will attain the emfire after you have killed a boar. This is supposed to have happened in the city of Tongres, in the present bishopric of Liege 1. Dioclesian served with great credit under Probus, who gave him the command of the troops quartered b in Mafia. He attended Carus in his expedition against the Persians, and distinguished himself in that war. Syncellus tells us, that he was raised by that prince to the confulship. He had, at the time of Numerianus's death, the command of the guards that attended the emperor's person, and were superior in rank to the prætorian guards, as we have observed above. He was a great master of civil affairs, prompt at foreseeing events, dextrous at concerting schemes, naturally inclined to violent measures, but at the same time master of his temper; an enemy to all useless expences, and a great encourager of learning, though from his youth he had been brought up in the camp, and had never applied himself to any study but that of the military art, in the knowledge of which he was equal to the famous commanders of c ancient times ". Lastantius charges him with cowardice, and fays, that he avoided, as much as he well could, exposing his person to dangers w. He was, according to Eutropius, naturally covetous, and bent upon amassing riches by any means whatever x. By his wife Prisia he had a daughter, named Galeria Valeria, who was married to Maximinus Galerius; but proved barren y. Both the mother and daughter favoured, and, according to Lastantius, once professed, the christian religion; for that writer reckons them among the first, who, terrified with the menaces of Diocle-fian, defiled themselves with impure sacrifices. Dioclessan being, by the unanimous confent of the army, proclaimed emperor, in the manner we have related above, afcended the tribunal; and after having harangued the foldiers, and folemnly declared d upon his oath, that he had been no-ways accessory or privy to the death of Numerianus, he caused Aper to be brought before him, reproached him in bitter terms with the murder of his prince and fon-in-law, and then descending from the tribunal, drew his fword, and buried it in his breast, saying, You shall have the bonour, O Aper, to fall by an illustrious hand. The new emperor would not have begun his reign with an action that favoured of cruelty, had it not been to fulfil the above-mentioned prophecy of the Druid, the word aper fignifying in the Latin tongue a boar; whence, in secing Aper fall, he cried out, I have at length killed the fatal boar. Vopiscus tells us, that, mindful of the prediction, he strove always in hunting to kill the boars with his own hand; and adds, that when he faw Aurelian, Tacitus, Probus, Carus and e his two sons, raised to the empire before him, he used pleasantly to say before Maximian, and our historian's grandfather, (for to these two alone he imparted the prophecy) That he killed, but others enjoyed, the boar 2. Dioclesian was proclaimed emperor at Chalcedon, on the seventeenth of September of the year 284. which epoch is the more remarkable, as it is the beginning of a new æra, called, The æra of Dioclesian, and sometimes, The ara of martyrs, which for many ages obtained in the church, and is still in use amongst the Cophts in Egypt, the Abissines, and some other African nations. The first year of this æra begins with the Egyptian year on the twenty-ninth of August of 284 b. Dioclesian made his public entry into Nicomedia on the twenty-seventh of September of this year, and spent the remaining months in making the necessary pre- f parations to oppose Carinus, who, hearing of his brother's death, and the assumption of Dioclesian, had left Gaul, and was hastening, at the head of a powerful army, into Illyricum. The following year Carinus took upon him his third consulship, having Aristobulus, his captain of the guards, for his collegue; and arriving in Venetia, overcame there and flew one Julianus, governor of that province, who had caused himself

The ara of Diocletian.

He puts Aper

to death.

a to be proclaimed emperor c. Elated with this victory, he advanced into Myricum, where he fought several battles with Dioclesian, whom he intirely deseated in a general engagement near Margum, a city on the Danube in Upper Mæsia; but while he was pursuing the enemy, he was killed by some of his own men, stirred up The death of against him by a tribune, whose wise he had debauched. Thus Aurelius Victor d. Carinus. But Eutropius writes, that he was betrayed by his own army, and killed by Dioclesian c. Be that as it will, Dioclesian, seeing himself, by the death of his rival, become fole mafter of the empire, marched to Rome; and having established his authority there, fet out soon after for Germany, where he gained several advantages over the Alemanni, who had made an irruption into Gaul. The fame year his generals fought b with success against the inhabitants of Britain, who, it seems, had attempted to shake off the yoke. For these victories he assumed the surnames of Germanicus and Britannicus, as appears from an inscription dated the second year of his reign f. From Germany he returned through Illyricum into the east; for he was at Sirmium on the first day of the following year 8, and at Nicomedia on the twenty-first of January b. The next consuls were Junius Maximus the second time, and Vettius Aquilinus. This year Dioclesian took Maximian, styled on the ancient coins M. Aurelius Valerius Ma-Dioclesian ximianus, for his collegue, and partner in the empire. Maximian was born of ob-takes Maxifeure parents, in a village near Sirmium in Pannonia; but entering early into the parenter in the army, had fignalized himfelf by many noble exploits, and was reckoned one of the empire. c best commanders of his time. All the ancients paint him as a man of a most cruel and favage temper, and addicted to all manner of wickedness; but at the same time extol his courage, his experience in military affairs, and his inviolable attachment to Disclesian, with whom he had lived many years in great friendship. The emperor therefore, who had no iffue male, and reposed an intire confidence in Maximian, chose him for his partner in the empire, invested him with the tribunitial and proconsular power, and honoured him with the title of Augustus. Some authors write, that Dioclesian not only took him for his collegue in the sovereignty, but divided the empire with him, referving to himself the eastern provinces, and leaving to Maximian, Italy, Africa, Spain, and the rest of the western countries. Maximian had by d his wife, Galeria Valeria Eutropia, by birth a Syrian, Maxentius, who usurped the empire at Rome, and Fausta, the wife of Constantine the Great. Maxentius was by fome thought to have been a supposititious child k. Eutropia had by a former husband a daughter, ftyled on the ancient coins Flavia Maximiana Theodora, whom Maximian married to Constantius Chlorus, of whom hereaster. Aurelius Victor tells us, that Dioclesian was induced to take Maximian for his partner in the empire, chiefly by the disturbances which happened this year in Gaul, where two commanders, Aulus Pomponius Ælianus, and Cn. Salvius Amandus, having affembled a great number of vagabonds, robbers and peafants, caused themselves to be proclaimed emperors. Maximian, leaving Dioclesian in Nicomedia, hastened into Gaul, and there, with the troops Arebellion in quartered in that province, defeated the rebels, and restored the province to its Gaul suppressed former tranquillity m. The revolted peafants were called Bacaude, or Bagaudæ, the by Maximian. etymology of which appellation has puzzled the best antiquaries. S. Maure des Fosses, about three short miles from Paris, was formerly called the castle of the Bagaudæ, being built, according to a tradition which obtained in the feventh century, by Julius Casar, in the peninsula formed by the Marne, and fortified with a rampart and ditches, which defended the entry left open by the river. The Bagaudæ are said to have held out there a long time against Maximian, who at length made himself master of the castle, levelled it with the ground, and filled up the ditches; which however gave to the place its present name ". While Maximian was employed against the f rebels in Gaul, Dioclesian was making great preparations in the east, in order to recover Mesopotamia from the Persians, who, after the death of Carinus, had seized that province. But Varranes II. at that time king of Persia, chose rather to restore what he had taken from the Romans, than to engage in a war, which, he apprehended, would prove long and dangerous o. Mention is made of some advantages gained this year by Dioclesian over the Saracens P. He was the last day of this year at Tiberias

p. 331. b Idem, tit. 9. leg. 3. p. 530. i No-• Aur. Vict. epit. p. 524. d Idem ibid. • Еитко
р. 19, 20. в Сод. Justin. l. vi. tit. 21. leg. 6. p. 331. f Noris de Diocles. num. c. 4. p. 19, 20. 8 Cod. Justin. l. vi. tit. 21. leg. 0. p. 351.

RIS de Diocles. num. Lactan. persec. c. 8. p. 8. Pagi, p. 157.

orat. i. p. 9. 1 Eutrop. p. 585. 24.

& insim. Latinitat. p. 661, 662. Panegyr. orat. x. p. 125—132. " Vide Du Cange glossar. med. P PANEGYR. P. 132.

in Palestine, as appears from the date of some laws in the code q. The following a

He utterly defeats several German nations.

year, 287. Dioclesian entered upon his third consulship, and Maximian upon his first. The former from Palestine passed into Pannonia, as appears from the date of several laws enacted this year 1; but what called him into that province, or what he performed there, we are no-where told. As for Maximian, he was attacked in Gaul by the Alemanni, the Burgundians, the Heruli, whom Bucherius places on the coasts of the Baltic sea, and by several other barbarous nations, who were all overcome by Maximian, and destroyed either by the sword, or by famine. Mamertinus, in his panegyric upon this prince, tells us, perhaps not without some exaggeration, that, of such an immense multitude, not one was left alive to carry back the news of their overthrow'. The same year, Carausius, a native of Gaul, having by Maximian's b orders built a fleet at Boulogne, gained great advantages over the Franks and Saxons, who began to infest the seas with piracies, and, in several engagements by land, made a dreadful havock of the German nations that had broke into Celtic Gaul. However, as he kept and applied to his own use the booty which he had taken from the barbarians, instead of returning it to the proprietors, Maximian resolved to put him to death; but Carausius, having timely notice of his design, passed over into Britain with the fleet under his command, and there taking upon him the title of emperor, was acknowledged by all the troops quartered in that island . He afterwards caused a great number of vessels to be built, levied new forces, called the barbarians from the continent to his affiftance, and, by instructing them how to c work their ships, and fight by sea, maintained himself a long time in possession of the island, in spite of the utmost efforts of Maximian.

Caraufius revolts, and feizes Britain.

Maximian defeats the barbarians a fecond time.

Gains great advantages over the Franks.

Britain given up to Carau-

THE following year Maximian was conful the fecond time, with Januarius. Mamertinus, his panegyrist, tells us, that on the first day of his confulship, news being brought to Treves, where he then was, that the barbarians had made an irruption into Gaul, and were but at a small distance from that city, he immediately quitted his consular robes, put on his armour, and mounting his horse, marched against the enemy, cut most of them in pieces, and the same day re-entered Treves in triumph ". Soon after, he croffed the Rbine; and entering Germany, laid waste the enemy's country, took a great number of captives, and returned to Gaul loaded with booty w. d The fame of his name struck such terror into the Franks, that two of their kings, Atec and Genobaud, submitted to him, desiring him to confirm them in their respective kingdoms x. From an ancient inscription it appears, that both Dioclesian and Maximian took the surnames of Francicus, Alemannicus, and Germanicus. Mamertinus speaks of some victories gained by Maximian's generals over a fickle and deceitful nation, meaning, no doubt, the Franks; for fuch was, at least in those times, the character of that people 2. Dioclesian likewise entered Germany this year on the side of Rhætia, and is faid to have extended the bounds of the empire to the springs of the Danibe . The next year, Baffus being conful the second time, with Quintianus, Claudius Mamertinus pronounced his famous panegyric on the emperor Maxi- e mian in the city of Treves, as is commonly believed, the emperor himself being prefent. As he was then affembling on the coast of Gaul the ships, which he had caused to be built in feveral parts, with a defign to attack Caraufius in Britain, his panegyrist promises him certain victory over that rebel b. But it happened quite otherwife; for Caraufius's men, who had been trained to fea-fervice, eafily put to flight those who were sent against them, dispersed the emperor's fleet, and drove them on the coast of Gaul, where most of them were dashed to pieces. Maximian, to cover the difgrace of this defeat, gave out, that the fea had not proved favourable to him, and that he only put off the war to a more convenient feafon. But in the mean time, he began a treaty with Caraufius, wherein it was concluded, that he f should enjoy the government of Britain, as the more proper person, on account of his skill in sca-affairs, to defend the island against the invasions of the barbarians c. This agreement is marked on all Caraufius's coins, which represent two emperors shaking hands, with this legend, Concordia Augg. d. Thus was Britain, by treaty, given up to Caraufius, who governed it, with the title of emperor, for the space of <sup>9</sup> Cod. Just. l. iv. tit. 40. leg. 3. p. 311.

p. 125.

t Eutrop. p. 585. Aur. Vict. p. 524. Panegyr. 8. p. 108.

w Idem ibid. p. 226.

* Vales. rer. Francic. l. i. p. 11, 12.

t Idem, p. 126.

b Idem, p. 128.

Eutrop. p. 586. Aur. Vict. p. 525.

Noris de Diocles. num. c. 4. p. 22, 23.

a fix or feven years, reckoning from this treaty, or, what to us feems most probable, from the time he first seized it. Our authors tell us, that he repaired and fortified the wall of Severus, and gained some advantages over the barbarians c. The same year, Dioclesian gained a complete victory over the Sarmatians, the lithunga, or Dioclesian rather Juthunga, and the Quadif. Eumenes writes, that the whole nation of the defeats the Sarmatians was cut off; and the province of Dacia, which they had seized, re-united Sarmatians. to the empire 3. For these victories, Dioclesian assumed the surname of Sarmaticus, as appears from feveral ancient coins and inscriptions. The next confuls were Dioclesian the fourth time, and Maximian the third. The former gained this year some confiderable advantages over the Saracens i; and then leaving the eaftern provinces, b returned to Illyricum, and from Illyricum entered Italy by the Alges Julia in the depth of winter. Maximian at the fame time left Gaul; and passing the Alpes Cottie, met Dioclesian at Milan, where the two emperors held feveral private conferences; The two empethe subject whereof is not mentioned by historians, and then returned to their respective meet at tive armies; for they came attended only by a small guard, but were received in Milani all the cities through which they passed, with the greatest demonstrations of joy ima-The following year, Tiberianus and Dion, the fon, or rather grandfon, as is conjectured, of the celebrated historian, being confuls, a bloody war broke out among the barbarians, both in the north, and in Africa. The Goths, having overc come the Burgundians dwelling on the banks of the Danube, were intent upon utterly extirpating that rival nation; but the Burgundians were powerfully supported by the Alam and the Tervinga. Another Gothic nation, entering into a confederacy with the Taifalæ, made war upon the Vandals, and the Gapidæ. In Africa the Blemves were at war with the Ethiopians, and the Moors were engaged in a civil war. Neither was Persia exempt from civil disturbances, raised by Hormisda, who, revolting from his brother Varranes II. endeavoured to drive him from the throne, and feize it for himself, being supported in his unjust pretensions by several Persian lords, and fome foreign nations k. The barbarians being thus diverted from making inroads into the empire, all the provinces subject to Rome enjoyed this year a profound trand quillity, which however was but short-lived; for the following year, 292. when Annibalianus and Asclepiodotus were consuls, the empire was in great danger of being torn in pieces by foreign as well as domestic enemies. Not to mention Carausius, The empire who still held Britain, the Persians, delivered from their intestine broils, broke into threatened on Mesopotamia, and threatened Syria. The Quinquegentiani, perhaps so called because all sides. they were quinque gentes, that is, five nations, joined in confederacy against the Romans, over-ran Africa; M. Aurelius Julianus revolted in Italy, and caused himself to be proclaimed emperor; the fame title was affumed at Alexandria in Egypt by Achilleus, ityled on his coins L. Epidius Achilleus 1. The two emperors, alarmed at the danger which threatened the empire, and not thinking themselves alone able to oppose so e many enemies at once, refolved to strengthen their interest with the affistance of others, and to name each of them a Casar, who should succeed them in the empire, and jointly with them defend the Roman dominions both against foreign invaders, and domestic usurpers. Pursuant to this resolution and agreement, Dioclesian chose The two empe-Maximinus Galerius, and Maximian, Constantius, surnamed Chlorus, who were each rors chuse two of them invested with the tribunitial and proconsular power, and honoured with the Casars. titles of emperor, father of their country, high pontiff, &c. which had hitherto been peculiar to the fovereign ". The two emperors, the better to cement the union between them and their Casars, obliged them to put away their wives, and marry others; upon which Constantius married Theodora, daughter-in-law to Maximian, and f Galerius Valeria the daughter of Dioclesian". Some authors write, that both the Cafars were named by Dioclesian, and by him invested in that dignity with great solemnity the first day of March of this year 292. on a rising ground, about three miles from Nicomedia, where a pillar was afterwards erected, with a statue consecrated to Jupiter. But most writers suppose Galerius to have been chosen by Dioclesian, and Constantius by Maximian; and all agree, that Galerius was adopted by the former, and Constantius by the latter. After the nomination of the two Casars,

* Paneg. 11. p. 132, 133.

* Paneg. 13. p. 133.

* Paneg. 13. p

The empire divided into four parts.

The exils

divition.

attending this

the empire was divided into four parts: Dioclesian chose for himself the countries a beyond the Agean sea; Thrace and Illyricum were allotted to Galerius; Italy and Africa, with the adjacent islands, to Maximian; and Gaul, Britain, and Spain, with Mauritania Tingitana, to Constantius. Each of these princes governed the provinces that fell to their share, with an absolute sway; but the other three paid great deference to Dioclesian, acknowledging themselves indebted to him for the power they enjoyed, and looking upon him as their common father. An intire union and concord reigned among them, each of them carefully avoiding to affume any superiority over the rest, or to give the least motive of jealousy or umbrage to his collegues °. From this time forward, the empire continued almost constantly divided; but at the same time each emperor was looked upon as master of the whole. Hence b to the laws, which any of them enacted, were always prefixed the names of his collegues; and likewise to all the requests and petitions that were presented to them. This multiplicity of princes was attended with great inconveniences, and is therefore much exclaimed against by Lastantius, who ascribes it to the cowardice of Dioclesian, unwilling to expose his own person to danger P. As each of the four sovereigns would have as many officers, both civil and military, and the fame number of forces as had been maintained by the state when governed only by one emperor, there were more foldiers to pay, than people to supply the necessary sums. Hence the taxes and imposts were increased beyond measure, the inhabitants in the several provinces reduced to beggary, the lands lest untilled for want of hands, &c. In c proportion as the people grew less able to pay the heavy taxes laid upon them, the number of the officers was increased to exact them by force. Thus was the empire greatly weakened, and almost quite ruined 9. Italy itself, which had hitherto only supplied with provisions the court, and the troops attending it, was obliged to pay the same tribute as the provinces; which reduced it in process of time to a deplorable condition r.

Birth, education, freferments, &c. of Galerius, whom Dioclesian named to the dignity of Casar, is styled on most of his coins, Caius Galerius Valerius Maximianus. He was born in a village near Sardica, the metropolis of New Dacia; his mother, by name Romula, having retired Galerius Ca- thither from O'd Dacia, or Dacia beyond the Danube, while that country was over- d run by the Carpi. Galerius, in honour of his mother, gave afterwards the name of Romulianum to the place of his nativity. As Romula was a professed enemy to the christians, she inspired her son with the same hatred to them; which chiefly gave rise to the bloody persecution which broke out in the latter end of Dioclesian's reign. Galerius was descended of an obscure family; for both he, and his sister's son Maximinus, whom he afterwards created Cæsar, are said to have been in their youth cowherds; whence Galerius was nick-named Armentarius, from the Latin word armentum, fignifying a drove of cattle. He was a person altogether illiterate; but nevertheless raised himself from the mean condition of a common soldier to the chief posts in the army, having given signal proofs of his valour and conduct under the emperors e Aurclian and Probus. Lastantius reckons him amongst the worst emperors, and speaks of him as one abandoned to all manner of wickedness, naturally inclined to cruelty, and a declared enemy to learning, and men of letters ". The fame writer adds, that in his words, in his actions, and even in his countenance, there was fomething shocking and offensive, apt to inspire those who approached him, rather with terror and aversion, than with esteem or affection. Aurelius Victor, who seems to have been no-ways prejudiced against him, owns, that he was naturally of a fierce and favage temper, and that his ruftic, haughty, and disobliging behaviour, drowned all his good qualities; for, according to that writer, he had excellent natural parts, and would have made a good figure on the throne, had the gifts of nature been f improved by a polite and liberal education . He had no children by Valeria, the daughter of Dioclesian; but a son, named Candidianus, by a concubine, and a daughter by his former wife, who was married to Maxentius, the fon of Maximian . Of Constantius, the other Casar, we shall speak in a more proper place. Galerius was no fooner created Cafar, than he marched, with all the troops he could affemble, against the barbarians in the neighbourhood of the Danube and Illyricum; but per-

• EUSEB. VICT. ibid.
• LACT. perf. c. 7. p. 6.
• Idem ibid. EUTROP. p. 581.
• VICT. epit. p. 543.
p. 526.

* LACT. perf. p. 401. 44. 19. 16. r Aur. Vicr. p. 524. q Idem, p. 6, 8. " LACT. perf. c. 9. p. 8. W AUR. VICT.

a formed nothing, either in this or the three following years, against the enemies of Rome, which historians have judged worth transmitting to potterity. He caused feveral large forests to be grubbed up in Lower Pannonia, and a lake to be difcharged into the Danube; by which means he gained a new province, which, from Pannenia his wife's name, he styled Valeria, lying between the Danube and the Draw, and Secunda, A known in future ages by the name of Pannonia Secunda. The chief cities of this new province. new province were, Mursa, Aquincum, and Valeria y. Maximian passed this year over into Africa, where he gained a complete victory over the Quinquegentiani, and reduced Julianus (who had taken upon him the title of emperor in Italy, as we have hinted above, and afterwards croffed over into Africa) to fuch streights, that he stabbed b himself with his own sword 2. Constantius was no sooner invested with his new dignity, than he hastened into Gaul; and arriving at Gessoriacum, now Boulogne, which Constantius was held by the troops of Caraufius, invested the place, and blocked up the haven tikes Gessoriawith huge beams driven into the ground at the entrance, and heaps of great stones like a rampart. The garifon being by this means prevented from returning into Britain, and deprived of all hopes of relief, submitted to Constantius, and were incorporated among his troops. The mole, which had continued firm for feveral days, was quite disjointed by the first tide after the surrender of the city, and broken to pieces. Constantius, notwithstanding the reduction of that important place, did not yet attempt the recovery of Britain, not thinking himself furnished with a sufe ficient number of ships for so great an undertaking. Where Dioclesian was this year, or what he performed, we are no where told. The following year, Dioclesian being conful the fifth time, and Maximian the fourth, Caraufius was treacheroufly Caraufius murdered by Allectus, his bosom friend, and prime minister, who thereupon usurped murdered by the government, and caused himself to be proclaimed emperor b. Constantius, while assumes the his steet was preparing in the ports on the ocean for the British expedition, cleared government of Batavia of the Franks, who had feized on that country, and transplanted them, Britain. with their wives and children, into other parts of the empire, destitute of inhabit- Constantius ants, obliging them to till the ground, to pay tribute, and to supply, when required, drives the recarring a certain number of troops. The emperor Julian tells us, that Maximian and Batavia.

d Constantius not only drove the barbarians out of the Roman territories, but built many forts on the frontiers, to prevent their making new irruptions; by which means the inhabitants long enjoyed a profound tranquillity d. It was probably on account of his victories over the Franks, that Constantius assumed the title of Germanicus, which is given him in an inscription of the following year, 194. quoted by Lattantius . Eumenius, the panegyrift, tells us, that Constantius performed many remarkable exploits before he attempted the reduction of Britain; that he utterly exterminated feveral barbarous nations, extended the limits of the empire, reftored many provinces, pillaged and laid waste Germany from the Rhine to the Danube, and took the king of a very fierce and warlike nation prisoner t. He restored to its ancient e splendor the city of Augustedunum, now Autun, which had been almost utterly ruined He restores the in the year 269. by Tetricus, for having revolted from him, and invited the emperor city of Autum. Claudius into Gaul. The temples, baths, and other public edifices, nay, and most of the houses belonging to private persons, were, at an immense charge, rebuilt by Constantius, who moreover embellished the city, in regard of its attachment to Claudius, his great uncle, with magnificent aqueducts, supplied it with plenty of water, transplanted thither the most conspicuous families in the other provinces, prevailed upon the famous orator Eumenius, who was himself a native of the place, to take upon him the charge of educating and instructing their youth, and, in short, did all that lay in his power to raise Autun above all the other cities of Gaul 8.

THE following year, when Constantius and Galerius were consuls, two strong castles were built by the latter on the Danube, in the country of the Sarmatians; the one over-against Acincum, or Aquincum, now Strigonium, or Gran, in Lower Hungary; the other opposite to Bononia, which stood between the Draw and Save, and is at present known by the name of Bonmoster. From the date of several laws, published this and the preceding year, it appears, that Dioclesian spent them both in Illyricum and Thrace; which provinces belonged to Galerius, whom perhaps he was come to affift &lt;sup>9</sup> Aur. Vict. p. 525, 526. BAUDRAN. p. 303. Aur. b Aur. Vict. p. 525. Eutrop. p. 586. Panegyt. 8. p. 108. 106, 107. d Julian. p. 12. Lact. perf. p. 366. <sup>2</sup> Aur. Vict. ibid. Panegyr. 7, 8. p. 93, 105. Panegyr. 1, 3, 7, 8. p. 3, 47, 93, 104, F Paneg. 8. p. 103, 107. Paneg. f Paneg. 8. p. 103, 107. 6, 8, 9. p. 85, 112, 114.

The Carpi intirely subdued.

Constantius invades Britain.

His army lands in the iftend.

by Constantius's men from Britain reunited to the empire.

against the barbarians on the other side the Danube: in the same manner we shall a fee Maximian enter Gaul to defend that province against the incursions of the barbarians, while Constantius was employed in Britain. The next consuls were Ty/cus and Annulinus. This year the Carpi, after having long maintained themselves in spite of the utmost efforts of the Roman emperors, were at length intirely reduced by Galerius, and by Dioclesian transplanted into the territories of the empire, chiefly into Pannonia . From an inscription of this year, we learn, that the emperors cauled the walls of Vitodurum, now Wintberthur, in the canton of Zurich, between Zurich and Constance, to be rebuilt. Aurelius Proculus, who commanded in the country of the Sequani, had the superintendency of the work. In that inscription, Dioclesian is styled imperator the tenth time, and Maximian the eighth. The following year, b 296. Dioclesian being conful the fixth time, and Constantius the second, the latter, after three years preparations, undertook at length the reduction of Britain. Eumenius the panegyrist pretends, that the Romans were every-where victorious; that they had recovered whatever they had formerly possessed (he ought at least to have excepted ancient Dacia); and, that having overcome the rest of their enemies, they deemed it a great difgrace, that such a wealthy province as Britain, which supplied them with many valuable commodities, should still be held by an assassin and usurper . Conftantius therefore, without further delay, resolved to pass over into Britain; and Maximian, to whom he imparted his resolution, hastened into Gaul, to prevent the barbarians beyond the Rhine from breaking into the empire, while he was employed & against the rebels in Britain. Constantius had equipped several sleets, and in different ports, that the enemy, not knowing where to expect him, might be obliged to divide their powerful navy. One of his fleets, commanded by Asclepiodotus, his captain of the guards, to whom historians ascribe the whole glory of the victory, fet fail from Boulogne; and escaping, by the help of a fog, the British navy, which lay off of the isle of Wight, and was ready to engage them, landed their men without meeting with the least opposition. Asclepiodotus had no sooner put his army ashore, than he set fire to his fleet, that there might be no hopes of safety, but in victory. Constantius, who had failed with another squadron from the mouth of the Seine, landed at another place, not mentioned by historians, and was received by d the inhabitants with the greatest demonstrations of joy. Allesius was encamped at a finall distance from the place where Constantius landed; but either not daring to engage him in person, or hoping to overcome Asclepiodotus before the two armies joined, he quitted his post, and marched with great speed against the latter. Conflantius followed him, but did not arrive, notwithstanding all the expedition he could Allectus over use, till after the battle, in which Allectus, who had engaged, hurried on by sear come and flain, and despair, before the arrival of the Roman troops who obeyed him, was killed; and his army, confisting only of foreign auxiliaries, either dispersed or cut in pieces. Before the battle, he had quitted the imperial robes, that they might not discover him; fo that the conquerors, with much ado, discovered his body among the heaps e of the barbarians who lay flain in the field 1. Part of Constantius's fleet, separating from the rest during the fog, entered the Thames; and sailing up that river, arrived This accident, which might have been attended with bad consequences, at London. occasioned a new victory. For such of the auxiliaries of Allectus as had escaped the general slaughter, fled to London, with a design to plunder that wealthy city, and London faved return to their respective countries with the booty. But Constantius's men landing luckily in the port of London at the same time, fell upon the barbarians, and made being plundered. a dreadful flaughter of them in all parts of the city; which was by that means, to the great joy of the inhabitants, happily preferved. Constantius granted a general pardon to the partizans of Caraujius and Allectus, and caused his own men to restore f whatever they had taken from the natives upon their first landing, saying, that he was not come to oppress, but to deliver the people from oppression m. Thus was Britain re-united to the empire, after it had been held seven years by Carausius, and three by Allectus. Of this victory, Eumenius the panegyrist speaks thus: "O im-"portant victory! worthy of many triumphs! By this Britain is restored; by this the " Franks are utterly defeated; and other nations in that rebellious confederacy, reduced > h Paneg. 8. p. 105, 107. John. rer. Goth. c. 16. p. 634. Aur. Vict. p. 525. Eutrop. p. 586.

>
> MMIAN. I. XXVIII. p. 357.
>
> GRUTER. p. 166. VALES. not. Gall. p. 615. FERRAR. de ant. Italic.
>
> 332.
>
> k Paneg. 8. p. 107.
>
> I Idem paneg. 7. p. 99. & 8. p. 109—111. Aur. Vic. p. 525.
>
> WTROP. p. 586. Euseb chron.
>
> Paneg. 8. p. 110, 111. Eutrop. p. 586. AMMIAN. 1. XXVIII. p. 357. p. 332. h Paneg. 8. p. 107. EUTROP. p. 586. Euseb chron.

a "to obedience. To conclude, the fea itself is scoured, to establish a lasting tranquillity 66 in those provinces. You, great Cafar, for your part, may with justice triumph in this " conquest of a new world; and, by restoring the naval glory of Kome, may boast, "that you have added to the empire a larger element than all its former dominions. -66 Britain is now so perfectly reduced, that all the neighbouring nations are under abso-" lute subjection "." Thus Eumenius, a greater friend to Constantius, as will appear in the sequel of the history, than to truth; for the brave Caledonians were not by him brought under the yoke, but still maintained their ancient liberties. The same writer observes, that from Britain, Constantius sent several workmen to be employed in rebuilding and embellishing the city of Autuno. Constantius, naving thus settled

b affairs in Britain, returned to Giul; and transplanting great numbers of Franks into Part of Gaul that province, peopled with them the countries of Amiens, Beat vois, Troies, and Lan-peopled by the gres, almost quite destitute of inhabitants, obliging the new corners to cultivate the Franks. lands, to pay the usual tributes, and supply the Roman armies with a certain number of troops P. The same year, Dioclejian recovered Egypt from Achilleus, who had caused himself to be proclaimed emperor, and held that province, according to his coins, for the space of near six years. Dioclesian murched against him this year in person, overcame him without much trouble, and punished him according to his Achilleusoverdeserts. Thus Aurelius Victor r. But Eutropius writes, that he fustained an eight come, and months siege in Alexandria; and Eujebius, that great numbers were killed on both Egypt reduced to sides, during the sieges. Dioclesian not only punished with death the ringleaders of the revolt, but filled Egypt with murders and profcriptions "; and even gave up, according to Orosius w, the city of Alexandria to be plundered by his greedy and enraged soldiery. If what these authors write be true, we leave our readers to judge of the sincerity of Eumenius, who tells us, that Dioclesian, by his extraordinary clemency, restored tranquillity to Egypt. Some writers observe, that he made a strict fearch after all the books of chymittry, written formerly by the Egyptians, and caused them all to be publicly burnt, left the Egyptians, inriched by that art, should be tempted to shake off the yoke anew. Constantine, the son of Constantine, attended Dioclesian in this war; for Eusebius tells us, that he saw him as he passed with the d emperor through Palestine'. The city of Coptos and Busiris in Thebais, having sided in this war with Achilleus, were by Dioclesian utterly ruined a. Zonaras supposes these cities to have been destroyed by Dioclesian, some time before the revolt of Achilleus, for having attempted to shake off the Roman yoke b. Eumenius tells us, that the victories gained by Dioclesian in Egypt, struck terror into the Indians and Ethiopians. However, the emperor was so far from taking any advantage of that consternation, and extending the limits of the empire on that side, that, on the contrary, he entered into a treaty with the Nubians, who used to make frequent inroads into the adjoining territory of Oasis, yielding to them a large country, as much, says Procopius, as Dioclesian a traveller could go through in feven days, on condition, that they prevented the yields part of e Blemyes, and other barbarians, from breaking into Egypt on the side of Ethiopia. Nubians.

The fame writer adds, that Dioclesian caused a castle to be built in an island formed by the Nile in the neighbourhood of Elephantis, and a temple, in which facrifices were offered, both by the Roman and Nubian priefts, for the prosperity of both nations. By this means, the emperor hoped to establish a good understanding between the Romans and those barbarians; and therefore called the castle Philas, that is, friendship. But neither the country he yielded to them, nor the pension which he engaged to pay yearly both to them and the Blemyes, and which was still paid in the time of Justinian, was sufficient to restrain them from making inroads into the empire, when not awed by the Roman troops d.

THE next confuls were Maximianus the fifth time, and Galerius the second. The former, quitting Gaul upon the return of Constantius from Britain, crossed over into Africa, cut in pieces the armies of the rebellious Moors, befieged their castles, and The Moors strong holds, drove them from their mountains and rocks, which they had hitherto subdued by deemed impregnable; and having obliged them to deliver up their arms, and fur-Maximian.

render at discretion, transplanted them into other countries. The same year, a Galerius de-ses, king of Perfia.

Narses, king of Persia, emulating the glory of Sapor, who had deseated the Roman armies, and taken the emperor himself prisoner, entered Armenia at the head of a mighty army; and having without much trouble reduced that kingdom, advanced into Mesopotamia. Dioclesian, mindful of the missortune that had besallen the unhappy Valerian, instead of marching against him in person, withdrew into Egypt, committing the whole management of that dangerous war to Galerius, whom he injoined to leave Illyricum forthwith, and hasten into Mesopotamia, to oppose there the attempts of the Persian monarch. Galerius obeyed, slew to Mesopotamia, and meeting the Persians between Callinicum and Carrbæ, engaged their numerous army with the few troops he had then with him. The battle lasted some hours; but in the b end the Romans, overpowered with numbers, were forced to give ground, and fave feated by Nar- themselves by flight. Galerius hastened to Dioclesian, to give him, by word of mouth, an account of the difaster, and advise with him about the most proper meafures to prevent the evil confequences that might attend it. The emperor, who, at his arrival, was taking the air in the fields, received him with the greatest contempt imaginable, and fuffered him, attired as he was with the purple, to walk one, or, as others write, feveral miles by his chariot f. This affront, instead of difheartening him, inspired him with an eager desire of wiping off the disgrace of his late overthrow. Having therefore, with much ado, obtained leave of Dioclesian to raise a new army, he assembled all the troops in Illyricum and Masia, made new c levies, and in a short time returned with a considerable army, and entered Armenia. All authors agree, that Galerius in this war performed whatever could be expected from a brave foldier, and experienced commander: he even went in person, attended only by two horse-men, to reconnoitre the enemy, passing himself upon those who stopped him for a deputy fent by the Roman emperor to the Persian monarch. Having thus viewed the enemy's camp and works, he attacked them so seasonably, and con-Narfes utterly ducted the whole action with fuch prudence and address, that only with twenty five thousand men he forced their entrenchments, tho' defended by an innumerable multitude, cut above twenty thousand of them in pieces, took an immense booty, and an incredible number of prisoners, among whom were the king's wives, sisters, and d children both sons and daughters, and a great many persons of the first rank &. Galerius treated the princesses with great respect, and would not suffer the least affront to be offered to them; which feemed so surprising to the Persians, that they owned themselves as much inserior to the Romans in chastity as in valour h. Eutropius tells us, that Licinius, afterwards emperor, fignalized himself on this occasion i. Narjes. who was prefent at this battle, and, according to Zonaras, wounded in the beginning of the engagement, fled with the rest, and took shelter in the most remote deserts of his kingdom; whence he fent Afharban, one of his chief favourites, to conclude a peace with the Romans upon any terms. Apharban, in the most humble and submissive manner, intreated the conqueror not to destroy the Persian empire, but to e use his victory with moderation; which, he said, would gain him greater reputation and fame, than the victory itself. As for the conditions of the peace, he left them intirely to him; and only begged in his master's name, that, mindful of the generosity which in all ages had been peculiar to the Romans, he would add to the obligations which he already owed him for treating his wives and children with fuch humanity, that of restoring them to their former condition. Galerius answered him, that it ill became the Persians to expect moderation in others, after they had in such an enormous manner, as was known to the whole world, abused their victory in treating their illustrious captive Valerian like the meanest of slaves, nay, worse than their beafts of burden. However, as it is beneath a Roman, added he, to retaliate f such indignities, and we are taught to spare those who submit, and humble such as oppose us, let your master know, that he may perhaps soon have the pleasure of feeing the persons who are so dear to him k. Galerius, having dismissed the Persian embassador, hastened to Dioclesian, who received him at Nisibis in Mesopotamia with all possible marks of honour and esteem. They held several conferences, the subject of which was, whether or no they should conclude a peace with the Persians, and

The Perficus fue for peace.

d feated in a second battle

by Galerius.

e Panegyr. 8. p. 105—108. f Aur. Vict. p. 525. Juli. orat. 1. p. 31. Ammian. l. xiv. p. 27. 8 Eutrop. p. 586. Festus, p. 553. Lact. perfec. c. 9. p. 8. Ammian. l. xxiii. p. 245. Zonar. p. 244. h Petr. Patric. in excerpt. de legat. p. 26. & 30. l Eutrop. ibid. k Eutrop. ibid. Petr. e Panegyr. 8. p. 105-108. Patric. legat. p. 26.

a upon what terms. We are are told, that they might have easily reduced Persia to a Roman province; but that Dioclesian did not approve of it, for reasons, says Aurelius Victor, unknown to us!. Sicorius Probus, one of Galerius's secretaries, was therefore dispatched to Narses, who received him with great demonstrations of kindness and esteem, and soon after admitted him to an audience on the banks of the Asprudis in Media, in the presence only of Apharban, and two others. The terms proposed by Probus were, that Narses should yield to the Romans the five following Which is provinces, Intelene, Sophene, Arxacene, Carduene, and Zabdicene; that the Tigris should granted them be the boundary between the two empires; that Nisibis should be a common empory yielding five to both nations; that the limits of Armenia should be extended to the castle of provinces to b Zintha on the confines of Media; and lastly, that the king of Meria should receive the Romans. the crown at the hands of the Roman emperor. Narjes excepted against the article relating to Nisibis, but complied with the rest. Whereupon a peace was concluded, and the Persian king's wives and children sent back to him m. This peace proved very advantageous to the Romans, and lasted forty years, till the Persians, desirous to recover the provinces they had yielded, broke it in the latter end of Constantine's reign. The above-mentioned provinces lay towards the springs of the Tigris, and on the Roman fide of that river; but were by the Romans commonly called the provinces beyond the Tigris, because they had been so called by the Persians. Instead of Intelene and Sophene, we read in Ammianus Marcellinus, Moxoene and Kehimene: as e to the names of the other three, there is no disagreement among authors. For these conquests, Galerius affumed the pompous titles of Perficus, Armeniacus, Medicus, Galerius is and Adiabenicus, as if he had subdued all these nations; and became so elated with puffed up with his victory, that Dioclesian began to take umbrage at his haughty behaviour, ima-his victory. gining that he would not be much longer satisfied with the bare title of Casar n. The following year, Anicius Faustus being consul the second time with Severus Gailus, Dioclesian built several forts and castles on the frontiers of the empire towards Persia, and furrounded with high walls, and strong towers, the castle of Cercusium in Mesopotamia, at the confluence of the Aboras and the Euphrates. The next confuls were, Dioclesian the seventh time, and Maximian the fixth. This year the Marcod manni and Bastarnæ received a great overthrow, and great numbers of their captives were transplanted into the Roman territories. From several laws it appears, that Dioclesian was this year in the months of January, February, April, and November, at Sirmium, and on the fifth of June at Philippopolis in Thrace 9. The following year, when Constantius and Galerius were consuls the third time, is quite barren of events. The next confuls were, Titianus the second time, and Nepotianus, whom Onupbrius takes to be the father of Flavius Popilius Nepotianus, who usurped the empire fifty years after . This year Constantius gained a remarkable victory over the Constantius Alemanni, who coming upon him unexpectedly, while he had but a small body of gains a signal troops with him, obliged him to retire, and shelter himself within the walls of victory over the had entered the signal be the Alemanni. e Langres. But his army arriving a few hours after he had entered the city, he marched out at the head of the detachment he had with him, joined his other forces, and falling upon the enemy, cut fixty thousand of them in pieces'. Eumenius mentions another victory gained this year by Constantius in the plains of Vindonissa, now Vindisch, in the canton of Bern, near the confluence of the Aar and the Russ. The same writer tells us, that a numerous army, confisting of different German nations, having rendezvoused in an island in the Rhine, while that river was frozen over, were by a fudden thaw that up there, and obliged to furrender at differetion to the Romans, who kept them blocked up with their fleet". Dioclesian was, as appears from the code ", on the fourth of July at Antioch in Syria. The following f year, when Constantius and Galerius were consuls the fourth time, a great dearth Agreat dearth prevailed in most provinces of the empire, occasioned, says Lastantius , by the in most provinavariciousness of Dioclesian, who, to obviate that evil, fixed the prices of all forts ces of the emof necessary provisions; but the rates being too low, the traders, instead of exposing to fale, concealed their commodities: by which means the dearth was changed into <sup>1</sup> Aur. Vict. p. 525.

M Petr. Patric. legat. p. 29.

Euseb. l. viii. c. 17. Lact. perf. c. 9. p. 9. Aur. Vict. p. 525.

Panegyr. 9. p. 121. Grut. p. 166, 167. Ammian. l. xxix. p. 359.

PAUR. Victor. p. 525. Eutrop. p. 586.

God. Just. l. ii. tit. 13. leg. 17. p. 201, &c.

FONDPH. p. 261.

Zonar. p. 244. Theophan. chronog. p. 5. Panegyr. 7. p. 93.

Panegyr. 7. p. 92.

W Cod. Just. l. ii. tit. 28. leg. 25. p. 268.

*Lact. peri. c. 7. p. 362.

a famine, which raged till the merchants were allowed to fell their commodities at a their own prices. The same thing happened in the reign of Julian, surnamed the apostate. We read in the chronicle of Alexandria, that Dioclesian gave this year to that city the military bread o: what is meant thereby, we are not told. Procopius writes, that Dioclesian ordered two millions of bushels of corn to be yearly distributed among the inhabitants of that populous metropolis?. Before the reign of Dioclesian, corn was given monthly to old and disabled persons; and in the reign of Constantine, to the ecclefiastics q. Dioclesian seems to have passed this year partly in Syria, and partly at Nicomedia in Bithynia, with Galerius r. The next year Dioclesian entered upon his eighth, and Maximian upon his seventh consulship. Dioclesian and Galerian passed the winter at Nicomedia in Bithynia, in consultations, not about the b means of extending the empire, and fecuring it against the incursions of the barba-The tenth ge- rians, but concerning the most effectual methods of utterly extirpating the christian neral persecureligion, to which Galerian had imbibed from his infancy an irreconcileable hatred. He found means to inspire Dioclesian with the same sury, and, as we may call it, madness; the effect of which was the most bloody and dreadful persecution the church had yet fuffered. This perfecution, which was the tenth and last general one, broke out on the twenty-third of February of this year, 303, the nineteenth of Dioclesian's reign, and raged ten whole years with a fury hardly to be expressed, the christians being every-where, without diffinction of fex, age, or condition, dragged to execution, and tortured with the most exquisite torments rage, cruelty, and hatred c could invent. Such numbers of christians suffered death in all the provinces of the empire, that the tyrants, imagining they had compassed their wicked intent, and intirely abolished christianity, told the world in a pompous, but lying inteription, that they had extinguished the christian name and superstition, and every-where restored the worship of the gods to its former purity and lustre. But the church triumphed over all the powers and artifices of men, and, in spite of the utmost efforts of tyranny, prevailed a few years after in the very metropolis of idolatry and superstition. During this persecution, Albanus Verolamiensis, Julius, Aaron, a crizen of Isca legionum, now Exeter, and other champions of the faith, almost without number, fuffered martyrdom in Britain. But to give an account of their fufferings, of their d truly heroic firmness, and unshaken constancy, would be intrenching on the province of the ecclefiaftic writers. Happy and glorious had hitherto been the reign of Dioclesian; but he no sooner began to imbrue his hands in the blood of the righteous, says Eusebius, than he felt the effects of divine vengeance in the many calamities which foon overtook him. A few days after the issuing of the first edicts

A fire breaks against the christians, a fire broke out in the palace at Nicomedia, where Dioclesian out in the pa- and Galerius were lodged, and reduced part of it to ashes'. Eusebius writes, that lace at Nico- he could never know how that accident happened ". Constantine, who was on the media.

the effect which was intended by the author of it, Galerius; for Dioclesian, ascribing it to the christians, resolved to keep no measures with them; and Galerius, the more to exasperate him against them, withdrew from Nicomedia the same day, saying, f that he was afraid of being burnt alive by the christians . About this time, one Eugenius pro- Eugenius assumed the title of emperor in Syria. He commanded five hundred men claimed empe- in Seleucia, who being employed in the day-time in cleanfing the harbour of that ror by a few city, and in the night in baking their own bread, to deliver themselves from that insupportable drudgery, agreed to revolt, and proclaim their leader emperor. Eu-fpot, ascribes it to lightning w; and Lastantius assures us, that Galerius caused fire to be privately fet to the palace, that he might lay the blame of it upon the christians, e and by that means incense Dioclesian still more against them, which he did accordingly x. Constantine tells us y, that Dioclesian was so disturbed with this accident, that thenceforth he constantly imagined to see lightning falling from heaven, which was in effect the beginning of that phrenzy, which by Lastantius and Eufebius is ascribed to the malady, of which we shall speak anon. Dioclesian's terror and dismay were greatly increased by a second fire, which broke out in the palace fifteen days after the first, but was stopt before it had done any great mischief. However, it had

° Chron. Alex. p. 644 P Procop. arcan. hist. c. 26. p. 77.

Evagr. p. 68. Atharapol. p. 737.

Cod. p. 240, 243.

Coetum. Coetu Z LACT. ibid. Eusen de martyr. Palæs. c. 2. p. 320.

a genius, who expected nothing less, refused at first the dignity offered him; but was at length prevailed upon, through fear, to accept it; for they threatened him with present death, if he resuled to second their designs. Being therefore arrayed with a purple robe taken from the statue of one of the gods, he led his men strait to Antioch, which city he reached the same day in the close of the evening, and entered it without opposition, as there was no garifon in the place, and the inhabitants were quite unapprifed of his revolt; but when he began to act as emperor, the whole city rose, and falling upon the rebels, for the most part intoxicated with wine, with such arms as chance presented, killed them all to a man before midnight. Thus the empire of Who are all cut Eugenius began and ended the same day . Dioclesian ought rather to have rewarded in pieces. b than punished the Antiochians; but on this occasion he betrayed that cruelty which The cruelty of was natural to him; for, without any trial, without paying any regard to the usual Diocksian to forms of law, he commanded the chief magistrates of Antioch and Seleucia to be publicly executed as if they had been all prive to the conspirace; which rendered him ans. licly executed, as if they had been all privy to the conspiracy; which rendered him fo odious to the Syrians, that they could not, without horror, hear his name mentioned ninety years after b. Among the many persons who lost their lives on this occasion, Libanius names his paternal grandfather, and his grandfather's brother, whose estates were likewise confiscated. Towards the close of the year, Dioclesian and Maximian, with their two Cafars, Constantius and Galerius, repaired to Rome, and there enjoyed the honour of a triumph, which the senate had long since decreed Dioclesian tric them, and their many victories and conquests well deserved. As Dioclesian, both in umphs, and leaves Rome. his triumph, and the sports that followed it, shewed greater occonomy than was pleafing to the populace, they took thence occasion to rally him with great liberty; which he not being able to bear, left the city foon after his triumph, and fet out for Ravenna on the nineteenth of December. As the season was then both rainy and cold, he contracted a lingering diftemper, which in a short time weakened him to such a His illness. degree, that he could neither walk nor fland d. He entered upon his ninth conful-.ship at Ravenna, having Maximian, the eighth time conful, for his collegue. In the beginning of the spring he set out from Ravenna, and passing through Venetia and Illyricum, carried always, contrary to his custom, in a litter, arrived at Nicomedia d in the beginning of the autumn. As his distemper increased daily, on the thirteenth of December to deep a fwoon feized him, that he was believed to have paid the last debt of mortality, and a report of his death was spread all over the city. However, he recovered his fight and voice; but his head remained so affected, that thenceforth he frequently fell into fits, which quite deprived him of the use of his reason. As he was not in a condition to appear abroad till the first of March of the following year, many persons believed he was dead; but that his death was kept concealed till the arrival of Galerius, lest the soldiers should, in the mean time, according to their custom, proclaim a new emperor. To dissipate this report, he shewed himself to the people of Nicomedia on the first of March; but there appeared such a change in his e countenance, that many doubted whether it was the same person. Soon after, Galerius arrived, who had already threatened Maximian with a civil war, if he did not resign the empire; and was come into Nicomedia with a design to oblige Dioclesian likewise to refign the fovereignty, fince he was no longer able to discharge the functions of the imperial dignity. As Dioclesian did not yield to the reasons he alledged, but only offered to take both him and Constantius for his partners in the empire, Galerius told him plainly, that if he did not refign of his own accord, he would force him to it. Dioclesian, frightened with these menaces, and well apprised, that Galerius, who had, for some time, been increasing his army with new levies, was in a condition to make good his word, yielded at length, and it was agreed, that Dioclesian and Maximian should refign the Galerius f fovereignty; that Constantius and Galerius should, at the same time, be invested with obliges him to it; and that, to preserve the form of government introduced by Dioclesian, two new empire. Cæsars should be named. Dioclesian immediately dispatched an express to Maximian, who was then at Milan, acquainting him with what had passed at Nicomedia. He was no less unwilling, than his collegue, to part with the sovereignty; but nevertheless, to avoid a civil war, in which, he was well apprised, Galerius would prevail, he came into the same measures f. Such is the account which Lastantius gives us of the refignation of Maximian and Dioclesian, in a piece not long fince recovered from * LIBAN. 07at. xiv. p. 399. & 07at. xv. p. 410, 411. b Idem ibid. a idem ibid.

**Constant Properties of Ammian I. xvi. p. 131. c Lact. perfect c. 17. p. 15. Euseb. I. viii. c. 13. persec, c. 17. p. 15. Ammian, l. xvi. p. 131.

LACT. persec, c. 17. p. 15. & c. 18. p. 16.

Vol. VI. Nº 3. Kkk darkness.

darkness. Constantine, who was then at Nicomedia, and lodged in the same palace a with Dioclesian, affures us, in a speech which he pronounced in public, that the emperor, thinking himself no longer able to govern, on account of the fits to which he was subject, resigned of his own accord &; and the panegyrists who wrote at that time, mention his refignation as a shining instance of greatness, generosity, and an utter contempt of all human grandeur; nay, they tell us, that both he and Maximian had agreed long before, and even bound themselves by a solemn oath in the capitol, to resign the sovereignty. Aurelius Victor writes, that Dioclesian quitted the government, and betook himself to a private life, that he might not be overwhelmed with the misfortunes that threatened the empire h. As two new Casars were to be chosen, Severus declared Cafars.

Sign the empire

Dioclefian leads a resired life.

10.2

Dioclesian proposed Maxentius, the son of Maximian, and son-in-law of Galerius, and b Constantine, the son of Constantius; but Galerius, rejecting them, prevailed upon Miximin and Dioclesian to name two others in their room, viz. Severus, whom he had already sent to receive the purple at the hands of Maximian, and Daia, or Daza, his fifter's fon, to whom he had a little before given the name of Maximin. They were both greatly attached to Galerius, but neither of them any-ways qualified for fuch a high station. However, Dioclesian consented to their election; and a few days after, on the first of Diocesian and May of the present year 305. the twenty-first of his reign, he resigned the empire in Miximum rethe presence of his court and the army, divesting himself of the purple, and delivering it to Maximin, whom at the same time he declared Cafar, together with Severus. This ceremony was performed in the fame place where Galerius had been declared c Ca/ar, about three miles from Nicomedia. Dioclesian, before he divested himself of the purple, made an harangue to the foldiers, telling them, That his infirmities obliging him to retire, he yielded the empire to Constantius and Galerius, who were more able and better qualified than he to discharge so great a trust. When the ceremony was over, Dioclesian passed through Nicomedia with a small retinue, and retiring to Dalmatia, his native country, chose the city of Salona for the place of his residence. The same day Maximian, quiting the purple at Milan, consigned it to Severus, as had been agreed on before-hand, declared Constantius and Galerius emperors, and then retired to Lucaniz, where we shall foon see him raising disturbances, with a design to resume the dignity which he had quitted. As for Dioclesian, he d patfled the remainder of his life, that is, near nine years, at a country-feat in the neighbourhood of Salona, on the spot where the city of Spalatro was afterwards built. The ruins of the palace of Dioclesian are still to be seen there, and take up two thirds of the town. It was, according to the description which Constantius Porphyrogenitus gives us of it, a most stately and magnificent building, and contained four temples, one of which is still intire, and the cathedral of Spalatro. Dioclesian diverted himfelf, during his retirement, with cultivating a garden, faying often, Now I live; now I see the beauty of the sun. Some time after, when Maximian and others wrote to him to join them, and resume the empire, he returned them this answer; I wish you would but come to Salona, that I might show you the colworts which I have planted with e my own hands: I am fure you would never thenceforth mention the empire to me k. He was long honoured in his retreat by the princes who reigned after him, and looked upon him as their common father, fince to him they were indebted for their dignity. In an inscription of the year 306, both he and Maximian are styled the ancient emperors, and the fathers of the emperors. In his time they confecrated the therma, or hot baths, which he had begun at Rome, and confulted him in all affairs of great importance, paying great deference to his counsels. Thus Galerius invited him in the year 307 to Carnus, or Carnuntum, in Pannonia, to advise with him about the promotion of Licinius m. However, several things happened afterwards, which gave him great concern and uneafiness: His daughter Valeria refusing to marry Maximin f after the death of her husband Galerius in the year 311. was by that prince treated in a barbarous manner, and banished. Constantine and Licinius, in the beginning of the year 313. espoused with great zeal the cause of the persecuted christians, whom he and his collegue Maximian had attempted utterly to extirpate ". Victor adds, that the two above-mentioned princes having been invited to the nuptials of Licinius with the lifter of Constantine, and he excusing himself on account of his age, they wrote a threatening letter to him, as if he had been concerned in the disturbances raised by Massentius.

B CONSTANT. Orat. c. 25.

h Aur. Vict. p. 525.

t Lact. perf. c. 18. p. 16, 17. Vict. epit. p. 543.

k Idem, p. 542. Eutrop. p. 587.

p. 26.

n Idem ibid. c. 41. p. 36.

ŧ

a Maxentius o. The same author adds, that the dread he was in of an ignominious death, prompted him to end his life with poifon P. Theophanes writes, that the fenate His death. had already iffued a decree for his execution 4; and Latlantius, that feeing himfelf, after a glorious reign of twenty years, ill used and despised, he resolved to put an end to his life, abstained from all food, and died of hunger, grief and despair. In the chronicle of Alexandria we read, that he died of a dropfy'; and in Eusebius, that he was consumed and worn out by a lingering distemper. He died, according to Aurelius Victor", soon after the marriage of Licinius, which was celebrated in the March of the year 313. after having lived about eighty years, and reigned twenty and some months. He was deified with the usual solemnities after his death w, prob bably by Licinius or Maximin II. for Constantine, at the time of his death, professed the christian religion. Libanius writes, that Dioclesian shewed himself in many, but He shewed not in all things, an excellent prince x; and the emperor Julian commends him him/eljia mang for having done many things that proved very useful to the public y. He enacted things an exa great many wholfome laws, and was fo far from countenancing informers, that he commanded them to be executed, when they could not make good their charge. He would not receive the accusation of one Thaumasius against his benefactor Symmachus, in whose house he had been brought up, and condemned another to banishment, for informing against his brother 2. He suppressed the officers called frumenc tarii, of whom Casaubon speaks much at length, without giving us any satisfactory reason why they were so called a. They were first established to give the emperor immediate notice of the disturbances that happened in the provinces; but abusing their office, especially in the distant countries, they often extorted large sums from the inhabitants, by threatening to accuse them, if they did not comply with their unjust demands. However, no great benefit was reaped from their suppression; for those who were styled agentes in rebus and curiosi, proved no less mischievous than the frumentarii b. Dioclesian encouraged and preferred persons of merit and virtue, discountenanced vice, managed the public money with great frugality, had much at heart the worship of the gods, and was, till seduced by Galerius, rather a friend than an enemy to the christians, of whom he had, till the year 303. great numbers both in his court and army c. He was greatly addicted to building, and embellished His public magnificence of that surprising fabric. Besides the bathing places, in which three thousand persons could conveniently bathe at a time, there were many other rooms and apartments; for the books which were lodged in Trajan's library were conveyed thither d. The emperor Constantius II. when he came to Rome in 358, admired nothing so much as Dioclesian's baths, which seemed rather a province, says Ammianus Mare tellinus, with no small exaggeration, than a building. Part of these baths were by pope Pius IV. changed into a church, consecrated to the Virgin Mary, under the title of Santa Maria degli Angeli. Dioclesian embellished with a great number of stately buildings many other cities, but above all Nicomedia, with a delign of equalling it to Rome, for which purpose he spared no cost or labour, that might render the place either beautiful or convenient. He built there a circus, several basilics, a mint, an arsenal, a palace for his wife, and another for his daughter. Thus Nicomedia became the ordinary residence of the emperors, when the affairs of the empire called them into the east, till the removal of the imperial seat to Constantinople s. We have spoken above of his magnificent palace or villa at Spalatro in Dalmatia, in which province he f likewise built the castle of Dioclea, in the village where he was born, the inhabitants whereof were called Dioclesians E. But these buildings proved very burdensome to They prove feveral cities of the empire, especially Rome, Carthage, Milan, and Nicomedia, with many stately edifices. From the ruins of his thermæ, or public hot baths, which are still visited and admired by all travellers to Rome, we may judge of the grandeur and the people, who were not only obliged to abandon their ancient habitations to make burdensome to room for them, but moreover to furnish workmen, beasts of burden, and the neces- the people.

9 Тнеорн. chronogr. p. 8. г Lact. реги. с. т. р. 317. ч Aug. Vict. p. 542. w Eu-LACT. pers. c. 42. • Vict. epit. p. 542. P Idem ibid. VICT. epit. p. 542. P Idem ibid. 4 Theoph. chronogr. p. 8.

LACT. peril. c. 42.
p. 36. Chron. Alexand. p. 656. Euseb. l. viii. c. 7. p. 317. 4 Aur. Vict. p. 542. W Eutrop. p. 586. Euseb. l. ix. c. 10. p. 364. Liban. orat. xiv. p. 399. Y Jul. orat. i. p. 12.

Cod. Just. l. ix. tit. i. leg. 17. p. 111. & leg. 12. p. 810. Casaub. not. in Spart. p. 22.
Aur. Vict. p. 524. Eldem, p. 525. Lact. perf. c. 10. p. 9.

Prob. vit. p. 233. Vict. epit. p. 525. Ammian. l. xvi. p. 71.
P. 7, 15. Constan. Porphyr. de administr. imper. ad Rom. fil. p. 72.

fary materials; by which means he ruined provinces, while he embellished the cities. If he happened not to like a building when it was quite finished, he caused it a to be pulled down, tho' reared at an immense expense, and to be rebuilt upon a different plan, perhaps to pull it down a second and third time h. Lastantius charges him with avarice, and with putting, under various false pretences, many persons to death, in order to seize their estates 1. Eutropius k, Zonaras 1, and Aurelius Vistor m, tell us, that, to cover the meanness of his extraction, he affected extraordinary magnificence in his attire, caused those who approached him to fall prostrate at his feet, affumed the titles of Lord and God, as Caligula and Domitian had done, and claimed divine worship. Hence Spartian, in addressing his works to him, uses this expresfion; I lay them at the feet of your deity". Other writers express themselves in the same style, whether they direct their speech to him or his collegues, who, it seems, fol- b lowed his example o. Dioclesian took the name of Jovius, and Maximian that of Hercules, as if they had been descended from these pretended deities, and even obliged their fuccessors to assume the same titles. Thus Galerius and Maximin added to their other citles that of Jupiter and Jovius, and Constantius the surname of Herculeus, which he transmitted to Licinius, and his son Constantine; but they soon quitted them; for Lastantius tells us, that in the year 320, the impious names of Jupiter and Hercules were abolished from off the face of the earth P. We cannot help observing, before we close this chapter, that tho' no reign was more remarkable, either for length, or variety of great events, than Dioclesian's, yet no prince's reign is less known; which feems the more furprifing to us, when we reflect on the great num- c ber of historians who flourished in his time. Many of them must, without all doubt, have written the history of his life, as we know they did those of his predecessors, which most of them inscribed to him: but no particular and distinct account of his reign has reached us; nay, a chasm even in the history of Zosimus, from the death of Carus to the refignation of Dioclesian, has deprived us of what we might have learnt concerning him of that, as we may call him, second-hand historian. May we not afcribe this general loss of memoirs concerning him to divine vengeance, for his attempting utterly to abolish the holy scriptures? This, at least, seems more probable to us, than what we read in a modern critic, viz. that the christians, out of hatred to so cruel an enemy, suppressed all histories and memoirs relating to him 4. d Of the writers who flourished under Dioclesian, we shall speak in our note (C).

AJumes the title of God.

h Lact. perf. c. 7. p. 7.

i Idem ibid. c. 9. p. 9.

m Aur. Vict. p. 523.

c. 62. p. 46.

Granus. not. in Spart. p. 201.

k Eutrop. p. 586.
Paneg. 10. p. 123.
V Zonar. p. 244.
LACT. ibid.

(C) Claudius Eusthenius, secretary to Dioclesian, wrote in four books the history of the four princes Dioclesian, Maximian, Constantius, and Galerius (45); and this is all we know of him. Vossius is of opinion, that Asclepiodotus wrote the history of Dioclesian's reign, because Vopiscus quotes him in relating some things concerning that prince (46); but as Asclepiodotus was captain of the guards to Constantius, and well acquainted with the court, Vopiscus might have quoted him, as he often quotes his father and grandfather, who never committed any thing to writing. The Augustine writers, viz. Spartian, Lampridius, Vulcatius, Capitolinus, Pollio, and Vopiscus, all lived in the reign of Dioclesian, though some of them wrote under his successors. Ælius Spartianus wrote first the lives of all the emperors, from Julius Cafar to Adrian, and afterwards resolved to add to them the lives of all the other emperors and Cafars, and to inscribe the whole to Dioclesian, of whose family he seems to have been (47). The lives of the following princes pass under his name, viz. of Adrian, of Alius Verus, his adopted son, of Julian, Niger, Severus, Caracalla, and Geta: Thole of Alius Cafar, Adrian, Julian, Severus, and Niger, are in-feribed to Dioclesian; that of Caracalla has no dedication prefixed to it; but the life of Gera is addressed to Constantine, already Augustus. What the author says in his address, gives us room to believe, that he had dedicated other lives to the same prince; nay, Salmasius takes him to be the author of the lives of all the emperors to Maximin I. (48). This opinion we shall examine anon. Vopiscus, in the life of Probus, names Julius Capitolinus and Ælius Lampridius among the historians who had written before him (49). To the latter are generally ascribed the lives of Commodus, of Diadumenus the fon of Macrinus, of Heliogabalus, and Alexander. The life of Commodus is inscribed to Dioclesian; those of Heliogabalus and Alexander to Constantine, who defired the author, as he tells us, to write the life of Heliogabalus, and to address it to him, as he had done several other lives before (50). He adds, that he designed to write the history of Alexander Severus, and his successors, to Constantine; namely, of the Gordians, of Aurelian, Claudius, Dioclesian, Maximian, Licinius, Severus, Alexander, who revolted in Africa in 308. and of Maxentius. These princes were, it seems, at that time all dead, and consequently he could not write this before the year 324. He tells us elsewhere, that he had written the lives of M. Aurelius and Macrinus (51). In some ancient manuscripts, all the lives that pass under the name of Lampridius, are ascribed to Spartian; and truly the lives said to have been written by these two historians are in every respect so like, that some learned critics have taken them to have been done by one writer, named Ælius Lampridius Spartianus. Cafauton and Vossius are greatly inclined to this opinion (51); the more because Vopiscus often quotes Lampridius, and never Spartian. On the other hand, Salmalins takes them to be two diffinct writers (52.) Julius Capitolinus likewise undertook to write the lives of all the emperors in fo many distinct and feparate books, as others had done before him; but, upon fecond thoughts, to avoid prolixity and repetitions, he joined several lives together, of such emperors especially as reigned at the same time (53). Under his name pass the lives of T. Antoninus, M. Aurelius, L. Verus, Pertinax, Albinus, Macrinus, the two Maximins, the three Gordians, Maximus, and Balbinus. The history of Titus Antoninus, M. Aurelius, L. Verus, and Macrinus, are dedicated to Dioclesian; and that of the Maximins, of the Gordians, and of Albinus, to Constantine, for whose sake he undertook the whole work (54). Perhaps Cornelius Capitolinus, quoted by Trebellius Pollio in his account of Zenobia (55), and Julius Capitolinus, are one and the same person. Some manuscripts ascribe to Spartian all the lives that pass under the name of Capitolinus, except those of the Maximins, of the Gordians, and of Maximus and Balbinus (56). Salmasius yields to the authority of the manuscripts (57); but Vossius afferts, that the lives commonly ascribed to Capitolinus, were done by him, and not by Spartian (58). Vulcatius Gallicanus, a Roman senator, undertook, in the reign of Dioclesian, to write the lives of all those who had enjoyed the fovereignty, whether by right or usur-pation (59), but of all he wrote, or designed to vrite, nothing has reached our times, except his history of Avidius Cassius, who revolted in the east during the reign of M. Aurelius, which is dedicated to Dioclesian. This life too Salmasius ascribes to to Dioclesian. This life too Salmasius ascribes to Spartian (60). But the name of Vulcatius, which is no common name, has not, in the opinion of Vosfins (61), been prefixed to it by chance, or mere caprice of the transcriber. Valejus takes the historian to be one and the same person with Gallicanus, who was consul with Bassus in the year 317.

(45) Car. vit. p. 254. (46) Voss. hist. Lat. l. ii. c. 5. p. 185. (47) Ver. vit. p. 13, 16. (48) Salmas. not. in Spart. p. 242, 243. (49) Prob. vit. p. 234. (50) Lampr. p. 45, 101, 136, 113. (51) Commod. vit. p. 45. Diadum. vit. p. 99.

Trebellius Pollio wrote the life of Philip, and of all the other princes, whether lawful emperors or usurpers, from his time to the reign of Claudius and his brother Quintillus (62). He had begun, it feems, this work before the year 291. when Tiberianus was governor of Rome (63). Great part of this work has been long fince lost. He likewise defigned to write the life of Aurelian; which defign if he ever put in execution, it was after Vopiscus had written on the same subject; for that writer glories in his being the first among the Latins who published the life of Aurelian (64). Trebellius Pollio scems to have been greatly attached to Constantion. tius the father of Constantine (65). Vopiscus thinks he overlooked some things, and was too minute and diffuse in others (66). His history of the thirty tyrants was published after the year 201. when Constantius was already Casar. He inscribed his work to some particular friend or friends, whom he does not name; but the life of Claudius he addresses to Constantine, and not to Constantius, as some have maintained (67). Vossius thinks his language and style not unworthy of praise, if compared with that of his contemporary writers (68). Some afcribe to Capitolinus the lives that pass under the name of Pollio; but their opinion is rejected by the best critics (69). Flavius Vopiscus was a native of Syracuse, and feems to have been descended of a noble family; for his father and grandfather, whom he often quotes, lived in great intimacy with Dioclesian. He was induced to write the life of Aurelian, as he himself informs us, by Junius Tiberianus governor of Rome (70), in 291. or 292, but he did not publish it before Constantius was created Cafar (71). He feems to have made some additions to it long after; for he takes notice of a faying of Dioclesian after his refignation, which, he fays, he had learnt of his father (72). He wrote likewise the histories of Tacitus and his brother Florianus, of Procus, of Firmus, and of fome other usurpers. He was employed in writing the lives of Carus and his children, while Galerius was waging war with the Persians (73); that is, about the year 297, but he must have alterwards added several things to it; for he mentions the shews exhibited by Dioclesian in 300. and says, That Eusthenius, who had been jecretary to that prince, had written his life, and the lives of his three collegues (74). From which expression we may conclude, not only that Eufthenius was no longer his fecretary, and confequently that Dioclesian was no longer emperor, but likewise that he and his collegues were dead, fince their lives were already written. The last of them died in 311. Vop: fens inscribed his works, not to he emperors, but to his friends. The lite of Firmus is odrelled to Baffus, and that of Probus to one Celfus, his intimate friend, perhaps Herennius Celjus, who aspired at the confulfhip (75), and was, according to Cajauton (76), governor of Egypt. Vorifeus was a great almirer of Apoilonius Tyanaus, and promises in one place of his work to write his life; but of such a performance no mention is made by any of the ancients (77). Thele ix writers, viz. Spartian, Lampridius, Vulcatius, Capitolinus, Pollio, and Vopifeus, are commonly known to the learned by the name of bistoria Augusta scriptores, though they are in effect rather biographers than historians, and take more care to inform us of the good and bad qualities of the emperors, of their birth, education, stature, mien, and even their diet, and the cloaths they wore, than to describe their wars, the laws they enacted, and the great revolutions that happened during their respec-tive reigns. Vopiscus, in the opinion of the learned, far excels the reft, both as to his me hod and style; but nevertheless has many great fautts, and is not to be compared with any of the ancient Latin hiftorians. As for the other five, they betray great want of judgment in their choice, and or method in digesting what they had chosen. Of these fix writers, Capitolians is the most confused and injudicious; whence some have jusp . Eted, that the author of this collection might have mixed and blended together the relations of Capitolinus, Spartian, and fome others (78). Their ftyle is quite coarfe and unpolified, their expressions uncouth, and sometimes hardly intelligible. Vopifcus writes, that Lampridius and Capitolinus minded rather truth than elegance in their narrations (79). Pollio owns his style to have nothing of the elegance of the ancients (80). But of the many historians, some say fifty and upwards, who have handled the fame subject, only

(51) Cafaub. in Spart. p. 1. Voss. hist. Lat. l. ii. c. 7. p. 192, 193. (53) Gord. vit. p. 151. Maxim. vit. p. 138. (54) Capit. p. 30, 29. p. 198. (56) Voss. hist. Lat. l. ii. c. 5. p. 186. (57) Sahist. Lat. c. 65. p. 18. (59) Cassii vit. p. 40, 41. (60) Salm. (52) Salmaf. in Spart. p. 66. (54) Capit. p. 30, 39, 96, &c. (55) 186. (57) Salmaf. in Spart. p. 108. (55) Trig. tyran. c. (58) Voff. biff. Lat. c. 65, p. 18. (59) Cassii vit. p. 40, 41. (60) Salmas. in Spart. p. 108. biff. Lat. l. ii. c. 5, p. 187. (62) Aur. vit. p. 209, 242. (63) Idem ibid. (65) Casaub. in not. p. 203. (66) Aur. vit. ibid. (67) Vide Voss. hist. Lat. c. 6, p. 190. (69) Vide Casub. in Pell. p. 203. (70) Aur. vit. p. 209. (61) Voff. (64) Idem ibid. (68) Voff. (71) Idem, (75) Trig. vit. p. 250. (74) Idem, p. 254. 116. (77) Aur. vit. p. 217. (80) Trig. tyran. p. 184. (72) Idem, p. 223. (73) Car. vit. p. 250. 95. (76) Cafaub. in Vopife. p. 216. (7 tyran. vit. p. 195. (78) Vide Cafano. in Spart. p. 13. (79) Prob. vit. p. 234. Vol. VI. No 3. Lll

the above-mentioned fix have reached us. Tatius, or Statius Cyrillus, was contemporary with these fix writers, and translated the lives of several emperors out of Greek into Latin. Constantine desired him to abridge them, and to join several lives together in one volume (81). His work has been long since lost. Sotericus, a poet and historian, slourished in the reign of Dioclesian, on whom he wrote a panegyric. He was a native of Oasis in Libya, and much esteemed by the learned men of his age. He lest behind him several works, and among the rest the life of Apollonius Tyanaus (82); but only a small fragment of what he wrote has been conveyed to us by the scholiast of Lycophron (83).

But of all the writers who flourished under Dioclefian, the most famous was the philosopher Porphyrius, born, as he himself writes, in the city of Tyre, or that neighbourhood; for he styles himself a Tyrian (84). St. ferom gives him the furname of Bataneotes (85); whence some have believed him to have been a native of Batanea, a village in Syria, according to Stephanus, or rather in Phanicia; for it stood within titteen miles of Casarea in Palestine. Perhaps the family of Porphyrius came originally from Tyre, and thence he ityled himself a Tyrian, though born in the village of Batanea (86). It is certain, that he passed part of his life in the neighbourhood of Tyre (87). Baronius maintains him to have been by religion a Jew 88) probably for no other reason, but because he supposed him to have been a native of Batanea; but in those days Batanea was inhabited not only by Jews, but likewise by Greeks and Syrians. It is true, he always spoke with great reverence of the God of the Jews (89); but at the same time he declared himself an open enemy to that people, as well as to the Christians (90). St. Austin styles him Porphyrius the Sicilian (91), probably on account of his having refided a long time in Sicily, and publishing there feveral books against the christians. He was descended of a good family. His ancestors were not Greeks, but Syrians, fo far as we can judge from the name of his father, who was called Malchus; which name he himself bore in his youth: but as the name of Malchus in the Syriac language signified king, Longinus advised him to exchange it for that of Porphyrius, which has some relation to royalty, the word woppupa signifying in Greek, purple, which was peculiar to the emperors and Casars. However, he was by some still called Malchus; and Longinus himself gave him that name in addressing a work to him (92). He was born in the year 233, for he was thirty in the tenth year of the reign of Gallienus (93). writes, that at first he professed the christian religion; but afterwards, upon his being beaten and abused by some christians at Casarea in Palestine, out of revenge he not only renounced, but undertook to impugn the religion, which he had till that time professed (94). Holstenius likewise supposes him to have been once a christian, and for that supposition quotes St. Austin (95); but that father only fays, that Porphyrius had read the scripture with great attention, but could not be reconciled with the humility of Jesus (96); from which words no one can conclude, that he ever professed the doctrine and humility of Jesus. While he was yet very young, he saw Origen, at that time in great credit among the christians (97), not at Alexandria, as Vincentius Lirinensis writes (98), (for he had left that city in 231.) but either at Cafarea in Palestine, or at Tyre. Porthyrius came to Rome about the year 252. He was disciple to Longinus, under whom he studied at Athens the philosophy of Plato, and made such progress in his studies, that he soon became the honour and ornament of that school (99). Though he was one of the most dangerous and inveterate enemies the christian religion ever had, yet this has not hindered the christian writers from doing him justice, and bestowing upon him the praises he deserved. Eusebius ranks him among the most illustrious men, and eminent philosophers, that flourished at any time (100). Cyrillus of Alexandria extolls his knowledge; and St. Austin styles him an extraordinary genius, and the most learned among philosophers (1). In the year 263, being then thirty, he passed from Greece to Rome, where he heard Plotinus, who taught there; and no fooner heard him, than forgetting Longinus, and all the other philosophers, he addicted himself intirely to him (2). Suidas supposes him to have been likewise disciple to Amelius (3); but the latter studied at the same time under Plotinus, so that he and Porphyrius were rather condisciples (4). Porphyrius indeed might have learned many things of Amelius, who was eighteen years older than he, and been in that sense his disciple. He lived fix years with Plotinus, and the fruit he reaped from his instructions was a profound melancholy, which in the end reduced him to fuch mifery, that he refolved to destroy himself. Plotinus, suspecting his design from some words he dropped, prevailed upon him to divert his mind from fuch gloomy thoughts by travelling. He therefore took his leave of Plotinus, and, in the beginning of the year 268, the fifteenth of the reign of Gallienus, fet out from Rome, and crossed over into Sicily. He landed near Messana, now Messma; but, without vifiting that city, went strait to cape Lilybaum, to see one Probus, who was generally esteemed a man of great learning. He continued fome days with Probus, without taking any food, or conversing with any one (7); but in the end got the better of his melancholy, and staid near two years at Lilybaum. While he was there, Plotinus died at Rome, about the beginning of the year 270. From Sicily Perphyrius feems to have passed into the east, to have staid some time at Tyre, and returning from thence to Sicily, to have croffed over from Lilybaum to Africa, and there visited the city of Carthage (6). From Africa he failed back to Sicily, and from Sicily returned to Rome, where he applied himself to the study of eloquence, and even made some public speeches or declamations (7). He lived to a great age, fays Eunapius; and Porphyrius himself, in his life of Plotinus, speaks of a thing that happened to him when he was fixty-eight; that is, in the year 299. or 300(8); so that he not only lived to the reign of Probus, as Eunapius Writes, but to that of Dioclesian, and perhaps longer; which confirms what we read in St. Austin, viz. that he lived in the time that the princes of the earth, and the adorers of the internal ipirits, contpired to extirpate the christian religion; and therefore could not persuade himself, that it had been given by God for a means of falvation; whereas he ought, continues St. Austin, to have looked upon that bloody perfecution as an evident proof of the giory and invincible strength of the church (8). He died, according to Eunapius (9), at Rome. St. Jerom feems to have believed, that he was buried in Sicily (10). He had married a widow, by name Marcella, who had five children by a former husband. Eunapius tells us, that he married her with no other view but to bring up her children with greater care, out of regard to their father, who was his particular friend(11). As the christian writers upbraid him with no vices, we conclude him to have been, as to his life and manners, altogether blameless. Eunapius cries up his eloquence, and the beauty of his style and expressions (12). He was thoroughly versed in every branch of literature, excelled all men of his age in the knowledge of polite learning, arithmetic, geometry, and music (13); but shone chiesly in philosophy, his favourite science and study. Authors observe of him, that whereas other philosophers studied to conceal their sentiments with an affected obscurity, Porphyrius expressed himself in a manner adapted to the meanest capacities (14). He taught philosophy at Rome both by word of mouth and in writing. Iamblichus, a celebrated philosopher in those times, and Theodorus of Afine in Peloponnesus, a man in great repute among the pagans, were both his difciples (15); as likewise were, according to some writers, Chrysaores, Nemercus, and Gedalus, who inscribed fome works to him (16). He was very communicative to those who defired to be informed and instructed, and kind to his disciples, whom on all occasions he was ready to affift to the utmost of his power. He applied himself, as most of the Patonic philosophers did in those days, to the execrable study of magic, which he disgussed with the plausible name of theourgia, or divine operation (17). He composed an infinite number of books upon different subjects, of which the reader will find a catalogue in the latter end of the differtation which Holftenius published on the life and writings of that philosopher (18). We shall only take notice of fuch of his works as are still extant. A manuscript has reached our times on the quantity and measure of words, under the name of Porphyrius, whom Holstenius believes to have been the true author of it. To Homer is added in several editions a small work, containing thirty-two questions concerning that poet, done by Porphyrius, and looked upon by Holstenius as the beginning of an intire comment, well known to the ancients. time writer published in 1630. a piece, which he alcribes to Porphyrius, on the cave of the nymphs, described in the thirteenth book of the odysty: the reader will find there many difficulties cleared up touching the theology of the pagans: at the same time Holstenius published a fragment of Porphyrius on the river Styx; and several other fragments of that piece are to be found in Stobaus. Porphyrius often quotes there the heretic Bardesanes, and his disciples, who, he says, lived in the time of Heliogabalus. He wrote in five books the curious history, or, as it is styled by others, curious entertainments (19). Out of the first book of this work, Eusebius quotes a long passage upon plagiaries, who copy from one another (20). Among his philosophical works, Holftenius takes, in the first place, notice of the introduction upon the universals, which he wrote while in Sicily, to explain to Chrysaores, his disciple, the categories of Arifotle. One Ammonius wrote a comment upon this work, which is still extant. Another work of Porphyrius, on Aristotle's categories, was first printed at Paris in 1543. Besides these two, he wrote a third on the same subject, in seven books, which he inscribed to Gedalus. This was in great part copied by Iamblichus, who likewise published a treatise on the categories longer than that of Porphyrius (21). In the latter end of the last century was published at Basle an introduction written by Porphyrius, on Ptolemy's work touching the influence and force of the stars; and several manuscripts of a comment by Porphyrius on another work of Ptolemy, treating of harmony and mutic, are still extant (22). His books, containing the lives and tenets of the philosophers, were well known to the ancients; but he brings them no lower than to Plato's time (23). The subject of the first book of this work was the life of Pythagoras, which Holstenius has published, but imperfect. The third contained the life of Socrates, of whom he speaks very contemptuoufly, having, as is supposed, compiled these lives with passages borrowed from the ancients, and among the rest from Aristoxenes, a declared enemy to Socrates (24). The reader will find, in the fecond book of Stohaus, great part of a work done by Porphyrius on what it is in our power to do, and inscribed by him to Chrysacres (25). The four books, which he wrote against eating of flesh, and the Latin translation of them by Bernardus Felicianus, are highly esteemed by Holstenius. These books are addressed to Castricius Firmus, who had an estate at Minturna, in the neighbourhood of Rome, and greatly admired, or rather adored, both Plotinus and his favourite disciple Porphyrius (26). Eusebius and Theodores have made use of several passages in this work, in writeing against the sacrifices of the gentiles (27). As this work Porphyrius condemned the facrifices, which the Jews were by their law commanded to offer to the true God, Diodorus, bishop of Tarsus, undertook to consute him as to that particular. St. Austin often quotes a treatise of Porphyrius on the return of the foul to God (28), divided into several books. This is, without all doubt, the treatise on the foul, which is often cited by Eufebius, and was divided into five books, written by Porphyrius to confute Bathius, a celebrated peripatetic in the time of Augustus (29). Porphyrius published another work on the faculties of the foul, out of which a long paffage has been conveyed to us by Stobaus. Holflenius has published several sentences or sayings of Porphyrius, which make up part of a treatife intituled, introduction to things intelligible. Eusebius and St. Auslin make frequent mention of a letter from Porphyrius to one Anebon, an Egyptian priest or prophet, containing feveral questions touching the nature of demons, the oracles, and magic. This letter was answered by Iamblichus, under the seigned name of Abammon (30). Eusebius and Stobaus quote scveral passinges out of a book upon statues, wherein Porphyrius is supposed to have excused, in the best manner he could, the worship paid by the pagans to their idols (31). Cyrillus of Alexandria has tran-fcribed some passages out of another book of his, inscribed to Nemercus, upon Divine Providence. Eufebius and St. Auslin speak frequently of a treatise intituled,

(81) Max. vit. p. 138. Voss. hist. Lat. c. 7. p. 193. (82) Suid. p. 784. (83) Voss. hist. Grac. l. ii. c. 16. p. 246. (84) Plot. vit. p. 6. (85) Hier. in Gal. par. prim. 156. (86) Vide Jons. l. iii. c. 15. p. 286. (87) Plot. vit. p. 12. (88) Baron. ad ann. 302. (89) August. civit. Dei, l. xix. c. 23. p. 253. (90) Euseb. prap. evang. l. x. c. 9. p. 485. (91) Aug. retract. l. ii. c. 11. p. 24. (92) Eunap. c. ii. p. 16. Plot. vit. p. 10. (93) Idem, p. 3. (94) Socr. l. iii. c. 3. p. 100. (95) Porphyr. vit. c. 5. p. 19. (96) Aug. civ. Dei. l. x. p. 118. (97) Euseb. l. vi. c. 19. p. 220. (98) Vinc. Lir. c. 23. p. 352. (99) Euseb. prapar. evan. l. x. c. 3. p. 464. Eunap. c. 2. p. 16. (100) Euseb. ibid. Porphyr. vit. c. 1. p. 10, 11. (1) Aug. civ. Dei, c. 32. p. 120. (2) Plot. vit. p. 3. Eunap. c. ii. p. 17. (3) Suid. p. 573, 193. (4) Plot. vit. p. 3. (5) Idem, p. 4. Eunap. c. 2. p. 17, 18. (6) Porphyr. vit. p. 2—12. Plot. vit. p. 17. (7) Eunap. c. 2. p. 21. Plot. vit. p. 16. (8) Idem ibid.

(8) Aug. civ. Dei, l. x. c. 32. p. 120, 121. (9) Eunap. c. 2. p. 21. (10) Hier. in Ezech. p. 377. (11) Eunap c. 2. p. 11. (12) Idem, c. 2, 3. p. 19, 20. (13) Idem, p. 18, 19. (14) Idem ibid. (15) Phot. c. 242. p. 1057. Steph. p. 121. (16) Porphyr. vit. c. 5. p. 44. & 51, 53. (17) Aug. ibid. l. x. c. 9. p. 111. Euseb. prap. Evang. l. iv. c. 6. p. 143. (18) Holslen. vit. Porph. c. 6. (19) Vit. Porph. p. 46—49. (20) Euseb. prap. Evang. l. x. c. 3. p. 464. (21) Porphyr. vit. p. 51, 52. (22) Idem, p. 54, 55. (23) Idem, p. 56. Eunap. p. 10. (24) Porphyr. vit. c. 7. p. 60. (15) Idem, p. 64. (26) Idem ibid. (27) Idem ibid. (28) Aug. civ. Dei, l. x. p. 9, &c. (19) Porph. vit. p. 71, 72. Euseb. prap. Evang. l. iii. c. 34. (30) Aug. civ. Dei, l. x. c. 11. p. 112, &c. Euseb. ibid. l. xiv. c. 10. p. 741. (31) Eutrop. p. 75. Euseb. ibid. l. iii. c. 9. p. 100.

intituled, philosophy founded upon oracles, in all like-lihood the same work with that which Eusebius elsewhere styles a collection of oracles. This work consisted at least of three books (32). St. Austin is of opinion, that most of the oracles related by Porphyrius in that treatife were feigned by himself (33). He published, by the advice of Plotinus, a book against the heretics called gnostics, to shew, that a treatise on magic, which they perused, and ascribed to Zoroaster, was a supposititious piece, and written by some of them (34). He published an incredible number of other books, which are mentioned by the ancients, and have been long fince intirely loft. But none of his works have rendered him fo famous as that which he wrote against the christians, to whom he bore an irreconcileable hatred, and whose religion he endeavoured to discredit with the blackest calumnies. He read with great attention the feri-ptures, not to feek the truth, but to find arms wherewithal to impugn it, fays Theodoret (35). He pre-tended to have discovered in the sacred books a great many contradictions, which were, it feems, the subject of his first book; for the whole work was divided into fifteen (36). He found the prophecies of Daniel so clearly and evidently fulfilled, that he employed great part of his twelfth book in endeavouring to shew, that the prophecies ascribed to Daniel had been published under his name by one who lived in the time of Antiochus, and wrote when the things supposed to have been foretold, had already happened (37). As Porphyrius was a man of great learning, and highly effected by the pagans, many were by his writings diverted from embracing the christian religion, which, however, triumphed in the end over this, as it had done over all its other enemies. The emperor Constantine, after he had embraced the christian religion, published some severe edicts, either against the person of Porphyrius, if he was still alive, which is not at all likely, or against his memory and writings, which he caused to be publicly burnt (38). Some authors think, that this punishment extended to all his writings; but Constantine's words need not be taken in so general a sense (39). That prince, to shew his aversion to the Arians, ordered them to be called Porphyrians (40). The christians did not fail to answer the ill-grounded calumnies, and sophistical reasonings, of their crafty and malicious enemy. The holy bishop Methodius confuted him in a very learned piece, which he published before the persecution of Dioclesian, in which he was crowned with martyrdom. Some are of opinion, that he wrote it during the persecution (41); but we can bardly persuade ourselves, that he was then at leisure to compose such a long and elaborate work, the bishops being, in times of perfecution, wholly taken up in relieving, comforting, and encouraging, the diffressed christians under their care. Eusebius of Casarea, a man of great learning and erudition, published, foon after Methodius, an answer to the calumnies of Porphyrius in thirty books; and Apoll naris wrote the same number of books against him about fixty years after Eusebius. But all these works, as well as that of Porphyrius, which they confuted, have been long fince loit. Julian the apostate borrowed from Porphyrius what he wrote against the christian religion; but he was fully answered by the pious and learned Cyrillus of Alexandria. St. Ferom, St. Austin, Eusebius and Theodoret, make use of several passages out of Porphyrius, in confuting the caumnies of the pagans; for that implacable enemy to the christian religion, notwithstanding all his hatred and molice, could not help uttering many things which redounded greatly to the honour of those whom he intended to traduce and expose: hence the judicious observation of Theodores, with which we shall close this note; viz. That as God obliged Balaam to bless his people, whom he was come with a design to curse, so he turned the tongue of Porphyrius against himself, and employed him as a means to desiroy the falshood which he laboured to establish (42).

(31) Porph. vit. p. 78. Jonf l. iii. c. 15. p. 289. (33) Aug. civ. Dei, l. xix. c. 23. p. 253. (34) Plot. vit. p. 10. (35) Theodoret. de Grac. affect. l. vii. p. 588. (36) Euseb. l. vi. c. 19. p. 219. Porphyr. vit. c. 10. p. 81. (37) Hier. in Dan. p. 567. (38) Socrat. l. i. c. 9. p. 32. (39) Idem ibid. (41) P. Pagi, p. 302. (42) Theodor. de curand. Gracor. affect. l. iii. p. 117.

C H A P. XXV.

The Roman history, from the resignation of Dioclesian, to the removal of the imperial seat to Constantinople, by Constantine the Great.

Constantius and Galerius acknowledged emperors.

PON the refignation of Dioclesian and Maximian, the two Casars, Constantius 2 and Galerius, were univerfally acknowledged emperors. Of the latter we have spoken above, and shall here give a succinct account of the birth, education, preferments, and qualities, of Constantius, the father of the great Constantine, to whom Extraction and the christian religion is so highly indebted. Constantius, styled in the ancient inscripreserments of ptions, Flavius Valerius Constantius (D), was the son of Eutropius, one of the chief Constantius.

(D) Constantius is sometimes called Julius by Aurelius Victor, to distinguish him from the other emperors of the same name (43) He probably assumed the name of Valerius, when he was adopted by Maximian, who had borrowed it of Dioclesian. As for that of Flavius, it was, according to some authors (44), peculiar to the family of the emperor Claudius II. whose great nephew he was. In some inscriptions, Constantius is falsly styled the grandson of Claudius; and in one, Constantine is called the grandson of Claudius, and the son of Constantius (45).

(43) Aur. Vict. p. 524.

(44) Vide Salmas. in Claud. p. 331.

(45) Gruter. p. 283.

a lords of Dardania in Upper Mæsia, by Claudia, the daughter of Crispus, brother to the emperor Claudius; fo that he was not, as some have styled him, grandson's, but great nephew to that prince. He is commonly distinguished from other emperors of the same name by the surname of Chlorus, borrowed perhaps from the faleness of his countenance, for fuch is the import of that word in the Greek tongue. He was born, according to some writers, on the thirty-first of March, of what year we know not, being only told, that at the time of his death, which happened in 306. he was, or at least seemed to be, very old ". In his person, he was well shaped; and in his aspect there was something extremely gracious and pleasing w. He was not so well versed in letters as in the military art, which he learnt under b two great warriors, Aurelian and Probus\*. An ancient anonymous writer tells us, that he ferved some time in the guards, was afterwards made tribune, and at length appointed governor of Dalmatia. He fignalized himself in war, and gained a great victory over the Alemans in Campis Vindonis, that is, in the neighbourhood of Windisch, at present a small village in the canton of Bern, the same year that Constantine was born, that is, in 274 2. He was made governor of Dalmatia in the year 282. or 283. by Carus, who had even some thoughts of creating him  $C \omega f a r$ , in the room of his debauched and wicked fon Carinus, whom he defigned to depose. Dioclesian, judging him well qualified for the sovereignty, agreed with Maximian to c create him Cæsar, together with Galerius, on the first of March of the year 292. as we have related above. He received the purple at the hands of Maximian, who by that ceremony adopted him; and hence he is fometimes called by the name of Hercules b, which Maximian had affumed. He took place of Galerius, tho' created Cafar at the same time, on account of his more noble extraction . Upon his being made Cafar, Gaul, Spain, and Britain, fell to his share. We have related in the foregoing reign, the exploits he performed in Gaul and Britain, while he was only Cæjar. When he attained to the empire, he governed the fame provinces with fuch justice, equity, and moderation, as gained him the hearts of his people, and made them look upon him rather as their common father, than their fovereign. He is d extolled, not only by Eusebius and Lastantius, whose testimony might be suspected, but by all the pagan writers, as the most equitable, pious, prudent, humane, and His excellent generous prince, that ever swayed a sceptre. He was not solicitous, says Eutro-qualities. pius, about inriching the exchequer, but pleased that his people should enjoy the fruit of their labour and industry. He was often heard to say, it was better the wealth of a country should circulate among the people, than be locked up in the coffers of the prince. For fear of loading his people, he was extremely sparing in his diet, furniture, equipage, and retinue. When he entertained his friends, and the officers of his court, he was obliged to borrow plate for the use of his table. What Eutropius writes is confirmed by Eusebius, who relates the following remarke able story, p ssing over in silence, says he, many others no less remarkable, but generally known: As the moderation and mildness with which Constantius governed An instance of were every-where mightily applauded, and it was generally faid, that he had no money the affections of by him, being unwilling to raise any upon his people, Dioclesian sent persons on him. purpose to reproach him with his neglect of the public, and the poverty to which he was reduced by his own fault. Conftantius heard these reproaches with patience; and having persuaded those, who made them in Dioclesian's name, to stay a sew days with him, he fent word to the most wealthy persons in the provinces, that he wanted money, and that they had now an opportunity of shewing whether or no they truly loved their prince. Upon this notice, every one strove who should be foremost in f carrying to the exchequer all their gold, filver, and valuable effects; fo that in a short time Constantius, from the poorest, became by far the most wealthy of all the four princes. He then invited the deputies of Dioclesian to visit his treasury, desiring them to make a faithful report to their master of the state in which they should find it. They obeyed; and while they stood gazing on the mighty heaps of gold and filver, Constantius told them, that the wealth, which they beheld with astonishment, had long fince belonged to him; but that he had left it, by way of depositum, in

Vol. VI. Nº 3.

T ZONAR. vit. Dio. p. 243. Ammian. anonym. p. 471. Spon. p. 193. Claud. vit. not. Salmaf. p. 331.

Byzantinor. familiæ, p. 43.

Bucher. de cycl. p. 276.

Euseb. vit. Conft. l. i. c. 18. Byzantinor. familiæ, p. 43. w Paneg. 5. p. 126. & 9. p. 192. *Aur. Vict. p. 524. Prob. vit. p. 241. Anonym. Animiano ubjunctus, p. 471. *Paneg. 9. p. 192. *Car. vit. p. 235. Paneg. 4. p. 115. C. LACT. Pareg. 18. *Aur. Vict. p. 136, 137. 9. p. 192, 219. *Eutrop. p. 587. fubjunctus, p. 471. pers. c. 20. p. 18.

His piety.

He favours the christians.

His issue.

the hands of his people; adding, That the richest and surest treasure of the prince was a the love of his subjects. The deputies were no sooner gone, than the generous prince fent for those who had affisted him in this exigency, commended their zeal, and returned to every one what they had so readily brought into his treasure f. Suidas writes, that, for his contempt of riches and grandeur, he was furnamed the poor s. Libanius too extols his tender and paternal regard for the people, who were bleffed with so good a prince; and adds, No prince ever loved money less; no prince was ever more loved by his subjects b. Eusebius frequently commends the piety of Constantius; and not only tells us, that he was inclined to the true religion, but that he acknowledged only one God, the Supreme Being; that he had honoured him all his life, had confecrated to him his whole house, and condemned the many gods b adored by the impious. This is in a manner telling us, that he was a christian; and nevertheless, neither Eusebius, nor any other writer, affirms that, at least in express terms; nay, it appears from Eusebius, that he esteemed and countenanced, but never professed, the christian religion. When Dioclesian, in the year 303. at the instigation of Galerius, began to persecute the church, he sent his bloody edicts to Maximian and Constantius, injoining both to see them put in execution in their respective provinces. Maximian obeyed with great readiness and joy; and Constantius, that he might not feem to oppose his collegues, suffered some churches to be pulled down; but was fo far from encouraging that, or any other violence, that, on the contrary, he preserved the christians in his provinces exempt from all the evils which they c fuffered in those of the others; insomuch that the church enjoyed under him a profound tranquillity, and intire liberty of worship k. Eusebius relates of him the following memorable action: While his collegues, fays he, were perfecuting the christians with fire and fword, he politically pretended to persecute them too; and declared to such officers of his houshold, and governors of provinces, as were christians, that he left it to their choice either to facrifice to the gods, and by that means maintain themselves in their employments, or to forseit their places, and his savour, by continuing steady in their religion. When they had all declared, the emperor discovered his real fentiments, reproached in most bitter terms those who had renounced their religion, highly extolled the virtue and constancy of such as had despised the d wealth and vanities of the world, difmissed with ignoming the former, saying, That those who had betrayed their God, would not scruple to betray their prince; and retaining the latter, trusted them with the guard of his person, and the whole management of public affairs, as persons on whose fidelity he could depend, and in whom he might repose an intire confidence. Thus he filled his palace, continues Eusebius, with the pious adorers of the true God, while the other princes exerted all their power to extirpate the christian name; nay, many ministers of God daily offered up prayers and vows for the happiness and preservation of so good a prince in his very palace, which seemed rather a church, or oratory, than the habitation of an emperor m. Tho' Constantius thus countenanced and honoured the christians, yet he never e embraced himself, which is altogether surprising, the true religion; at least we are no where told, that he did. By his first wife, Helena, he had but one child, viz. Constantine, surnamed the Great, of whom, as well as of his mother, we shall speak anon. He was obliged, in the year 292, to divorce her, and marry Elavia Maximiana Theodora, daughter to the wife of Maximian, by a former husband. He had by her three sons, Dalmatius or Dematius, Julius Constantius, and a third, named by fome Annibalianus, and by others Constantine; and as many daughters, viz. Constantia, Anastatia, and Eutropia n. Dalmatius, who was honoured with the censorship, died before Constantine, and left two sons, viz. Dalmatius the younger, who, after having been consul in 333. with Zenophilus, was created Cafar on the eighteenth or twenty- f fourth of September in 335. and Annibalianus, king of Pontus and Armenia. Julius Constantius was consul with Albinus in 335. and killed with one of his brothers soon after the death of Constantine the Great. He had by his first wife Galla, Gallus Cæsar, and another son, whose name is unknown; and by his second wife, Basilina, Julian, furnamed the apostate. Valesius, who calls the third son Constantine, takes him to

F EUSEB. l. viii. c. 13, 17. p. 309, 317. & vit. Conftan. l. i. c. 13. p. 414.

Suid. π. p. 466.

Liban. orat. 3. p. 104.

Luseb. vit. Conft. l. i. c. 13. & hift. l. viii. c. 13. p. 309.

EUSEB. l. viii. c. 13, 18. p. 309, 317. & Conft. vit. l. i. c. 13. p. 413.

OPTAT. mil. l. i. p. 44.

Lact. c. 15. p. 13.

EUSEB. vit. Conft. l. i. c. 15. p. 415.

m Idem ibid. c. 17. p. 416.

EUTROP. p. 586. Ammian. p. 2. Byzan. famil. p. 44. Goltz. p. 125.

a have been conful in 327. with Maximus, whose collegue is styled in the fasti Conftantine. As to Constantius's three daughters; Constantia, styled on the ancient coins Fl. Valeria Constantia, was married to Licinius in 513. Anastatia married Bassianus, who, at the instigation of Licinius, betrayed Constantine in 314. tho' he had then fome thoughts of creating him Casar. Eutropia was mother to Nepotianus, who usurped the empire in 350. and is supposed to have been married to Nepotianus, who was conful in 301.

BEFORE we proceed to the history of the reign of Constantius, it will be necesfary to give the reader a fuccinct account of the birth, education, and extraordinary qualities, of his fon Constantine, whose actions are inseparably interwoven with those b of his father. Constantine, styled in the ancient inscriptions, C. Flavius Valerius Aure- The birth, edulius Claudius Constantinus, was born on the twenty-seventh of February, about the cation, and extraordinary year 274. for at his death, which happened on the twenty-second of May in 337. qualities of his he was about sixty-four P. As for the place of his nativity, the anonymous writer jon Constanting of his life, published in 1636. by Henricus Valesius, and subjoined to the fifteen books timeof Ammianus Marcellinus, Stephanus the geographer 9, Julius Firmicus, who, according to the best-grounded opinion, wrote in the reign of Constantine, and Cedrenus', tell us in express terms, that Constantine was born in the city of Naissus in Dardania, The birth-place called also Naisus and Nassus, and now known by the name of Nissa. It is certain, of Constantine. that the father and ancestors of Constantine were natives of Dardania; that Constanc tine himself frequently resided at Naissus, as appears from the many laws which he enacted there; and that he ever shewed himself partial to that city, inriching it with many privileges, and embellishing it with a great number of stately edifices; whence it is styled by Stephanus, the birth-place and work of the emperor Constantine's. However, most modern writers of all nations, not excepting such as are most jealous of the glory of ours, do us the honour to acknowledge this great emperor, this deliverer of the church, as Eusebius styles him, a native of Britain, some of them supposing him to have been born in the city of Colchester, where Coellus, the father of Helena, reigned; others in York, where the Roman governors usually resided. We heartily wish, an opinion, which reflects so much glory on our island, were Whether bern d better grounded. But to speak our sentiments, unbiassed by any national prejudice in Britains or partiality, tho' we have had from abroad, and perused with great attention, the elaborate work, published at Antwerp in 1641. by the learned jesuit father Alford on this subject, under the title of Britannia Illustrata, yet we cannot say, that his arguments weigh down with us the above-mentioned authorities. The moderns have been led into this opinion by a passage in a panegyric pronounced before Constantine, wherein the orator, addressing the emperor, told him, that he had ennobled Britain, illic oriendo, which words equally import by being born there, and by being there made emperor. In the latter sense they are understood by Lipsius , and Livineius in his comments on those ancients panegyrists; but by father Alford and above seventy e other authors of different nations, whom he quotes, in the former w; nay, both he and Baronius think the above-mentioned words can admit of no other fense. For Constantine, say they, was made Casar at Rome, and emperor at Treves: but that he was created Casar in Britain; that he was there first saluted Augustus; and confequently, that the words of the panegyrist may, and perhaps ought to be under-stood in the sense of Lipsius and Livineius, will evidently appear in the sequel of this history from Libanius, Eusebius, the emperor Julian, Lastantius, and Eumenius, whom we shall quote hereafter. Aldhelmus, who stourished in the seventh century, was the first who wrote in express terms, that Constantine was born in Britain y: those who came after copied from him, and, as it generally happens, from one another; by f which means that opinion universally prevailed. Aldhelmus probably held it upon the authority of some tradition, or was persuaded by the ambiguous passage of the above-mentioned panegyrist. Eusebius, who relates the most minute particulars of the life of Constantine, never once mentions, which is very surprising, the place of his nativity.

Constantius had Constantine by the celebrated Helena, so much extolled, and not undeservedly, by all the christian, especially the ecclesiastic writers. Most modern authors, whether natives of this island, or foreigners, suppose her to have been the a

GOLTZ. p. 126, 127. PBUCH. cycl. p. 276. Byzant. fam. p. 214. LACT. p. 411,412. Anonym. p. 471. STEPH. in Naifo. FJUL. FIR. mathef. l. i. c. ult. Cedren. hift. p. 221. STEPH. ibid. LIPS. de mag. Rom. l. iv. c. ult. W Vide Alford. Britan. illustrat. p. 140—155. BARON. 2d ann. 306. Bucher. de Belg. l. 6. c. 15. Aldhelm. de laude virg. c. 23. authors.

Whether his was born in Nicephorus's account.

False and inconsistent with history

mother Helena daughter of Coellus, a British king, and to have married Constantius, who was charmed with her beauty, when he first came into Britain, in the reign of Aurelian. But this opinion is no better grounded, than the former relating to the birth-place of Constantine, there being a profound filence among the ancients, if we except Nicephorus, with respect to the country of this pious, as Eusebius styles her, and venerable princess. As for Nicephorus, he gravely tells us, that Helena was the daughter of an inn-keeper of Drepanum near Nicomedia in Bithynia; that Constantius, being seized with a lustful desire, while he lodged in her father's house, as he passed through that place upon an embassy to the king of Persia, acquainted therewith his landlord, who, to oblige the Roman embassador, offered him his daughter, a virgin in the b flower of her age, and of extraordinary beauty; that Constantius, terrified that night with a dream, in which he faw the fun rifing out of the western ocean, exhorted his landlord next morning to preserve his daughter from any further pollution, and earnestly recommended to him the child she should bring forth; that some time after, other Roman embassadors, who happened to lodge in the same house, chiding young Constantine, the fruit of that amour, and the child highly resenting that freedom, the mother informed them whose son he was, and at the same time shewed them a purple robe, the gift of Constantius. The embassadors, upon their return to Italy, acquainted Constantius with what had passed, who thereupon ordered Constantine and his mother to repair to Rome; but afterwards, not thinking them fafe there, on account c of the jealous temper of his lawful wife Theodora, he fent Constantine to Nicomedia, to be brought up in the court of Dioclesian, where he was instructed in the sciences, and the truths of the christian religion, which he embraced <sup>1</sup>. Such is the account Nicepborus gives us of the condition of Helena, of the birth and education of Constantine; an account which contains, we may fay, without exaggeration, as many notorious blunders as periods. But we shall for the present only take notice of two; and chronology, the one in point of chronology, the other of history; which, with every judicious reader, will be a sufficient apology for our rejecting, as altogether fabulous, the narration of that historian, tho' highly applauded by Lipsius a, and adopted by some modern writers of no mean character. To begin with the enormous anachronism d contained in that account, it is evident from all the ancients, that Constantine, at the time of his father's pretended embassy to the king of Persia, was twenty-nine, or at least twenty-seven years old. For Constantius was sent into Persia, according to Nicephorus, after Dioclesian had begun to persecute the christians; but his first edicts against them were published, as we read in Eusebius, who lived at that time, on the twenty-third of February, in the nineteenth year of his reign, that is, according to all chronologers both ancient and modern, in the 303d of the christian æra. On the other hand, Eusebius d, Epiphanius c, St. Jerom f, Victor 8, Nicephorus Constantinopolitanus h, &c. agree, that Constantine died in 337. being then sixty-four, or, as fome will have it, fixty-two; fo that he must have been born in 274. or 272. and e consequently was, at the time of his father's supposed embassy, twenty-nine or twentyfeven years old. Besides, Constantine himself, in his oration annexed to the works of Eusebius, tells us, that he was with Dioclesian in the palace at Nicomedia, when the memorable fire broke out there, of which we have spoken above; and that accident happened, according to Eusebius, a few days after the publishing of the first edicts against the christians. 'Tis amazing that Lipsius should, with other chronologers, suppose Constantine to have been born about the year 272. and yet admit, as an unquestionable truth, the fable of Nicephorus, which utterly destroys that supposition. As to the Greek historian's mistake in point of his history, he tells us, that the Persians having made an irruption into the Roman dominions, and threat- f ening the empire with a destructive war, Constantius was sent with the character of embassador, to try whether he could, by any means, even by the offer of a pension to be paid yearly to the Persian king, prevail upon him to desist from hostilities, and conclude a peace with the Roman emperors k. Now it is evident from Eutropius, Eusebius m, Ammianus Marcellinus n, Zonaras o, Aurelius Victor P, Festus 9, Lactantius r, > <sup>2</sup> NICEPH l. vii. c. 17, 18. LIPS. de magnit. Rom. l. iv. c. 11. ft. l. viii. c. 7. EUSEB. vit. Const. l. iv. c. 53. EPIPHAN. lit. m. l. iv. c. 11.

>
> EPIPHAN. lib. de menf.
>
> Euseb. l. viii. c. 7. p. 292.
>
> Niceph.
>
> Zonar. p. 144. hift. I. viii. c. 7. Luseb. vit. Conft. I. IV. c. 53.
>
> 8 Vict. in Conft. Niceph. Const. in chronol. c. 12. Luseb. I. viii. c. ibid. Lutrop. p. 586. Euseb. p. 170. Ammian. p. 109
>
> P Aur. Vict. p. 526. Festus, p. 954. Lactan. perf. c. 9. p. 9.

a &c. that the Persians had, at least fix years before the time of this pretended embassy, been utterly overthrown by Galerius, and had purchased a peace of Dioclesian, by yielding up to him five provinces, as we have related above. This peace lasted, as the same writers assure us, for the space of forty years, that is, till the year 337. the last of Constantine's long reign. But after all, we must not imagine Nicepborus to have been the only writer who questioned the legitimacy of Constantine, the chafity of his mother Helena. For Zosimus writes, that she was not Constantius's lawful whether Helewife. The chronicle of Alexandria calls her fon Constantine, in plain terms, a bastard na was Conchild. St. Ambrose gives us room to think, that this was a current report or tradi-fit nites's lawtion in his time; and that he himself did not disbelieve it ". The same thing is ful wife. b afferted in the Greek text of Eusebius's chronicle, published by Scaliger; and in that of St. Jerom, who has been followed by several eminent writers of a later date, namely, by Prosper, Cassiodorus, Aldbelmus, bishop of the West Saxons, and the venerable Bede, who, speaking of Helena, thyle her the concubine of Constantius. On the other hand, Eutropius w, and both the Victors x, tell us, that Constantius and Galerius were obliged, when created Cajars, to divorce their former wives. Constantius therefore had a lawful wife before he married Theodora; and we are no-where told, that he had any befides her and Helena. Scalger indeed pretends, that he was married to Minervina, the mother of Criffus, not appriled that Criffus was Constantine's fon, and not his brother; a pretty considerable mistake in a critic. The c anonymous author of Constantine's life, published by Valesius, writes in express terms, that Constantius divorced Helena to marry Theodora Y; and Eutropius, that Constantine was the fruit of an obscure, but lawful matrimony . At Naples is still extant an inscription, in which Helena is styled the wife of Constantius. In two others, to be seen in Gruter, the is diffinguished with the title of Augusta, which was never given, as is well known, to a concubine. The ancient panegyrists supply us with presumptions, of equal strength with these authorities, in favour of Helena's marriage with Constantius. One of them b, in an oration which he pronounced before Constantine on occasion of his marriage, addresses him thus: "You, O Constantine, make it your " study to imitate the continence of your father; treading in his footsteps, you prefer d " in your early youth the ties of matrimony to an unrestrained liberty, that you " may not be tempted to abandon yourself to loose and unlawful amours." How preposterous and unseasonable would this address have seemed, had Constantine been the fruit of an unlawful amour? By supposing Helena to have been the concubine, and not the wife, of Constantius, we at once turn the panegyric into a satire. For what can it be called but a fatire, to cry up the continence of the father before a fon, whose very birth is a proof of his incontinence; and to commend the fon thus unlawfully begotten for imitating the continence of his father? Helena is styled, not only by the panegyrists, but historians, a most pious, venerable, religious, and virtuous woman; which epithets they would have hardly bestowed upon her, had she been e Conflantius's concubine, and not his wife: neither would Conflantine, we conceive, have dignified her with the title of Augusta, had she not been his lawful mother. The emperor Dioclesian ever distinguished Constantine with particular marks of honour and esteem, whereof Eusebius tells us, he himself was an eye-witness; for he saw young Constantine on the emperor's right-hand, as they passed together through Palestine, either going to or returning from Egypt. He caused him to be brought up in the court with great care, took him with him whithersoever he went, and, in the year 305. when two new Cæsars were to be created, named him in the first place, no one, fays Eumenius, calling in question the right which he had to that dignity, as the fon of Constantius d. Eusebius, speaking of his father Constantius, says, that f at his death he left the empire to his fon Constantine, whose birth-right it was . Illegitimate children were not, as is well known, thus treated and respected among *Zos. l. ii. p. 672. Chron. Al. p. 650. AMB. div. 3. p. 123. WEUTROP. p. 586.

*AUR. Vict. p 524. Vict. epit. p. 542. Anonym. p. 471. EUTROP. p. 587. GRUTER, p. 1 5 Panegyr. 5. p. 126. Euses vit. Conft. c. 15. p. 601. Panegyr. 9. p. 191, 192.

*Euses vit. Conft. l. t. c. 19. p. 417. LACT. perf. c. 18. p. 16

VOL. VI. No. 3. No. 1

the Romans. Galerius is said to have alledged several reasons to divert Dioclesian from naming Constantine to the dignity of Casars; but among these we do not find the least mention made of his birth, which, had it been unlawful, would have surnished him with a stronger and far more plausible reason, than any he produced. Nay, we can by no means imagine, that Dioclesian would have ever thought of preferring Constantine, had he only been Constantius's natural son, to that prince's lawful chil- a dren by Theodora, for whom both he, and his collegue Maximian, had cogent motives to interest themselves. These arguments are of such weight with us, that, notwithstanding the above-mentioned authorities, we cannot entertain the least doubt of Constantine's legitimacy, unbiassed as we are by any prejudice or partiality with respect Helena's coun- either to him or his mother Helena. As for Helena's country and parentage, no writer try and paren- before the seventh century mentions either: those who slourished after that time commonly suppose her to have been a native of this island, and the daughter of a king, whom they call Coelus or Coellus. This opinion, grounded, as we conjecture, upon tradition, or perhaps the authority of some historian, whose works have not reached our times, obtained pretty early here, and produced the many churches and monu- b ments which were erected throughout Britain to her honour.

His courage and valour.

His singular continence.

Severus and declared Cæ.

But to return to Constantine. When his father was created Casar in 292. and fent into Gaul, Dioclesian kept him as an hostage, caused him to be brought up in the court with great care, and raised him, long before the year 303, to the rank of a Constantine's tribune 8. He already appeared capable of any degree of fortune, however elevated. excellent qua- The loveliness of his countenance, blended with a certain air of majesty; the tallness of his person, extremely well shaped and regular; his life without blame or reproach; his generofity, good-nature, affability, and obliging behaviour, towards perfons of all ranks, gained him the affections both of the people and foldiery to fuch a degree, that no one knew him, who did not wish to see him one day emperor, and was not c ready to contribute, fo far as lay in his power, to his preferment. The anonymous writer of his life fays, that he had no great learning: and truly learning could not then be much in request, fince none of the four princes who governed were men of letters. However, both Eusebius k and Aurelius Victor affure us, that Constantine was well versed in most branches of literature; that he was a generous encourager of learning; that after he was raifed to the empire, he fpent much of his time in reading; that he composed, and pronounced in public, several orations; and, that the many laws which he published, were all drawn up by himself. One of his orations has reached us, and is subjoined to the ecclesiastic history of Eusebius m. But he chiefly fignalized himself in war, and served with great reputation under d Dioclesian and Galerius, in their wars with the Germans, Goths, Sarmatians, and Perfians ". He often grappled with the enemy hand to hand ", and gave fuch proofs of his valour as raifed some jealousy in the other princes P. All authors, pagans as well as christians, agree in extolling, with the highest encomiums, his sobriety, continence, and the abhorrence he shewed from his early youth to unlawful pleafures q. He never violated the laws of chaftity, fays an ancient panegyrift; but subjected himself, when yet a youth, to the ties of matrimony, that he might not be tempted to fully himself with any kind of lewdness or impurity. He married to his first wife Minervina, of whose parentage and condition no mention is made by the ancients; and had by her Crispus, who must have been born about the year e 300. for, twenty years after, he fignalized himself in the wars against the Franks and Licinius. Dioclesian, before he refigned the empire, was for appointing Constantine, and Maxentius, the son of Maximian, Cafars. But their election was opposed by Galerius, who at length prevailed upon the emperor to name in their room Severus and Maximinus, who he knew would be intirely ruled by him, and blindly obey his orders. The former was a native of Illyricum, descended of an obscure family, abandoned to all manner of vices, and in every respect unequal to so great a charge. The latter was born in the same country, and no less meanly than the other; for tho' he was nephew to Galerius, being his fifter's fon, yet in his youth he had followed the mean calling of a shepherd; and he proved, after his preferment, no less f vicious than his collegue. He was yet a youth, and half barbarian, unknown to the emperors, and quite unacquainted with state affairs, when Galerius, who had taken him a little before from his flocks, named him to Dioclesian for the dignity of Casars. The emperor, terrified with the menaces of Galerius, confented, much against his will, to the promotion both of Severus and Maximinus; and on the day

E Euseb. vit. Conft. l. i. c. 12. p. 415. Lact. perf. c. 18. p. 17. h Euseb. ibid. l. i. c. Panegyr. 5. p. 125. l Anonym. p. 471. k Euseb. ibid. p. 418. l Aur. Vim Orat. Const. ad fanctor. cœtum, p. 567. h Euseb. ibid. p. 589. l Theorh. p. 6. ibid. p. 418. l Euseb. ibid. Panegyr. 7. p. 175. & 5. p. 126. r Panegyr. 6. p. 137. perf. c. 18. p. 17. Aur. Vict. p. 525. Euseb. l, ix. c. 9. h Euses, ibid. l.i. c. 19. p. 417. AUR. VICT. P. P EUSIB.

a appointed for his relignation, after having declared in a great affembly, that he yielded the empire to Constantius and Galerius, who were more capable than he of bearing so great a weight, added, not without betraying some concern and reluctance, I am likewise to name two new Cæsars, and these are Severus and Maximinus. The whole affembly was greatly furprifed to hear these two names, and began to ask one another whether Constantine had changed his? Their surprize was doubled, when they heard Galerius command Constantine to descend from the throne on which he fat with Dioclesian; and faw unexpectedly a young barbarian, who stood behind it, ftep forth and receive the purple at the hands of the emperor. The numerous multitude was firuck with amazement; every one asked, who Maximin was? whence he came? for what demerit Constantine had been excluded from a post, to which he b had so just a claim? but no one dared to oppose his promotion. This happened at Nicomedia; and on the fame day, that is, on the first of May of the year 305. Maximian refigned the empire at Milan to Constantius, and declared Severus Casar. Galerius excluded Constantine, with a view of becoming foon fole master of the empire; for he was well apprifed, that Constantius, who was subject to many infirmities, and quite worn out, could not live long; and besides, he hoped easily to get the ascendant over him, on account of his mild and peaceable temper. But he dreaded Constantine, on account of his courage, his experience in war, his address, and other extraordinary qualities; and therefore refolved to keep him in a private c condition, and allow him no share in the government, that it might not be in the young prince's power to defeat his vast designs ". As for the two new Cæsars, he looked upon them as his own creatures, and persons to be governed in every thing by him. Matters being thus fettled, the empire was divided between Constantius The empire and Galerius. To the share of the former fell Gaul, Italy, Africa, Spain, and Bri-divided betain; the latter had Illyricum, Pannonia, Thrace, Macedon, Greece, Afia Minor, Egypt, frantius and Judea, Syria, and all the eastern provinces. Constantius yielded to Severus, Italy Galerius. and Africa, as did Galerius, Syria and Egypt, to his nephew Maximin w. Severus, who was created Cæ/ar, to govern under Constantius, is always named before Maximin, who governed under Galerius x. As Severus was indebted to Galerius alone for d his promotion, that prince expected he should obey him even against Constantius himself . However, it is certain, that notwithstanding the implacable hatred which Galerius had to the christians, the perfecution ceased both in Italy, and the other western provinces, soon after Constantius was declared emperor. In the mean time, Constantine continued at Nicomedia, in the heart of the provinces belonging to Galerius, who would not, tho' earnestly intreated by his father Constantius, during a dangerous malady, with which he was feized, fuffer him to depart; but pretending a great affection to him, kept him by way of hoftage a. Victor the younger tells us, that he kept him with him at Rome b; but it is certain, that Galerius never came to that city . As the extraordinary qualities of that prince gave the emperor great e umbrage, he only waited some opportunity of destroying him; but not daring, Galerius seeks through fear of the foldiery, by whom Constantine was greatly beloved, to make the destruction any open attempt, he had recourse to treachery, and exposed him, under various of Constantine. fpecious pretences, to many dangers; from which he was happily delivered by the watchful providence of God, whose church he was to deliver from the persecution with which it had been cruelly oppressed for the space of near three hundred years. Praxagoras, a pagan author, who compiled in two books the history of the first emperors, and wrote, according to Vossius, in the time of Constantine, or his children, tells us, that Galerius often encouraged him to enter the lifts with wild beafts, on which occasion he once killed a lion of extraordinary sterceness and size d. The f same thing is related by Zonaras, who adds, that Galerius, in the Sarmatian war, observing one of the chiefs of the barbarians, who surpassed all the others in stature, and the fierceness of his looks, ordered Constantine to engage him, which he did accordingly with great refolution and intrepidity, overcame him, and throwing him to the ground, dragged him by the hair to the emperor's prefence, and laid him at his feet e. On another occasion, Galerius, who sought his destruction, having ordered him to crofs a marsh at the head of some troops, he entered it the first Lact. perf. c. 19. p. 17, 18. Lact. c. 18. p. 17. W EUTROP. p. 5205 l. ii. p. 672. Vide Spon p. 192. Y Lact. perf. c. 18. 20 p. 17—tyr. Pawftin. Lact. perf. p. 406. Vict. p. 525. C Lact. perf. c. 67. p. 64. Voss. hift. Gr.c. l. ii. c. 17. C Znar. vit. Dioclef. p. 246. w EUTROP. p. 587. AUR. VICT. p. 525. Y LACT. perf. c. 18. 20 p. 17—19. 2 Eu VICT. p. 525. 4 LACT. perf. c. 27. p. 25. Eusen de mar-on horse-back; and being followed by his men, put great numbers of the enemy a to the fword, and gained a complete victory f. This too happened in Galerius's war with the Sarmatians, which we must place in this, or in the beginning of the next year.

THE following year, Constantius and Galerius being both consuls the fixth time, the latter, finding he could no longer detain Constantine without openly breaking with his collegue, gave him at length leave to depart, and figned a warrant for the officers of the post to supply him with the necessary horses and chariots. This warrant he delivered to him in the evening; but at the same time ordered him not to make use of it till the next morning, when he defigned to give him his final instructions s. In the mean time, he dispatched an express to Severus, injoining him, by all means, b to stop Constantine, and prevent his arrival in the provinces governed by his father. That the express might reach Italy before Constantine, he did not rise that day, contrary to his custom, till noon, when he sent for Constantine. But he had set out the night before, as foon as Galerius had withdrawn; and travelling with all possible fpeed, for several stages, hamstringed or killed the horses which he did not make use of, that no one might pursue or stop him while he crossed the provinces of Galerius, and Italy, where Severus ruled. This precaution faved him; for next morning, Galerius, being informed, that he had fet out the night before, flew into a violent passion, and ordered several messengers to make what haste they could after him; but he was told, that Constantine had disabled all the post-horses; which transported c

Constantine escapes from Galerius to his father.

Constantius Picts.

The death of Constantius.

He bequeaths the empire to Constantine.

him to fuch a degree, that, through grief and rage, he could scarce forbear burtling into tears h. Eusebius, Lastantius, and several historians, tell us, that Constantine, arriving in Britain, found his father at the point of death; but therein they must certainly be mistaken, since Eumenius, in the panegyric which he pronounced before Constantine a few years after, writes, that he arrived while his father was weighing anchor with a design to pass over into Britain. With him agrees the anonymous writer, published by Valesius, who says, that Constantine found his father at Gesso-Passes over riacum, or Boulogne k. He attended him into Britain, where he was going to make Britain, where war, says Eumenius, upon the Caledonians and Pists. The latter people, now first mentioned in history, inhabited Scotland; but were thought, says Bede, to have come d overcomes the from Scythia, that is, according to the learned Usher, from Scandinavia, or some other northern country m. Constantius, in the last days of his life, overcame the Pills, as the anonymous author quoted above informs us ", being affifted in this war, as we read in Aurelius Victor o, by Eroc, or, as others style him, Crocus, king of the Alemans. Not long after this victory over the PiAs, he died at York on the twenty-fifth of July in 306. the fourth year of the persecution of Dioclesian, according to St. Jerom P; and the fixteenth, or rather fifteenth, of his reign, reckoning from the time he had been created Cæsar, that is, from the year 292, for he had enjoyed that dignity thirteen years and two months, and the empire one year, and near three months 9. He died in his palace, surrounded by his children, and his body was e with the utmost pomp and magnificence interred by his son Constantine. Some pretend, that he was buried at a place called Cair Segeint, and by some Cair Custeint, that is, the city of Constantius or Constantiner. In 1283. a body was found at a small distance from that place, which Edward I. who reigned then, caused to be removed to a church, believing it to be the body of Constantius. This was not agreeable to the canons. Not long before, as some persons were digging in a place at York, where Constantius was supposed to have been buried, they discovered a lamp that was still burning'. After his death, he was ranked among the gods, as appears from several ancient coins, and among the rest from one of his brother-inlaw Maxentius. Constantius bequeathed the empire to his son Constantine , who f declared he would not accept it without the confent of the other princes, to whom he immediately wrote, acquainting them with the death and last will of his father. But the foldiers, by whom he was greatly beloved, impatient of delays, proclaimed

f Ammian. Anonym. p. 471.

8 Lact. c. 24. p. 22. Euseb. Conft. vit. l. i. c. 20.

h Euseb. p. 418. Ammian. Anonym. p. 471. Lact. p. 21. Zos. l. ii. p. 672. Aur. Vict. p. 525.

h Panegyr. g. p. 194.

k Ammian. Anonym. p. 472.

Panegyr. g. p. 194.

p. 581, 578, 579.

n Anonym. p. 471.

O Vict. epit. p. 943.

P Hier. chron.

q Aur. Vict. p. 124.

Euseb. chron.

Goltz. p. 124. Eutop. p. 587. Panegyr. g. p. 194.

** Usser. ecclef. Prit. antiq. p. 60.

Alford. ann. ad ann. 306.

Birag. p. 440.

** Euseb. vit. Conft. l. i. c. 21. p. 418

Julian. Orat. 1. p. 13. Lact. perf. c. 24. p. 21.

Panegyr. 5. p. 127.

8 9. p. 194.

a him emperor the same day in which his father died, and, the first time he appeared in public, faluted him with the title of Augustus, and forced him to accept the purple, who is saluted knowing him, fays Zosimus, a writer no-ways biassed in his favour, to be truly Augustus by worthy of the empire, and promising themselves great things from his generosity a. the soldiery. Thus was Constantine first declared emperor in Britain, the same day in which his father died; that is, on the twenty-fifth of July of the year 306. which, in an ancient calendar, is marked as the first day of his reign w. Lastantius tells us in express terms, that, uppn his father's death, he took the title of Augustus x; and Eusebius x, that he performed his father's obsequies clad in purple; which is a plain proof, that he took, in Britain at least, the title of Cæsar, which however those must deny, who b maintain him to have been born in Britain, as we have observed above. He afterwards fent his image to the other emperors, adorned, according to custom, with the marks of the imperial dignity. Galerius was long in suspense whether or no he should receive it; nay, transported with rage, he was upon the point of condemning both the image, and the messenger who brought it, to the slames; but his friends remonstrating, that such an affront would give rise to a civil war, in which the soldiery would in all likelihood abandon him, and fide with Constantine, he was prevailed upon to receive his image, and to fend him the purple, that he might at least feem to hold his authority of him 2. However, he gave him only the title of Cafar, and Galerius grants created Severus emperor, whose provinces, viz. Italy and Africa, he governed with him only the title of Casfar. c as absolute a sway as his own, oppressing them with endless taxes, and practising unheard-of cruelties upon such as were not in a condition to comply with his unjust demands. This occasioned great disturbances in all the cities of Italy, but especially in Rome; which Maxentius laying hold of, caused himself to be proclaimed emperor Maxentius by the diffatisfied foldiery and people. Maxentius was, or at least passed for, the son causes himself of Maximian; for some writers tell us, that he was a supposititious child, and that ed emperor. his mother, before her death, owned she had imposed him upon her husband to gain his affection. However that be, he was quite destitute of every commendable quality, proud, arrogant, cruel, ill-shaped, or rather deformed in his person, abandoned to all manner of vices, and univerfally abhorred, not only by his father's friends, d but by his father himself, and much more by Galerius, whose daughter he had married. He had highly complained of Galerius, for excluding him in the year 305. from the dignity of Casar; but when he heard that Constantine had been raised to that high station, and saw his image publicly exposed in Rome, transported with rage, he refolved at all events to do himself justice; and accordingly, having with large promises gained over the sew prætorian guards that were then in Rome, and some of their officers, namely, Lucianus, Marcellus, and Marcellinus, he caused himself to be proclaimed emperor on the twenty-eight of October of this year 306. and was acknowledged as such by the Roman people, who hoped, by his means, to deliver themselves from the insupportable tyranny of Galerius. The news of his revolt no fooner reached the east, where Galerius then was, than he dispatched a messenger to Severus, injoining him to hasten with all his forces to Rome, to surprise and suppress at once this new usurper. On the other hand, Maxentius had recourse to his father Maximian, who, either with a view to refume the empire, which he had quitted much against his will, or to support his son, hastened to Rome, and thence wrote to Dioclefian, exhorting him to abandon his folitude, and remount the throne. Dioclefian, taken with the sweets and tranquillity of a private and retired life, returned him the answer which we have related above. But Maximian, instead of following Maximian rehis example, fuffered himself to be declared emperor a second time by the senate and sumes the empeople of Rome; and receiving the purple at the hands of his fon, was universally pire. F acknowledged for his collegue in the empire 2. Aurelius Victor writes, that his lust of reigning, and defire of supporting his fon in his claim to the empire, prompted him to quit his folitude, and refume the authority which he had unwillingly abdicated b. While these things passed at Rome, Constantine was busied in visiting the provinces under his care, viz. Britain, Spain, and Gaul, and defending them against the barbarians. His father Constantius had no sooner left Gaul, to make war upon the Los. I. ii. p. 67. W Buch. cycl. p. 286. Lact. perf. c. 24, 25. p. 23. Y Euseb. Conft. vit. l. i. c. 22. p. 419. Lact. perf. c. 25. p. 22. Zos. l. ii. p. 672. VICT. epit. p. 543. Lact. perf. c. 18.p. 16, 17. Zos. l. ii. p. 672. Eutrop. p. 587. Euseb. vit. Conft. p. 498. Panegyr. 5. VOL. VI. No. 7 Vol. VI. Nº 3. PiT: $O \circ \circ$

The Franks break into . Gaul, but are Constantine. His severity towards the captives.

Pitts in Britain, than the Franks, forgetful of their oaths, had invaded Gaul, and a committed there dreadful ravages. Against them therefore Constantine marched at the head of a powerful army, overcame them in a pitched battle; and having taken two of their kings prisoners, Ascaric and Gaisus, or Regaisus, he exposed them to be devoured by the wild beafts in the magnificent shews which he afterwards exhibited c. He thought himself obliged, says the panegyrist 4, to renew the severity of the ancient Romans towards their captive kings, in order to restrain, with the fear of punishment. a perfidious people, who made no account of the most facred ties that awed other Eutropius writes, that he treated in like manner the kings of the Alemans, who, it seems, were in consederacy with the Franks, and fell into his hands in this war . After this victory, he passed the Rbine, and entering the country of the b Brutterians, when least expected, made a dreadful havock of that people, and took a great many prisoners, whom he likewise condemned to be devoured by the wild beafts f. He repaired all the forts on the Rbine, placed numerous garifons in them, kept there a powerful fleet, and by that means struck such terror into the Franks and other German nations, that none of them dared to approach that river 8. He even undertook to build a bridge over the Rhine, and accomplished, according to Baudrand, that great work; for he tells us, that it stood till the year 955. when it was broken down by bishop Berno's orders. But Valesius k writes, that it was never finished, supposing, we imagine, (for he alledges no proof in favour of his opinion) that fuch a memorable work would have been more famous in history, had it ever c been executed. Bucherius writes, that Constantine, to defend this bridge, built, or repaired, the castle of Duitz on the Rhine, over-against Cologne. Be that as it will, Constantine, in memory of his victory over the Franks, appointed solemn sports, called from them ludi Francici, to be annually celebrated from the fourteenth of July to the twentieth m. Notwithstanding the severity he exerted towards the enemy, Lastan-The mildness of tius a and Eusebius affure us, that he governed his subjects with extraordinary his government mildness and moderation; that to all he shewed himself kind, affable, benevolent, and good-natured; that he made it his chief study to render those happy who lived under his administration, &c.

THE following year Severus and Maximinus were created consuls by Galerius, and d acknowledged as such in all the provinces of the empire, except those that obeyed Maxentius, where Maximian caused himself to be declared consult he ninth time. This is what we look upon as most probable; for the consusion which appears this year 307. in the consular tables, was the natural consequence of that which prevailed in the empire. Constantine was likewise consul this year, having, as we conjecture, been substituted in the room of Severus, who was killed before the year expired. Many writers, to avoid the confusion occasioned by such a number of consuls, have chosen to date this with the consuls of the preceding year, whereof we have not yet had any instance, but shall have frequently in succeeding times. This year Severus, in com-pliance with the orders he had received from Galerius, lest Milan, and marched e towards Rome, to drive from thence the usurper Maxentius. He had with him a powerful army; but confisting of troops which two years before had belonged to Maximian, the father of Maxentius, they were easily gained over by the latter, with Anullinus, who commanded them in quality of captain of the guards. Hence Severus no sooner approached Rome, with a design to besiege it, than they Hels abandon- abandoned him, and joined his rival. Hereupon Severus, with a small body of troops that remained faithful to him, betook himself to flight, bending his rout towards Milan; but being closely pursued by Maximian, who met him at the head of some troops which he had raifed in Campania, and was leading to Rome, he was obliged to that himself up in Ravenna; which Maximian immediately invested. The place was f well fortified, and supplied with great store of provisions; so that it might have easily held out till relieved by Galerius: but Severus, distrusting his own men, and relying upon the mighty promises and solemn oaths of Maximian, yielded up the place to him, and the purple with which he had been invested about a year and nine months before P. Maximian, unmindful of his oaths, carried him captive to Rome; and after having kept Severus marches against Maxentius.

ed by his men, besieged in Ravenna, and taken.

EUTROP. p. 587. f Paneg. e Paneg. 9. p. 190, 197. 5. 127. 7. 163. d Idem, 5. p. 126. e Eutrop. p. 587. f Paneg. 3. p. 197. t Idem, p. 198. h Idem ibid. BAUDR. p. 192. k Valef. rer. Franc. p. 18. l Buom. hiff. Belg. l. viii. c. 2. m Eutrop. p. 587. h Lact. perf. c. 24. p. 23. Eutrop. p. 587. Lact. perf. c. 24. p. 23. Anonym. p. 471. Hier. chron. Lact. perf. c. 26. p. 24.

a him some time confined to a place on the Appian way, about thirty miles from the His death. city, called Tres Taberna, or the Three Inns, he caused him to be there put to death. The only favour he could obtain was that of dying by having his veins opened. His body was interred in the tomb of Gallienus, about eight or nine miles from Rome 9. He left a son behind him, named Severianus, who was put to death by Licinius in 313. Maximian, well apprised, that Galerius would not suffer the death of Severus to pass unrevenged, resolved to strengthen himself with the alliance of Constantine, who, having conquered the Franks, enjoyed at that time a profound peace and tranquillity, and was wholly bent on promoting the happiness and welfare of his people. Having therefore fortified Rome with many new works, and put it in a condition of b fustaining a long siege, he left Italy, and went to confer with Constantine in Gaul, where Constantine he persuaded him to marry his daughter Fausta, and at the same time changed the marries Fausta title of Cosar, with which he had contented himself hitherto, as appears from several the daughter of medals, and from a panegyric pronounced on occasion of his nuptials, into that of is by him de-Augustus. Constantine is generally thought to have been declared emperor on the clared empethirty-first of March of this year 307. Fausta, whom he married, is styled in the ror. ancient inscriptions Flavia Maximiana Fausta ". Lastantius calls her Maximian's fecond daughter w. Perhaps he looked upon Theodora, his wife's daughter, as his own; for we find no mention made of any other daughter of Maximian. She was born and brought up in Rome . The emperor Julian commends her modesty, and blameless conduct r. Minervina, Constantine's first wife, by whom he had Crispus, must have been dead at this time; for he is not said to have divorced her. By Fausta His issue by he had, besides Constantius, who is the best known of all his children, Constantine his Fausta. eldest son, Constans his youngest, and two daughters, Constantia and Constantia, or rather Constantina, who was married, first to Annibalianus, and afterwards to Gallus Casar, her cousin-germans, and Helena, the wife of the emperor Julian 1. The wife of Gallus is styled on an ancient coin Flavia Julia Constantina Augusta 2. Galerius did not grant the title of Augustus to Constantine till about a year after, when he was obliged to bestow it on Maximin b. While Maximian was in Gaul with Constantine, Galerius entered Italy with a powerful army; but not fufficient, as he found by d experience, to beliege Rome: for, as he had never feen the great capital of the empire, he imagined it to be only somewhat larger than Antioch, and some other cities of the Galerius apeast. He threatened to lay it in ruins, to put all the inhabitants to the sword, and proaches Rome utterly to extirpate the senate; but when he approached that immense metropolis, besiege it. and viewed its fortifications, despairing to be able to carry it by assault, and not having with him a sufficient number of troops to invest it, he retired to Interanna, now Terni, and thence fent Licinius and Probus to exhort Maxentius, in his name, to demand the empire of his father-in-law, and not usurp it by force of arms s. But Maxentius, having found means to gain under-hand some of Galerius's legions, was so far from hearkening to the deputies, that he would have marched out against But is obliged e Galerius, if he, distrusting his troops, and dreading the fate of Severus, had not to retire with haftened back into his own dominions. In his retreat he laid waste the country far precipitation. and wide, to prevent the enemy from pursuing him, and allowed his soldiers to commit unheard-of disorders and cruelties d. Maximian, who was still in Gaul, being informed of the precipitous retreat of Galerius, did all that lay in his power to perfuade Constantine to pursue him; but finding that prince no ways inclined to engage in so dangerous a war, he repassed the Alps, and returned to Rome, where he reigned fome time jointly with his fon, but was less respected, and not so readily obeyed, as he. This piqued him to such a degree, that, divesting himself of all paternal affection, he resolved to deprive Maxentius of the empire, not doubting but the troops f that had abandoned Severus, as they had formerly belonged to him, would favour Maximian atthis attempt. Having therefore endeavoured under-hand to estrange them from his tempts to defon, he affembled both the people and foldiery; and after a long descant upon the Pose his son: evils and misfortunes of the times, he turned unexpectedly to his fon, who fat on the throne or tribunal with him, reproached him as the fole author of the present calamities, and after many bitter and virulent invectives, stripped him of his purple robes, * Vict. epit. p. 542. Zos. l. ii. p. 673, &c. * Lact. perf. Birag. p. 459. Byzant. fam. p. 15. Panegyr. 5. p. 127. c. 27. p. 25. × Idem ibid. * Julian. orat. i. p. 9. E LACT. perf. c. 50. p. 45. SG. c. p. 127. B GOLTZ. p. 128. * Goltz. p. 126. 28. w Lact. c. 27. p. 25. SPANH. p. 640. JULIAN. 0121. i. p. 9.

LACT perf. c. 32. p. 29. * Vide Anonym. p. 3. & Byz. fam.
f Idem ibid. c. 27. p. 25. Pan. p. 46, 47. SPANH. p. 6. 6. P. 136. Anonym. p. 472. 4 LACT. Anonym. ibid.

and tore them in pieces. Maxentius, leaping from the throne, implored the protec- 2

But is obliged Gaul.

tion of the foldiery, who, being moved with his tears, but more with his promifes, received him in their arms, loaded Maximian with injuries, and threatened him with present death. Zonaras tells us, that Maximian, to appease the soldiery, told them, that he was not in earnest, but had made use of that artifice to try whether or no they were fincerely attached to his fon; but no one believing him, he thought it adviseable to leave Rome, and accordingly hastened back into Gaul, where he complained to Constantine, that his son had driven him from Rome. But Constantine, not feeming to be much affected with his complaints, about the month of November he repaired to Galerius, the declared enemy of his fon, to regulate with him, as he pretended, the public affairs, but in reality to watch an opportunity of dispatching b him, and feizing his provinces f. But no favourable occasion offered of putting in execution his wicked purpose. Galerius was not then at Carnutum in Gaul, now Chartres, as we read in Zosimus E, but at Carnuntum, or Carnus, on the Danube in Pannonia, with Dioclesian, whom he had invited thither to authorize with his presence the election of Licinius, whom he intended to create emperor in the room of Severus. On this occasion Maximian, in a private conference with his ancient collegue, did all that lay in his power to prevail upon him to refume the empire, and deliver the people of Rome from fo many tyrants . Victor the younger writes, that Galerius himself pressed Dioclesian to re-ascend the throne; which to us seems altogether improbable. Be that as it will, Dioclesian found such delights in a retired life, that he would c hearken to no proposals of that nature. Lastantius assures us, that the design of Maximian was to re-instate Dioclesian and himself in the empire, and destroy the rest one after another, his own fon not excepted k. Some writers, and Eutropius among the rest 1, seem to have believed, that Maximian only pretended to be at variance Licinius creat- with his fon, the better to deceive the other princes, and compass their ruin; but, instead of that, he was obliged to authorize with his presence the promotion of Lici-His extraction nius, whom Galerius created emperor in the room of Severus, on the eleventh of Noand character. vember of this year 307. Licinius was a native of New Dacia, which lay on the Roman fide of the Danube, and was, ever fince the reign of Aurelian, accounted one of the provinces of Illyricum. He pretended to derive his pedigree from the emperor d Philip, but was in reality forung from a family quite mean and ignoble m. His education was fuitable to his birth; for he was brought up without the least knowledge of letters; nay, he was not ashamed to declare himself an open enemy to learning, calling the sciences the pest and bane of the state. He was naturally of a cruel, violent and haughty temper o, and addicted, even in his old age, to the most infamous debaucheries P. His infatiable avarice prompted him, when raifed to the empire, to fill his coffers by the most unjust, tyrannical and iniquitous methods q. However, he was a brave and experienced officer, kept the foldiers to their duty. punished the least transgressions with the utmost severity, and by that means revived in the army the discipline of the ancient Romans r. In the year 323. he was, according to Victor the younger, about fixty. Eusebius speaks of him as one at that time worn out without age s; and Lastantius tells us, that Galerius did not create him Cesar in 305. because he was ashamed to call him his son, but chose to raise him to the empire at once, and style him his brother. However, in 313. he married Conflantia, the fifter of Conftantine, and had children by her ". Galerius and he had lived in great intimacy ever fince they first entered into the army; and the emperor, reposing an intire confidence in him, had, in all his expeditions, after he had attained to the dignity of Cx/ar, fuffered himself to be wholly governed by his counsels. The memorable victory which Galerius gained over the Persians, was in great measure owing to the valour and conduct of Licinius w. Galerius seems at first to f have given him only the provinces of Pannonia and Rhatia; but at the same time he promised to put him in possession of those that were held by Maxentius, as soon as he had driven out that usurper x. Thus was the empire ruled at once by fix princes, viz. Maximian, Galerius, Licinius, Maximin, Constantine, and Maxentius.

> * Panegyr. 6. p. 136. Eutrop. p. 687. Zos. l. ii. p. 674. f Lact. perf. c. 29. p. 26. Eutrop. 687. Zos. l. ii. p. 673. h Idem ibid. l Vict. epit. p. 542. h Lact. perf. c. 43. Signature ibid. h Lact. perf. c. 29. p. 26. Eutrop. p. 587. Vict. epit. p. 543. Signature ibid. h Lact. perf. c. 29. p. 26. Eutrop. p. 543. Signature ibid. h Lact. perf. c. 29. p. 26. Eutrop. p. 543. Signature ibid. h Lact. perf. c. 29. p. 26. Eutrop. p. 543. Signature ibid. h Lact. perf. c. 29. p. 26. Eutrop. p. 543. Signature ibid. h Lact. perf. c. 29. p. 26. Eutrop. p. 543. Signature ibid. h Lact. perf. c. 29. p. 26. Eutrop. p. 543. Signature ibid. h Lact. perf. c. 29. p. 26. Eutrop. p. 543. Signature ibid. h Lact. perf. c. 29. p. 26. Eutrop. p. 2 p. 687. p. 37. n Vict. ibid. Anonym. p. 474. perf. c. 32. p. 29. LACT. perf. p. 424.

THE following year Maximian was conful the tenth time, and Galerius the seventh; but at Rome the year was dated by the consuls who should be named, Maxentius, who reigned there, refusing to acknowledge the consulship either of Galerius or his father Maximian. This continued till the twentieth of April, when Maxentius caused him-Maxentius and felf to be declared conful, with his fon Romulus, styled on the ancient coins M. Aure- bis son Romulius Romulus v. Maxentius gave him the title of Cafar and emperor, created him Rome. consul the following year, and ranked him among the gods after his death, which happened during his second consulship 2, being drowned, it seems, in the Tiber 2. While the disturbances and changes, which we have mentioned above, happened in the west, Maximin enjoyed a profound peace and tranquillity in the east, which he governed with the title only of  $C\alpha far$ . But when he understood, that Licinius had been declared emperor, he pressed Galerius to raise him too to the same rank. The emperor could not be prevailed upon to grant him his request, but, to content him, contrived a new title, appointing, that he and Constantine should, for the future, be styled Filii Augustorum, sons of emperors; which title is still to be seen on some of his and Constantine's coins h. Maximin pretended to be satisfied with this new mark of distinction, but in the mean time caused himself to be proclaimed emperor by his Maximin carearmy; and in the letter which he wrote on that occasion to Galerius, assured him, fes himself to be that the troops had, without his consent or co-operation, saluted him Augustus c. peror. This gave Galerius great uneafiness; but nevertheless, as he did not think it advisec able to quarrel with his nephew about the title he had usurped, he confirmed it, and at the same time granted it to Constantine, who was thus, through the ambition of another man, acknowledged emperor through all the provinces of the empire d. This year Constantine Maximian, thinking himself neglected by Galerius, left Illyricum, and privately with- acknowledged drew to Constantine in Gaul, with a design to lay hold of the first opportunity that emperor by Gaoffered to dispatch him, and cause himself to be acknowledged in his room. The better to deceive him, he quitted the purple the second time, declaring, that, in imitation of Dioclesian, he would lead a retired life, and no longer concern himself with public affairs. Constantine received him with the greatest marks of honour and efteem, affigned him an apartment in his own palace, and commanded all his subd jects to pay the same obedience to the orders of his father-in-law, as to his own. But the realless and turbulent spirit of Maximian did not suffer him long to enjoy so happy a situation. Constantine was then busied in building a bridge over the Rhine; which great undertaking struck the neighbouring nations with such terror, that they sent embassadors to sue for peace, offering to deliver up some of their chiefs as hostages and pledges of their fincerity. However, some Franks still continued in arms; and against these Maximian advised Constantine to march with a small body of forces, and leave the rest at Arelatum, now Arles. His design was to make himself master of Con- Maximian arftantine's forces, and seize his provinces, if any misfortune should befal him, as there tempts to dewas room to believe there might, feeing he was attended only by a small army. Con-tine. e stantine, not suspecting the least treachery, followed the advice of his father-in-law, who marched part of the way with him, and then returned to Arles, where the emperor had left the flower of his troops. When he thought him engaged in the enemy's country, he all on a fudden refumed the purple the third time, made himfelf master of the palace, seized on the treasures there, distributed great part of them among the foldiers who were present, and wrote to those who were absent letters filled with most bitter invectives against Constantine, inviting them, with mighty promises, to follow the example of the troops at Arles c. Constantine was no sooner informed of what had passed, than he led back his army by land from the Rbine to Challon, where he imbarqued his forces on the Sone; and landing them unexpectedly at Arles, furprised Maximian, before he was in a condition to oppose him. The soldiers who had declared for Maximian, awed with the presence of their lawful commander, returned to their duty, a small number excepted, who being seduced by the presents and promises of the usurper, fled with him to Marseilles, and shut themselves up in that city. Constantine pursued them close, and arriving before the place, would have carried it by affault, had not his scaling ladders unluckily proved too short. This obliged him to found the retreat; but, in the mean time, some of the inhabitants \* Buch. cycl. p. 238. Idat. Birag. p. 450, 452. \* Vide Noris. de Dioclef. num. \* Paneg. 6. p. 146. \* Birag. p. 446. Lact. p. 23. Euseb. p. 310. \* Lact. perf. p. 433. \* Idem ibid. c. 43. p. 36. c. 44. p. 38. \* Lact. p. 26. Panegyr. 9. p. 199, 200. Zos. l. ii. p. 673. Vales. rer. Franc. p. 21.

Vol. VI. No 3. * Pp p having He is taken prijoner; but wed with great clemency by Contlantine.

Alexander fire in Africa.

having opened one of the gates to Constantine's men, they entered the city, seized on a the uturper while he was uttering from the walls bitter invectives against the emperor, and carried him to Constantine; who, after having reproached him with his treachery and ambition, and obliged him to quit the purple, not only granted him his life, but fuffered him, through an excess of clemency and good-nature, to continue with him in the same palace. While these things passed in Gaul, the troops in Africa revolting from Maxentius, who was acknowledged there, declared Alexander, who ulurps the em- commanded them in quality of lieutenant, emperor, and with the ulual ceremonies gave him the purple at Carthage's. He was descended of an ignoble and mean family in Phrygia , or, as Aurelius Victor will have it, in Pannonia. All authors paint him as one in every respect unequal to so great a charge, being stricken in b years, and quite destitute of vigour, prudence, and courage. Besides, his troops confifted chiefly of new levies, unacquainted with the military discipline, and for the most part without arms. However, as he had a Maxentius for his rival, he maintained his usurped authority for the space of three years at least, some of his Greek coins, which have reached us, being dated the fourth year of his reign k. One Nigrinianus, who is represented on some ancient medals with rays round his head, and the title of divus or deified, is by most antiquaries thought to have been the fon of Alexander 1. THE following year 309. Maxentius took upon him his fecond confulship at Rome, having his fon Romalus for his collegue m. There were, it feems, no other confuls c in the other parts of the empire; for this year is commonly distinguished by the confuls of the preceding year thus, the year after the tenth and feventh confulflip, viz. of Maximian and Galerius. Some however are of opinion, that Licinius was this year conful for the first time; and it is past all doubt, that he was conful before the death Eumenius pro- of Galerius. This year Eum. nius, as is commonly believed, pronounced his panenotinces his pa- gyric on Constantine, in a city which stood on a great river that falls into the Rhine negyricon Con- above Cologne; that is, according to most interpreters, in Treves, which stood then, as it still does, on the Movelle, the river plainty pointed at in the above-mentioned description. The panegyrist tells us, that Constantine was then busied in repairing the walls of that city, which had been ruined, and in building there a great circus, a d large fquare, bufilies, and a magnificent palace for the administration of justice. He exicls the generofity of the good-natured emperor, the effects whereof had been felt in all the places through which he had paffed; and therefore he intreats him to visit the city of Autun, where the orator himself was born, and at that time taught rhetoric. In the close of his speech, he recommends to the emperor his five children, and all his disciples, some of whom already enjoyed the first employments in the flate o. The following year Andronius and Probus were named confuls by Galerius; but were not acknowledged as fuch at Rome, where Maxentius took upon him that dignity the third time without a collegue. In the confular tables this year is dated as the preceding, thus; the second year after the tenth and seventh confulship P. This e year Maximian, no longer able to lead a private and retired life, resolved at all events to attempt the recovery of his former condition; but being well apprifed, that all

Miximian at his efforts would prove unfuccefsful, fo long as Constantine lived, he determined, in rempts to mur the first place, to murder him; and in order to compass his wicked purpose, had der Constanrecourse to his daughter Fausta, the wife of Constantine, using his utmost endeavours, and all manner of careffes and intreaties, to prevail upon her to betray her hufband, and leave the door of the bed chamber open; which she promised to do, but immediately revealed the whole to Constantine, who, unwilling to condemn his father-inlaw without some undeniable proof of his guilt, placed one night an eunuch in his bed, and left the door of the chamber open. Maximian did not fail to lay hold of the f opportunity, and entering the room about midnight, killed the eunuch, crying out as he retired, Constantine is dead; I am emperor. But Constantine, appearing that He is discovered instant, attended by a numerous guard, stopped him, and shewed him the body of the murdered eunuch. It is easier to conceive than express the terror and dismay that and jeized.

imaginable, without being able either to excuse or deny it. As he had been chiefly cyci. p. 238. Onuph. in fast. p. 263. p. 238. & 249. IDAT. PROSP. &c.

feized him, when he found himself thus convicted of the most detest ble treachery prompted

a prompted to this excess of wickedness by the mild treatment which he had hitherto met with, and still promised himself, from Constantine, that prince thought himself obliged, in his own defence, to put an end to the life and crimes of fuch an ambitious, implacable and treacherous enemy. The only favour he granted him was the choice of his death, and he chose of all deaths the most infamous and disgraceful, which was hanging q. Such was the unhappy, but deserved end of Maximian, after having His death. reigned with great glory at least twenty years, and lived, according to Villor the younger, about fixty (F). Constantine caused all his statues to be pulled down, his images to be torn in pieces, and his inscriptions erased, not sparing even such as were common to him with Dioclesian. The same year Galerius was seized with a most seized with a b dreadful distemper, an incurable ulcer in his privy parts. Lastantius and Euse-dreadful distenses. bius: describe at length the miserable condition to which he was reduced, and tell temper. us, that besides the inexpressible torments with which he was racked night and day, without the least respite, such an insusterable stench issued out of his body, as insected not only the palace, but the whole city. The distemper increased daily, in spite of all the art and skill of the best physicians and surgeons: his thighs putrified by degrees, his belly was confumed, his bowels laid open, and the whole mass of his blood corrupted. Notwithstanding all the care that could be used, he was devoured alive with infinite fwarms of worms and vermin. No longer able to bear fuch unrelenting c torments, he often attempted to lay violent hands on himself, and caused some of his physicians to be put to death, because their remedies proved ineffectual. He had recourse to Apollo, to Esculapius, and all his gods, but to no effect; nay, the remedies which Apollo, or rather some impostor in his name, prescribed to him, served only to aggravate his raging diftemper. He languished in this painful, and, beyond expression, miserable condition, a whole year, and upwards, suffering every minute all the agonies of death ". The pagan as well as christian writers take notice of this unaccountable malady of Galerius w. The latter afcribe it to divine vengeance, as he had been the chief author of the persecution and unheard-of cruelties suffered by the christians. This year Constantine waged war with the Alemans, the Brusterians, d Cheruscans, Chamovians, and several other German nations; who, after having attacked the Romans in separate bodies, joined in the end all their forces, and formed a very numerous and powerful army x. Constantine, not depending upon the relations of others, ventured in difguise into the midst of their army, pretending to be a deputy fent to them by the emperor. As he found, that not caring to engage him, they designed to separate, which would have rendered the war more tedious, he affured them, that the emperor was not then with his army; which they no fooner understood, than they dismissed the pretended deputy, and without loss of time marched with all their forces against the enemy. Constantine received them at the head of his army, put them to the rout at the first onset, and made a dreadful Constantine e flaughter of them in their flight y. It was perhaps on account of this victory that he overcomes fetook the title of Maximus, which we find on some of his medals struck this year 310. veral German nations. the fifth of his reign 2. Eusebius tells us, that after he had driven out of Gaul, or intirely subdued, the barbarians bordering on the Rhine and the ocean, he passed over into Britain, and there reduced such of the inhabitants as had not yet submitted to him 2. But of this expedition no mention is made by the panegyrists.

THE next consuls were Galerius the eighth time, and Maximinus the second; but Maxentius refuling to acknowledge them, Rome was without confuls till the month of

<sup>9</sup> LACT. pers. C. 30. p. 27. EUTROP. p. 587. Zos. l. ii. p. 674. VICT. epit. p. 542.
<sup>1</sup> Idem ibid.

<sup>8</sup> LACT. pers. C. 33. p. 30.
<sup>1</sup> EUSEB. l. viii. C. 16. p. 314, 315.
<sup>8</sup> Idem ibid. LACT. C. 33.

<sup>8</sup> AUR. VICT. epit. p. 525. Zos. p. 674. Anonym. p. 472.
<sup>8</sup> Panegyr. 7. p. 163—165.
<sup>9</sup> Idem, p. 164.
<sup>2</sup> BIRAG. p. 462.
<sup>8</sup> EUSEB. vit. Constant. l. i. c. 25. p. 420.

(E) Some authors write, that Maximian died at Marfeilies, confounding perhaps his death with what happened to him there in 308, as Zosimus confounds it with that of Maximin II. in telling us, that he died a natural death at Tarfus (46). In an ancient chronicle, quoted by Du Chefne (47), we are told, that about the year 1054 his body was discovered at Marfeilles in a leaden costin, inclosed in a tomb of white marble, so well embalmed, that it was still intire, and appeared fresh. The author of the chronicle writes, that he learnt this of those who had seen the body; and adds, that Raimbaud, archbishop of Arles, perfuaded the inhabitants to throw the carcase of such an unmercitul persecutor of the church into the sea, with the cossin, tomb, and whatever else was found with it. St. Ambrose had written long before, that Maximian was buried in a most beautiful tomb of marble (48).

Galerius puts

a stop to the persecution.

His death.

Licinius and Maximin divide his provinces.

Valeria enormously abused by Maximin.

September, when Rufinus and Eusebius Volusianus were honoured with that dignity b. a As the distemper of Galerius grew daily more raging and violent, he began at length to afcribe it to the just vengeance of heaven, for his cruelties to the innocent christians, and immediately published an edict, ordering a stop to be put to the persecution. This edict was enacted in the name of three emperors, viz. Galerius, Constantine, and Licinius. Maxentius was looked upon by Galerius as an enemy, and had never been acknowledged by him; and as for Maximin, he either would not agree with the rest to put a stop to the persecution, or his name has been, through a mistake of the transcribers, omitted in the edict, as that of Licinius has been lest out in most editions of Eusebius, and even in the Latin translation by Rusinus. The edict was dated the twentieth year of the reign of Galerius, and confequently must have been b drawn up after the first of March of this year 311. It was publicly set up at Nicomedia on the thirtieth of April, and the following month his death was known there; for he died, according to the most probable opinion, at Sardica, the metropolis of New Dacia, now known by the name of Sofia, or, as the inhabitants flyle it, Triadizza c. Galerius had reigned, reckoning from the time he had been created Cujar, nineteen years, two months, and some days. He had been emperor six years, and a few days; for we find some of his coins dated the seventh year of his reign d. Before he expired, he earnestly recommended to Licinius his wife Valeria, the daughter of Dioclesian, and Candidianus his natural son e; which shews, that Licinius was present when he died. He was buried in the fame city where he was born, and afterwards c deified with the usual ceremonies f. Maximin was no sooner informed of the death of Galerius, than he hastened from the east, where he then was, with a design to seize on his provinces, and entering Bithynia, made himself master of all the countries beyond the Propontis. On the other hand, Licinius, having drawn together his forces, marched to oppose him; and the two armies encamped over-against each other, the one on the coast of Asia, and the other of Europe. However, they came at length to an agreement; and in a private interview which they had in the streights of Chalcedan, they entered into an offensive and defensive alliance, which they confirmed with the most solemn oaths 8. Maximin remained master of Bithynia, and Licinius of Thrace, the streights of Chalcedon being the common boundary between d the two empires h. Valeria, the widow of Galerius, though earnestly recommended by him at the point of death to Licinius, chose to withdraw into the dominions of Maximin, with her mother Prisca, the wife of Dioclesian, Candidianus the natural son of Galerius, and Severianus the fon of Severus, put to death by Maximian in 307. Maximin treated Valeria for some time with the utmost respect, honouring her with the title of mother; nay, he conceived a violent passion for her, and even offered to repudiate his own wife, and marry her. Valeria, not a little surprised at this unexpected proposal, answered him with great freedom, That the state and habit she was in, the time of her mourning for the death of her husband not being yet expired, did not allow her to think of marriage; that to her it seemed very strange he should e put away a wife, who had not given him the least occasion of complaint; that such a proceeding gave her room to expect the like treatment; and, in short, that it was both unbecoming and unprecedented in a person of her rank to entertain the least thought of a fecond marriage. Maximin was provoked to such a degree with this frank and generous answer, that, changing his love into hatred and rage, he immediately banished both her and her mother, seized on all her effects, confined her domestics, put her eunuchs to the rack, and, upon false accusations, sentenced to death feveral illustrious ladies who attended her, and among the rest two senators wives, and one, whose daughter was a vestal at Rome. They were publicly executed at Nicea, upon the deposition of a Jew, who falfly accused them of adultery, hoping f to escape the punishment due to his crimes, by impeaching them. The people loudly complained of such a bare-faced piece of injustice, and, transported with rage, would have torn in pieces Eratineus the governor of that province, while he sat on his tribunal to condemn them, and fee his fentence put in execution, had he not been furrounded by a numerous body of foldiers, who with much-ado protected him against the insults of the incensed populace. The Jew, their accuser, being after-

b Lact, perf. c. 35. p. 31. Buch. cycl. p. 238. C Lact. perf. c. 33. p. 30. Euseb. l. viii. c. 17. p. 315. Pagi, p. 311. Lact. c. 35, 50. p. 32, 44. Euseb. l. viii. c. 17. F Vict. epit. p. 543. Birag. p. 444. Euseb. l. ix. c. 10. p. 364. Euseb. l. ix. c. 10. Lact. c. 45. p. 39. Euseb. Lact. ibid.

a wards condemned to be crucified, acknowledged on the crofs their innocence, and his own guilt, in suffering himself to be suborned to accuse them i. Valeria, tho' confined in the deferts of Syria, found means to acquaint her father Dioclesian with the miserable state she was in, who, moved with tenderness and compassion, sent several persons, and among the rest a kinsman of his own, an officer of great distinction in the army, to intreat Maximin, by all the obligations he owed him, to release his beloved daughter from her confinment, and allow him the fatisfaction of enjoying her company in his old age. But the tyrant was deaf to all intreaties; which is faid to have hastened the death of the old emperor k

Constantine in the mean time was busied in visiting the provinces under his government. He arrived this year, the fixth of his reign, at Autun; and finding the b inhabitants overloaded with taxes, he not only forgave them what they owed to the Conflantine's exchequer ever fince his accession to the empire, but remitted above a fourth part of generofity to all imposts. In acknowledgment of this favour, the city of Autun, looking upon the city of Autun, the generous and good-natured emperor as their founder, took the name of Flavia, which was the name of his family; and upon his return to the place of his refidence, probably Treves, they fent Eumenius to return him thanks for his extraordinary kindness to them; which the orator did in a speech that is still extant. In the mean time Maxentius, who reigned at Rome, undertook the reduction of Africa, which had revolted, as we have related above, in 308. and declared Alexander emc peror. Against him Maxentius dispatched Rusus, or Rusius Volusianus, probably the conful of this year, and one Zenus, a celebrated commander, who, in the first battle that was fought, put the troops of Alexander to the rout, took him prisoner, and caused him immediately to be strangled m. Thus ended the war in Africa; but not the calamities of that unhappy province: for Maxentius caused such of the Africans Maxentius reas were confiderable either for their birth or wealth, to be inhumanly put to death, duces and ruins and feized their estates, pretending they had favoured the usurper; nay, he commanded the city of Cartbage, at that time one of the most beautiful and flourishing cities in the world, to be laid in ashes. Thus was the province of Africa utterly ruined, and the inhabitants reduced to beggary, and obliged, through fear of the d tyrant, to abandon their native country, and take shelter in the provinces of the other princes ". Maxentius triumphed at Rome for the defeat of Alexander, or rather for the destruction of Carthage, and the ruin of Africa. But Rome and Italy were no less Rome and grievously afflicted by the lewd, inhuman and avaricious tyrant, than Carthage and Italy grievously Africa. The unexpressible calamities under which they grouned, are described at affilied by him. length by Zosimus o, Eusebius P, Aurelius Victor 9, and the panegyrists who flourished in those times. His lust spared not the most illustrious ladies of Rome, nor his avarice the chief men in the fenate: he forced the former, by all manner of torments, to comply with his impure defires; and condemned the latter, under various pretences, to death or banishment, in order to seize their estates. Eusebius' and Rusie nus tell us, that having by menaces forced the governor of the city to yield up to him his wife, by name Sophronia, she, who professed the christian religion, and consequently thought death a less evil than the defiling herself with any impurity, begged a few minutes to put on her best attire; which being granted, she withdrew into her closet, and there, after a short prayer, buried a dagger in her breast, and died on The resolution the spot. This action is mightily commended by Eusebius and Rufinus; and Palla- and intrepidity dius feems to approve it ". It shews a courage in Sophronia above her sex, and a love achristian lady. of purity worthy of the religion which she professed; but nevertheless cannot, in the opinion of St. Austin w, be commended, or even excused, unless done by a particular and extraordinary impulse from heaven, such as he supposes Razias to have had, of f whom mention is made in the books of the Maccabees. Maxentius allowed his foldiers the same unrestrained liberty, or rather licentiousness, which he took himself, abandoning to them the honour, the lives, and the fortunes of the most innocent persons. By this means Rome was in a short time reduced to a most deplorable condition; the fenators were stripped of their estates, and either banished upon false accusations, or publicly executed; and the people fo loaded with taxes, that they had not where-

1 Lact. perf. c. 39, 40, p. 35, 36. k Idem, c. 41. p. 30 Vict. p. 526. Zos. l. ii. p. 675. Lactan. perf. c. 43. p. 37. Zos. ibid. 2 Zos. l. ii. p. 675. P Euseb. l. viii. p. 310. 7. p. 137, 158. Euseb. hist. l. viii. c. 14. p. 313. Lausiaca, c. 150. p. 105. w August. civ. Dei, l. i. c. 26. k Idem, c. 41. p. 36. <sup>1</sup> Paneg. 8. p. 188, &c. n Paneg. 6, 7. p. 145, 173. Aur. Vict. 9 Aur. Vict. p. 526. t Rufin. c. 17. p. 141. " PALLAD, hift.

Vol. VI. Nº 4.

Qqq

withal

The cruelty of

withal to purchase the common necessaries, and great numbers of them died daily for a want. He was greatly addicted to the study of magic, which prompted him to many unheard-of cruelties, as he hoped to learn future events from the entrails of women. and innocent children x. A fire accidentally breaking out in the temple of Fortune, and the people flocking from all parts to extinguish it, a foldier uttered some words of raillery against the unfortunate goddes; which one of the populace hearing, killed the foldier on the spot. His comrades, to revenge his death, fell sword in hand upon the people; which occasioned a dreadful tumult, in which an incredible number of persons lost their lives y. Zosimus writes, that Maxentius immediately restrained the fury of his foldiers; but though he excuses him on this occasion, yet he owns, that his tyranny grew daily more infufferable, and that the Roman people impa- b tiently wished for a deliverer z. Prudentius gives us a pathetic account of the evils which the city endured under so cruel a tyrant, who was not ashamed to fill the public prisons with the most venerable and illustrious persons in the senate. Being elated with his success against Alexander tyrant of Africa, he began to entertain thoughts of destroying the other princes, one after the other; for he was often heard to fay, That he alone was emperor, and that the others were only his lieutenants, employed by him to defend and guard the confines of the empire against the incursions of the barbarians, that he might enjoy at Rome an undiffurbed peace and tranquillity. He refolved to begin with Constantine, under the plausible pretence of revenging the death of his father Maximian, though we are affured, that he was not in the c least affected with it b. He had then under his command an hundred and seventy thousand foot, and eighteen thousand horse, most of whom had served under his father, and consequently were enured to military toils and dangers. He had amassed by his extortions vast sums to defray the charges of a war, and great store of provifions, having for that purpose drained Africa, and the adjacent islands. He no

Constantine.

Constantine begins his

fooner began to affemble his troops, than Constantine, well apprised of his design, wrote to him, and by laying before him the dreadful evils and calamities attending a civil war, endeavoured to divert him from it. Nazarius tells us, that Constantine, pitying the miserable condition to which he saw, with the utmost concern, the metropolis of the empire reduced, burnt with a defire of redeeming it from the d tyranny under which it groaned; but not thinking that could justify his engaging in a war with his brother-in-law, he endeavoured to fatisfy him as to the death of his father. But Maxentius, who wanted only a pretence for stripping Constantine of his dominions, without giving ear to his remonstrances, caused his statues to be pulled down, and his images defaced, giving out, that he was determined at all events to revenge the death of his father. Hereupon Constantine, leaving a strong body of troops to guard the banks of the Rhine, and prevent the barbarians from breaking into Gaul during his absence, set out on his march to Italy, at the head of an army, confisting, according to those who magnify their number the most, of ninety thoumarch to Italy. fand foot, and eight thousand horse. Of these only twenty-five thousand were Romans, and the rest auxiliaries. A panegyrist, in an oration pronounced before him, fays, that he engaged in this war with a smaller number of troops than Alexander had with him, when he went to attack the king of Persia d; that is, not quite forty thousand men. He endeavoured to gain over Licinius, by promising him his sister Constantia in marriage; which gave such jealousy to Maximin, that he sent deputies to court the friendship of Maxentius, and entered into an alliance with him; which however was kept secret; for Constantine was not apprised of it till he became master of Rome, and faw there the statue of Maximin placed close to that of Maxentius. We are not told, that Maximin fent any fuccours to Maxentius, or Licinius to Conflantine. In this war providence had something in view infinitely more important, than the rescuing of Rome from the tyranny of Maxentius; nothing less than the f delivering of the church from the cruel persecution under which it had groaned for the space of near three hundred years. Constantine had inherited of his father some love and esteem for the christians; for the first use he made of his authority was to put a ftop to the perfecution in the provinces subject to him f. However, he had not yet shewn any inclination to embrace a religion which he both honoured and a esteemed; but in the war with Maxentius, apprehending that he stood in need of an extraordinary affiftance from heaven, he began ferioufly to confider with himfelf, He deliberates what deity he should implore as his guardian and protector. He revolved in his mind with himself the fallacious answers given by the oracles to other princes, and the success that had what god he attended his father Constantius in all his wars, who despised the many gods worshipped by the Romans, and acknowledged only one Supreme Being. At the same time he observed, that such of his predecessors as had persecuted the christians, the adorers of this God, had miscarried in most of their undertakings, and perished by an unfortunate and untimely end; whereas his father, who countenanced and protected them, had in all his wars been attended with uncommon fuccess, and ended his life in the b arms of his children. Upon these considerations, he resolved to have recourse to the God of his father, and adhere to Him alone. To Him therefore he addressed himself with great humility and fervour, beseeching Him to make himself known to him, and to affift him in his present expedition. Heaven heard his prayer in a manner altogether miraculous; which, however incredible it may appear to fome, Eusebius assures us, he received from the emperor's own mouth, who solemnly confirmed the truth of it with his oath. As he was marching at the head of his troops A miraculous in the open fields, there suddenly appeared to him, and the whole army, a little after apparition. mid-day, a pillar of light above the fun, in the form of a cross, with this inscription, In this conquer. The emperor was in great pain about the meaning of this wonderful c vision, till the following night; when our Saviour appearing to him, with the same fign that he had feen in the heavens, commanded him to cause such another to be framed, and to make use of it in conquering his enemies. The next morning Constantine imparted to his friends what he had seen; and sending for the ablest artificers and workmen, ordered them to frame a cross of gold, and precious stones, according to the directions which he gave them. This cross is minutely described by Eusebius, who faw it s. Baronius, who has caused it to be engraved in his annals b, places the images of Constantine and his children on the standard that was fastened to the crosspart of it, though Eusebius feems to place them below the standard. In a crown of gold at the top of the cross was a figure, consisting of the two first letters of the name d of Christ, according to the Greek orthography. This figure, on some medals, is formed thus R, and in others thus R. This cypher was probably shewn to Constantine with the cross; for we are no-where told, that he contrived it. Some are of opinion, that this cypher, in which the cross is plainly represented, was the only thing Constantine added to the ancient standard. This the pious emperor caused to be carried before him in all his wars, as an enfign of fafety and victory k. Socrates feems to infinuate, that in his time, about the year 430. it was lodged in the imperial palace at Constantinople 1; and Theophanes tells us, that it was still to be seen in the ninth century ". Constantine caused several other crosses to be made after the The cross befame manner, and to be constantly carried at the head of his armies, instead of the comes the chief e figures of Mars, Jupiter, Romulus, &c. The name of Christ was not always at the standard. top of the crofs, but sometimes on the standard n. When the troops in any part of the army began to give ground, the emperor caused the standard with the cross to be conveyed thither; and his faith, fays Eufebiuso, was rewarded with victory, which began on that fide where the greatest danger was apprehended. He chose fifty of the most courageous, robust and religious men among his guards to attend this standard, and carry it in their turns. Eusebius affures us, that none of those who carried it were ever wounded in battle; and adds, that, in one encounter, the person who held it, finding himself aimed at on all fides by the enemy, and therefore delivering it to another, in order to avoid the danger by flight, was shot through with a dart f the minute he parted with it; whereas the other escaped unhurt amidst the showers of arrows that slew round him. This Eusebius, as he assures us, learnt of Constantine himself P. In the year 416. Theodosius the younger bestowed great privileges on those who carried the labarum or laborum; for fo the standard consecrated, to use the expres- The labarum or lion of St. Ambrose 9, with the name of Christ, is styled by Gregory of Nazianzum, laborum. Prudentius, and others. As to the etymology of that name, we are quite in the dark. The reader will find many conjectures concerning it in Du Cange, who is of

&lt;sup>2</sup> Zos. l. ii. p. 675. <sup>c</sup> Zos. l. ii. p. 676. * PRUD. in d Pan. 6.

```
* Euseb. vit. Const. l. i. c. 27—31. p. 421—423. BARON. 20 200. 31. p. 423. Idem ibid. Socrat. l. i. c. 2. p. 7. Theoph. p. 11. Fuseb. D. 525. Euseb. ibid. l. ii. p. 447.
                                                                                                                       BARON. ad ann. 312.
                                                                                                                                                                             1 Eusen. ibid.
                                                                                                                                                                          n Nazar. orat.

P Idem ibida
C. 31. p. 423. * Idem ibid. 1 SOCRAT. l. i. c. iii. p. 75. SOZOM. l. i. c. 4. p. 405. Euseb. p. 535. p. 448. 9 Ambros. epift. xvii. p. 213.
                                                                                                                                                                                    opinion,
```

opinion, that it was borrowed of the Germans. At the same time Constantine ordered a the shields, helmets, and offensive as well as defensive weapons of the soldiers, to be marked with croffes, as appears from Eusebius', and various ancient monuments. Sozomen tells us, that the emperor caused the name of our Saviour to be put upon the labarum, that the foldiers, who, in all times, paid the utmost respect to the imperial standard, might, by degrees, be brought to forget their false deities, and pay the same honours to Him, whose name they had constantly before their eyes . Constantine had the above-mentioned vision before he passed the Alps to make war upon Maxentius, and consequently in Gaul; but as to the precise place, we are quite at a loss. Some stand up for Besançon; others for Sinzic on the Rhine, at a small distance from Cologne; and some for Numegen, a village on the Moselle, about five b miles below Treves; which Ausonius calls the illustrious camp of Constantine : but their conjectures are altogether groundless. Balusius complains, and not without reason, of the irreligious temerity of a modern writer w, who is pleased to style the whole account of this miraculous apparition, that is, the best attested fact in the history of Constantine, a pious fiction, which, in other terms, is calling Eusebius an impious impostor, and at the same time charging him with the greatest folly imaginable, in pretending to impose upon the world with such an enormous falshood, while many thousands of witnesses were still living, who would not have failed to disprove what he wrote, and give him the lye. To imagine a writer of Eusebius's character guilty of such folly, impudence and presumption, is, in our opinion, carrying scepticism c and incredulity to too great a height. Constantine being, after the miraculous vision, Constantine is immutably determined to adore that God alone who had appeared to him, fent for feveral bishops, in order to be instructed by them in the mysteries of their religion, and in several particulars of the late apparition. He hearkened to them with the utmost respect, and believed what they told him of the divinity, incarnation, cross, and death of our Saviour, reading with great attention the holy scriptures, and confulting in his doubts the bishops, whom for that purpose he kept constantly about him . Eusebius does not name them; but Zosimus tells us, that an Egyptian, coming from Spain to the place where Constantine was, prevailed upon him to abandon the religion of the Romans Y. This may be true, though no great stress is to be laid d upon what Zosimus writes touching the conversion of Constantine; for Osius, the celebrated bishop of Corduba in Spain, was by birth an Egyptian, and might, as he was a man of great piety and learning, have been fent for by the emperor. It is at least certain, that Constantine soon after appointed him his almoner, and treated him on all occasions with the utmost respect, esteem, and veneration. The modern Greek writers pretend, that one of the emperor's chamberlains, by name Euphrates, had great share in his conversion; but of him no mention is made by the ancients. We may well imagine what a great alteration the conversion of Constantine produced in the His example is church. The whole imperial family followed, it seems, his example; we are well followed by the affured, that his mother Helen did: for though Theodoret writes, that she inspired her e fon from his infancy with fentiments of piety 2, yet Eusebius tells us in express terms, that she knew not the true God, till she was induced by her son to embrace the truth, and adhere to it 2. The zeal which Constantia shewed for the doctrine of Arius, inclines us to believe, that she professed the christian religion. Eusebius tells us, that Eutropia, the widow of Maximian, and mother-in-law of Constantine, followed the example of the emperor; and Valefius maintains the same thing of her daughter Fausta; which does not at all seem improbable, though not positively afferted by any of the ancients. Johannes Damascenus writes, that Constantine caused not only the cross, but the image of our Saviour, to be represented on his coins; but no medals have been yet found to confirm his opinion. On his coins appear only f the labarum, and on some of his son Constantius the  $\mathcal{P}$ , with the A and  $\Omega$ , the emblem assumed by our Saviour in the Revelations b. The silence of the ancient panegyrists with respect to so public and remarkable an event as the apparition of the imperial fa-

instructed in the christian religion, and embraces it.

cross, which occasioned the conversion of Constantine, would seem to us unaccountable, were we not well apprifed of the great and almost invincible power of prejudice in r Cange dissert de inferior, zwi numismat, p. 18. & glossar, p. 190.

p. 535.
t Soz. l. i. c. 4. p. 405.
in thesaur, numis antiquor, p. 463.
p. 685.
Theodoret, l. i. c. 17.
p. 563.
Euseb, vit. Const. l. ii. c. 32.
p. 423, 424.
F Euseb, l. ii.
p. 685.
Vide

Du Cange Bryant, smil, p. 21-22. p. 685. THEODORET. I. i. c. 17
Du Cange Byzant. famil. p. 31-33.

a matters of religion. The authors of those panegyrics could not, even in their speeches uttered before Constantine, forbear speaking of their fabulous deities, as if the emperor had still been a pagan. However, some of them seem to have hinted at that apparition, though in very dark and ambiguous terms; for one of the orators speaks much at length of an extraordinary affiftance, which, he fays, all Gaul believed to have been fent to Constantine from heaven c. Another says, that every one dreaded the war with Maxentius, on account of an evil omen d. This may be well understood of the cross, than which nothing was more infamous, or more detefted, among the Romans. But Constantine placed his chief confidence in it, and causing it to be carried at the head of his army, as the banner of victory, croffed the Alps the following year, when he Constantine b and Licinius were confuls the fecond time, without meeting with the least opposition, passes the Alps, till he arrived at Segusium, now Susa; which being fortified both by nature and art, bimleif master and defended by a numerous garison, refused to submit. Hereupon Constantine, of everal anes. having ordered a general assault, and at the same time caused fire to be set to the gates, carried the place by florm the same day; but would not give it up to be plundered, nor fusfer the inhabitants to be any-ways injured in their lives or fortunes e, though Zosimus writes, that he laid in ruins all the cities that prefumed to oppose him . From Segusium he marched to Augusta Taurinorum, now Turin, in the neighbourhood of which place he was met by a numerous army of the enemy, whose cavalry, armed cap-à-pé, fell upon him with a fury hardly to be expressed; but c Constantine ordering his ranks to open and receive them, they were surrounded on all sides, and, unwieldy as they were, pulled off of their horses, and killed, without the loss of a single man on Constantine's side. The rest of the army was easily put to the rout, and pursued with great slaughter to the gates of Turin; which the citizens shut against them, but opened to Constantine, whom they received with the greatest demonstrations of joy imaginable. All the cities between the Po and the Alps followed the example of this, fending deputies with great store of provisions to the conqueror, and affisting him to the utmost of their power against Maxentius, whose cruelties and tyranny they could no longer bear s. From Turin he marched to Milan, which city he entered without opposition; and having passed a few days there, he pursued his d march to Brescia, where he was met by a numerous body of horse, who being routed at the first onset, retired in great confusion to Verona, the place appointed for the general rendezvous of all the troops of Maxentius dispersed up and down the country. They were very numerous, and commanded by Ruricius Pompeianus, an experienced officer, and captain of the guards to Maxentius, who not thinking it adviseable to venture a battle, shut himself up in Verona, with part of his troops. Constantine, having passed the Adige a great way above that city, invested it with his whole army. Verona be-Pompeianus made a vigorous fally; but being repulsed with great loss, he stole away sieged. in the night, and foon after returned with a numerous army, which he had with incredible expedition drawn together from all parts. Constantine, receiving intelligence e of his approach, left part of his troops to pursue the siege, and marched with the rest to meet him. Hereupon an engagement enfued, which lasted almost the whole night; but in the end the troops of Pompeianus were utterly defeated, and the general himself Maxentius's killed. Constantine distinguished himself on this occasion in a very eminent manner, army descated. grappling hand to hand with the enemy like a common foldier; infomuch that his officers, after the battle, conjured him with tears in their eyes to moderate his courage for the future, and not expose to such dangers a life, on which depended the fafety and welfare of the state h. The city of Verona still held out for some time; but was in the end taken by storm, and utterly ruined. The garison surrendered at Verona taken, discretion, and Constantine, contrary to their expectation, granted them their lives; f but that his own men might not be employed in guarding them, as they were very numerous, he caused chains to be made of their swords, and confined them in two prisons '. During the siege of Verona, Constantine detached part of his troops to attack Aquileia, Mutina, and several other cities; which readily submitted. By this means And several he became master of all the places between the Alps and Rome, the deliverance of other cities. which city from the tyranny of Maxentius, was what he had most of all at heart k. He therefore bent his march thither, and approached the city with all his forces. Constantine His approach roused Maxentius, who had abandoned himself to ease, and wallowed approaches Rome.

in .

I Idem, 6.

His dream.

in all manner of pleasures and debaucheries, stissing the tidings that were daily brought a to him of the defeat of his troops, and the progress of Constantine. He caused a bridge of boats to be laid over the Tiber, a little above the Milvian bridge, now Ponte Molle, so contrived that it could be easily loosened, which he charged one of his engineers to do as foon as Constantine was entered upon it with his army. But the emperor chose to encamp in a spacious plain, over-against the Milvian bridge, hoping by that means to draw Maxentius out of Rome, and tempt him to venture a general engagement, being well apprifed, that if he kept within the city, which was supplied with great store of provisions, the besieging him there would prove a dangerous undertaking, and protract the war to a great length. But Maxentius ordering his troops to encamp between the Milvian bridge, and the city, in order b to prevent Constantine from approaching the walls, did not so much as stir out of his palace, till he was frightened from it by an inaufpicious omen, which obliged him to repair with his wife and fon to the house of one of his friends. Lastantius tells us, that the night preceding the twenty-seventh, or rather the twenty-eighth of October, Constantine was admonished in a dream to cause the shields of his soldiers to be marked with the P, and then give battle. The order was immediately executed, and not only on the shields, but likewise on the helmets, as appears from an ancient medal k, of all the foldiers were displayed the cross, and the name of our Saviour 1. The same day, the twenty-eighth of October, Maxentius, who then ended the fixth year of his reign, exhibited, notwithstanding the danger that threatened c him, magnificent shews in the circus; and having caused the sibylline books to be confulted, had this answer, that the great enemy of Rome was doomed to perish that very day. This he understood of Constantine; and therefore, quitting the city without delay, he croffed the bridge, which he had caufed to be laid over the Tiber, and chose for the field of battle a place called Saxa rubra, or the red rocks, about nine miles from Rome, drawing up his numerous army between the enemy and the river. Constantine, overjoyed to hear that Maxentius had marched out of the city, immediately advanced against him; and having encouraged his men with certain hopes of victory, ordered the fignal to be given for the battle. At the first onset, the Romans and Italians in Maxentius's army, out of hatred to the tyrant, gave way and retired; d but the others, chiefly the prætorian guards, the ministers of his tyranny, stood their ground, and fought with great resolution and intrepidity; so that the victory remained doubtful, till Maxentius's cavalry being broken, the tyrant abandoned the field to fave himself across his bridge of boats, and return to the city m. Lactantius writes, that the bridge broke down of itself during the battle"; but Eusebius and Zosimus tell us, that the engines which fastened the boats together, giving way under the great weight of the multitude that fled with or before Maxentius, the boats parted, and he was pushed into the river by those who were flying with him o. Be that as it will, all authors agree, that he was taken in the snare which he had laid for Constantine; and that, falling into the Tiber with his horse and armour, he e was there drowned with many of his men, and some of his chief officers. His body being with much ado found the next day, buried in the mud, Constantine caused his head to be struck off, in order to shew it to the Roman people, who had not yet shewed any joy for his death, apprehending it might be only a false report, spread on purpose to discover their inclination and real sentiments P. The same day, the twenty-ninth of October, Constantine, causing the head of Maxentius to be carried upon a pole before his army, made his public entry into the city, attended by the fenate in a body, and by infinite crowds of people, who flocked from all parts to behold and welcome, with loud shouts of joy, their new prince and deliverer. In the shews which were exhibited the following days, the people, neglecting the diver- f fions, kept their eyes immoveably fixed on Constantine, returning thanks to the tutelar gods of the city and empire, for giving them, in the room of a cruel and inhuman tyrant, a prince, of whose humanity, prudence, and moderation, same had Constantine enters Rome.

drowned in the Tiber.

proclaimed fo many instances q.

The battle was no sooner over, says one of the panegyrists, than Constantine sheathed his sword, and not only pardoned, but received into sayour, even his most

His clemency after victory.

inveterate

&lt;sup>1</sup> Idem, p. 145. <sup>16</sup> Baron, ad ann. 312. <sup>1</sup> Lact. perf. c. 44. p. 37. <sup>m</sup> Zos. l. ii. p. 676. Anonym. p. 473. Panegyr. 6, 7. p. 145, 170. Lact. p. 38. <sup>n</sup> Lact. ibid. <sup>o</sup> Zos. p. 677. Euseb. vit. Contt. p. 427. <sup>p</sup> Zos. ibid. <sup>q</sup> Panegyr. 7. p. 146, 147. Lact. c. 44. p. 38. <sup>r</sup> Panegyr. 6. p. 148.

a inveterate enemies; nay, and preferred fuch of them as he found qualified for public employments. The people demanded with great importunity the death of some of the tyrant's chief ministers, but could not prevail upon the good-natured emperor to comply with their demands, and humour their revengeful temper . All the troops of Maxentius were immediately difarmed; but Conflantine reinstated them foon after in their former condition, and employed them against the barbarians on the banks of the Rhine and the Danube. As for the prætorian guards, a corps fo famous ever fince the time of Augustus, and so powerful as to raise to the empire, and depose, whom they pleased, he either disbanded them, or reduced them to the The pratorian rank of common foldiers, caufing their camp, which had been begun by Sejanus, guarde offb in the reign of Tiberius, to be utterly demolished . Aurelius Victor seems to infinuate, variable. that he would not fuffer any troops to remain in Rome, thinking them more apt to foment than suppress tumults and seditions f. Zosimus writes, that Constantine punished fome, tho' very few, of those who had been most attached to the tyrants; and Nazarius, that he cut off his whole race h, that is, his fon, for he had no other iffue; and of him no mention is made from this time forward, tho' he was alive when his father was drowned. Upon the death of Maxentius, incredible numbers of informers ftarted up to accuse such had adhered to him. But Constantine, treading in the footsteps of other good princes, put a stop to their accusations, and the evils that thence threatened the state, by a law enacted this year, in which he declared all He enacte a c informers, and fuch as attempted to diffurb the peace and tranquillity of private ferere law perfors with unjust fuits, guilty of death. He restored the senate to its former ers. lustre and authority, filling it with persons of the greatest merit, chosen out of all the provinces subject to him. He recalled such as had been banished by Maxentius, fet those at liberty whom he had confined, and, by a general edict, remitted to all without diffinction whatever punishment had been inflicted upon them by Maxentius k. Not fatisfied with delivering them from the evils under which they groaned, he exercifed his generofity and good-nature to all in fuch a manner, as to make full amends, in the space of two months, for the calamities they had suffered during the tyrant's fix years reign 1. As he was now master of all Italy, the people crouded d from every quarter to Rome, to see their benefactor and deliverer, and were received by him with such marks of kindness, and unseigned affection, that they returned home with a far greater opinion of his affability, good-nature, and moderation, than fame, which delights in exaggeration, had raifed in them m. The fenate, out Honeurs conof gratitude, decreed him the first place among the emperors, tho' claimed by Maxi-fired upon min, and a triumphal arch, which is still standing, and was raised, as we read in him by the the inscription, in honour of Constantine, for having, by divine instinct, and with senate. extraordinary courage, delivered, in one combat, the republic from the tyrant, and his whole faction. In the fame inscription, Constantine is styled the deliverer of Rome, and the author of the public tranquillity. This arch is thought not to have been e ended and dedicated before the folemnity of the tenth year of Constantine's reign, that is, before the year 315 n. Baronius observes, that it was adorned with several statues, taken from monuments erected to the honour of Al. Aurelius, and other princes, which far excelled in workmanship such as were done at this time o. The fenate confecrated likewife to Constantine several magnificent edifices, which had been raised at a vast charge by Maxentius. Baronius observes, that the panegyrists, in describing the triumphal entry of Constantine into Rome, tell us, that he went to the palace, and to the fenate, but take no notice of his vifiting the capitol, tho' that was one of the chief ceremonies of the folemnity P. Zosimus writes, that the court being, on occasion of a certain solemnity, obliged to go to the capitol, Conf flantine was so far from complying with the ancient custom, that he openly despited and derided both that and the other ceremonies of the religion of the Romans 9.

or strength, but to God alone, soon after his entry into Rome, he caused a statue to be erected to himself, holding a cross in the right hand, with an inscription, Page great reimporting, that under the influence of that victorious and falutary fign, he had deli- pech to the d Panegyr. 6. p. 148.

* Zos. l. 11. p. 077.

* Cod. Theodof. 3. p. 430, 431. . . . k Panegyr.

* I Cod. Theodof. 3. p. 430, 431. . . . k Panegyr.

* I Idem, p. 173. ELIBAN, orat. 12, p. 262. d Panegyr. 6, p. 148. e Zos. l. ii. p. 677. f Idem ibid. B Zos. p. 677. h Paneg. 7, p. 157. i Cod. Theodof. 3, p. 430, 4 6, p. 137. & 7, p. 175. Euseb. l. i. c. 41, p. 409. l Panegyr. 7, p. 174. n Norts de Licin. num. c. 3, p. 49, 50. e Baron. ann. 312. Aur. Vict. p. 526. <sup>e</sup> Zos. l. ii. p. 677. Aur. Vict. p. 526. P BARON. 1bid. 9 Zos. l. ii. p. 686.

As he ascribed the late victory, and all his other successes, not to his own conduct vered the city from the tyrannical yoke under which it groaned, and reftored the a

to be put to senate and people of Rome to their ancient liberty and splendor. About the month of November of this year 312, an edict was iffued in his name, and in the name of Licinius, putting a stop to the great persecution which had been begun by Dioclesian, and had raged with incredible fury in most provinces of the empire for the space the perfecution. of ten years. This edict was fent by the two emperors to Maximin, the most implacable enemy the christians ever had, accompanied by a letter from Constantine, wherein the pious emperor acquainted him with the miraculous affistance he had received from heaven, and the victory he had by that means gained over the tyrant Maxentius. As Maximin yet pretended to live in friendship and amity with Constantine and Licinius, (for the letter was figned by both princes) notwithstanding his hatred b to the christians, he published in their favour the decree, which is related at length by Eulebius', and feems to have been enacted this year. That writer, in speaking of the conduct of Constantine at this time, tells us, that he treated with the utmost respect the ministers of the true God, kept several of them constantly with him, entertained them at his own table, and paid an entire deference to their counsels. He seems to have honoured above the rest Melchiades, bishop of Rome; for to him he appeals in speaking of the veneration he had for the catholic church, and his fincere desire of seeing unity reign in it without the least schism or division . Theophanes mentions some constitutions said to have been addressed by Constantine to that holy bishop, but thought by Theophanes to be spurious pieces forged by the Arians. c It is certain, that the emperor bestowed great privileges on the clergy of the city of Rome". We are not told what privileges these were; but most writers suppose the emperor to have exempted them from the payment of taxes, from the discharging of public offices not fuitable to their calling, and fuch-like burdens. Baronius pretends, that this year, 312. Constantine gave the Lateran palace to the bishop of Rome w. But Optatus Milevitanus writes, that in the year 31g. a council was held there in the apartment of the empress Faustax; whence some conclude, that it still belonged to the emperor. However, as it is certain, that it appertained to the fee of Rome in the fourth century, and that the church adjoining to it was even then flyled the bafilic of Constantine, we cannot think it improbable, that the palace was d a gift of Constantine to the bishops of Rome, and that the church was built by him, as we read in Anastatius?. As for the famous donation, by which Constantine declared the pope prince and fovereign of Rome, it is now looked upon by the Roman catholic, as well as the protestant writers, as a forgery of a later date. Baronius is ashamed to maintain it as a genuine piece, and yet declines declaring it a forgery. It is commonly believed to have been forged in the eighth century by the noted impostor Builds a great Isidorus 2. Eusebius tells us, that Constantine built a great number of churches, fupplied them with vast riches, and adorned the altars with magnificent offerings 2. There are several churches at Rome, and in other places, said to have been sounded by Constantine; but the authority of Anastatius, and such-like writers, is not of sufficient weight with us to ascribe that glory to any in particular. What he writes of the church of St. Peter on the Vatican, is confirmed by two verses, that were formerly to be feen in the vault of that church, importing, that it had been founded by Constantine b. In demolishing the ancient church, to build that which is at present looked upon as the most magnificent structure in the world, the name Constantine was discovered in several places. In some monuments, thought to be of the sixth century, we read, that Constantine built at Rome the basilic of the Sessorian palace, in which he placed the true cross, about the year 326, whence it was called the church of the boly cross c. In some ancient inscriptions, the church of St. Agnes is said to have been built by Constantine, at the request of his daughter Constantia, or rather f Constantina, who is supposed to have been buried there in 354 d. Theophanes writes, that Constantine no sooner saw himself master of Rome, than he caused the reliques of the holy martyrs to be carefully gathered, and honourably interred . He received, continues Eusebius, in describing his conduct, all strangers with great demonstrations of kindness, and made them rich presents. Not thinking it enough to relieve the number of churches.

Pays great respect to the bishops and clergy.

His generosity and good-nature to all.

EUSEB. l.ix. c. 9. p. 360. * EUSEB. hift. l. x. p. 391. t Theoph. p. 14. * Cod. Theodof. 16. t. 2. l. xiv. p. 40. w Baron. ann. 312. * Optat. l. i. p. 44. f Anast. c. 34. p. 13. * Vide P. Pagi, p. 324. * Euseb. vit. Conft. l.i. c. 4. p. 429. b Baron. ann. 324. Anast. c. 34. p. 15. c Boll. 18. Feb. p. 69. d Idem, p. 70. Theoph. p. 11.

common beggars with money, he caused them to be maintained and cloathed at his

a own expence. To such as were come of noble, but decayed families, he was rather magnificent than liberal, bestowing upon some of them estates, and profitable employments upon others. He took under his protection orphans and widows, supporting them with great generofity, and establishing rich funds for their maintenance, He married to wealthy citizens, and persons of distinction, many young women, who were destitute of friends and relations, allowing them fortunes out of the exchequer proportionable to the estates of their husbands. In short, all who had the good fortune to live under him, felt the effects of his generofity and good-nature. No one ever implored his affistance in vain; no one ever departed diffatisfied from his prefence. He was often heard to fay, that whoever was allowed to approach his b prince, ought to receive some favour or other at his hands; that it was incumbent upon the prince to make it his chief study to content all who applied to him: hence to those, against whom justice obliged him to pronounce in the judging of causes, he usually gave large sums, or by some other means made good the losses they fuftained; so that his generosity was no less extolled and commended by those who lost their suit, than his justice was by such as carried it. Thus far Eusebius.

THE indictions, that is, a cycle or revolution of fifteen years, made use of in The indiction.

reckoning time, are supposed to have begun about the end of the present year 312. The origin of this cycle, and the etymology of its name, has occasioned great disputes among modern writers. The reader will find in Du Cange a list of the authors who c have written on this subject f. Constantine having reduced the time, which the Romans were obliged to ferve, to fifteen years, fays Baronius, he was confequently obliged every fifteen years, to impose, or indicere, according to the Latin expression, an extraordinary tax for the paying of those who were discharged; and hence came this new cycle, which, from the Latin word indicere, was styled indiction s. The opinion of Baronius, tho' in reality a bare conjecture, feems to Petavius more probable than any thing that has been faid by others on the fame subject is, for we know nothing for certain touching the origin, name, or author of this cycle. There are three kinds of indictions, viz. the Casarean or imperial indictions, which begin on the twentyfourth of September, and were long made use of in France and Germany i; the Constand tinopolitan indictions, beginning with the year of the Greeks, on the first day of September; and the papal indictions, or indictions of the popes, who, some centuries fince, reckon from the first of January of the year 313. Petavius seems to think, that the Constantinopolitan indiction was generally used among the Greeks as early as the reign of the emperor Anastatius, and perhaps of Theodosius the younger; nay, he is inclined to believe, that the indiction originally began on the first of September k. And truly, from various passages of the history of the fifth century, it appears, that the emperors of Constantinople followed this style, and that it prevailed all over Syria, and even at Rome!. Some have reckoned the indictions from the year 314. or from September of the year 313. but Petavius m, and cardinal Noris, shew, that we ought e to count them from the month of September of 312, tho' we have no certain proof that they first began then; for some pretend, that they were in use in the time of Julius Caefar, or Augustuso; which we can hardly believe, fince no mention is made of indictions by any author who flourished before the reign of Constantine. The first thing we find dated by them is the council of Antioch, held, as we read in Athanasius P. if that passage is genuine, which Petavius questions 4, in the year 341. and in the fourteenth indiction. However, it is certain, that St. Ambrose mentions the indiction in a letter of the year 386. and observes, that it began in the month of November r. From that time forward it is common in the code, where mention is made of the indiction of the year 367, and in other monuments both of facred and profane history; f but the indictions, as cardinal Noris observes, are seldom marked right's. Onuphrius quotes a book on the indictions, by one Chyrius Fortunatianus, whom he takes to be the bishop of Aquileia of that name, so famous in the time of Constantine's children . But Petavius thinks there never was any fuch book; and likewise rejects, as quite groundless, the opinion of those who tell us, that the council of Nice com-

EUSEB. l.i. c. 43. p. 429, 430. & l.iv. c. 4. p. 528. Cangiana, Parif. ann. 1688. 8 BARON. ann. 312 f Vide Chron. Paschale, seu Alexandrin. ex edit. Cangiana, Parif. ann. 1688.

8 BARON. ann. 312.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

Vide Johan. Forbes, institut. historico-theologic. l. v. c. 20. p. 268. & P. Pagi, ann. 312.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40. p. 265.

h Petav. d h Petav. doct. temp. l. xi. c. 40, p. 265. 268. & P. Pagi. ann. 212. R Petav.

manded all bishops to mark the indiction in their letters u. He even suspects the a council of Rome, said to have been held under pope Julius, and dated the fixth indiction w. The reader must observe, that the first year of this cycle is called the first indiction; the second year, the second indiction, and so of the rest, till the fifteenth; after which, the cycle is begun anew, and the years counted in the same manner.

Maximin perchristians.

His dominions afflicted with many dreadful calamities.

During the war between Constantine and Maxentius in the west, Maximin, who had enjoyed a profound tranquillity in the east ever fince his agreement with Licinius, began anew the persecution, which the edict of Galerius, in favour of the christians, had obliged him to interrupt for some time. In a rescript addressed to the inhabitants of Tyre, he had bragged of the happiness of his reign, which, he b faid, had never been interrupted or diffurbed by wars, storms, dearth of provisions, contagions, or earthquakes. This exemption from the evils that afflicted other parts of the empire, he ascribed to the great care he took in promoting the worship of the gods, and persecuting with fire and sword their enemies the christians x. But providence did not fail to humble his pride, and punish, in a very remarkable manner, his cruelty to those who deserved it the least. For the very next winter proving exceeding dry, the drought produced a famine when no ways expected, and the famine a dreadful plague, attended with naufeous fores, which breaking out in the face, and especially about the eyes, deprived of sight an infinite number of men, women, and children. This Eusebius, with a great deal of reason, looks upon as c a punishment from heaven upon Maximin, who sparing, out of his great mercy, to use his expression, the lives of several christians, caused their right eyes to be put out, in order to diffinguish them by that mark of infamy from his other subjects y. To the famine and plague that ravaged the dominions of Maximin with a fury hardly to be expressed, was added a destructive war. For the tyrant, attempting to oblige the Armenians, who had embraced the true religion, to offer victims to his false deities, forced them to take arms in their own defence, and, from ancient friends and allies, to become enemies of the Roman people and empire'. This must be understood of Armenia Major; for the people of Armenia Minor were not allies, but subjects of the empire. This is the first instance we find in history of a religious d war, or a war for the fake of religion. As to the iffue of it, we are only told, that, in the course of this war, Maximin, and his army, suffered much, our historian being wholly taken up in describing the inexpressible miseries that attended the plague, and the famine, in all the provinces subject to Maximin, and the charitable conduct of the christians towards their greatest enemies, during the time of their distress. Maximin was obliged, as we have related above, by the decree of Constantine and Licinius, to put a stop to the persecution this year, not daring yet openly to oppose them.

Constantine

THE next consuls were Constantine and Licinius, both for the third time. former did not, it feems, stay at Rome above two months, as appears from a law e which he published at Milan, dated the tenth of March b. He was met in that city by Licinius, and there he married to him his lifter Cinstantia, whom he had betrothed marries mis to him before his war with Maxentius. They both wrote to Dioclesian, inviting him tia to Licinius. to affift at that folemnity; but he begging to be excused on account of his age, they highly refented it, and fent him a fecond letter, filled with menaces, which haftened his death; for he died foon after, in the month of July of this year 313 d. The two emperors, in this interview, enacted an edict in tavour of the christians, which is related at length by Eusebius. Constantine was soon obliged to leave Milan, and hasten into Gaul to make head against the Franks, who, forgetful of the treaty which they had made with him a few years before, were affembling their forces with f a design to invade the Roman dominions. The emperor arrived while they were preparing to pass the Rhine; but finding they withdrew, awed by his presence, he gave out, that the Germans too were ready to break into Gaul; and leaving some troops concealed among the woods at a small distance from the river, retired with the rest. The Franks no sooner heard of his departure, than they passed the Rhine; when the Romans, rifing unexpectedly out of their ambuscade, fell upon them before a they could draw up their forces, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and obliged Overcomes the the rest to repass the river in the utmost consusion. Constantine, not allowing them Franks. time to recover themselves from their consternation, entered their country, laid waste their lands, burnt their habitations, and, having taken an incredible number of captives, exposed them all to be devoured by the wild beasts in the shews which he exhibited on account of his victory f. This severity towards a perfidious and faithless enemy, whom no ties could bind, is commended by his panegyrist; but whether it answers the character of a mild, generous, and good-natured prince, which all the writers of those times give him, is what we leave our readers to judge. Cruelty, even towards an enemy, however treacherous, was not, at least, counteb nanced by the religion which he professed. For this victory he took the title of Francicus 8. Constantine was, as appears from the date of several laws h, in the months of November and December of this year, at Treves; during which time the panegyric of the anonymous writer is thought to have been pronounced, in which the orator extols the victory, which he had lately gained over Maxentius; and in the end of his speech addresses himself to the great and only true God; but at the same time plainly shews, that he had not yet wholly renounced the superstitious ceremonies of the gentiles. He observes, that certain barbarians, who inhabited a distant country, had submitted to Constantine; but as to this particular, there is a profound silence among historians. This year Constantine granted great privileges to catholic churches He bestows e in Africa, which province had submitted to him upon the news of the death of Max. great privientius. In a rescript addressed to Anulinus, whom he had appointed proconsul of less on the arrival has commanded him to example the along the had appointed proconsul of array and the Africa, he commands him to exempt the clergy belonging to the catholic church church, there, of which Cacilianus, bishop of Carthage, was the head, from all civil employments, that they might not be diverted from the facred functions of their office. Nothing, fays he in that rescript, speaking of the clergy, will more contribute to the welfare of the state, than their applying themselves wholly to the worship of God k. This ordinance was notified by Anulinus to Cacilianus, as appears from his answer to Constantine, dated the fifteenth of April of this year 3131. As this exemption was granted only to the catholic clergy, the heretics, probably the Donatists, d attempted to diffurb them in the enjoyment of it; which obliged Constantine to confirm the privileges he had granted them by a new edict, dated the twenty-first of Oslober of this year. His exempting the clergy thus from the public offices in the cities, proved very burdenfome to the other inhabitants, and many entered themselves among them on purpose to enjoy that privilege: the emperor therefore, by another edict, put a stop to the increase of the clergy, ordaining, that none should be admitted among them but to supply the places of others deceased; and that those, who were admitted, should be persons not qualified by their birth or wealth for the first and most chargeable employments. In virtue of this edict, several cities attempted to oblige such of the clergy as were qualified for those offices to dise charge them, tho' they had been ordained before it was enacted; which Constantine prohibited by a rescript, dated the eighteenth of July of the year 320. But after all, his forbidding persons of rank and estates to enter themselves among the clergy, in order to ease the laymen, was afterwards looked upon by other emperors, some say by Constantine himself, as an affront and injury offered to the church; and therefore that edict was annulled, and persons of the highest rank were allowed to enter into holy orders, but upon condition of their refigning to others, either their whole estates, or the greatest part of them; which was deemed suitable to that disinterestedness which the church requires in her ministers m. Some writers are of opinion, that Constantine at the same time exempted the church-lands from all taxes f and burdens whatfoever, there being mention made of this immunity, as already established, in a law of the year 315.; but others pretend this law to be of a later date, and ascribe the above-mentioned exemption to Constantius, the son of Constantine . We have a letter written this year by Constantine to Cacilianus, bishop of Carthage, acquainting him, that he designed to put into the hands of the ministers Gives sums to of the catholic church a confiderable sum, to be distributed by them among the the clergy to indigent christians in Africa, Numidia, and Mauritania; and that with this design he among the inhad ordered Ursus, his receiver in Africa, to pay to him a certain sum, to be distri-digent christi-h Cod. Theod. chronol. p. 7. 1 Panegyr. 6. k Euseb. l. xx. c. 6. p. 392. Cod. Theodof. chronol. p. 11.

* Petav. p. 365. w Concil. tom. ii. p. 527. * Euseb. l. ix. c. 7. p. 353, 354. 7 Idem ibid. 2 Idem, p. 355. 2 Euseb. ibid. p. 553—557. b Cod. Theodol. t. 5. p. 114. C Lact. perf. c. 45. p. 38. Vict. epit. p. 545. Zos. l. ii. p. 677. Anonym. p. 473. d Vict. epit. p. 542. * Euseb. l. x. c. 5. p. 388.

buted according to the tickets which he should receive from Ofins: he adds, that a if the sum he mentions was not by him thought sufficient, he might recur to Heraclides, another of his receivers, whom he had injoined to supply him with what monies he wanted for fo pious an use o. Ofus, mentioned in this letter, is, without all doubt, the great Osius, bishop of Corduba, to whose counsels Constantine ever paid the utmost regard in whatever related to the affairs of the church. In the same letter he acquaints Cacilianus, that, by word of mouth, he had ordered Analinus, proconful of Africa, and Patricius, lieutenant in that province, to check and suppress those who disturbed the peace of the catholic church there, meaning, we suppose, the Donatists, who had formed a powerful party against Cacilianus himself. Not satisfied with the orders he had given to his officers, in order to put an end to the diffur- b bances raised by those obstinate schismatics, and maintain the unity of the church, he affembled, on the second of October of this year, a council at Rome; and another, far more famous, the year following, at Arles in Gaul P.

His zeal for the unity of the church.

War between Licinius and Maximin.

Licinius's aream or 71,1013.

He gains a complete victory over Maximin.

WHEN Constantine left Milan to oppose the Franks, threatening to invade Gaul, Licinius returned to Illyricum, where he was foon after attacked by Maximin, who, taking umbrage at his marrying the fifter of Constantine, and jealous of the good understanding that passed between those two princes, resolved to destroy them, and to begin with Licinius, whose ruin he hoped to compass, while the other was employed in Gaul against the Franks and Germans. With this view, he affembled in great haste his forces; and leaving Syria, marched in the depth of the winter into Bithr- c nia; and from thence passing into Thrace, laid siege to Byzantium, which, after having held out eleven days, was obliged to submit. He attacked Heraclea next, which made a vigorous defence, but was in the end taken by storm. In the mean time, Licinius, having drawn together what forces he could, took the field, not with a defign to venture an engagement, (for he had with him only thirty thousand men, whereas Maximin's army was twice that number) but to stop the progress of his conquests. However, the two armies meeting between Heraclea and Adrianopolis, Licinius, if we may give credit to Lastantius 4, was admonished in a dream to give the enemy battle, and affured of victory, provided he implored the affiftance of the true God by a prayer which was fuggetted to him in his fleep. Licinius remembered d it when he awaked, dictated to his fecretary, and caused many copies of it to be distributed among his foldiers, whom he took care to acquaint with his dream; which inspired them with new courage, and an eager defire of engaging the enemy, over whom they promifed themselves certain victory, fince heaven had declared in their favour. This prayer is related at length by Lastantius. Licinius defigned to give battle on the first of May, the day on which Maximin ended the eighth year of his reign. But Maximin having drawn up his army in battle-array on the last day of April, Licinius could no longer put off the engagement. When the two armies were in presence of one another, the officers and soldiers of Licinius, quitting their shields and helmets, with their hands lifted up to heaven, repeated three times e the above-mentioned prayer. Afterwards the two princes had an interview; but Maximin hearkening to no terms, they parted, and ordered the fignal for battle to be given . Zosimus writes, that Licinius's men at first gave ground, and retired; but foon after returned to the charge, and carried the day . But Lastantius and Eusebius w tell us, that the army of Maximin was put to flight at the very first onset, and pursued with great slaughter by the conqueror. Most of his troops, especially the legions, were cut in pieces, and the rest, his guards not excepted, abandoning him, submitted to Licinius. Maximin himself, quitting his purple robes, fled in the difguile of a flave; and croffing the Bosporus, reached Nicomedia on the first of May about sun-set, having in the space of twenty-sour hours travelled an & hundred and fixty miles. He did not stop at Nicomedia; but taking with him his wife and children, continued his flight into Cappadocia, where he halted, and refumed the purple, being met there by some troops that were marching from Syria to his affiftance x. Licinius entering Bithynia a few days after the battle, was received comes master of every-where with the greatest demonstrations of joy imaginable, especially at Nicomedia, where he caused solemn thanks to be returned to the Almighty for the success with which he had bleffed his arms; and then ordered the edict, which had been enacted

• Euseb. l. x. c. 6. p. 393. P Idem ibid. 9 LAC. Idem ibid. 1 Zos. l.ii. p. 677. LACT. p. 41. 9 LACT. perf c. 46. p. 39 I Idem ibid. p 40. Idem ibid. w Euses. l. ix. c. 10. p. 363. LACT. Zos. ibid.

a enacted by him and Constantine at Milan, in favour of the christians, to be published; which was done accordingly on the last day of June of this year, 313. that is, about ten years and four months after the edict, which gave rife to this long and bloody persecution, had been first published in the same city, by Dioclesian and Galerius v. Licinius had no sooner put a stop to the persecution by this edict, than he lest Nicomedia, and pursuing Maximin, arrived at the streights of mount Taurus, where he had resolved to make a stand; but his courage failing him at the approach of the victorious army, he retired with great precipitation to Tarfus, proposing to pass from thence into Egypt, and raise a new army there. But distrusting the troops he had with him, and apprehending they defigned to deliver him up to Licinius, he altered his mind, and refolved, fince he found no means of making his escape, to b put an end to his life with poison; which however had not the defired effect, but brought upon him a dreadful diftemper, whereof the unaccountable symptoms are The unaccounter described at length by Eusebius 2 and Lastantius 2, who ascribe it to divine venge-able distemper ance. He was tormented night and day with inexpressible pains; his eyes and of Maximin. tongue putrefied, a punishment justly inflicted upon him for the blasphemies he had uttered against heaven, and his causing the eyes of many christians to be put out; an invisible fire, to use the expression of Eusebius b, was kindled in his bowels, which, being attended with unrelenting torments, reduced him in a few days to a skeleton; his whole body was covered over with a kind of leprofy, and devoured by fwarms c of vermin: he could not be prevailed upon to take any nourishment, but greedily swallowed handfuls of earth, as if he had hoped by that means to asswage his pains, and allay the hunger, which tormented him without intermission c. Eusebius tells us, that reflecting in this condition on his unjust conduct towards the christians, and ascribing the agonies he suffered to his cruelty towards them, he caused an edict to be published, more favourable to them than that which he had been forced by Conflantine and Licinius to enact the year before. But as his repentance, fays Eufebius, was not fincere, it obtained no ease to his torments, which at length put an end to his life at Tarsus in Cilicia, about the middle of August, after he had reigned nine His death. years with the title of Casar, and five years and fix months with that of Augustus d, d He left several children behind him, whom he had created Casars, as appears from feveral ancient coinse; but their names are not mentioned by historians. By his death, Licinius became master of all the eastern provinces; so that the whole empire was now divided between him and Constantine. Maximin was declared by the edicts of the two furviving princes a public enemy, and treated as fuch; for his statues were pulled down, his images defaced, his name razed out of all public infcriptions, and fuch monuments as had been erected to his honour overturned and levelled with the ground. His children and relations were fentenced to death, and publicly exe- All his friends, cutted; his wife was thrown into the Orontes at Antioch, and drowned; all his mini-relations, and fters and favourites were involved in his ruin, and among the rest Culcianus, who to death by e had put a great number of christians to death in Egypt; Firmilianus, who had signa-Licinius. lized his hatred against them in Palestine; and Peuceces, whom the tyrant had favoured above the rest, and created three times consul. Licinius caused likewise a celebrated magician, by name Theotechnes, and all his affociates, to be publicly executed at Antiocb, after having obliged them to discover and own the impostures, with which they had led aftray the ignorant populace, and ftirred them up against the christians s. Candidianus, the son of Galerius, being introduced to Licinius at Nicomedia, was received by him with great demonstrations of kindness, and treated for some time in a manner suitable to his rank; but when he thought himself safe, he was, by the order of Licinius, murdered with Severianus, the fon of Severus, killed, as we f have related above, in the year 307. Valeria, the daughter of Dioclesian, and widow of Galerius, who had adopted Candidianus, was no sooner informed of his death, than the withdrew from Antiocb with her mother Prisca, and wandered about in disguise and undiscovered for the space of fifteen months; but being at last known at Theffalonica, she was seized there, and by Licinius's order publicly executed with her The death of mother, and both their bodies thrown into the sea 8. Thus were the families of these Valeria and three cruel persecutors of the church, Dioclesian, Galerius, and Maximin, utterly Prilca.

* LACT. perf. c. 49. p. 43. b EUSEB. iv. ver. 12. d Chron. Alex. p. 456. Y Lact. pers. c. 48. p. 41. 2 Euseb. l. ix. c. 10. p. 361. 2 Lact. pers. c. 49. p. 43. 5 Euseb. 365. 5 Euseb. ibid. Lact. p. 44. Hier. in Zachar. xiv. ver. 12. 5 Chron. Alex. p. 456. Noris de Licin. c. 2. p. 48. 5 Euseb. l. ix. c. 11. p. 366, 367. & de Pall. c. 18. p. 342. p. 365. C. EUSEB. IDId. 1 e Noris de Licin. c. 2. p. 48. Vol. VI. Nº 4.

cut off and exterminated. Zosimus tells us h, that the secular games ought to have a been celebrated at Rome this year, but were neglected by Constantine; which was noways pleafing to the pagans, who looked upon them as one of the chief supports of the empire, and a powerful preservative against plagues, wars, earthquakes, and other calamities, tho' the last, celebrated by Severus an hundred and ten years before in the consulate of Chilo and Libo, had not, as we have seen, kept off these evils. THE next confuls were Rufius Volusianus the second time, and Annianus. Conflantine passed the first months of this year at Treves, as appears from the dates of feveral laws. By one, which was published at Rome on the twenty fourth of April, he declared all those free, who had been condemned to slavery by Maxentius, commanding, under the severest penalties, such as held them in captivity to restore them b forthwith to their ancient liberty k. From Treves the emperor passed to Arles, where he ordered a general council to meet of all the bishops of the west, in order to suppress the Donatists, who raised great disturbances in the church. The letter he wrote to the council is a manifest proof of his piety, of his respect for the clergy, and his zeal for the unity of the church. He was obliged to leave Gaul before the bishops met, a war breaking out this year between him and Licinius, of which historians give us but a confused account, some blaming Licinius as the author of it, and others Constantine. The anonymous writer, whom we have often quoted, lays the whole blame on Licinius. According to him, Constantine had married his fister Anastasia to Bassianus, whom he defigned to create Casar, and appoint governor of c Italy; but not caring to take this step without the approbation of Licinius, he dispatched one Constantius to acquaint him with his design, and obtain his consent. But having discovered at the same time, that Licinius attempted to stir up Bassianus against him by means of Senecio, the brother of Bassianus, he wrote a letter to Licinius, upbraiding him with treachery, and infifting upon his delivering up to him Senecio, who had taken refuge in his court. Licinius was fo far from complying with his request, that, refenting the letter he had written to him, he caused his statues to be pulled down in Amona, a city of Upper Pannonia. Hereupon Constantine, having drawn together in great hafte a body of twenty thousand men, marched into Illyricum, hoping to surprise Licinius. But he found him already in the field, with d an army far more numerous than his own. However, he advanced into Pantionia; and the two armies meeting in the neighbourhood of Cibalæ, an engagement en sued, in which Licinius was utterly defeated, with the loss of twenty thousand of his best feated in Pan-troops. It appears from Zosimus, who relates the most minute particulars of this nonia,

War between Constantine and Licinius.

their agreement.

to Sirmium, and from thence, with his wife, his children, and treasures, into Dacia, where he raised to the dignity of Casar one of his officers, by name Valens. From Dacia, he passed into Thrace, and there assembled a second army, far more numerous and powerful than the former. In the mean time, Constantine made himself master of Cibalæ and Sirmium; and having caused the bridge over the Save to be repaired, which Licinius had ordered to be broken down, he pursued the enemy into e Thrace. Upon his arrival at Philippopolis, he was met by a deputation from Livinius, with proposals for an accommodation; but Constantine insisting upon his deposing Valens, and Licinius obstinately refusing to comply with that article, a second battle And in Thrace, was fought in the plains of Mardia in Thrace, which lasted from morning to night, when both armies retired, according to Zosimus, without any considerable advantage on either side . Aurelius Vistor , and the anonymous author of Constantine's life P, write, that Constantine would have gained a complete victory, had not night intervening faved Licinius's army from utter destruction. The next day Licinius sent one Mestrianus, who is styled comes or count, to Constantine, to negotiate a peace, The articles of which was in the end concluded upon the following terms: 1. That Valens should is be forthwith deposed, and reduced to his former condition. 2. That Syria, Egypt, Libya, Asia, Thrace, Mesia, and the leffer Scythia, should remain in the possession of Licinius; but that Illyricum, Dardania, Macedon, Greece, and Masia, should be yieded to Constantine q. Mæsia is named in both divisions, there being then two battle, that it was fought on the eighth of Ollober of this year, 314 m. Licinius fled provinces of that name, the one, known at prefent by the name of Servia, belonging

h Zos. 1. ii, p. 671. 1 Cod. Theodof. chronol. p. 8, 9. 1 Cod. Just. 7, t. 22. leg. 3, p. 665. 1 Concil. tom. i. p. 1431. 1 Anonym. p. 472. Zos. 1. i. p. 678. Eutrop. p. 588. Euseb. p. 21c. Vict. epit. p. 543. 1 Zos. p. 679. 2 Aur. Vict. p. 526. 1 Anonym. p. 474. 2 Idem ibid. Sozom. l. i. c. 2, p. 403. Zos. p. 779.

a to Illyricum, and the other, now Bulgaria, to Thrace. Peace being thus concluded, the two emperors entered the following year, 315. on their fourth consulship. Constantine, as appears from the dates of several laws, passed the best part of this year in Illyricum and Greece, which had been yielded to him by the late treaty. By one of these laws, dated the first of August, he forbids the crucifying of criminals, and several laws intirely abolishes that fort of punishment, tho' common among the Romans till his enacted by time, especially with respect to slaves. This prohibition is generally looked upon Constantine. by the fathers as an instance of his respect for the cross and passion of our Saviour. By another law, enacted at Naissus on the thirteenth of May, he commands the officers of the revenue to receive and educate at his expence fuch children as shall be brought b to them by their parents, as not being in a condition to provide for them by their own labour and industry. He ordered this law to be engraved on brass, and to be publicly hung up in all the cities of Italy. In the year 322, he extended it to Africa, injoining the proconfuls, governors, and receivers of the revenue there, to supply with corn out of the public granaries such parents as they shall find incapable of maintaining their children. By a third law published this year at Sirmium, and dated the second of June, he forbids, on pain of death, the attaching for debt either flaves or cattle employed in tilling the ground'. From Illyricum, Constantine went to Aquileia, and from thence to Rome, where he was, on the twenty-fifth of August, and the thirteenth of September, as appears from a law addressed to Probinus, c or rather Probianus, proconsul of Africa, and from an edict addressed to the people of Rome ". On the eighteenth of October, he was at Naissus in Dacia; for the law bears that date, which he published there, forbidding, under pain of being burnt alive, the Jews, and their patriarchs, to molest such as should abandon their sect to embrace the true religion, and inflicting severe punishments on those who should embrace the Jewish religion . Constantine passed almost the whole year ensuing, when Sabinus and Rufinus were consuls, in Gaul; for on the eleventh of January he was at Treves, on the fourteenth of May at Vienne in Dauphiny, and on the thirteenth of August at Arles, where his wife Fausta was delivered of a son, whom some Fausta delitake to be Constantine his eldest son, and others to be his youngest son Constans. vered of a son d This year the emperor enacted a law, dated the eighth of June, and addressed to at Arles. a bishop, by name Protogenes, probably the celebrated bishop of Sardica, by which he gave leave to all masters to infranchise their slaves in the presence of the christian people affembled with their bishops or pastors in the church, without recurring, as was prescribed by the Roman laws, to the prætors and consuls. Thus the manumitting of flaves, which before was attended with great difficulties, and no small expence, became easy and no-ways chargeable, the masters being no longer obliged to recur to the prætors and confuls at Rome, but only to their own bishops and clergy x. In the month of Ostober of this year, the emperor was at Milan, and there heard the complaints of the Donatists against Cacilianus bishop of Carthage y; e and on the fourth of December at Sardica, where he enacted a law, commanding persons even of the greatest distinction, when guilty of rapes, extortions, or other crimes of that nature, to be tried by the governors of the provinces, and executed, without being allowed to appeal to the governor of Rome, or the emperor z. This feverity was judged necessary to check the insolence of the nobility, who began to oppress the people in a most tyrannical manner, especially in the remote provinces. The following year, 317. when Gallicanus and Bassus were consuls, Constantine and Licinius agreed to create three Cafars, viz. Crispus and Constantine, the sons of the Crispus, Conemperor Loustantine, and Licinius or Licinianus, the son of Licinius by Constantia, stantine, and the fifter of Constantine. This promotion was made, according to the best chrono created Calars. f logers, on the first of March, and was afterwards notified to the armies, and published in all the cities of the empire. The fon of Licinius is styled on the ancient coins Valerius Licinianus Licinius, and also Licinius the youngerb, and was but an infant, about twenty months old, when raised to the dignity of Casarc. Crispus, Constantine's fon by his first wife, was born, according to some, in the year 300.

according to others in 296. fo that he was at this time in the seventeenth or twenty-

* Cod. Theodof. l. i. p. 224, 225.

Cod. Theodof. l. i. p. 224, 225.

Cod. Theodof. l. i. c. g. p. 414.

Cod. Theodof. l. xvi tit. 8. leg. 1. p. 214.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 13. leg. 1. p. 111. Sozom. l. i. c. g. p. 414.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. 3, 4.

Cod. Theodof. l. iv. tit. 1. leg. 1. p. * Anonym. p. 474. Zos. l. ii. p. 679. Hier. chron. is de Licin. c. i. p. 39, 40.

* Vict. epit. p 543.

first year of his age d. Constantine had committed the care of his education to the a celebrated Lastantius, a person equally capable of instructing him in the sciences, and inspiring him with sentiments of piety. Eusebius styles him an excellent prince, a prince beloved of heaven, a son in no respect inserior to his father. He is called in the ancient inscriptions Flavius Valerius Julius Crispus. This year was born, according to the common opinion, on the seventh, or, as others will have it, on the thirteenth of August in Illyricum, and according to some in the city of Sirmium, Constantius, Constantine's fecond fon, by Fausta, the fister of Maxentius 8. Constantine passed the following year, when Licinius was conful the fifth time with Crispus, partly in Illyricum, and partly in the neighbourhood of Rome, and revived the ancient Roman law against parricides, which had been abrogated by Pompey the Great, comprehending under the name of parricide b the murder, not only of a father and mother, but likewise of a son h. The next confuls were, Constantine the fifth time, and Licinius Cafar. Constantine passed this and the three following years in Illyricum; and by several laws enacted there, and addressed to the governors of Rome, and to the Roman people, endeavoured to reform the many abuses which had long prevailed in the metropolis of the empire. By one of these laws, published at Rome on the first of February, he gives the pagans leave to confult the aruspices, that is, those who pretended to foretel events from the entrails of victims; but forbids the aruspices, as well as the other pagan priests, to enter the houses of private persons, tho' their friends or relations, upon pain of being burnt alive: fuch as received them were by this law to forfeit their estates, c and be banished for life; the informers were not to be punished in this, as in other cases, but amply rewarded for their zeal. The end of this law was to prevent all private facrifices and confultations. By another law, dated the feventeenth of December, he commands those, who shall consult the aruspices, or other diviners, to send their answers to him k. The emperor continued this year at Sirmium till the twentyfecond of June, as appears from the dates of his laws; was at Naissus on the fifteenth of July, at Milan on the seventh of September, at Aquileia on the twelfth of October, at Sardica on the twenty-fixth of November, and again at Sirmium on the first of December 1. The following year Constantine entered upon his sixth consulship, having his son Constantine for his collegue. This year he abrogated the Papian, and all d other laws against celibacy; but suffered those who had children to enjoy the privileges granted them by those laws m. He annulled another law, impowering the creditors to seize on the estates and effects of their debtors; and at the same time declared, that such as had forfeited their estates by that law, might redeem them by paying the fums they owed n. By a law dated the first of February, he forbids the officers of the revenue to punish with rods, or confine to the public prisons, such as were backward in paying the common taxes; but orders them to be secured in places where every one might fee and visit them o. This law must have been unknown to Zosimus, who tells us, that rods, and all forts of torments, were used by the officers of Constantine in exacting what was due to the exchequer P. Two other e laws were enacted by Constantine this year, the one forbidding married men to keep in open and wholfome places, and not to confine them, at least in the day-time, to dungeons: he declares such as shall by ill usage extort money from their prisoners, guilty of death; and threatens with his indignation the magistrates who shall wink at fuch diforders. This year Crifpus gained a victory over the Franks, the particulars of which are not mentioned in history: Nazarius in his panegyric only Constantius born.

Laws against

Conflantine revokes the Papian and other laws against celibacy.

Laws in favour concubines 7, and the other commanding all judges to dispatch the causes of crimiof prijoners, nals, and the gaolers to treat them, however guilty, with humanity, to keep them tells us, that he overcame the Franks, granted them a peace, and then returned to his father '. THE following year, when Crispus and Constantine, the emperors two sons, were manner of work on fundays. Sozomen writes, that out of respect to the cross, he

And for keep consuls, Constantine published an edict on the seventh of March, forbidding all ing holy fundays. likewise ordered fridays to be kept holy ". But of this edict no mention is made d Zos. p. 679. Panegyr. 7. p. 177. Euseb. l. x. c. 9. p. 298. Goltz. p. 129. Cod. Theodof. chronol. p. 13. Du Cange Byzant. famil. p. 47. h Cod. Theodof. l. ix. tit. 15. p. 112, 113. l Cod. Theodof. l. ix. tit. 16. leg. 1, 2. p. 114, 115. k Idem, l. xvi. tit. 10. leg. 1. p. 257. l Cod. Theodof. chronol. p. 16—27. m Sozom. l. i. c. 9. p. 413. Euseb. vit. Conft. l. iv. c. 26. Cod. Theodof. p. 643, 644. n Idem, p. 251, 252. l Idem, p. 68, 69. p. Zos. l. ii. p. 691. l Cod. Theodof. p. 70, 71. l Idem, p. 33. l Panegyr. 7. p. 177. l Euseb. vit. Conft. l. iv. c. 18. p. 534. Cod. Just. l. iii. tit. 12. leg. 3. p. 250. l Sozom l. i. c. 8. p. 412.

the arupices.

either

a either by Eulebius, or any other historian. However, the authority of Sozomen, who lived at Constantinople, was by profession a pleader, and shews himself every-where thoroughly acquainted with the laws, is of great weight with us. The following year 322. Petronius Probianus and Anicius Julianus being consuls, Constantine gained a Constantine great victory over the Sarmatians w. Optatianus writes, that they were overcome in defeats the Sar-feveral battles with the Carpi and the Geta, that is, the Goths x. These battles were matians. fought, according to that writer, at Campona, Marga, and Bononia, all three cities of Illyricum on the Danube, the first in Pannonia or Valeria, near the present city of Buda, and the other two in Upper Mafia y. Rausimodes, king of the Sarmatians, had, as we read in Zosimus 2, besieged a city, which he does not name; but Constantine, b haftening to the relief of the place, put the enemy to flight, and having obliged those who had made their escape to repass the Danube, pursued them cross that river, defeated them a fecond time with great flaughter, their king being killed among the rest, and returned with an incredible number of captives. Eusebius does not speak of this victory in particular; but tells us in general terms, that heaven rewarded with many victories over the different clans of barbarians the emperor's zeal for the propagation of the gospel. The Sarmatian games, which were yearly celebrated about the latter end of November, probably took their rife from this victory b. The next consuls were Severus and Rusinus. Constantine, after his victory over the barbarians, marched with his army to Theffalonica; but while he was busied there in making c a port, the Goths, notwithstanding their late deseat, entered Thrace and Massia, committing every-where dreadful ravages. Constantine marched against them with incredible expedition; and having gained a complete victory over them, purfued And the Goths them with great flaughter into the dominions of Licinius; which that prince highly refenting, complained of it as an open breach of the treaties subsisting between them. Constantine endeavoured to appeare him; but as Licinius, distatisfied with the late partition of the empire, waited only a plaufible pretence to break with Constantine, after several embassies and unsuccessful negotiations, both princes began to prepare for War between war. Constantine dispatched expresses into all the provinces, ordering his troops to Constantine hasten into Illyricum, and join him c. Zosimus writes, that his army was an hundred and Licinius. d and thirty thousand men strong, and that he assembled at the port of Athens a sleet confishing of two thousand two hundred vessels of different rates and sizes; whereas Licinius had with him but an hundred and fifteen thousand men, and three hundred and fifty galleys d. Constantine was still at Sirmium on the twenty-fifth of May e, and a few days after at The falonica, whence he marched into Thrace, and found Licinius encamped there on the banks of the Hebrus, in the neighbourhood of Adrianople. The two armies continued fome days encamped over-against each other, being parted by the river. Constantine was for laying a bridge cross the Hebrus; but in the mean time having discovered a ford at some distance, he passed it at first with twelve horsemen, who being followed by a few more, kept the enemy in play, till the e whole army crossed the river. Both princes drew up their forces in battle-array, and prepared for the ensuing engagement, which was likely to prove decisive. Eusebius writes, that the author of the war, that is, Licinius, gave the fignal for the onset, and that Constantine, having first with a fervent prayer invoked the Almighty, and given for the parole God our Saviour, ordered the cross, in which he confided more than in the number and bravery of his foldiers, to be displayed at the head of his army. His confidence, says the same writer, was not ill grounded; for victory attended the royal banner where-ever it appeared f. Constantine's men behaved with incredible bravery, animated by the example of their leader, who, though he exposed himself to the greatest dangers, escaped f only with a slight wound in the thigh. But of the enemy thirty-three thousand were killed upon the spot, and the rest, though advantageously posted upon a rifing ground, obliged to betake themselves to a precipitous and disorderly flight. Licinius in-Licinius escaped in the night, with what forces he could rally, to Byzantium; and the tirely defeated next morning fuch of his men as had remained in the neighbourhood of Adrianople, at Adrianople, fubmitted to Constantine, who, transported with joy for so signal a victory, granted a discharge to many of his veterans 8. This memorable battle was fought on the w Cod. Theodof. chronol. p. 22. Zos. l. ii. p. 680. * OPTAT. C. 23.

Conference D. 421. Cod. Theod. chronol. p. 22. y BAUD. l. ii. p. 680. EUSEB. vit. Constant. p. 431.

d Zos. l. ii. p. 681. Cod. Theod. p. 23. 6 Anonym. p. 474. f Euses. vit. Conft. l, ii. c. 3. & 6. p. 445, 447. ibid. Anonym. p. 475. Zos. l. ii. p. 681. Vol. VI. Nº 4. Uuu third third of July of this year 323. Eusebius tells us, that Licinius, before the battle, 2

retired to a neighbouring wood to facrifice to his gods; and, when the ceremony was over, told those who attended him, that he had offered victims to the gods, whom both his and their ancestors had ever adored, but the enemy had forsaken, to embrace a religion unknown to the Romans, whose standards he dishonoured with the ignominious fign of a cross. He added, that as Constantine, transported with a blind zeal for his new religion, had declared himself an enemy rather to his gods than to him, it was incumbent upon them to defend and protect him, that the world might conclude from the fuccess of the approaching engagement, how powerful were the gods of the Roman empire, how weak the unknown God adored by Constantine. "If we are overcome, continued he, we must despise those deities whom we now b " adore, and adore that deity whom we now despise. But if our gods bless our " endeavours with success, as I am confident they will, we must with an eternal " war pursue their enemies, and utterly extirpate the christian name." Eusebius tells us, that he learnt this speech, soon after the battle, of those who were with Licinius when he made it h. Sozomen likewise writes, that Licinius had resolved, if his gods had granted him the victory, to purfue with fire and fword their enemies the christians; and therefore that writer looks upon his defeat as a glaring instance to prove, that the christians were, in a special manner, savoured by heaven, and that their religion was not a human contrivance, but the work of the Almighty 1. As Licinius had fled to Byzantium, Constantine pursued him thither without loss of time, c ordering his fleet, commanded by his Ion Crisques, to repair to the same place. Crispus immediately put to sea, and failing along the coasts of Macedon and Thrace, entered the streights of Gallipoli, where the enemy's fleet, confisting of two hundred vessels, under the command of Abantus, or, as others call him, Amandus, waited for him. As the place was very narro , Crispus thought it adviseable to engage him only with eighty of his best ships. Victory was long doubtful, both sleets fighting with great obstinacy and resolution; but in the end the enemy being encumbered by the great number of their ships running foul of one another in so narrow a place, were utterly defeated, with the loss of five thousand men, and one hundred and thirty ships. Amandus, the enemy's admiral, with the utmost difficulty faved himself d the streights of ashore k. Zosimus, who describes all the particulars of this battle, tells us, that even the winds fought for Constantine, in order to render the victory of the son by sea no less glorious than that of the father had been by land 1. Crisqus himself hastened to his father with the joyful tidings of the total defeat of the enemy's fleet, and was by him received with the most tender expressions of paternal affection and esteem. Conflantine had already laid fiege to Byzantium, after having gained fome new advantages over the enemy; but, before his fleet arrived, Licinius made his escape by sea, and taking with him the flower of his troops, and his treasures, passed the streights, and thut himself up in Chalcedon, with a design to raise a new army in Asia. In that city he preferred to the dignity of Cafar one M. Martinianus, the chief officer of his e houshold, and dispatched him with a considerable force to Lampsacus, to make head against Constantine, in case he attempted to enter the Hellespont m. But Constantine, leaving Byzantium, embarqued his troops, and croffing over into Asia, landed in the neighbourhood of Chalcedon; and finding Licinius encamped on a rifing ground not far from that city with a numerous army, which he had drawn together with incredible expedition, he began to prepare for a fecond engagement. But in the mean time deputies arriving from Licinius, with proposals for an accommodation, Constan-An agreement tine hearkened to them with great joy, and complied with the terms they proposed, which were, fays Eufebius n, no less advantageous to Licinius, than to the whole stantine, which empire. But this agreement was short-lived; for Constantine being soon after informed, f is broken by the that Licinius was drawing together forces from all parts, and had even invited the barbarians to join him, advanced to Chalcedon, with a defign to invest the place, and oblige Licinius to comply with the terms of their agreement. But as he approached Chryofolis, the port of Chalcedon, he was there, to his great surprize, met by Licinius at the head of a very numerous army. Zosimus writes, that he had with him above

Gallipoli.

And his fleet

by Crifpus in Licinius creates M. Martinianus Cæfar.

an hundred and thirty thousand men, counting the troops commanded by Martinianus, whom he had ordered to leave Lampfacus, and join him . Constantine drew up h Euseb. vit. Const. l. ii. c. 5. p. 445, 446.

B2. Anonym. p. 475.

Idem ibid. k Zos. l. ii. p. 681, I Sozom. l. i. c. 7. p. 409. 682. Anonym. p. 475. Idein 16. Zos. l. ii. p. 683. m Zos. p. 683. Anonym. p. 475. n Eusen. ibid. l. ii. c. 15. p. 451.

a his men in battle-array; but, scrupling to break the treaty, waited till the signal was given by the enemy; which was no fooner done, than he fell upon them with fuch resolution and intrepidity, that, not able to withstand him, they immediately Licinius uttergave way, and fied in the utmost confusion. In this battle Licinius lost, according to by defeated. the anonymous writer of Constantine's life, twenty-five thousand men P; but, according to Zosimus, above an hundred thousand 9. It was fought on the eighteenth of September; and a few days after the cities of Byzantium and Chalcedon opened their gates to the conqueror. Licinius fled, with what forces he could rally, to Nicomedia, whither Constantine pursued him, and immediately invested the place; but, on the second day of the siege, his sister Constantia intreating him with many tears, by b the tenderness he had ever shewn to her, to forgive her husband, and grant him at leaft his life, he was prevailed upon to comply with her requeft; and the next day Licinius, finding no means of making his escape, presented himself before the conqueror, and throwing himself at his reet, yielded to him the purple, and the other He submits to enfigns of fovereignty. Constantine received him with great demonstrations of kind- Constantine. nefs, entertained him at his table, and afterwards fent him to Theffulonica, affuring him, that he should live unmolested, so long as he raised no new disturbances . However, he was foon after strangled by Conflantine's orders, who, on that account, He is by his oris highly blamed by Zosimus and durelius Vistor. St. Jerom has copied the very death. words of the latter in his chronicle. The anonymous writer, whom we have often c quoted, tells us, that the foldiers, having demanded the death of Licinius, Constantine complied with their request, fearing he might, in imitation of Maximian, one day refume the empire. Zonaras writes, that upon the complaints brought against Licinius by the foldiery, Constantine referred the whole affair to the senate, who sentenced him to death. Socrates fays in express terms, that Licinius began privately to make new preparations for war, and to invite the barbarians to his affiltance; which Constantine no sooner knew, than he ordered him to be put to death, and by that means prevented a new civil war . Constantine caused all his statues to be pulled down, and by two laws, the one dated the fixteenth of May 324. the other the twelfth of February 325, annulled all his acts, and repealed the laws which had been published d by him, or his officers in his name ". As for Martinianus, Zosimus writes, that Constantine abandoned him to the fury of the foldiery x, as foon as he fell into his power. But the anonymous writer and Victor the younger affure us, that Constantine at first granted him his life, but afterwards ordered him to be put to death, as having been privy to the defigns of Licinius x. All those who had prompted him to persecute the christians, underwent the same fate y, and among the rest his son Licinius, who was this year degraded from the dignity of Cæsar, and two years after, that is, in 325. according to St. Jerom, sentenced to death. Licinius had been created emperor on the eleventh of November 307, and consequently had reigned near fixteen years. We have not thought it necessary to take notice of the miracles, which Zonaras and Nice. phorus have inferted in their account of the defeat of Licinius, as things not vouched by any ancient writer. For this victory Constantine, and after him his fon, and several time his third fon, and fix years old, to the dignity of Cafar. Constantine, now master of all the eastern provinces, made it his chief study to establish there the worship of the true God, as he had already done in the west, and to abolish all remains of idolatry, which had been no less countenanced by Licinius, than the christian religion persecuted and oppressed. He began with two edicts, whereof both Greek and Latin copies were fent into all the provinces of the empire, f figned with the emperor's own hand, and addressed, the one To the churches of God, the other, To the people of each province. By these edicts he reinstates in their former Constantine condition all, who, on account of their religion, had been condemned to exile, to the ever had been mines, or any other punishment; orders their goods and estates to be forthwith taken from the restored to them, or to their heirs; gives leave to such as had been deprived of their churches, &c. military employments to resume them, if they pleased; and commands the officers of to be restored to the revenue, as well as private persons, of what rank or condition soever, to deliver up of his successors, assumed the title of Victorious, which we find still prefixed to some of his letters z. Not long after the defeat of Licinius, he preferred Conflans, at that

P Anonym. p. 475. ¶ Zos. l. ii. p. 683. it. Const. p 4.

Socrat. l. i. c. 4. p. 8.

Cod. Zos. p. 685.

Anonym. p. 475. Vict. epit. p. 543. oid.

Euseb. ibid. p. 452. Optat. p. 284. * Idem, p. 684. Vict. epit. p. 543. * Zonar.

* Cod. Theodof. l. xv. tit. 14. leg. 1. p. 404, 405.

t. p. 543. * Euseb. vit. Const. p. 452. Anonym. wit. Conft. p 4. w Zos, p. 685.

ral edicte against the worshipping of Orders the temples to be Chies.

Assembles #

to the churches, upon the publication of the edict, without waiting the sentence of the a magistrates, what houses, tenements, gardens, orchards, &c. had ever belonged to them, but more especially the places where the holy martyrs had been interred. He threatens with his indignation such as shall not yield immediate obedience to this ordinance, which, he fays, comprises those too who may have purchased such lands, houses, &c. of the emperor, or received them as a present, or by way of reward for These however he encourages to depend upon his generosity; their past services. but requires of them, as well as of the rest, an immediate compliance with his edict y. He enalls seve- These ordinances were followed by others, forbidding the offering of sacrifices to idols, the confecrating of any new idol, and the confulting, either in public or in private, the aruspices, soothsayers, oracles, &c. He had no sooner caused these b laws to be published, than he enacted another, ordering the churches, which had been pulled down during the persecution, to be rebuilt at his own expence, injoining his receivers in the different provinces to furnish the necessary sums for that purpose; and those whom he appointed to oversee such buildings, to take care that they were capable of containing all the inhabitants; for we hope, added the pious emperor, that they will all embrace the faith of the true God. He wrote upon the same subject to all the metropolitan bishops, styling them his beloved brethren, and among the rest to Eulebius of Casarea, who relates his letter at length, and tells us, it was the first he had received from him 2. Not long after, he published an edict drawn up by himself, and addressed to all the people of the empire; wherein he exhorts them to c renounce their ancient superstition, to adore but one God, the Creator of the universe, and to place all their hopes in Jesus Christ. This edict is related at length by Eusebius, who translated it out of the original Latin into Greek 2. Constantine, not thinking it yet adviseable to pull down the temples of the idols, ordered them to be thut up in all the places where that might be done without tumults and bloodshed; to be stripped of their riches and ornaments, and even of their idols; and all the lands, houses and revenues belonging to them to be applied to pious uses. In virtue of this ordinance, the Pythian and Smynthian Apollo, the tripod of Delphos, the muses of Helicon, the famous Pan, whom all the cities of Greece had confecrated after the Persian war, and whatever missed antiquity had for many ages revered and adored, d were publicly dragged through the streets, and either dashed in pieces, or made use of as master-pieces of art to adorn the squares, villa's, palaces, public galleries,  $\mathcal{C}_c$  b: From the several laws enacted this and the following year 324. when the emperor's two fons, Crispus and Constantine, were consuls, it appears, that Constantine continued in the east, residing for the most part at Nicomedia. The next year, Paulinus and Julianus being consuls, the emperor, to put a stop to the disturbances and divisions that rent the church, affembled the famous council of Nice, at which he affifted in person, and afterwards condemned to banishment the refractory heresiarch Arius, with Eusebius of Nicomedia, Theognis of Nice, and several others, who could not be prevailed upon to renounce his impious tenets. On the twenty-fifth of July of this e year, the emperor folemnized with extraordinary pomp and magnificence the twentieth year of his reign, and on that occasion made a great entertainment in his palace, to which he invited all the bishops of the council, treated them with the utmost respect, made them several presents, and caused large sums to be distributed among the poor, dispatching at the same time orders to all the governors of provinces to fupply yearly the facred virgins, widows, and ecclefiaftics in each city of their respective districts with a certain quantity of corn c. Constantine passed this year partly at Nice, partly at Nicomedia, as appears from the dates of feveral laws. By one published at Nicomedia on the seventeenth of October, and addressed to all the subjects of the empire, he encourages such as had been, or should be oppressed, or any ways f all his subjects injured, by his ministers, counsellors, governors of provinces or cities, &c. to apply to recur to him. to him for redrefs, affuring them, that they should be well received, and amply rewarded, for undeceiving him, fince he had employed none but such as he believed to be men of integrity. But the best princes, adds he, are liable to be deceived and imposed upon by wicked ministers; if therefore those in whom I reposed an intire confidence, have deceived me by a false appearance of integrity, and injured the meanest of my subjects, let the person thus injured lay his complaints before me, and

F Euseb. vit. Const. l. ii. c. 19—28. p. 453, 458.

Idem ibid. c. 44. id. c. 47, 48. p. 465, 466.

Idem > 7 10, 511. Sozom. p. 449. ibid. c. 47, 48. p.465, 466. p. 438.

accuse

a accuse me as the author of the injuries he has suffered, if I do not revenge them 4. In the beginning of November he enacted another law, forbidding throughout the whole empire the combats of gladiators, and ordering, that criminals, instead of being obliged to fight in the arena, should, for the future, be condemned to work in the mines. The following year Constantine entered upon his seventh consulship, having his third son Constant for his collegue. The emperor passed the winter in Thrace and Illyricum; for he was on the third of February at Heraclea, and on the fifteenth of March at Sirmium. From thence he went to Milan, and from Milan to Rome, where he was on the eighth of July; but he did not stay long there, being, as appears from the dates of several laws, in the beginning of Ostober at Spoletum, on the twenty-b third of the same month at Milan, and on the last day of December at Sirmium s.

Zosimus, a declared enemy to Constantine, writes, that the whole Roman people He is insulted loaded him with injuries and curses, for having abandoned the religion of his ancesttors, and promoted with great zeal the worship of an unknown God; and adds, that the difrespect and aversion which the Romans shewed him, prompted him to transfer the feat of the empire to Byzantium 8. Libanius tells us, that he bore with great patience the fatires and lampoons that were daily published against him during his stay at Rome. He left the city, highly dissatisfied with the disrespectful behaviour of the Roman people, and was never after prevailed upon to return to it h. But the most remarkable event of this year was the death of Crispus, Constantine's eldest son.

e The empress Fausta, jealous of the great reputation he had acquired, and piqued to fee him preferred to her own children, falfly accused him of having solicited her to incest. Some say, that she charged him with aspiring at the sovereignty. Be that as it will, Constantine, hearkening to the accusation, and not only forgetting on this occasion his usual elemency, but acting contrary to all laws of justice and equity, without examining an accusation of such importance, without giving the accused prince room to clear himself, ordered him to be put to death. Some write, that he He puts his son was dispatched with poison; others, that by the emperor's orders his head was struck Crispus to He was, according to the most probable opinion, executed at Pola in Istria, on death; the first of March, being then in the thirtieth, or, as others will have it, only in the d twenty-fifth year of his age. He was a prince of extraordinary endowments, had fignalized himself in a very eminent manner against the Franks, and in the war with Licinius, and was universally beloved by the people and soldiery, on account of his bravery, his obliging behaviour to persons of all ranks, his generosity, and other princely qualities. He had in all likelihood embraced the christian religion, nay, and been baptized, according to Baronius; but the authority of Nicepborus, whom that writer quotes, is of no great weight with us. The death of Crispus was followed Addikewise by that of young Licinius, Constantine's nephew, at that time in the twelfth year of his nephew Lihis age . St. Jerom styles these executions the effect of an unheard-of cruelty k. Fausta wife Fausta. did not long out-live her fon-in-law; for, being this very year convicted of having e accused him falsly, and moreover of having prostituted her honour to persons of the meanest rank, Constantine caused her to be suffocated with the steam of a hot bath 1.

With Fausta many persons of distinction, supposed to have been accessory to her crimes, were condemned, and either privately dispatched with poison, or publicly executed m. Evagrius, to excuse Constantine, denies all these sacts "; but they are too well attested, both by the Greek and Latin historians, to be denied, or even called in question. Eusebius, in his ecclesiatic history, which he published before the death of Crispus, bestows the highest encomiums upon that prince, and tells us, that he had great share in the victory gained over Licinius o; but, in the life of Constantine, he suppresses those encomiums, and though he describes at length that memorable I victory, yet he does not so much as mention the name of Crispus. This filence is, in our opinion, a strong argument against Evagrius, who pretends the above-mentioned facts to have been seigned by the enemies of Constantine, because he does not find them in Eusebius; but as they are sufficiently attested by several other credible writers,

<sup>d</sup> Col. Theod. chronol. p. 25. Col. Theodof. tit. 5. p. 397. f. Col. Theodof. chronol. p. 28. Zos. l. ii. p. 686. Liban. orat. xv. p. 412. Zos. l. ii. p. 685. Aur. Vict. p. 527. Ammian. l. xiv. p. 29. Eutrop. p. 588. Hier. chron. Zos. p. 685. Vict. epit. Philostorg. hift. ecclef. 470. Ammian. p. 56. Hier. chron. Eutrop. p. 588. Evag. l. iii. c. 41. p. 371. Euseb. l. x c. 9. p. 398, 399.

we ought rather to infer from the silence of Eusebius, that he was well apprised nothing could be alledged to excuse Constantine, and therefore took no notice of those execu-

Vol. VI. No 3.

Xxx

by heaven.

Makes Drepanum a ciry.

The empress

Helena dies.

tions, chusing rather to incur the censure of having transgressed the known laws of a history, than to take upon him the justifying of facts, which all the world but too His cruelty and justly condemned. This inexcuseable cruelty and injustice in Constantine drew down injuffice puished upon his family divine vengeance; for his brothers, his nephews, and his favourite ministers, were, soon after his death, all massacred by Constantius, his second son by Fausta, whom he loved and cherished above the rest. Constantine his eldest son was killed by Constans the youngest, Constans by Magnentius, Gallus their cousin by Constantius, and Constantius by Julian, the brother of Gallus. Julian perished in a most miserable manner, and in him ended the numerous family of Constantine, which, every one expected, would have furnished the empire with princes for many ages, the emperor having three brothers, four fons, feveral fifters and daughters, and nine b nephews P. Constantine seems to have passed the following year 327, when Constantius and Maximus were cousuls, in Illyricum and Thrace; for on the twenty-seventh of February he was at Thessalonica, on the eighteenth of May at Sardica, and at Heraclea on the fifth of August. He probably passed the following winter at Nicomedia; for he was in that city on the first of March q. This year Constantine granted the privileges of a city to the village of Drepanum in Bithynia, styling it, from the name of his mother, Helenopolis. This honour he bestowed upon the place out of respect to the holy martyr Lucianus, who had fuffered under Maximin in the year 312. and was interred there r. About this time the empress Helena is said to have discovered the sepulchre and cross of our Saviour, which induced Constantine to build at Jerusalem c the famous church of the refurrestion, which was confectated in the year 335. The pious princess died soon after in the arms of her son, who caused her body to be conveyed with great pomp to Rome, and to be interred in the burying-place of the emperors. To honour her memory, he gave the name of Helenopolis to a city of Palestine a, and that of Helenopontus to a part of the Euxine sea w, and caused a statue to be erected to her honour at Daphne near Antioch. From this statue the street in which it flood took the name of Augustalx. The following year, Januarius and Justus being confuls, Constantine was, as we have hinted above, on the first of March at Nicomedia, and on the thirteenth of July at a place in Masia called Oiscos and Escos y; whence some conjecture, that he was waging war with the barbarians in d those parts: and indeed we read in the chronicle of Alexandria, that this year the emperor passed the Danube several times, and that he even laid a bridge over that river. Both the Villors mention this bridge amongst his other great works; and on several ancient coins of this and the following years, notice is taken of a bridge, of his passing the Danube, and his defeating the Goths 2. According to the chronicle of Alexandria b, he began this year the city of Constantinople; but, according to others, on the twenty-fixth of September of the following year 329. Notwithstanding his zeal for the catholic faith, he recalled this year from banishment the two bishops

The emperor recals from banifiment two Arian bifhops.

> tember, at Sardica; and on the twenty-fifth of Oslober at Heraclea. THE following year 330. when Gallicanus and Symmachus were confuls, is remarkable for the dedication of the city of Constantinople, the greatest of all Constantine's works. Authors are divided in their opinions with respect to the motives that prompted Constantine to undertake the building of that city. Zosimus writes, that he f did it out of hatred to the Romans, feeing himself scorned and insulted by them for having embraced and introduced a new religion d. He had, according to Eutropius e, nothing else in view but to display his power, and shew, that, in a sew years, he could build a city equal to Rome, which, for so many ages, had been not undefer-

Eusebius and Theognis, great sticklers for the doctrine of Arius, and suffered them to consulship, having his eldest son, the fourth time consul, for his collegue. He passed this whole year in the neighbourhood of the Danube; for on the nineteenth of June he was at Sardica in Dacia; on the twenty-second of July at Sirmium in Pannonia; on the twenty-fifth of the same month at Naissus in Dardania; on the third of August at Heraclea in Thrace; on the eighteenth of the fame month, and twenty-ninth of Sep-gain a great ascendant over him. The next year Constantine took upon him his eighth e

Constantine undertakes the building of a new city.

F Julian. ad Athen. p. 497, 498. 9 Cod. Theod. p. 29. 18. p. 49. 5 Philostory. hist. eccles. l. ii. c. 12. p. 474. T HIER. chron. p. 662. Socrat. l. i. C. 18. p. 49.

S PHILOSTORG. hift. ecclef. l. ii. c. 12. p. 474.

Euseb. vit. Conft. l. iii. c. 47. p. 506.

Sozom. l. ii. c. 1. p. 443.

P. 448.

Cod. Theodo. p. 30.

Chron. Alexand. p. 662.

Birag. p. 467.

Cod. Theodof. chronol. p. 30, 31. & l. xi. tit. 30. leg. 15. p. 236, 237. THEODRET. l. i. c. 17. p. 564.

V Cod. Just. p. 235. * Suid. w Cod. Just. p. 235. b Chron. d Zos. l. ii. p. 686.

a vedly looked upon as the wonder of the universe. Others only tell us, that Conftantine, difliking Rome for motives unknown to them, refolved to build a city elfewhere, and reside there. That he disliked Rome, whatever his motives were, is very plain; for though he had been master of that metropolis near twenty years, yet he had never made any long stay in it, but passed most of his time in Gaul, and, after his victory over Licinius, in Thrace. Sozomen writes, that Constantine, seeing himself absolute master of the whole empire, and not being disturbed by any domestic tumults, or foreign wars, undertook the building of a new city, as a work worthy of a great prince, and resolved, as he did not care to reside at Rome, to settle the imperial feat there. The first place he chose for executing his design was between b Troas and ancient Ilium, on the coast of Asia; but afterwards changing his mind upon a vision which he had, or imagined to have had, he resolved to inlarge the ancient city of Byzantium, and make it the second, or, if he could, the first of the empire. This pretended vision is much spoken of by the modern Greek and Latin writers s; and Constantine himself, in one of his laws, declares, that, in the choice of the place, he followed the directions of heaven h. He began with extending the he inlarges the walls of the ancient city from sea to sea; and while some of the workmen were busied tium. in rearing them, others were employed in railing within them a great number of stately buildings, and among the rest a palace no-ways inferior in magnificence and c extent to that of Rome. As he defigned to fix his own court there, and was defirous, that the fucceeding emperors should follow his example, and honour his new city with their ordinary residence, he spared no cost or labour to render it both beautiful and convenient. With this view he built a capitol and amphitheatre, made a circus Adorns it with maximus, feveral forums, portico's, and public baths, and divided the whole city many new into fourteen regions, fecuring the inhabitants with many wholfome laws, and grant-buildings. ing them great privileges and immunities. By this means Byzantium became in a short time one of the most flourishing and populous cities of the empire, whole families flocking thither from all parts, especially from Pontus, Thrace, and Asia, Conflantine having appointed by a law enacted this year, that such as had lands in those d countries, should not be able to dispose of them, nor even leave them at their death to their heirs, unless they had a house in his new city. The common people were enticed thither from the different and most distant provinces, and even from Rome itself, by the emperor's largesses, and the great quantities of corn, oil, and meat, which were daily distributed among them i. But however desirous the emperor was to see his new city filled with people, yet he did not care it should be inhabited by any but christians; and therefore caused all the idols to be pulled down, and their temples to be confecrated to the true God. He built besides an incredible number of churches, and caused crosses to be erected in all the squares and public places. When most of the buildings were finished, the emperor, on the eleventh of May of e the year 330. the twenty-fifth of his reign, caused his new city, by a very solemn And solemnly dedication, to be confecrated, according to Cedrenus, to the virgin Mary k; but, confecrates it, according to Eusebius 1, to the God of martyrs. Some modern Greek writers tell us, and equal that this ceremony was performed by the fathers of the council of Nice, that the folemnity lasted forty days, and that Constantine, during the whole time, caused an immense quantity of all forts of provisions to be daily distributed among the populace ". It was on this occasion that Constantine styled the new city from his own name Constantinople, or the city of Constantine, and likewise Second, or, as others will have it, New Rome". At the same time he equalled it to ancient Rome, granting it the fame rights, immunities and privileges enjoyed by that metropolis o. He estaf blished a senate, and other magistrates, with a power and authority equal to that of the Roman senate P, and declared New Rome the metropolis of the east, as Old Rome was of the west. Constantine, having accomplished this great work, according to some in five, according to others in two years, fixed his residence in the new city, and never more returned to Rome. The removal of the imperial seat from Rome to m Vide Georg. cod. in antiq. Constantinop. p. 25.

Constantinople, happened in the year of the christian zera 330. the twenty-fifth of EUTROP. p. 488. f Soz. l. ii. c. 3. p. 444. l. ip. 23, &c. h Cod. Theod. tit. 5. p. 64. l. Zos. l. ii. p. 687. Soz. p. 444. Socrat. l. ii. c. 13. p. 90. k Vide Du Cange de Constantinop. l. i. p. 27. l. Euses. vit. Const. l. iii. c. 48. p. 507. m Vide George cod. in antiq. Constantinop. p. 25. n Socrat. p. 45. Sozom. l, ii. c. 3. p. 444. p. 90. Vide Du Cange de Constantinop. 1.1.

P Cod. Theod. l. xiv. tit. 13. leg. 1. p. 120, 223.

Constantine's reign, and 1078. after the foundation of Rome. By this removal the Roman empire received a fatal stroke, and shrunk by degrees into nothing, as the reader will find in the sequel of this history.

C H A P. XXVI.

The Roman history, from the removal of the imperial seat to Constantinople, to the death of the emperor Julian.

Constantine

plete victory over the Goths,

And the Sar-

The emperor's generofity during a famine.

Embassadors fent to him from the most distant nations.

TONSTANTINE having fixed his court at Constantinople, continued there, h as appears from the dates of several laws 9, great part of the ensuing year 331. when Bassus and Ablavius were consuls, being chiefly employed in building new churches, and adorning with other stately monuments the city he desired might be honoured with the residence of the succeeding emperors. The next year, Pacatianus and Hilarius being consuls, the Sarmatians having implored the affiltance of Conflantine against the Goths, who had made an irruption into their country, and committed every-where unheard-of cruelties, the emperor, either in person, or, as some write, by his fon Constantine, gained a memorable victory over them on the twentieth of April. Near an hundred thousand of the enemy were either cut in pieces, or perished after the battle with hunger and cold; insomuch that the barbarians were c obliged to fue for peace, and deliver up hostages to the emperor, among whom was the fon of their king, Ariaric or Araric r. Sozomen and Socrates write, that the Goths acknowledging the power of the God adored by Constantine, who had miraculously affisted him in this war, great numbers of them embraced the christian religion, which had been first preached among them about seventy years before. The Sarmatians, unmindful of the affistance they had received from Constantine, as soon as he withdrew with his victorious army, began to ravage the provinces of Mæsia and Thrace; but the emperor, returning with incredible expedition, fell upon them unexpectedly, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and forced the rest to submit to what terms he was pleased to impose upon them . The next consuls were Dalmatius, either the d brother or nephew of Constantine, and Xenophilus, or Zenophylus. This year Constantine created Constans, his youngest son, Ca/ar, who was born in 320. and is styled in all the ancient inscriptions Flavius Julius Constans ". The same year Syria, Cilicia, and Thrace, were grievously afflicted with a pestilence and famine, which swept off incredible numbers of people. Theophanes tells us, that at Antioch the wheat was fold at four hundred pieces of filver the bushel w. During this calamity, Constantine sent to the bishop of Antioch thirty thousand bushels, and an incredible quantity of corn, oil, and all forts of provisions, to the other churches, to be divided among the widows, orphans, ecclesiastics, &c x. Towards the close of this year embassadors arrived at Constantinople from the Blemyes, the Indians, the Ethiopians, and Persians, e with rich presents for the emperor, whose friendship they courted, acknowledging him, fays Eufebius y, for their fovereign, and declaring, that they coveted nothing fo much as to live in peace and amity with fo great a prince, fo renowned a warrior. The Persian embassadors, in the name of Sapor their king, renewed the ancient treaties between the two empires. Constantine received them with extraordinary marks of honour; and being informed that the christians were very numerous in Persia, he was transported with joy; and looking upon himself as their general protector, he a wrote a letter in their behalf to Sapor, which is related at length by Eulebius , and The letters from Constantine to the bishops, begging their prayers, and those both from him and his children to the great Antony for the same purpose, which we read in Eusebius b, Athanasius c, Sozomen d, and Prosper c, are supposed to have been written this year. The following year, when Optatus and Anicius Paulinus Junior were consuls, the Goths, under the command of Geberic their king, who had fucceeded Araric, made new irruptions into the country of the Sarmalians, whom they defeated in a great battle fought on the banks of the Marifus, in which their king, by name Wisimar, and most of their chiefs, were cut in pieces. The Sarmatians in this extremity armed their flaves, and by their means gained a complete victory over the Goths; but the victorious flaves, fensible of their strength, threw b off the yoke, and turning their arms against their masters, for whose desence they had been intrusted with them, drove them out of the country, and seized their houses, lands and effects for themselves. St. Jerom f and Ammianus Marcellinus & call these slaves Limigantes; and the former tells us, that, in his time, the free-born among the Sarmatians were styled Arcaragantes. The Sarmatians, thus driven from their habitations, fled for refuge to Constantine, who received them, to the number of three hundred thousand, incorporated in his legions such of them as were fit for service, and gave settlements to the rest in Thrace, Scythia, Macedon, and Italy h. Another He allots the party of the fugitive Sarmatians had recourse to certain barbarians, called by Ammia-Sarmatians fere nus Vistobales, and supposed to be the same people with the Quadi Ultramontani. dominions of These were re established in their ancient possessions by the Romans in the year 358. Rome. after they had driven out the Limigantes. This year Eusebius, bishop of Casarea, pronounced before Constantine his speech on the boly sepulchre; and returning afterwards to his diocese, wrote and inscribed to Constantine a book on the feast of Easter; for which the emperor returned him thanks by a very kind and respectful letter, desiring him at the same time to cause fifty copies of the holy scriptures to be transcribed, and sent him for the use of the churches of Constantinople. Eusebius immediately complied with his request, and, in his answer to him, acquainted him with the conversion of Maiuma, the port of Gaza in Palestine, of the city of Constantina in d Phanicia, and of several others; which gave Constantine an inexpressible pleasure k. The learned cardinal Noris takes Constantina to be the city and island of Aradus; for a bishop of that place, by name Atticus, styled himself bishop of Aradia Constantia; which the above-mentioned writer supposes to have been, through mistake, put instead of Aradus Constantina 1. Constantine was this year, on the seventeenth of June, at Constantinople, on the fifth of July at Singidunum in Mæsia, and on the twenty fifth of August at Naissus in Daciam. The next consuls were Flavius Julius Constantius, the emperor's brother, and Rufius Albinus. As Constantine, on the twenty-fifth of July of this year 335. entered the thirtieth year of his reign, which had happened to no emperor ever fince the time of Augustus, he celebrated that day at Constantinople with extraordinary pomp and magnificence; and foon after affembled two councils, The councils of the one at Tyre, hoping by that means to appeale the disturbances raised in the church Tyreand Jeby the followers of Arius; the other a few weeks after at Jerusalem, to consecrate the rusalem. magnificent church which he had built there. But the council of Tyre condemned, for leveral pretended crimes, and deposed, the great Albanasius, bishop of Alexandria; and that of ferusalem admitted Arius and his followers to the communion of the church. The emperor, milled by the Arians, especially by Eusebius bishop of Constantine Nicomedia, and by a priest, whom his fister Constantia, the widow of Licinius, had ear-favours the nestly recommended to him on her death-bed, conformed to the decisions of both Arians. councils; and though the crimes laid to the charge of Athanasius were evidently false, f yet he was so far prepossessed against him, that instead of examining the accusations, when he appealed to his tribunal, he banished him into Gaul, and at the same time deposed and sent into exile three other bishops, viz. Eustathius of Antioch, Asclepas of Gaza, and Lucas of Adrianople, for zealously opposing the wicked and impious tenets of drius. The emperor, not fatisfied with having created his three fons, Conftantine, Constantius, and Constans, Casars, raised this year, on the eighteenth or twenty-

<sup>9</sup> Cod. Theod. p. 353, & feq. г Амміан. p. 476. Jul. orat. i. p. 16. Euseb. vit. Constant. iv. p. 529 год р 48. Socrat. p. 411. г Апопут. р. 476. и Euseb. ibid. p. 533. Тиворн р 23. х Idem ibid. г Еизев. ibid. l. i. c. 8 p. 479, 410. ]. iv. p. 529 w Тивори p 23.

&lt;sup>2</sup> Idem ibid. c. 9—13. p. 350—535.

<sup>3</sup> Theod. l. i. c. 24. p. 573—575.

<sup>4</sup> Euseb. ibid. l. iv. c. 14. p. 533.

<sup>5</sup> Athan. vit. Anton. p. 497.

<sup>6</sup> Soz. p. 47.

<sup>6</sup> Prosp. chion.

<sup>7</sup> Hier. chron.

<sup>8</sup> Ammian. l. xvii. p. 107.

<sup>8</sup> Euseb. p. 529.

<sup>8</sup> Ammian. p. 478.

<sup>9</sup> Jornand. rer. Goth. p. 641.

<sup>9</sup> Ammian. l. vii. p. 106. & l. xvii. p. 105—111.

<sup>9</sup> Euseb. ibid. p. 542—545.

<sup>1</sup> Noris cpoch. p. 363.

Concil. tom. 4. p. 921.

<sup>1</sup> Cod. Theod. chronol p. 34.

<sup>1</sup> Euseb. ibid. p. 545-8510. Vol. VI. Nº 4. Yyy

Divides the his children and nephews.

Arius diec.

tius.

fourth of September, to the same dignity his nephew Dalmatius, son to his brother of a the same name, and appointed Annibalianus, brother to young Dalmatius, king of Pontus o. Soon after their promotion, the emperor, to prevent any misunderstanding, jealoufy or quarrels between his nephews and children, divided the government of the empire among them in the following manner: Constantine, the eldest, had Gaul, empire amongst Spain, and Britain; Constantius, the second son, all the Orient; that is, Asia, Syria, and Egypt; and Constans, the youngest, Illyricum, Italy, and Africa. To his nephew Dalmatius he gave Thrace, and part of Illyricum; that is, Macedon and Achaia; and to king Annibalianus, his other nephew, Armenia Minor, and the neighbouring provinces; that is, Pontus and Cappadocia, with the city of Cafarea, which he defired might be the capital of his kingdom P. About this time one Calocerus, a man of b great interest and authority in the island of Cyprus, caused himself to be proclaimed emperor there, and made himself master of the whole island. But Dalmatius, who was fent with an army against him, defeated the rebel, took him prisoner, and carrying him to Tarsus in Cilicia, condemned him to be burnt alive in that city 4. On an ancient medal quoted by Spanbenius, mention is made of one Tiberius, who usurped the sovereignty in the time of Constantine; but of him we find nothing in history. As for one Azotus, who was overcome by Constantine, as we read in Suidas and Codinus, it appears from several epigrams in the anthology, that both he and that Constantine by whom he was overcome, were but drivers of chariots in the circus. Athanajius was accused of having supplied with money a rebel, by name Philumenes; but of c him not the least mention is made in history. The emperor was this year at Constantinople on the thirtieth of March, at Viminacum in Masia on the twelfth of August, and again at Constantinople on the twenty-second of October'. The following year, Nepotianus and Facundus being confuls, died the famous herefiarch Arius, and foon after him Alexander bishop of Constantinople, whom Constantine had solicited in vain to re-admit the anathematized heretic to the communion of the church. The holy bishop Paul was raised to the fee of Constantinople in the room of Alexander; but the emperor was persuaded by Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedia, to banish him into Pontus ". Towards the close of this year Constantine married his second son Constantius to the daughter of Julius Conmarried to the frantius and Galla. Julius Constantius was brother to the emperor, and his wife Galla d daughter of Ju. fifter to Rusinus and Gerealis, of whom hereafter. He had by Galla, Gallus Cæsar, lius Constantius was brother to the emperor, and his wife Galla de lius Constantius was brother to the emperor, and his wife Galla de lius Constantius was brother to the emperor, and his wife Galla de lius Constantius was brother to the emperor, and his wife Galla de lius Constantius was brother to the emperor, and his wife Galla de lius Constantius was brother to the emperor, and his wife Galla de lius Constantius was brother to the emperor, and his wife Galla de lius Constantius was brother to the emperor, and his wife Galla de lius Constantius was brother to the emperor, and his wife Galla de lius Constantius was brother to the emperor, and his wife Galla de lius Constantius was brother to the emperor, and his wife Galla de lius Constantius was brother to the emperor, and his wife Galla de lius Constantius was brother to the emperor was brother to the empero born in Hetruria in the year 325 or 326. another fon, who was killed in 337. and one daughter, married this year to Constantius, whose name has not been transmitted to The emperor Julian, speaking of this and other marriages between the nephews and nieces of Constantine, fays, that a strange confusion reigned in the imperial family; that marriages were celebrated which were no marriages; and that the laws, both human and divine, were profaned and troden under foot w. But there were yet no laws forbidding marriages between cousin-germans. On occasion of this marriage, Conftantine caused large sums, and great quantities of provisions, to be distributed among the people in all the cities and provinces of the empire x. He had long before married his eldest fon Constantine; but to whom, we are no-where told. The year ensuing, when Felicianus and Titianus were consuls, the Persians, after having lived in peace with the Romans for the space of forty years; that is, ever since the year 297.

The Persians awed by the terror of Canstantine's arms which seeming very reasonable to the emperor, a peace was concluded, and both

> O EUTROP. p. 588. Aur. Vict. p. 227. Chron. Alex. p. 668. Zos. l. ii. p. 692. P Eusen. orat. in tricennal. Const. p. 609. Vict. epit. p. 544. Anonym. p. 476.
>
> p. 296. * Spanh. l. vi. p. 601. * Athan. 2pol. 2. p. 779. * Cod. Theod. * Euseb. vit. Const. l. iv. c. 49. p. 551. * Julian. orat. vii. p. 425. * Euseb. ibid. p. 554, 555. * Fest. p. 57. Liban. orat. iii. p. 120. Eutrop. p. 117. 9 THEOPH. P. 23. AUR. VICT. Cod. Theod. chronol. p. 35. * Euses. ibid. p. 551.

> began to commit hostilities in Mesopotamia, because the emperor refused to restore to them the five provinces which they had been obliged to yield to Galerius. Hereupon Constantine, having drawn together a very numerous and powerful army, and made the other necessary preparations for a vigorous war, began his march, with a design > to invade the Persian dominions. But in the mean time the enemy, terrified at his approach, dispatched embassadors to him, with proposals of an accommodation;

armies withdrew. Thus Eusebius v. But Festus, and most other historians, tell us, f that Constantine, desirous of triumphing over the Persians, would not grant them a peace upon any terms, and that by death alone he was prevented from invading their dominions z. Be that as it will, Constantine, having celebrated this year with extraordinary solemnity the feast of Easter, which fell on the third of April, was soon after a taken ill, being then in the fixty-fourth year of his age. He had recourse to the warm Constantine baths of Constantinople; but his distemper increasing, he removed, for change of air, taken ill. to Helenopolis in Bithynia, and from thence to a castle at a small distance from Nicomedia, called Achyrona, or Aguyrona. Being there apprised, that his end approached, he declared in a speech, which he made to the bishops who attended him, his eager desire of being baptized, adding, that he designed to have received that seal of sal- He is baptized. vation in the waters of the fordan; but fince God, in his infinite wisdom, had otherwise disposed of him, he acquiesced to his will. When the ceremony was over, he was clad in white, and would not afterwards so much as touch or see his purple robes, passing most of his time in pious meditations, and edifying discourses with the bishops b of the immortality of the foul, and the rewards and punishments of another life. Some of the officers of the army, who were admitted into his room, expressing with a flood of tears their concern for the loss of so good a prince, he told them, That they ought rather to rejoice than mourn, fince he was going to exchange a short and miserable, for an eternal life, happy beyond conception or expression 2. St. Jerom writes, that he was baptized by Eusebius bishop of Nicomedia; and that, by receiving baptism at his hands, he fell into the heresy of Arius b. But Athanasius, and all other ecclefiastic writers, Lucifer alone excepted, assure us, that he held always inviolate the faith of the council of Nice, though, deceived and missed by the Arians, he persecuted those who defended it against the tenets of that heresiarch. As for Eusebius, c though he held, yet he did not openly profess, the doctrine of Arius; nor was he cut off from the communion of the church. As he was therefore bishop of the place, Constantine could not decline being baptized by him, without openly affronting him, and likewise transgressing the laws of the church. Before he died, he ordered the great Athanasius to be recalled from banishment, notwithstanding the warm remon- He orders strances of Eusebius of Nicomedia, who did all that lay in his power to prevent the Athanasius to be recalled return of that zealous champion of the true faith . He probably ordered at the same from banish. time the other catholic bishops to be recalled; for Athanasius tells us, that they were ment. all restored with him to their respective sees by the children of Constantine d. By his last will he bequeathed some revenues to the city of Rome, and others to that of Cond stantinople. He likewise confirmed the above-mentioned division of the empire among his three fons and two nephews . The emperor Julian writes, that he committed to Constantius his second son the care of all things, appointing him in a manner his executor, either because he loved him above the rest, or because Constantius, who was nearer, arrived before the rest, at least before Constantine the eldest, who was then in Gaul . But it is certain, that the emperor died before any of his children arrived, He dies, and is though he had dispatched expresses to them all as soon as he found himself past reco-universally lavery. Not long therefore before he expired, he privately put his will into the hands of an ecclefiastic, in whom he reposed an intire confidence, not knowing him to be a follower of Arius, and obliged him to promise upon oath not to deliver it to any but e Constantius. This commission proved very prejudicial to the church, on account of the credit which it procured to the ecclefiaftic and his feet with the new emperor s. Constantine, having fettled matters in the manner he judged best both for the church and state, after various pious ejaculations, expired about noon on the twenty-second of May, that year 337. Whitfunday, after having lived, according to the most probable opinion, sixty-three years, two months, and twenty-five days, and reigned thirty years, nine months, and twenty-seven days. His death was bewailed by perfons of all ranks, as the greatest misfortune that could befal the empire. The soldiers no fooner heard of it, than they tore their cloaths, fell proftrate on the ground, and gave other public testimonies of their deep concern, calling him their deliverer, their f beloved leader, their common parent. The people of Constantinople, overwhelmed with forrow, and drowned in tears, for the loss of their great benefactor, of their magnificent and generous founder, expressed their grief in a manner suitable to so general a calamity h. Messengers were immediately dispatched with the dismal tidings to his children, and in the mean time the body of the deceased prince, with the purple Honours done and diadem, was put into a golden coffin, and conveyed to Constantinople, being him after his attended by all the troops quartered in that neighbourhood, who had affembled upon death.

* Euseb. c. 62. p. 557, 558. Socrat. l. i. c. 29. p. 75. b H:er. chron. Sozom.l. iii. c. 2. p. 498. Athan. apol. 2. p. 806. d Athan. folit. p. 814. l. ii. c. 34 p. 495. f Julian. orat. i. ii. p. 83. & 175. Socrat. p. 75. Zos. p. 496. Theodor. p. 585. Rufin. p. 167. b Euseb. c. 65. p. 559.

the first notice of his death. It was exposed to public view in the chief hall of the a palace, with an infinite number of tapers burning round it in golden candleftics. All the great officers, both civil and military, the senate, and other persons of distinction, came to pay their devoirs to the corpse, kneeling before it, as if the emperor had been still alive. Court was kept in the same manner as when he was living, and those who attended his person, came at the usual hours, as if he had still wanted their attendance. This empty honour, formerly paid to the deceafed emperors, as appears from Herodian and other writers, seems to have been long before laid aside, and to have been revived now in honour of Constantine. His children were daily expected to pay him the last duty; but Constantius alone came, the other two being probably at a great distance; and, soon after his arrival, caused the corpse to be b conveyed with the utmost pomp and magnificence to the famous church of the Apostles, which the emperor had built close to the palace, desiring to be interred in it, that he might, after his death, fays  $Eu/ebius^k$ , partake of the prayers offered there by the faithful in honour of the holy apostles. That magnificent structure was built in the form of a cross, and covered, not with tiles, but gilt brass. Constantine and the fucceeding emperors were buried, not in the church itself, but in the porch, where mausoleums were erected for them, and a burying-place allotted for the bishops of the city; the priesthood, says Sozemen , claiming equal honour and respect with the imperial dignity, especially in holy places, where it holds the first rank. This church had been finished and consecrated a little before Constantine's death. Constan- c tius attended the body to the church, but withdrew with the foldiers, as he had not yet been baptized, when the ministers of the church began the holy ceremonies m. As foon as they were over, the body was deposited in the porch, where Constantius caused a magnificent mausoleum to be raised over it ". Not many years after, that is, in 358 or 359, the porch being ready to fall, the body of the emperor was conveyed from thence to the church of St. Aacius, a native of Constantinople, and martyr, built likewise by Constantine ; but it was afterwards carried back to the church of the Apostles P, where it was to be seen, with the bodies of other princes of the same family, many ages after. Though Constantine had never made any considerable stay at Rome, and had in the end intirely abandoned that metropolis, yet the people d expressed an uncommon concern for his death; for they no sooner heard of it, than they shut up their shops and public baths, and intermitted all kinds of sports and diversions, as was usual in time of some great and general calamity. They all demanded with one voice, that his body might be brought to Rome; and expressed the greatest concern imaginable, when they understood, that it was, by his will, to remain at Constantinople 4. It appears from some ancient coins, that the senate of Rome conferred divine honours upon him r. He was by most churches, especially He is honoured in the east, honoured as a faint, as he is still by the christians in Egypt, and the Greek church, which folemnizes his festival on the twenty-first of May with a very folemn office. The Muscovites celebrate his anniversary on the same day, tho' they e can give no reason for their preferring that day to the twenty-second of the same month, on which he died, as is agreed on by all writers, both ancient and modern. About the middle of the fifth century, extraordinary honours were paid to his tomb, and to his statue, which was set up upon a column of porphyry'. The modern Encomiums be- Greeks equal him to the apostles, as one to whom we all owe our being christians: him by the modern Greeks. prevailed over paganism, till it was countenanced and established by the great Constantine; which in reality is preferring the emperor to all the apostles. But of these high flights, intirely fuitable to the temper of the Greeks, we leave our readers to judge. All authors allow him to have been a prince endowed with extraordinary f accomplishments both of body and mind, an excellent commander, an able statesman, a great encourager of learning, and himself much addicted to read, write and meditate. But, as to his character in general, there is a great difagreement among authors, some of the heathen writers painting him as a perfect tyrant, and the christians extolling him as the best prince that ever swayed a sceptre. The emperor Julian fpeaks of him as a prince extremely ambitious of military glory, and one who had

His obsequies.

by the eastern

churches as a

Saint.

Authors disagree as to his oharacter.

&lt;sup>1</sup> Sozom l. ii. c. 34. p. 469. <sup>6</sup> Socrat l. ii. c. 38. p. 145. 561. F Goltz. p. 128. k Euseb. p. 555, 556. m Eusen. c. 71. p. 561. ibid. & Julian. orat. i.p. 29. P CHRYSOST. 2 Cor. VICT. p. 527. EUSEB. C. 69 p. 561. C. 34. p. 66. * THEODORET. vit. Constant. l. i.

a nothing fo much at heart as the aggrandizing of himself and his family; and adds; that the bad example he fet therein to his children, armed them against each other ". He is charged by some with having inriched the imperial robes with pearls not used Several before his time, and with constantly wearing the diadem. But this charge is quite groundless is being certain, that Disclosion was the first who added poorly to the diarges groundless, it being certain, that Dioclesian was the first who added pearls to the brought imperial robes, and Constantius Chlorus the first who wore constantly the diadem, even against him by when he was only Cafar, as we read in Aurelius Victor w and Eutropius and is evi-the pagan wrident from his medals y. The emperor Julian and Zosimus a represent him as a volu-ters. ptuous prince, intirely abandoned to all manner of diversions and pleasures, to banquets and revellings, to public shews, &c. insomuch that he could spare notime from sports and entertainments, to regulate the affairs of the state. On the other hand, Victor b, Eusebius c, and Libanius d, tell us, that he was constantly employed in reading, writing, meditating, composing speeches, (some of which, of an extraordinary length, have reached our times) hearing embassies, giving audience to his ministers and subjects; in short, that he was never idle, but ever busied either in forming or executing some great design or other for the good of the empire. Most of his laws were dictated by himfelf; he never continued long in any place, but was, as we have often observed, continually moving from one city or province to another; so that we cannot help thinking this charge as groundless as the former. Julian and Zosimus, zealous sticklers for idolatry, were evidently prejudiced against a prince, who had e enacted so many severe laws against all manner of idolatrous worship. We are told, that he kept with him for the space of thirty years one Samacus, who, pretending to be a fool, diverted the emperor when tired out with business. This was not a diverfion worthy of so great a prince. It proves however, that Constantine applied himself feriously to business. Victor the younger, after having told us that he was addicted to raillery, gives us the following idea of his reign: Constantine, says he, reigned thirty years, and behaved the ten first like an excellent prince, the ten following like a robber, and the ten last like a prodigal. The same charge is brought against him by Zosimus, who writes, that, when he became master of the whole empire, he abandoned himself without controll to his rapacious temper, loading the people with d heavy taxes, and at the fame time fquandering away the money thus raifed upon undeserving favourites, or useless buildings f. Amongst the other imposts with which that virulent writer pretends that Constantine oppressed the people, he mentions one called the chryfargyrum, and will have Constantine to have been the first who exacted it. But this Evagrius maintains to be a mere calumny, owing to the implacable hatred which that pagan bore to the deliverer of the church 8. And truly long before Constantine's time a tax was laid upon the public prostitutes, which most writers take to be meant by the chryfargyrum. Constantine, to fave charges in raising it, ordered it to be paid only every fourth year. Zosimus ascribes to him another tax called follis, which was levied upon all persons of quality, and occasioned, according to that writer, the ruin of all the cities of the empire h. But he is the only author who says, that it was introduced by Constantine. Aurelius Victor writes in express terms, that it was first raised by Maxentius i. In our opinion, it is not at all probable, that Constantine laid any new burdens upon the people, feeing he generously remitted to all his subjects the fourth part of the land-tax, and discharged several cities of contributions, which they had paid for the space of an hundred and fifty years; among the rest Tripolis in Libya, and Nice in Bithynia . From an ancient inscription we learn, that one year he remitted all taxes throughout the empire 1. Zosimus writes, that, during his reign, rods, prisons, and all kinds of severe treatment, were made use of by him in levying the common taxes "; whereas the laws he enacted, forbidding thefe violences under the feverest penalties, are still extant, as we have observed above. Whence we leave the reader to judge what credit that implacable enemy to Constantine and the christian religion deserves. Zosimus and Julian are rather accusers than historians; and an accuser is not to be believed, unless witnesses can be produced to vouch what he fays. Hence the accusations brought against Constantine by these two writers, are of no weight with us, unless confirmed by the authority of other historians. Aurelius

# Jul. orat. vii. p. 423, 424. w Aur. v. a Jul. C. as. p. 23, 42, 52. a Zoi. l. ii. p. d Liban. orat. iii. p. 107. e Vict. epit. p. 3 b. 370. a Zos. p. 691. Aur. Vic w Aur. Vict. p. 523. * Eutrop. p. 502.

* Zos. l. ii. p. 687. b Vict. epit. p. 543. C Euseb. p. 752.

Vict. epit. p. 543. f Zos. l. ii. p. 685. Evagr. l. iii. c. 40.

* Euseb. p. 528. Aur. Vict. p. 527. e Vict. epit. p. 543. f. Aur. Vict. p. 526.

Victor", Ammianus Marcellinus, and even his panegyrist Eusebius P, complain of his a employing in the administration of affairs, persons altogether unworthy of the confidence he reposed in them, and suffering them to inrich themselves at the expence of the people committed to their care. This fault, altogether inexcusable in a prince, Eusebius ascribes to his excessive goodness, which induced him to pardon, or only to inflict flight punishments on, such of his ministers as were found guilty of the most enormous extortions. He could not, says Eusebius, prevail upon himself to condemn those whom he had once judged worthy of his favour; and hence his ministers, prefuming upon his indulgence and good-nature, often committed great diforders in the provinces, and oppressed the people in a most tyrannical manner. His thus neglecting to punish the crimes of his ministers, rendered him, without all doubt, no less b guilty than if he had committed them himself.

Several regulations introduced by Constantine.

The præfccti empire into four prefectures.

We shall now proceed to several regulations in the government, both civil and military, thought to have been first introduced by Constantine. Before his time there were, according to Zosimus, two captains of the guards, known by the name of præfetti prætorio, who had an equal authority over all the troops dispersed in the feveral provinces of the empire. But Constantine, jealous of their too great power, prætorio, and lessened it by creating two more, and allotting to each of them a certain number division of the of provinces. By this means the whole empire was divided into four parts, which were the Orient, Illyricum, Italy, and Gaul, governed by the four prafetti pratorio, each of whom had feveral dioceses or districts under his jurisdiction. To the pra- c festus pratorio orientis were subjected the five following dioceses; viz. Thrace, Asia, Pontus, Egypt, and the Orient. Each of these dioceses comprised several provinces, as is manifest from the Theodosian code, and the acts of several ancient councils. The diocese of Thrace, whereof Heraclea, and afterwards Constantinople, was the metropolis, consisted of five provinces, viz. Europe, Thrace, Hemimuntum, Rhodope, Massia Secunda, or Lower Masia, and Scythia. The diocese of Asia, which had Ephesus for its metropolis, comprised ten provinces, viz. Pamphylia, the Hellespont, Lydia, Pisidia, Lycaonia, Phrygia Pacatiana, Phrygia Salutaris, Lycia, Caria, and the islands of Rhodes, Lesbos, and the Cyclades. In the diocese of Pontus, the metropolis of which was Cafarea in Cappadocia, were eleven provinces, viz. Pathlagonia, Galatia, d Bithynia, Honoriades, Cappadocia Prima, Cappadocia Secunda, Pontus Polemonaicus, Helenopontus, Armenia Prima, Armenia Secunda, Galatia Salutaris. The diocese of Egypt, which had Alexandria for its metropolis, confifted of fix provinces, viz. Upper Libya, or Libya Pentapolitana, Lower Libya, Thebais, Egypt, Arcadia, and Augustamnica. The Orient comprised fifteen provinces, the metropolis of which was Antioch: the provinces were, Palæstina Prima, Palæstina Secunda, Phanicia Prima, Syria, Cilicia, Cyprus, Arabia, Isauria, Palastina Salutaris, Phanicia Libanensis or Phanicia Secunda, Euphratensis, Syria Salutaris, Osrboene, Mesopotamia, Cilicia Secunda. The præsectus prætorio Illyrici had but two dioceses under his jurisdiction, viz. Macedon and Dacia; of which the former confifted of fix provinces, viz. Achaia, Macedon, e the island of Crete, Thessaly, New and Old Epirus, and part of Macedonia Salutaris: the metropolis of this diocese was Thessalonica. The diocese of Dacia comprised five provinces, viz. Dacia Mediterranea, Dacia Ripensis, Massa Prima, Dardania Prævalitana, and part of Macedonia Salutaris. The præfestus prætorio Galliarum had three dioceses under his jurisdiction, viz. Gaul, Spain, and Britain. In the diocese of Gaul were seventeen provinces, viz. Viennensis, Lugdunensis Prima, Germania Prima, Germania Secunda, Belgica Prima, Belgica Secunda, Alpes Maritimæ, Alpes Penninæ, Maxima Sequana, Aquitania Prima, Aquitania Secunda, Novempopulana, Narbonensis Prima, Narbonensis Secunda, Lugdunensis Secunda, Lugdunensis Turonica, Lugdunensis Senonica. In the diocese of Spain were seven provinces, viz. Bætica, Lusitania, Ga-f licia, Tarraconensis, Carthaginiensis, Tingitana, and the Balearic islands. The diocese of Britain consisted of five provinces, viz. Maxima Casariensis, Valentia, Britannia Prima, Britannia Secunda, and Flavia Casariensis. The prasectus pratorio of Italy had three dioceses under his jurisdiction, viz. Italy, Illyricum Occidentale, and Africa. Illyricum consisted of six provinces, viz. Pannonia Secunda, Savia, Dalmatia, Pannonia Prima National Secunda, Savia, Dalmatia, Pannonia Secunda, Savia, Dalmatia, Dalmatia nia Prima, Noricum Mediterraneum, Noricum Ripense: Sirmium was the metropolis of this diocese. Africa comprised five provinces, viz. Africa Carthaginiensis, Byzacene, Mauritania Sitifiensis, Mauritania Casariensis, and Trisolitana. Italy was divided into a seventeen provinces, which were Venetia, Æmilia, Liguria, Flaminia and Picenum Italy divided Annonarium, Hetruria, and Umbria, Picenum Suburbicarium, Campania, Sicilia, Afulia into seventeen and Calabria, Lucania and Brutium, Alpes Cotiæ, Rhætia Prima, Rhætia Secunda, provinces. Samnium, Valeria, Sardinia and Corfica. The prefects were the first officers of the empire, and generally looked upon, to use the expression of Ammianus Marcellinus, as emperors of an inferior rank. They had feveral other officers under them, viz. The feveral proconsuls, vicars, rectors, consulars, correctors, and presidents. In the east were two officers under proconfuls; one in Achaia, and another in Asia, and sometimes, but very seldom, a the practical third in Palestine: in the west there was but one, viz. the proconsul of Assica. The vicars represented the præsects, and were their lieutenants; whence, in the ancient b inscriptions, they are styled pro-præsection vice-præsects. There were vicars in the provinces of Asia, Pontus, Thrace, the Orient, Macedon, Africa, Spain, Gaul, and Britain, and two in Italy, viz. the vicar of the city of Rome, and the vicar of Italy: under the former were the ten following provinces, Campania, Hetruria, Umbria, Picenum Suburbicarium, Sicilia, Apulia, Calabria, Lucania, Brutium, Samnium, Sardinia, Corsica, and Valeria: under the vicar of Italy were five provinces, Liguria, Æmilia, Flaminia, Picenum Annonarium, and Venetia; to which were afterwards added Istria, the Alpes Cotiæ, and both the Rhætia's. The provinces under the vicar of Rome were called provincia suburbicaria; and those under the vicar of Italy, provinces of Italy. The vicar of Italy relided at Milan, which by that means became the metropolis of all the Italian provinces. Next in dignity to the vicars were the rectors, who governed whole provinces under the præfect or his vicars, as did likewife the consulars, the correctors, and the presidents: Phanicia was governed by a consular, who resided sometimes at Tyre, sometimes at Berytus, and sometimes at Damascus: several provinces of Italy had likewise a consular for their governor, viz. Æmilia, Liguria, Venetia, Picenum, Sicilia, Flaminia, and Campania: Hetruria, Apulia, Calabria, Lucania, and Brutium, were governed by correctors; and Samnium, Valeria, the Alpes Cotiae, both Rhatia's, Sardinia, and Corfica, by prefidents. We find feveral laws in the Theodosian code addressed to the presects, proconsuls, vicars, rectors, consulars, and correctors, but very few to the presidents. The presects under Cond stantine and his son Constantius had only the title of clarissimi, which was common to all senators, but were soon after distinguished with that of illustres. Most writers, upon the authority of Zosimus, ascribe the institution of these four presects to Constantine; but that author was perhaps therein mistaken, it being certain, that the empire was by Dioclesian divided into four parts, and governed by two emperors, and two Cæsars, each of whom had an army, and a præsectus prætorio; nay, even before Dioclesian's time, we find one Glarus styled presect of Illyricum and Gault. The prefects were originally military; but after this division of the empire, became altogether civil officers, the command of the troops being given to two magistri The magistri militiæ, the institution of which office is likewise ascribed by Zosimus to Constantine'. militiæ. e In Dioclestan's time, each province had its peculiar general, flyled dux or duke; but Constantine in their room created the two above-mentioned magistri militiæ, one for the foot, and another for the horse, with a full power of making what regulations in the army they thought proper; of punishing the soldiers when guilty of breach of duty, or any other crime; of discharging and admitting into the army whom patricis or patricians were superior in rank both to the magistri militiæ, and the pre- The patricians.

F Trig. tyrann. vit. c. 17. p. 193.

17. ronol. p. 48.

Notit. c. 5, 8, 34, 38. t Cod. Theo of l. xi. tit, 1. leg. 1. p. 6. & Zos. p. 688. chronol. p. 48. w Z.os. p. 692. Cod. Theodof. p. 74,75.

fects. This was a new dignity instituted by Constantine, but had no power or authority annexed to it, being only a title of honour. The patricians, tho' raised above all the other subjects of the empire, were nevertheless obliged to give the precedency to the confuls w. Conftantine conferred this dignity on Julius Conftantius, his they pleased, &c. Sometimes both commands were vetted in one person; for in a law, dated the seventeenth of June, 315. mention is made of one Eusebius, commander in chief both of the horse and foot; and one Sylvanus, in two laws addressed to him in 349. is styled magister utriusque militiæt. But their number was soon increased; for in the time of Theodosius I. they were at least five, viz. one for the f court, called præsentalis; one for Ibrace, one for the Orient, one for Illyricum, and one for Gaul. These magistri militiæ were afterwards distinguished with the title of comites or counts, and raised to the rank of the first officers of the empire. The brother.

The comites or counts.

brother, and Optatus, his brother in-law x. The patricians are feldom mentioned a by the writers of the fourth century, but frequently by those of the fifth. title of comes or count feems likewise to owe its origin to Constantine. Before Confanting's time, those who attended the emperors out of Rome in quality of counfellors, flyled themselves comites; but to that word added the name of the prince whom they attended. In Constantine's time, the name of the prince was omitted, and those who accompanied him were styled simply comites, companions, and in the modern languages counts: one Dionysius is the first to whom we find that title to have been given: afterwards it became a title of honour, and was bestowed upon all officers of any rank, tho' they neither followed the court, nor accompanied the emperor. These comites or counts were divided, according to their employments, b into three orders or ranks; and hence the expressions which we frequently meet with in the writers who flourished under Constantine and his successors, comes domesticus primi ordinis, secundi ordinis, &c v. We find no mention made of the title of nobilissimus, or most noble, before Constantine's time, who gave it to two of his brothers, viz. Julius Constantius and Annibalianus 2. It was, under the succeeding princes, bestowed upon their sons before they were raised to the dignity of Casar. writers who flourished under Constantine, we shall speak in our note (F).

THE

* Idem ibid.

7 Vide Du CANGE gloff. p. 1074.

2 Zos. l. ii. p. 692.

(F) We shall begin with those who have written the history of Constantine. Eusebius of Casarea published his life in four books, but declares in the beginning of his work, that he defigns to infert in his hillory fuch accounts only as ferve to flew his piety and religion, and may prove editying to his readers. However, he relates great part of his wars; and we may depend upon the truth of what he writes relating thereunto, fince the emperor honoured him with his intimacy and friendship, and informed him himself of many transactions. He composed this work soon after the emperor's death; for he tells us, that he began it when Constantine's children reigned; and on the other hand it is certain, that he did not survive the emperor two full years. Besides the life of Constantine, he wrote two panegyrics on that prince, one in 325. which has been long fince loft; and another, of an extraordinary length, in 335. which has reached our times, but gives us no great inlight into the transactions of those times (1). Several other panegyrics on Conflantine, composed in the beginning of his reign, are still extant, and have been of great use to us, as the reader must have observed, in writing the history of his life. Among these there are two, the authors of which are not known; one of them was pronounced in the year 308. on occasion of the marriage of Constantine and Fausta; and the other in 313. after the defeat of Maxentius (2). Two other panegyrics were composed by Eumenius, of whom we have spoken in the text, the one about the year 309. and the other in 311. to return thanks to the emperor for the favours and privileges granted to the city of Autun: that written by Nazarius was pronounced on the first of March, 321. Eumenius was professor of eloquence in the city of Autun, and esteemed one of the best orators of his time. St. Ferom speaks of Nazarius as a celebrated orator in 324. and adds, that he had a daughter no less esteemed for her eloquence than himself. Vinctus, in his comments upon Aufonius, calls her Eunomia; and syles her, upon what authority we know not, a christian virgin (3). Praxagoras, by birth an Atherican nian, wrote, when only nineteen years old, two books on the kings of Athens; and, three years after, two others, comprising the life of Constantine. At the age of thirty-one, he published the life of Alexander the Great in fix books (4). An abridgment of his life of Constantine is to be found in Photius (5). His style is clear, but unequal. He was a pagan, but bestows great encomiums on Constantine. He is supposed to have flourished under Constantius, and to have been contemporary with the fophist Bemar-chus, who was a native of Casarea in Cappadocia, wrote several declamations and speeches, and published the life of Constantine in ten books (6). But none of his works have reached our times. Libanius mentions one Bemarchus, a pagan sophist, but greatly favoured by Constantius (7). Eunapius likewise wrote the history of Constantine, but comprised without all doubt in the general history, which he published of all the emperors from the death of Alexander Severus (8). We may well rank Constantine himself amongst the writers and men of learning who flourished in his time; for many monuments of his application and study have reached our times, and are to be found in Eusebius, who has transmitted them to us. Of these, the chief, or at least the most diffule and extensive, is his oration ad fanctorum cotum, or his discourse addressed to the assembly of saints. Eusebius assures us, that this speech, as well as his many laws and letters, were all composed by himfelf. His speech, and several letters he wrote in Latin, and caused them to be afterwards translated into Greek, tho' he must have been well acquainted with the Greek tongue too, having passed most of his time in the east. Of his letters or edicts the sollowing are still extant in Eusebius: the edict of Milan in 313. in favour of the christians; his letters to Anulinus, proconsul of Africa, for the ecclesiastic inimunity, and ordering whatever had been taken from the churches to be restored; his letter to Cecilianus, bishop of Carthage, concerning the alms, which were by his orders to be distributed among the indigent christians in Africa; his letter to Melchiades, bishop of Rome, in 313. touching the council of that city against the Donatists; that which he wrote in 314. to Chrestus, bishop of Syracuse, concerning the council of Arles; his edict addressed to the inhabitants of Palestine, and the people of the east, in 323. for the re-establishing of the consessor; his letter to Eusebins the historian, concerning the building of churches; his edict to the people of the east, exhorting them to embrace the christian religion; his letter to Alexander and Arius, touching their disputes in point of religion; his letter to the churches, con-

(1) Euseb. or. habit. in tricennal. Constantin. p. 605. (2) Panegyr. 5. p. 124. & 7. p. 152. (3) Vint. in Auson. p. 158. (4) Phot. c. 62. p. 64. (5) Idem, p. 64. (6) Voss. hist. Grac. l. ii. c. 17. Suidas, p. 551. (7) Liban. vit. p. 15. (8) Eunap. p. 40. Voss. ibid. c. 18.

cerning

THE news of Constantine's death no sooner reached the armies, than they all The armies agreed to acknowledge no other emperors but the sons of Constantine, whom they acknowledge Constantine's accord-three children;

cerning what had been decided in the council of Nice in 325. with respect to the celebration of Easter; the letter he wrote to Macarius for the building of the church of the Resurrection at Jerusalem, and that to the bishops of Palestine for the building of another at Mambre; three touching the promotion of Eulebius to the see of Antioch about the year 331. part of the edict which he addressed to the heretics; his letter to Sapor, king of Persia, in behalf of the christians; two to Eulebius, the one touching his treatife on Easter, the other requiring him to fend him fifty copies of the scripture; his letter to the bishops of the council of Tyre in 335. for the quieting of the troubles in the church. Besides these ing of the troubles in the church. letters or edicts in Eusebius (9), others have been transmitted to us by different authors, viz. five touching the Donatists, written about the year 314 (10); one to Arius and his disciples about the year 324. complaining of their obstinacy (11); one to the church of Alexandria, upon the condemnation of Arius by the council of Nice; one to the whole church, commanding his books, and those of his followers, to be burnt (12); one to the church of Nicomedia, on the banishment of the two Arian bishops, Eusebius of Nicomedia, and Theognis of Nice (13); another, on the same subject, to Theodotus, bishop of Laodicea (14); one to Arius, inviting him to court (15); some lines of that which he wrote to Athanasius, injoining him to admit Arius to the communion of the faithful(16); one to the church of Alexandria, wherein he commends the conduct of Athanasius (17); one to Athanasius himfelf, condemning those who had flindered him (18); one to Johannes Melecianus, congratulating him upon his being reconciled to the church 19); one to the Eusebians of the council of Tyre, inviting them to Constantinople (20). To these we may add the letter which he wrote to the poet Optatianus, thanking him for a poem which he had published in his commendation; and affuring him, that he had nothing more at heart than the encouraging of learned men. Belides the authors of the Augustine history, of whom we have spoken already, several other authors flourished under Constantine. St. Ferom extols among the rest, the orator Attius Patera or Paterius, a native of Bayeux, and iprung, according to Aufonius (21), from the ancient Druids. He taught rhetoric at Rome with great applaule, about the end of Conflantine's reign, and afterwards at Bourdeaux (22). lince Aufonius ranks him among the proteffors of that city. He was the father of the orator Delphidins(23), of whom hereafter; and Hedinias, to whom Sr. Ferom wrote his hundred and fittieth letter, was defeended from him. He was a pagan, as St. Ferom tells us in express terms (24) The reader will find in Ausonius (25) several things relating to him, which ir would be rooted out to infert here. Suidas aferibes fiveral rhotorical pieces to one Onajimus, a native of Cybrus or Sparta, who live i in the time of Condantive, and is flyled by Suidas both an historian and fophist (26). At the same time structured Palladius, a native of Methone in Pelopounefus, who published a treatife on the feaths of the Romans, and fome other philological pieces (27). And this is all we know of these two writers, whom Vossius ranks among the Greek historians (28). The reader will find in Photius (29) feveral grammatical observations copied by him from four books written in Iambic verse by one Helladius, a native of Antinopolis or Bisantinopolis, as he styled it, in Egypt. This work was intitled Chrestomathia: he published several other pieces, was a pagan, and lived under Licinius and Galerius (30). Photius speaks elsewhere of one Helladius, author of a very copious lexicon(31). In the time of Constantine flourished the celebrated Platonic philosopher Iamblithus: he was a native of Chalcis in Lower Syria, sprung from a rich and noble family, and very famous among the pagans, as appears from Eunapius, who wrote his life (32). He studied philosophy first under one Anatolus or Anatolius, and afterwards under the celebrated Porplayrius. He had an incredible number of disciples, taken with his probity, fays Eunapius, and not with his eloquence; for he both spoke and wrote very improperly. From what Eunapius says of him, it is manifest, that he studied magic with no less ap-plication than philosophy (33). He died at Alexandria before the year 331. some time after he had put the last hand to the life of a philosopher of that place, named Alypius, who was his contemporary.

This work has not reached our times, nor ought we to regret the loss of it; for Eunapius speaks of it as a very mean performance (34). Several works of a philosopher, named Iamblichus, are still extant, and highly effeemed by the best judges, but commonly ascribed, not to the disciple of Porphyrius, but to another Iamblichus, who lived at Apamea in Syria, forty or fifty years after the former, and was one of the emperor Julian's chief favourites, as appears from the feveral letters he wro e to him (35). These two philosophers bore the same name, lived in the same country, and had each of them a disciple named Sopater; no wonder, therefore, that most writers have contounded them. A third philosopher, of the same name, lived under the emperor M. Aurelius. Several works have reached our times, under the name of Lamblichus; but which of these three was the true author of them, we will not take upon us to determine: the works are, the history of the life and fift of Pythagoras, with an exhortation to the study of philosophy, containing an explication of the proverbs and maxims of that philotopher (36); an explication of the arithmetic of Nicomachus; a treatife on mathematics in general; an antiwer to the letter of Perphyrius to Ancho, on the mysteries of the Egyptisms; a collect on of the tenets of the Pythagoreaus; and a fhort treatife on the fun. The first of these works was translated into Latin, and published in 1598 by one Johannes Arcerius, a native of Frifia; but he is thought not to have taken the true meaning of the author in feveral pallings, and, befiles, his flyle is both obscure and improper. Samuel Tomatius published in 1668. Iamblichus's expircation of the arithmetic of Nicomachus, promiling at the fime time to publish soon after his treatise on mithema-

(9) Enfeb. hift. I. x. c. 5, 7. & vit. Corft. I. ii. c. 24, 25, 46, 43, 64. I. iii. c. 17, 20, 30, 32, 52. 60, 64.
I. iv. c. 9, 13, 35, 42. (10) Cacil. Optat. p. 280, 283, 285, 287. (11) Vide Baron. ad ann. 319.
(12) Socrat. I. i. c. 9 p. 30, 32. (13) Gelaf. Gyzicen. acta Nic. concil p. 217. (14) Idem, p. 224.
(15) Socrat. I. i. c. 25, p. 61. (16) Ath. apol. p. 778, 779. (17) Idem, p. 785. (18) Idem, p. 767.
(19) Idem. p. 803. (20) Vide Baron. ann. 325. (21) Aufon. de profess. Burdigal. car. 4. p. 145.
(12) Idem. car. 6. p. 150. Hier. epift. 150. p. 410. (23) Aufon. ilid. p. 145. (24) Ilier. p. 140.
(25) Aufon. ilid. p. 149. (26) Suid. c, v. p. 311. (27) Idem, π. p. 405. (28) Voss. hist. Grac. I.iv.
(2.18. p. 486. (29) Phot. c. 279. (30) Idem, p. 1592. (31) Idem, c. 145. p. 317. (32) Eurap.
(2.2. p. 23. (33) Idem ibid. (34) Idem, c. 3. p. 28. (35) Julian. epift. 40. & p. 180. &c.;
(36) Iam. vit. Pyth. p. 25.
Vol. VI. No 4.

accordingly proclaimed emperors, as did, soon after, the senate of Rome, without taking a the least notice of their two cousins, Dalmatius Casar, and Annibalianus king of Pontus, tics; but whether or no he was as good as his word, we cannot tell, not having ever heard of that work's being published. Ismblichus, in his answer to the letter of Porphyrius, endeavours, under the name of Abammon, to confute his arguments against the power of magic. Holstenius designed to publish all the works of Iamblichus, together with observations; but he was prevented by death from executing his design. Iamblichus's life of Pythagoras was in great part copied from that of the same philosopher, written by Porphyrius (37). St. Jerom tells us, that the philosopher Iamblichus wrote copious comments on the precepts of Pythagoras, commonly called the golden maxims (38). The emperor Julian equals lamblichus of Chalcis to Plato himself. Gothofredus is of opinion, that Gregorius and Hermogenes, or rather Hermogenianus, the authors of the two different, but like codes, flourished under Constantine and his children. They both begin with the laws of Adrian, and seem to end with those of Dioclesian, not caring, as is conjectured, to meddle with the laws of Constantine, by reason of the many changes that prince had introduced into the Roman jurisprudence (39). The they were both pagans, yet they might have inserted such laws of Constantine as no-ways related to religion. In compiling their respective works, they followed the order of time; which was afterwards observed in the codes of Theodosius and Justinian. The codes of Gregorius and Hermogenianus are thought to be the most ancient of all; and were both abridged by those who abridged the Theodosian code (40). Only fome fragments of them now remain to be found in different books of jurisprudence. Gregorius is commonly believed to have been the most ancient of the two. The style of Hermogenianus is very uncouth, and often obscure. Publius Optatianus Porphyrius flourished under Constantine, and is thought to have published the poem, which has reached us, about the middle of the year 326. on occasion of the solemnity of the emperor's twentieth year, and the tenth of the two Casars, Crispus and Constantine, his children. He had before that time inscribed another poem to Constantine; which being well received by the prince, Optatianus returned him thanks by a letter, which is still extant, for the kind reception he had given it; adding to the letter a second poem, addressed likewise to Constantine. These two poems have been long fince lost; but the letter, which the emperor wrote to him, thanking him for one of them, has reached our times. Constantine calls him in his letter his dearly beloved, and Optatianus Styles Constantine emperor of the whole earth; whence we may conclude it to have been written after the year 323. Not long after, Opsa-tianus was, upon several charges brought against him, banished. He owns some of them to have been true; but pretends not to have been guilty of the crime for which chiefly he was fent into exile. He wrote the poem, which is still extant, to beg of Constantine, that he would recal him from banishment, and allow him to fee again his fon and family. The poem is a panegyric on Constantine, filled with acrostics, and other trifling conceits of that nature, which betray want of judgment and true taste in the writer (41). St. Jerom assures us, that the emperor, pleased with this poem, recalled the author

(42). Several epigrams in the anthology are afcribed to the same author; and Fulgenius, the grammarian, quotes some of his verses (43): Robanus Maurus, and venerable Bede, speak of his poem as an elegant performance (44); but the modern critics, with a great deal of reason, despise all compositions, and difficiles nugas, as Martial styles them, of that nature, agreeing therein with the ancient Latin poets, whose writings ought to be our standard. Some authors are of opinion, that several of the pieces which pass under the name of Petronius Arbiter, were written by Optatianus. Sopater, the disciple of Iamblichus, flourished under Constantine, and, after the death of that philosopher, became the head of the Platonic sect that followed Plotinus. He was a native of Apamea in Syria, and both spoke and wrote with great elegance and propriety; whence he was styled a sophist, as well as a philosopher (45). After the death of Iamblichus, not deigning to converse with other philosophers, says Eunapius his admirer, he repaired to the court of Constantine, to try whether he could prevent the downfal and utter ruin of the ancient religion of the Romans. He gained, adds the same writer, a great ascendant over the emperor, who frequently conferred with him, and yielded to him in public the most honourable place. But this we can hardly believe, upon the bare word of his panegyrist Eunapius; for no other writer takes the least notice of Sopater's great credit with Constantine. Sozomen tells us, that Constantine had recourse to him to know in what manner he might atone for the death of his fon Crifpus; and that both the philosopher, and the pagan pontiffs, an-fwered, that, in the religion of the Greeks, there was no atonement for so heinous a crime (46). Hereupon he began to hearken to the christians, says Zosimus (47), who assured him, that the virtue of their baptism was capable of washing off any wickedness, however enormous. We can scarce believe, that the pagans owned there was no atonement in their religion for an emperor. Besides, it is certain, that Constantine had hearkened to the christians, and embraced their religion, before the death of Crifpus. While Sopater was with the emperor at Conflantinople, there being great scarcity of provisions in that city, by reason the vessels that brought corn were detained by contrary winds, the people assembled in the theatre broke one day on a fudden into bitter invectives against Sopater, as a magician, who stopt the favourable winds, and prevented the arrival of the so long-expected vessels. Hereupon Constantine abandoned him to the fury of the enraged populace, who being underhand stirred up by the prescet Ablavius, and other courtiers, jealous of his too great credit with the emperor, tore him in pieces. Thus is his death related by Eunapius (48); and from him Zosimus copied what he wrote on this subject (49). It is surprising, that Constantine should have treated in this manner, without the least provocation, so great a favourite as Eunapius, and after him Zosimus, pretend Sopsier to have been. Suidas writes, that Constantine put him to death, to give the world a fignal instance of his hatred and aversion to paganism (50). Sopater left a treatise on providence, and on those who had been undeservedly happy or miserable (51). Vossius seems to confound Sopater of Apamea with another philo-

(37) fonf. l. iii. c. 16. p. 293, 294. (38) Hier. in Ruf. l. iii. c. 10. p. 246. (39) Cod Theod. chronol. p. 185. (40) Idem, p. 184. (41) P. Opt. prol. c. 11. apud Velf. (42) Hier. ann. 329. (43) fonf. l. iii. c. 15. p. 290. (44) Optat. prol. p. 2. (45) Eunap. p. 23. Sozom. l. i. c. 5. p. 406. Suid. p. 781. (46) Sozom. l. i. c. 5. p. 406. (47) Zof. l. ii. p. 685. (48) Eunap. c. 4. p. 34, 37. (49) Zof. l. ii. p. 692. (50) Suid. s. p. 782. (51) Idem ibid. fopher

a Pontus, the two fons of their uncle Constantius Dalmatius, tho' Constantine had, in the above-mentioned division of the empire, allotted to each of them their share. However, the three brothers did not, for what reason we are no-where told, take upon them the title of Augusti till the ninth of September of this year 337, that is, near four months after the decease of their father 2. Soon after the foldiery, under colour of preventing disturbances in the empire, slew to arms, and cut in pieces Julius Constantius, the deceased emperor's brother, Dalmatius Casar, Annibalianus king of Pontus, But put Dalthe patrician Optatus, who had, as is commonly supposed, married Anastatia, the matius and late emperor's fifter, five of his nephews, among whom was the eldelt fon of Julius Annibalianus

Constantius, the presect Ablavius, and most of the great Constantine's ministers, sup-b posing them attached to the interest of his nephews b. Thus was the numerous family of Constantine reduced at once to his three sons, and two nephews Gallus and Julian, the fons of Julius Constantius; of whom the former owed his life to a malady, from which no one believed he could recover; and the other to his infancy, he being then at most but seven years old. Gregory of Nazianzus writes, that Julian was privately conveyed away, and concealed by one Marcus of Arethusa, whom he afterwards put to a cruel death d. All authors agree, that neither young Constantine, nor Constans, had any hand in the massacre of the imperial family: as for Constantius, Eutropius and Socrates write, that he rather permitted than commanded it. Julian 8, St. Jerom, and Zosimus, tell us in plain terms, that he was the author of that cruel massacre; and St. Athanasius openly reproaches him as the murderer of his uncles and cousins k. The three brothers met in Pannonia in the beginning of the ensuing year 338. when Ursus and Polemius were consuls, to divide Their dominiamong them the dominions of the two deceased princes Dalmatius and Annibalianus; ons divided but all we know of this division is, that Constantine had Thrace (for he is faid to three brothers; have reigned at Constantinople) ; and Constans, Greece and Macedon; for Corinth and fome places in Macedon are said to have belonged to him m. Each of them kept the dominions allotted to them by Constantine in his life-time, that partition being confirmed by his last will, viz. Constantine, Gaul, Spain, and Britain; Constantius, Asia, Syria, and Egypt; and Constans, Illyricum, Italy, and Africa. Constantine seems d to have yielded this very year Thrace to Constantius, and Constans Africa to Constantine. While Constantius was absent in Pannonia, the Persians, finding the frontiers The Persians unguarded, entered Mesopotamia, committing every-where dreadful ravages. At the invade the same time the Armenians revolted, drove out their king, who was a friend to the Roman domi-Romans, and joined the Persians, who being thus strengthened, laid siege to Nisibis;

* Euseb. vit. Const. l. iv. c. 68. p. 560. b Euseb. ibid. p. 541. Zos. l. 2. p. 692. Julian. epist. l Atheniens. p. 497, 498. c Socrat. l. iii. c. 1. p. 164. Ammian. p. 298. d Nazian. orat. 3. 90. Eutrop. p. 558. f Socrat. p. 115. s Julian. ad Athen. p. 497. h Hier. chron. Zos. p. 692. k Athan. folit. p. 856. l Chron. Alex. p. 670. m Liban. orat. 9. p. 212. ad Athenienf. p. 497, 498. SOCRAT
p. 90. EUTROP. p. 558. SOCRAT
Zos. p. 692. ATHAN. folit. p. 856.

sopher of the same name, who was a native of Alexandria, and abridged the works of several historians and other authors. These abridgments are greatly esteemed by Photius, tho interwoven with several sables. They were divided into twelve books (52). Julian speaks of one Sopater of Apamea, who lived in his time (53), and confequently must be distinguished from the disciple of Iamblichus. To the other writers, who flourished under Constantine, we may add the two christian poets Commodianus and Juveneus. The former wrote, according to Rigault, who published his work with those of St. Cyrian in 1666, in the time of Sylvester, bishop of Rome; was a native of Gaza, or at least bore the name of Gazeus; he was descended of pagan parents, but in reading the holy scripture, discovered and embraced the truth. He wrote a kind of poem, in hexameter verse, commonly styled instructions, but without any regard to quantities. It is divided into feveral articles, and the initial letters of each article make up its title. In this poem, if we may bestow upon it that name, he impugns the errors of the pagans, but seems not to have been yet well instructed himself in the truths of the christian religion (54). Juvencus, frequently mentioned by St. Jerom, flourished under Constantine: he was by birth a Spaniard, sprung from an illustrious family, and not only a christian, but in holy orders. However, he applied himself to the study of poetry, and wrote a poem, comprising the four gospels in as many books. He keeps close to the text, chusing rather to preserve the truth of the history, than to display his genius. This poem was composed when Con-flantine had settled both the church and empire in peace (55), that is, after the defeat of Licinius. Some of his verses are quoted by the venerable Bede (56). The council of Rome held in the time of Gelasius. bishop of that city, approved of this work, styling it a laborious and excellent performance (57). He wrote another poem on the order of the facraments, of which the abbot Tritenham (8) affures us he had feen and peruied two books; but they have not reached our times. Crinitus afcribes to him some hymns (59), of which no mention is made by any other writer.

86. (54) Comm. p. 23.c.33. (56) Vide Labb. de script. ecclesast. (9) Bib. pat. s. viii. p. 657. but (52) Phot. c. 161. p. 344. (53) Julian. epift. 40, 53. p. 185, 186. Gennad. c. 15. (55) Juvenc. l. iv. p. 657. ver. 1, 2. (57) Concil. tom. iv. p. 1264. (58) Trit. de script. eccles. p. 14.

Raise the suge but after having continued before it sixty-three days, they were obliged to drop that a

of Nilibis, and enterprize, and retire. The preservation of that important place is ascribed by Theodoret to the prayers of the holy bishop James, during whose life and residence there, all the attempts of the enemy against it proved ineffectual n. Constantius, in the mean time, taking leave of his brothers, left Pannonia, and returned into the east, where he affembled all his forces, with a design to relieve Nisibis; but finding the Persians had retired of their own accord, he turned his arms against the Armenians, obliged them to receive again the king whom they had driven out, and drew over to his party the robbers of Arabia, no doubt the Saracens, who, by frequent inroads into the Persian dominions, made a powerful diversion, and greatly annoyed the enemy . The war, however, continued during the whole time of his reign: many battles b were fought, some gained by the Romans, and some by the Persians: the cities of Mesopotamia were often taken and retaken; and that of Nisibis three times besieged by the enemy, without their ever being able to reduce it. Ammianus Marcellinus observes, that the Romans gained great advantages when commanded by the emperor's lieutenants, but were conftantly defeated when headed by the emperor in person P. The following year, 339. when Constantius was consul the second time, with his brother Constans, several laws were enacted in the name of the three emperors; and among the rest one forbidding, under no less a penalty than that of death, marriages between uncles and nieces, which had been allowed by a decree of the senate, issued in favour of the marriage of Claudius, and the celebrated Agrippina. Notwithstanding c this decree, such marriages were ever looked upon by the Romans as incessuous, but frequently practifed by other nations, especially the Phanicians, to whom the law forbidding them, dated the thirty-first of March of this year, is addressed 9. The next confuls were Acyndinus and Proculus. This year Constantine, diffatisfied with the late partition of the provinces, after having folicited in vain his brother Constans to yield to him Italy, or at least part of that country, raised a considerable army, and, under pretence of marching to the affiftance of Constantius, who was at war with the Persians, left Gaul, and, entering the dominions of Constants, made himself master of several places. Hereupon Constans, who was then in Dacia, Constans, and detached part of his forces against him, who having drawn him into an ambuscade d near Aquileia, cut both him and his army in pieces. His body was thrown into the river Ansa, at a small distance from Aquileia; but being afterwards discovered, it was fent to Constantinople, and interred there near the tomb of his father r. Such was the end of the great Constantine's eldest son. He was born at Arles, as is commonly believed, on the seventh of August, 316. created Casar the first of March, 317. and saluted Augustus on the ninth of September, 337. so that he did not injoy the imperial dignity three whole years. His panegyrist paints him as a prince endowed with great accomplishments both of body and mind; and adds, that he studied the scriptures, and, to the utmost of his power, practised what they required '. But his invading his brother's dominions, without the least provocation, can by no means e be justified. He received and treated with great kindness the great Athanasius, when he was banished by his father into Gaul; which province he then governed '. By his death, Constant remained sole master of the western provinces, Constantius voluntarily yielding to him the whole share of the deceased prince ". Constant, foon after the death of his brother, arrived at Aquileia, where he was on the ninth of April, and on the twenty-fifth of June at Milan w. All we find of Constantius this year is, that on the fifth of August he was at Bessus in Thrace, and on the ninth of September at Antioch x. The next year, when Marcellinus and Probinus were confuls, many cities in the east were overturned by a violent and dreadful earthquake 1; and the Franks in the west, having crossed the Rhine, made an irruption into Gaul, committing every-where great ravages. Constans marched against them, gave them battle; but as he gained no great advantage over them, the war was not ended till the ensuing year. On occasion of this war, Libanius speaks much at length of the turbulent and restless temper of the Franks. This year a law was enacted in the

The Franks invade Gaul;

Constantine invades the

is killed.

n Theodor, in vit. patrum, с. т. р. 770.

LIBAN. p. 122. JULIAN. orat. г. р. 37.

P Ammian. l. xx. p. 177.

Cod. Theod. l. iii. tit. 12. leg. 11. p. 294.

Eutrop. p. 588.

Monodia, feu orat. in Conftantin. junior. mort. p. 7—8—14.

Mordia, feu orat. in Conftantin. junior. mort. p. 7—8—14.

LIBAN. orat. 2. p. 175.

W Cod. Theodol. p. 97. chronol. p. 41.

X Cod. Theodol. chronol. p. 42.

Y Socrat. p. 88. Soz. p. 504.

Theophan. p. 30.

Socrat. p. 88. Soz. p. 504.

LIBAN. orat. 3. p. 138.

a name of the two emperors, forbidding, under the severest penalties, all manner of idolatrous worship b. Firmicus Maternus writes, that Constans ordered several temples to be demolished, and likewise the celebrated altar of Vistory in the senate at Rome's. Constantius built this year, and fortified, the city of Amida upon the Tigris in Mesopotamia. Stephanus the geographer takes no notice of this city: however, it is certain, that it sustained a long siege in the latter end of the present reign, and became afterwards the metropolis of Mejopotamia, properly so called, as Edessa was the metropolis of that part, which was known by the name of Ofrhoene. The Arabians, the present inhabitants, call it Hemit or Ameth, and the Turks Caramit 4. The following year, Constantius entered upon his third, and Constans upon his second consulship.

b The latter either conquered or appealed the Franks, to use the expression of Idatius; But are quieted and that warlike people submitted to the princes of their own nation, whom he was by Constans. pleased to appoint over them . Constans being thus disengaged, passed over into Britain the following year 343. when Placidus and Romulus were consuls, to oppose the Scots, who made frequent inroads into the Roman dominions; but the filence of Libanius with respect to this expedition, is a manisest proof, that he performed no great exploits against that brave and gallant nation. He was at Boulogne on the twenty-fifth of January on his way to Britain, and returned to Treves on the thirtieth of June 1. As for Constantius, he was, on the fifth of April, and the eleventh of May of the preceding year, at Antioch s; and this year, on the eighteenth of Februc ary, at Antioch, and on the twenty seventh of June, and sourth of July, at Hierapolis in Euphratesianah. By a law enacted this year on the twenty-seventh of August, and commonly ascribed to him, the ecclesiastics and their domestics are exempted from all new impositions, and an intire immunity from all customs granted to such of them as were by their poverty obliged to earn a livelihood by trading. When the church acquired sufficient wealth to support her ministers, they were forbidden by the canons to merchandise, or follow any trade. Theophanes tells us, that Constantius triumphed this year over the Persians; for, as we observed above, he was at war with them during the whole time of his reign k; but he often triumphed, when he had been overcome, to conceal the shame of his defeat. The following

d year, when Leontius and Salustius were consuls, is remarkable for a dreadful earthquake, which intirely ruined the city of Neocasarea in Pontus, no one edifice having Neocasarea withstood the violence of the shock, except the church, and the habitation of the rained by an bishop, who was saved, with the clergy, and some other pious persons, while the earthquake. other inhabitants were all buried in the ruins m. Theophanes speaks of a battle this year between the Romans and Persians, in which the latter were defeated with great loss ". The year ensuing, when Amentius and Albinus were consuls, the city of Duras on the coast of Greece was swallowed up with all its inhabitants in an earthquake, and twelve cities in Campania overturned. The above-mentioned confuls were fucceeded by Constantius the fourth time, and Constans the third time, consuls. The e latter was at Cesena in Italy on the twenty-third of May, at Milan on the twentyfirst of June, from whence he passed into Macedon, and was at Thessalonica on the sixth of December; from Macedon he seems to have returned to Gaul; for he sent from thence Athanasius and Osius to the council of Sardica, held the following year 347°. As for Constantius, he was, on the seventh and twenty-fixth of May, and the twenty-third of August, at Constantinople P. The law dated the twenty-sixth of May, and addressed to the bishops, confirms to them, and the inserior clergy, to year Constantius caused an harbour to be made at Seleucia, at an immense charge, The port of for the convenience of the city of Antioch, which stood on the Orontes, at a small Antioch at Seleucia. f distance from thence. This work cost him, according to Libanius and the emperor Julian r, incredible sums, the mouth of the Orontes, where the port was made, being full of rocks and fands. He likewise rebuilt the cities of Seleucia in Syria, and Antaradus in Phanicia; whence the latter, in the acts of some councils, is called from him Constantia. The same year, Sapor, king of Persia, besieged Nisibis a second

d Vide BAUDR. p. 35. E IDAT. Cod. Theodos. l. xi. tit. 3. leg. 1. p. 2. FIRM. MAT. p. 57. d Vide BAUDR. p. 35. FIDAT. 85. SOCRAT. l. ii. c. 13. p. 90. f Cod. Theodos. chronol. p. 44. f Idem, p. 43. h Idem ibid. Cod. Theodos. l. xvi. tit. 2. l. viii. p. 32. k Theoph. p. 30. l. Libam. orat. 12. p. 309. GREG. Nyss. in vit. Greg. Thaumat. h Theoph. p. 31. Cod. Theodos. chron. p. 46. Ath. orat. 12. p. 36. J. Libam. orat. 13. p. 386. Julian. orat. 1. p. 74. Theoph. p. 31. BAUDR. p. 45. p. 85. Socrat. l. ii. c. 13, p. 90. Cod. Theodof.
Cod. Theodof. l. xvi. tit. 2. l. viii. p. 32.

m Gree. Nyss. in vit. Greg. Thaumat.

apol. 1. p. 676. Cod. Theodof. chron. p. 46. apol. 1. p. 676. P Cod. Theodof. chron. p. 4 P LIBAN. orat. 13. p. 386. Julian. orat. 1. p. 74.

suppressed in

The battle of Singarus.

Africa.

Nilibis bestaged time; but was obliged to retire with disgrace, after having continued before it three a in vain by the months, as we read in St. Jerom, or seventy-eight days, as Theophanes will have it. The following year, when Rufinus and Eusebius were consuls, the emperor Constantius pretended to have gained a considerable victory over the Persians : he was at Ancyra on the eighth of March, and at Hierapolis on the eleventh of May o. The next consuls were Flavius Philippus, a great stickler for the doctrine of Arius, and Flavius Sallea or Salia, a zealous defender of the faith of the council of Nice. This year Constans, filled with indignation against the Arians, and ashamed of the weakness of his brother, who fuffered himfelf to be imposed upon and deluded by those subtle heretics, threatened to restore by force of arms the orthodox bishops, whom he had banished at their instigation, unless he recalled them of his own accord. Constantius b was, either by fear, or the reasons alledged by Constans in behalf of the exiled bishops, prevailed upon to give his consent to their return P. The same year Constans sent Macarius and Paulus, two officers of distinction, into Africa, with large sums to be distributed among the poor of that province. They were likewise injoined by that most religious prince, as he is styled by a council q, to use their utmost endeavours The Donatists in reclaiming the Donatists, and re-uniting them to the church. Their endeavours were crowned with fuccess; for the most obstinate and stubborn among these sectaries being driven out of the province, the rest yielded to reason, and were received again into the church; fo that the christians there enjoyed a profound tranquillity, till those who had been banished were recalled by the emperor Julian. But this c year is chiefly remarkable for a great battle between the Persians and Romans, fought in the neighbourhood of Singarus, a city of Mesopotamia. The Persians had posted themselves there, and fortified their camp with a deep ditch and ramparts; on which, as well as on the neighbouring hills, they had placed an incredible number of archers: their army was very numerous, and composed almost of all the nations of the east, Sapor their king being determined to put the whole to the iffue of a general engagement, and end, if possible, by a single victory, so tedious and expensive a war. He did not doubt but the Romans would attack him in his camp, and therefore had fortified it with extraordinary care, and placed bodies of archers on all the eminences which commanded the avenues leading to it. Accordingly the Romans, finding they could by no means intice the enemy into the open field, forced Constantius to lead them up to the very ramparts of their camp, which they attacked with a fury hardly to be expressed, and forced, in spite of the showers of arrows that were discharged upon them from the eminences, and the vigorous resistance they met with from those in the camp. Great numbers of the Persians were cut in pieces, and the rest either put to slight, or taken prisoners: amongst the latter was the king's son, whom the Romans are faid to have put to death, after having caused him to be publicly beaten with rods. Thus the Romans made themselves masters of the enemy's camp, baggage and treasures: but while they were, without the least apprehension of danger, quenching their drought with the fresh water, of which they e found great plenty in the camp, the Persian archers rallying, sell upon them unexpectedly, and snatched the victory, to use the expression of Libanius t, out of their hands. In this attack, which happened in the night-time, great havock was made

The Romans

force the Per-

fian camp,

But sustain a great loss.

A dreadful earthquake at Berytus.

of the Romans; but nevertheless the Persians, as soon as day began to appear, withdrew beyond the Tigris, and broke down the bridges, which they had laid over that river, that the Romans might not pursue them ". The loss was great on both fides; but the Romans, by remaining mafters of the field, claimed the victory w. The following year, when Ulpius Limenius and Aconius Catulinus were consuls, the city of Berytus was in great part overturned by an earthquake; which fo frightened the inhabitants, that fuch of them as had not yet embraced the christian religion, f crouded to the churches to be baptized: but the lives of fuch converts, not instructed in the holy mysteries, and the duties of their profession, did no great honour to the religion they pretended to embrace . Constans, in the beginning of this year, was in Gauly: there Athanasius took leave of him, upon his setting out for his see in Egypt. From Gaul he passed into Illyricum, and was on the twenty-seventh of May n Athan. folit. p. 819. Cod. Theodof. chron. p. 46, 47. P. Theodoret. via. particily, a. ... c. 8. p. 13. Concil. tom. ii. p. 713. Philostorg. l.iii. c. 12. p. 45. Socrat. l. ii. c. 23. p. 107. Lib. p. 13. Eutrop. p. 588. Julian. p. 43. Lib. p. 133. Lib. ibid. Julian. orat. 1. p. 45. W. Ammian. p. 122. Theoph. p. 32. Cedren. p. 299. Athan. apol. 2. p. 774.

a at Sirmium; whence he returned to Gaul before winter. As for Constantius, he was on the first of April at Antiocb, and some time after at Edessa in Mesopotamia; whence he wrote to Atbanasius, pressing him to hasten his return to the east. He was at Constantinople on the third of October 2. The law enacted this year on the eleventh of April, exempting the ecclefiaftics from all civil functions and employments, is commonly ascribed to him.

THE following year 350. when Sergius and Nigrinianus were confuls, is remarkable for many great events. The Persians, notwithstanding the loss they had sustained in 348. returned this year with a mighty army, an incredible number of elephants, and warlike engines of all kinds, and, after ravaging Mesopotamia, and taking several b strong holds there, fat down before Nisibis the third time, and left nothing unat-Nisibis besieged tempted to reduce that important place. Constantius was then at a great distance, a third time. the diffurbances which happened this year in the west, requiring his presence there. But the city was defended by Lucilianus, father-in-law to Jovian afterwards emperor, an officer of great courage and experience, and by the holy bishop James, in whose prayers the garison and inhabitants confided more than in their own valour and arms b. The Persians battered the walls for several days together, with the many engines which they had brought with them for that purpose, and at the same time endeavoured to undermine them; but all their efforts proving ineffectual, Sapor Allthe efforts caused the river Mygdonus, slowing through the city, to be turned into a new cha- of Sapor caused the river Mygdonus, slowing through the city, to be turned into a new cha- of Sapor against it renthem fufficiently supplied with wells and springs within the walls, he caused the course tual. of the river to be stopped, and by that means laid the whole country round the town under water; infomuch that it feemed an island in the midst of the sea. His defign was to overflow the town; but as it stood on a rising ground, the waters did not quite reach the top of the walls. He therefore ordered them to be battered with all kinds of warlike engines from ships and boats, of which he assembled an incredible number for that purpose. This attack lasted several days; but proving in the end ineffectual, Sapor caused the river to be stopped above the city by a wall or mole of an extraordinary breadth and height; which being fuddenly broken down, the d waters rushed with such violence against the wall of the city, that it was overturned, and laid level with the ground for the space of an hundred cubits. Hereupon the enemy, believing themselves now masters of the place, advanced with loud shouts to the attack; but, to their great furprize, met with so vigorous a resistance, the The vigorous garison and inhabitants being encouraged and animated by their holy bishop, that rejustance of the they were obliged to retire, after having lost a great many men, horses and elephants, habitants. as the reader will find related at length by the emperor Julians. Heaven itself feemed to espouse the cause of the inhabitants of Nisibis; for the Persians, during the attack, were so terrified with dreadful flashes of lightning, winds and rain, that they were not in a condition either of defending themselves, or offending the enemy 4. • They are faid to have lost in this one attack above ten thousand men . Sapor did all that lay in his power to prevent the inhabitants from repairing the breach, annoying them with incessant showers of arrows, but to no effect; for the very next morning he faw, to his great surprize, a new wall raised, and the garison ready to receive him. He continued however the fiege; but was, as often as he attacked the place, repulfed with great loss. Besides, his army was annoyed with swarms of small slies; which entering the foot, and crushed to pieces. To these evils was added a dreadful famine, and soon after a plague, which made a terrible havock in the Persian camp, and in the end f obliged Sapor, despairing of success, to raise the siege, after it had lasted near four The siege raised. months, and retire with the loss of twenty thousand men and upwards f. The many evils and calamities which afflicted the Persians during this memorable siege, are ascribed by Theodoret and Sozomen to the prayers of James, bishop of the place. Be that as it will, Sapor was forced to abandon the enterprize, after having, in the transports of his rage, put some of his chief commanders to death, and all those who had advised him to this war. He gave no further trouble to the Romans till the year 359. when the war was rekindled, as we shall relate in a more proper place. The history nostrils of the horses, and the trunks of the elephants, rendered them quite wild and ungovernable; infomuch that great numbers of the Persians were by them troden under

&lt;sup>2</sup> Cod. Theod. chronol. p. 48. THEODOR. • JUL. F JULIAN. THEOPHAN. PHILOSTORG. 1. iii. c. 23. a Idem ibid. orat. ii. p. 116. d Тибори. p. 33. • Idem ibid. & chron. Alexand. ibid. THEODOR. p. 633.

of the siege of Nisibis was written by Vologeses bishop of the place 8, who probably a fucceeded James in that see; but that work has not reached our times.

WE shall now give a succinct account of the disturbances in the west, which encouraged the Persians to invade the Roman dominions, and lay siege to Nisibis. Magnentius, the son of one Magnus, a native of Germany, and commander of some troops appointed to guard the banks of the Rhine, finding Constans universally despised by the army, on account of his indolence and inactivity, resolved to dispatch him, and fet up for himself. Accordingly, having imparted his design to Marcellinus, receiver of the revenues in Gaul, to Chrestus, and some other officers, and gained them over to his interest, on the day appointed for the execution of the plot, Marcellinus, under pretence of celebrating his son's birth-day, invited Magnentius, and the chief officers b of the army, to an entertainment, which lasted till the night was far spent, when Magnentius withdrew, and foon after returned in the imperial robes, and with all the enligns of fovereignty. Such of the company as were privy to the delign, immediately faluted him with the title of Augustus. The rest, who looked upon it at first as a jest, (and for such it had passed, had the plot miscarried) were easily prevailed upon, as they were heated with wine, to follow the example of the conspirators; so that Magnentius was, by all who were present, acknowledged emperor. This happened in the city of Autun, on the eighteenth of January, while Sergius and Nigrinianus were consuls, four years after the council of Sardica, and ten after the death of young Constantine h. The usurper immediately seized on the imperial palace at Autun, c and distributed among the populace what sums he found there; which induced, not only the city, but the neighbouring country, to espouse his cause. Their example was followed by a body of cavalry detached from the army in Illyricum, to reinforce that in Gaul. Magnentius, upon his first assuming the title of emperor, dispatched one Gaiso, a principal commander in the army, with orders to put Constans to death. The unhappy prince, being informed of what had passed, notwithstanding Magnentius had ordered the gates of Autun to be kept shut a whole day, and placed guards on all the roads, had thrown off the imperial robes, and fled towards Spain. But Gaiso, informed of the rout he had taken, followed him close with a chosen body of troops, Constans mur- and overtaking him at Helena, a small village at the foot of the Pyrenees, dispatched d him there with many wounds. St. Chrysoftom writes, that the unfortunate prince, finding it impossible to make his escape, first slew his children, and then himself k. But this is not vouched by any ancient historian; nay, we are no-where told, that he had any children. Such was the end of Constants, the great Constantine's youngest fon, in the thirtieth year of his age, and thirteenth of his reign. He was created Cæsar on the twenty-fifth of December 333. and assumed the title of emperor on the His character, ninth of September 337. He was a zealous defender of the christian religion, and the orthodox faith, a declared enemy to the Arians, Donatists, and all sectaries. He filled the churches with gifts and offerings, and had nothing so much at heart as the propagation of the gospel, the abolishing of idolatry, and the unity of the church 1. Thus Athanasius, who never speaks of him but with the greatest respect and vene- e ration, giving him constantly the title of Bleffed. The same writer assures us, that he had received the facrament of baptism, and seems to rank him among the martyrs m. On the other hand, the pagan writers lay feveral things to his charge. Aurelius Villor writes, that after he had reigned some years with great applause, he abandoned himself to cruelty and avarice n. Libanius charges him with suffering one Eugenius, and his other favourites, to oppress the people, and fill their own coffers at their expence o. Villor the younger complains of his preferring to the most profitable employments fuch as were able to lay down most money for them, without any regard to merit P. Eutropius likewise finds fault with his ministers, and adds, that the many vices which began to appear in the prince, joined to the rapaciousness of f his ministers, rendered him odious to the soldiery, and insupportable to the people q.

Magnentius

dered.

Zosimus, an avowed enemy to all princes who professed the christian religion, speaks of him as the most cruel and inhuman tyrant that ever wore and disgraced a diadem, and paints him as one addicted to all manner of lewdness, and guilty of such crimes as are most repugnant to nature r. Aurelius Victor s and Zonaras t seem to confirm this a charge. But, had it been true, we cannot think the great Athanasius, who could not be unacquainted with it, would have commended him on account of his piety, as he frequently does. Libanius, in an oration which he pronounced not long before his death, extols his continence, and aversion to unlawful pleasures; which would have been rather deriding than commending him, had he been guilty of the above-mentioned crimes. Zonaras writes, that, before the death of Constans was publicly known, Magnentius The cruelty of fent in his name for all the officers, whom he thought attached to the deceased prince's Magnentius. interest, and capable of defeating his own designs, and caused them to be murdered on the road ". But whether the death of Constans, and the usurpation of Magnentius, could be fo long kept concealed, we leave the reader to judge. Be that as it will, b Magnentius, by the death of Constans, became master of all the countries beyond the Alps, and foon after of Italy, Sicily, and Africa w. To strengthen his interest, he declared his brother Desiderius, and Decentius, according to some, his other brother, Hedeclares according to others only his cousin, Casars. The latter took also the names of Mag-Decentius and nentius and Magnus, and is distinguished on his medals with the uncommon title of Casars. Fortissimus, or Most valiant x. The news of the death of Constans, and the revolt of Gaul, no sooner reached Illyricum, than Veteranio, general of the foot in Pannonia, veteranio as. assumed the imperial robes, and caused himself to be saluted with the title of Augustus sumes the sule by the legions under his command. This happened at Sirmium, on the first of May, of Augustus. c according to Idatius, or on the first of March, as we read in the chronicle of Alexandria. He was a native of Upper Masia, and stricken in years when he usurped the fovereignty; but so illiterate, that he then first learnt to read y. Aurelius Victor speaks of him as a man of no parts?. But the emperor Julian writes, that he was no despicable man as and Eutropius commends him on account of his probity and affability, and adds, that as he had ferved in the army from his infancy, and had been always attended with fuccess, he was universally beloved by the soldiery b. It appears, both from the chronicle of Alexandria c, and from his medals d, that he was a christian c. Philostorgius f and Theophanes 8 write, that he was invested with the purple by Constantia, the eldest fister of Constantius, and widow of Annibalianus, who claimed that d right, as having been declared empress by her brother Constantine. The emperor Julian does not speak of him as an usurper; and Zonaras tells us, that, in assuming the imperial dignity, he wrote to Constantius, affuring him, that he had nothing in view but to oppose the usurper Magnentius; and that he should always look upon himself rather as his lieutenant, than an emperor or sovereign . Philostorgius adds, that Constantius confirmed to him the title of emperor, and sent him the diadem i. Besides Magnentius and Veteranio, a third pretender to the empire started up, viz. Nepotianus Flavius Popilius Nepotianus, the son of Eutropia, sister to Constantine the Great; who, sittle of empehaving affembled a company of gladiators, and several others of desperate fortunes, ror, and seizes assumed the purple on the third of June, and in that attire presented himself before Rome. e the gates of Rome. The prefect Anicetus, who commanded there for Magnentius, fallied out against him with a body of Romans, who were soon repulsed, and driven back into the city; which Nepotianus took not long after, and filled with blood and flaughter, putting to death among the rest the presect Anicetus. Magnentius was no sooner informed of what had happened, than he sent Marcellinus, his chief savourite and prime minister, against this new competitor. Nepotianus received him with great resolution; whereupon a bloody battle ensued between the soldiers of Magnentius and the Romans who had espoused the cause of Nepotianus; but the latter being betrayed by a senator, named Heraclitus, his men were put to slight, and he himself killed, Heis slain. after having enjoyed the sovereignty twenty-eight days k. Marcellinus ordered his f head to be carried on the point of a lance through the chief streets of the city, put all those to death who had declared for him, and, under pretence of preventing suture disturbances, commanded a general massacre of such as were any-ways related to Constantine. On this occasion many persons of great distinction were inhumanly murdered, and among the rest Eutropia, the mother of Nepotianus 1. Soon after,

<sup>8</sup> Chron. Alex. p. 674. b Zos. p. 692. Zonar. p. 12. Jul. orat. ii. p. 106, 107. Hier. chron. i Zonar. p. 12. Zos. p. 693. c Chrys. in Phil. hom. 15. p. 143. l Athan. apol. i. p. 678, 679. m Idem ibid. n Aur. Vict. p. 527. LIBAN. orat. iii. p. 212. P Vict. cpit. p. 544. Eutrop. p. 588. r Zos. l. ii. p. 692. l Aur. Vict. p. 527. l Zonar. p. 11.

4 C

&lt;sup>18</sup> Zonar. p. 13. w Julian. orat. i. p. 47. Zos. l. ii. p. 693. * Birag. p. 483, 485. y Zos. p. 693. * Aur. Vict. p. 527. * Julian. p. 59. b Eutrop. p. 588. C Chron. Alexand. p. 678. d Spann. l. ii. p. 91. Birag. p. 486. Chron. Alex. 676. f Philostorg. p. 22. Theoph. p. 37. h Zonar. p. 14. Philostorg. p. 55. k Zos. l. ii. p. 693. Eutrop. p. 588. Aur. Vict. p. 527. Ammian. p. 316, 319. Themist. orat. iii. p. 43. Julian. orat. iii. p. 106. 107. P. 106, 107.

Magnentius himself came to Rome, to raise the necessary supplies for carrying on the & marches against him.

Constantius

war against Constantius, who was making great preparations to attack him, and revenge the murder of his brother. The tyrant, during his stay at Rome, put many nically oppress persons of distinction to death, whom Marcellinus had spared, in order to seize their ed by Magnen- estates, and oppressed the rest in a most tyrannical manner, obliging them, under pain of death, to contribute half what they were worth towards the expences of the approaching war. Having by this means raised great sums, he assembled a mighty army, consisting of Romans, Germans, Gauls, Franks, Britons, Spaniards, &c. but at the same time dreading the uncertain issues of war, he dispatched embassadors to Constantius, with offers of an accommodation 1. That prince was then at Antioch, where, upon the first advice of his brother's death, he had caused himself to be acknow- b ledged emperor of the west, and, to support that title, had affembled all the troops dispersed in the several provinces of the east, and a more powerful seet, if the emperor Julian is to be credited, than that with which Xerxes formerly invaded Greece m. Theodoret writes, that Constantius, before he set out on his march to Europe, exhorted all his foldiers to receive the facrament of baptism, and dismissed such as refused to be baptized, declaring, that he could not prevail upon himself to expose to the dangers of a war persons not initiated in the holy mysteries n. This seems to us somewhat strange, since Constantius himself was not yet baptized. Be that as it will, Conflantius fet out from Antioch about the beginning of the autumn, and passing through Constantinople, arrived at Heraclea, where he was met by deputies from Magnentius c and Veteranio, who had agreed to support each other, in case Constantius would not hearken to an accommodation. The terms proposed by their deputies were, That they were ready to affift him with all their forces against the Persians, and other barbarians, and to acknowledge him as the first emperor, provided he suffered them to enjoy the same title. The deputies of Magnentius proposed in his name a match between him and Constantia, or rather Constantina, the sister of Constantius, and widow of Annibalianus, offering at the same time to Constantius the sister of Magnentius .. We are told, that while Constantius was deliberating with himself whether or no he should yield to these terms, and come to an agreement with the two pretended emperors, his father Constantine appeared to him in a dream the night following, and d presenting Constans to him, commanded him to revenge his death, and affured him of success in so commendable an undertaking. Hereupon Constantius, resolved to hearken to no terms, ordered the deputies, both of Magnentius and Veteranio, to be committed to custody; and pursuing his march with incredible expedition, arrived at Sardica, before Veteranio knew of his departure from Heraclea. However, he affembled in haste what troops he could, resolved to put the whole to the issue of a battle; which Constantius wisely declined, offering to conclude a separate treaty with Veteranio, that he might not have two enemies to contend with at once. Veteranio hearkened to the proposal, and being acknowledged emperor by Constantius, joined him with all his forces. The two princes, after the conjunction of their forces, e mounted the tribunal together to harangue their troops. Constantius, who spoke the first, reminded the soldiers, in a very elegant and artful speech, of their obligations to his father; of the bounties they had received at his hands; of the oaths of allegiance which they had taken to his fons,  $\mathcal{C}_{c}$ , and concluded with exhorting them not to fuffer the inhuman murder of his brother, the son of so great a prince, to pass unrevenged; and declaring, that he only demanded what was in justice due to him, it being agreeable to all the laws of equity, that to a brother should succeed a brother,

Confrantius rejects the terms of an accommodation proposed by Magnentius.

Veteranio deposed by the soldiery.

<sup>1</sup> Ammian. I. xvi. p. 64. Socrat. I. i. c. 32. p. 127. <sup>m</sup> Jul. orat. i. p. 77, 78. <sup>n</sup> Th I. iii. c. 1. p. 638. <sup>o</sup> Zonar. p. 14. Themist. orat. iii. iv. p. 42, 56. Jul. orat. ii. p. 55. orat. ii. p. 143. Zos. p. 694. Athan. solit. p. 844.

and not a stranger, much less an open enemy to the whole imperial family P. Tho this speech was levelled against Magnentius alone, yet the soldiers, applying it to Veteranio, cried out aloud, That they acknowledged no other emperor but Constan- f tius, pulled Veteranio down from the tribunal, and obliged him to quit the purple and diadem; who thereupon threw himself at Constantius's feet, and implored his mercy. The emperor received him with great kindness, embraced him, styled him father, entertained him at his table, and afterwards fent him to Prusia in Bitbynia, where he allowed him a maintenance suitable to his quality. This happened, according to some, at Sirmium, according to others, at Naissus, on the twenty-fifth of December 350. Veteranio spent the residue of his life, which was six years, in works

a of piety, in affilting daily at the holy mysteries, in relieving the distressed, &c. without ever intermeddling in affairs of state; nay, he is faid to have written frequently to Constantius, returning him thanks for having delivered him from the anxiety and cares attending the fovereignty, and by that means procured him the happiness he

THE following year Magnentius entered upon his first consulship, and took Gaïso for his collegue, rewarding him with that dignity for the murder of Constant; but as neither of them was acknowledged in the countries subject to Constantius, the present year is in all the fasti dated thus, the year after the consulate of Sergius and Nigrinianus r. Constantius, now matter of all Illyricum, which was held by Veteranio, and b of the army he commanded, confifting of an incredible number of foot, and twenty thousand horse, resolved to march against Magnentius, as soon as the season would allow him to take the field, and attack the tyrant in his own dominions. In the mean time, upon advice that the Persians were preparing to invade the eastern provinces, he married his sister Constantina, the widow of Annibalianus, to Gallus his cousin-Gallus marries german, the fon of his uncle Julius Constantius; created him Casar on the fifteenth of Constantina, March; allotted him for his share not only all the east, but Thrace too and Constant- Cariar. tinople; and fent him to Antioch to oppose the Persians, in case of an invasion'. Philostorgius writes, that, before the two princes parted, they took a solemn oath in the presence of Theophilus, and the other bishops then at court, to maintain an invioc lable fidelity to each other. The Persians contented themselves with only making some inroads into the Roman dominions; but were constantly repulsed by Gallus n. These inroads and incursions are the war mentioned by Philostorgius w and Theophanes x, and faid to have been finished with great glory by Gallus Cafar. About the fame time that Gallus was created Cafar by Constantius, Magnentius, who was then at Milan, gave the same title, according to Zonaras, to his brother Decentius, whom he dispatched into Gaul, to defend that country against the barbarians, who had invaded it; for Constantius had not only stirred up the Franks and Saxons to break into that province, by promising to relinquish to them all the places they should reduce, but had fent them large supplies of money and arms for that purpose y. The d barbarians, upon this encouragement, invaded Gaul with a mighty army, overthrew The Franks

Decentius in a pitched battle, committed every-where dreadful ravages, and reduced and Saxons h-the country to the deplorable condition in which Julian found it as he him full radae Gaul. the country to the deplorable condition in which Julian found it, as he himself relates at length, in the year 3562. In the mean time Magnentius, having affembled a numerous and formidable army, confisting chiefly of Gauls, Franks, and Saxons, left Italy, and croffing the Alps that part it from Noricum, advanced into the plains of Pannonia, where Constantius, whose main strength consisted in cavalry, was waiting for him. Magnentius, hearing that his competitor was encamped at a small distance, dispatched a messenger to him, inviting him into the extensive plains of Sciscia on the Save, to decide there which of them had the best title to the empire. Constantius e accepted the challenge with great joy, and ordered his troops to file off towards Scifcia; but as they marched in diforder, they fell into an ambuscade, and were put to flight with great flaughter . Magnentius, puffed up with this fuccess, quickened his march towards Sciscia, without hearkening to the terms proposed to him by Philip in Magnentius Constantius's name, who, dreading the evil consequences of a civil war, offered to rejects all yield to him the prefecture of Gaul; that is, Gaul, Spain, and Britain, and to acknow-terms of peace. ledge him emperor, upon condition-that he relinquished Italy. Philip being dismissed, Magnentius attempted to pass the Save in the neighbourhood of Sciscia; but the garifon fallying out, and Constantius, who was at a small distance, hastening with a strong detachment to support them, Magnentius's men were put to slight, and great numbers f of them cut in pieces. But the usurper, notwithstanding this defeat, sent a few days after one Titianus, a Roman senator, with the character of embassador, to Constantius, advising him, if he tendered his life, to relinquish the empire, and pass the residue of his days in retirement. To this haughty message, and the bitter invectives uttered by Titianus against the great Constantine and his children, which Zosimus himself styles outrageous insults b, Constantius answered with great temper, That he did not doubt and levelled with the ground.

&lt;sup>9</sup> Zonar. p. 14. Socrat. l. ii. c. 28. p. 120. Zos. p. 695. F Buch. cycl. 240. Socrat. l. ii. 29. p. 120. AMMIAN. l. xiv. p. 1, 3. Philostorg. iv. c. 1. p. 63. AMMIAN. l. xiv. p. 7, 8. W Philostorg. p. 60. Theoph. p. 3.4. Liban. orat. xii. p. 269. Jul. epift. ad Athen. p. 511, 512. Zos. p. 695. Jul. orat. c. 29. p. 120. 1. iv. c. 1. p. 63. y Liban. orat. xii. p. 269. 2 Jul. i & ii. p. 64, 181. 2 Zos. p. 698.

but heaven would espouse his cause, and revenge the blood of his brother on the author a While the two armies lay at a small distance from each other, Sylvanus, of whom hereafter, abandoning Magnentius, fled over to Constantius, with a considerable body of cavalry under his command. Magnentius, no-ways disheartened Sciscia taken at his defection, attacked Sciscia; and having taken it by assault, and levelled it by Magnentius, with the ground, he laid waste the whole country lying on the Save, and then sat down before Sirmium, the metropolis of Illyricum; but not being able to reduce it, he removed from thence, and laid close siege to Mursa; which obliged Constantius to quit his camp at Cibale, where his father had formerly defeated Licinius, and hasten to the relief of the place. Magnentius, informed of his approach, placed four thoufand Gauls in a neighbouring wood, with orders to fall upon the enemy's rear, when b they found both armies engaged. But Constantius, receiving timely notice of the ambuscade, seized all the avenues leading to the wood, by which means the party

The battle of Murfa.

Magnentius overthrown.

the empire.

was cut off d. After this, Constantius approached Mursa, and drew up his army in the adjoining plain along the Drave or Draw, on which Mursa stood, the river being on his right, and Magnentius's left. Both armies, thus ranged in battle-array, continued in the presence of each other till the close of the day, during which time Magnentius, though he professed the christian religion, is said to have sacrificed, by the advice of a magician, a virgin, and to have obliged his men to drink of her blood mixed with wine . At length the signal was given, and the two armies advanced against each other with a fury hardly to be expressed. Magnentius's centre, accord- c ing to the account of the emperor Julian f, was, at the first onset, put in disorder by Constantius's left wing and cavalry; which Magnentius, who had drawn them up unskilfully, as being altogether ignorant of the art of war, no sooner observed, than he abandoned them, and betook himself to a shameful flight. His men, especially the Gauls and barbarians, ashamed to follow the example of their leader, though broken and in the utmost confusion, often rallied in platoons, and, in spite of the utmost efforts of the victorious army, stood their ground till the night was far spent, having no resource but in victory, and being animated by their commanders, who were men of great valour and experience. Thus the emperor Julian. But Zosimus & and Zonaras h write, that Magnentius did not retire till his army was intirely routed; d and Eutropius, that he narrowly escaped falling into the enemy's hands. Zonaras adds, that, to avoid being taken, he turned his horse loose, adorned as he was with the imperial ornaments, that the enemy, imagining the rider to have been flain, might not pursue him. As for the battle, Zonaras tells us, that fortune favoured fometimes one fide, and sometimes the other k; and Zosimus, that the victory was long doubtful; and that Constantius, grieved to see so much blood shed for a few provinces, sent, even in the heat of the combat, deputies to Magnentius, with terms for an accommodation; but that the foldiers and officers of the tyrant, rejecting them with the utmost indignation, fought like men in despair, till the night was far fpent, when they were at length put to flight by Constantius's cavalry, armed capá-pé, and pursued to their camp, which was taken and pillaged 1. Some, savoured by the darkness of the night, made their escape; but the far greater part were either cut in pieces, or pushed into the river, and drowned m. Such was the issue of the memorable battle of Mursa, fought, according to the emperor Julian, about the end of the autumn; but, according to Idatius, on the twenty-eight of September. Zonaras writes, that Magnentius lost on this occasion twenty-four thousand men, and Constantius thirty thousand; which we can hardly believe. However that be, it is certain, that the empire was greatly weakened by this blow, and that the battle of Mursa is generally reckoned by the ancients one of the most dreadful calamities that Mursa fatal to ever happened to Rome o. Most of the officers on both sides were killed, and among f the rest Menelaus, who commanded the Armenian archers under Constantius, and had signalized himself during the engagement in a very eminent manner. He was slain by Romulus the enemy's general, who being mortally wounded by him, would not retire till he had killed the person who had given him the wound. We are told, that Menelaus was famous for his skill in archery; that he used to shoot three arrows at a time, which did execution in three different places; and that this greatly contri-

e Idem ibid. & Jul. orat. i. ii. p. 88, 181. d Jul. ibid. Ammian. l. xv. p. 44. Zonar. p. 15. os. l. ii. p. 65, 106. Zonar. p. 15. f Jul. orat. i. ii. p. 65, 106. Zos. l. ii. p. 700. Zonar. p. 15. l Idem ibid. k Idem ibid. l Zos. p. 699. m Jul. orat. i. ii. Zos. l. ii. p. 698. h Zonar. p. 15. ldem ibid. p. 67, 110. n Idem, orat. i. p. 69. * VICT. epit. HIER. chron. EUTROP. &c.

a buted to the victory P. Marcellinus, the chief author of this war, and all the evils attending it, fignalized his courage in the battle, but was never afterwards heard of, nor could his body be found; whence he was believed to have been drowned in the river q. Though we are not told in express terms by any writer, that Constantius was in person at the battle of Mursa, yet we can scarce believe what we read in Sulpicius Severus, viz. that not daring to appear in the field, he waited the iffue of the combat in a neighbouring church. As foon as it was day, (for the battle continued almost all night) the emperor, beholding from an adjoining eminence the plain An inflance of covered, and the river choaked up, with dead bodies, could not refrain from tears Constantius's at so melancholy a sight, and being more grieved at the slaughter of so many men, b than rejoiced at the victory, he ordered all the flain to be buried without distinction, and such as were wounded to be attended with care. At the same time he caused a general pardon to be proclaimed for all those who had borne arms against him; those only were excepted who had been concerned in the death of his brother Constants. Magnentius, abandoning Pannonia, fled with the remains of his shattered army into Magnentius Italy, there to recruit his broken forces, and try the fortune of another battle: Constantius did not pursue him, because the winter approached, says Julian ", and likewife, without all doubt, because his army was greatly fatigued, weakened, and consequently not in a condition to undertake any new expedition.

Constantius's

THE following year, Decentius Casar and Paulus were acknowledged confuls at c Rome, and Constantius the fifth time, with Gallus Casar, at Constantinople. Constantius passed the winter at Sirmium, as appears from the dates of several of his constitutions. By one dated the twenty-fixth of February of this year 352, and addressed to the prefect Rufinus, he granted to eunuchs the liberty of making testaments w; whence it is evident, that, till his time, they had been excluded from that privilege. Constantius was a great favourer of eunuchs, and intirely governed by them, and his other domestics . Magnentius having, after the battle of Mursa, fortified the passes of the Alps, and left a sufficient number of troops to defend them, remained the whole winter at Aquileia, passing his time, if Julian is to be credited y, in feasting and debaucheries, as if no danger threatened him. But Constantius, as soon as the season Constantius d was proper for action, affembled his troops; and having, without the loss of one paffer the Juliman, surprised and taken a castle on the Alps, in which Magnentius had left a strong garison, advanced in order to force the rest. His sudden approach struck the tyrant with fuch terror, that he immediately abandoned Aquileia, and ordered the troops that guarded the other passes on the Alps to follow him. By this means Constantius, entering Italy without opposition, made himself master of Aquileia, and the neighbouring country. From thence he advanced to Pavia, where Magnentius gained a confiderable advantage over him; which however did not prevent him from reducing the whole country bordering on the Po, Magnentius's men abandoning him in whole troops, and delivering up to the enemy the places they garifoned. This so dishearte ened the tyrant, that in the end he left Italy, and retired with all his forces into Magnentius Gaul L. Zosimus writes, that he abandoned Italy, because he found the city of Rome abandons Italy, greatly attached to Constantius 2; and Socrates, that before he withdrew into Gaul, he and retires came to Rome, and there put a multitude of persons of all ranks to death b. Constantius was master of Rome and Italy before the third of November; for we find a law bearing that date, addressed to the Roman people, wherein the emperor declares void some of the acts of Magnentius. But, not satisfied with driving him from Italy, he fome of the acts of Magnentius. But, not latisfied with uriving nith from trainy, no fent a powerful fleet to seize on Africa and Carthage; which immediately submitted, Africa, Sicily as did soon after Sicily and Spain d. At the same time several cities in Gaul revolted and Spain declare for Confrom the tyrant, and among the rest Treves, the inhabitants of which important stantius.

```
P Zos. l. ii. p. 700.

q Julian. orat. ii. p. 106.

r Sulp. Sever. l. ii. p. 158.

g Jul. orat. i. ii. p. 69, 107.

E Zos. l. ii. p. 700.

Jul. orat. i. p. 69.

" Jul. ibid. w Cod. Jult. l. vi. tit. 22. leg. 5. p. 544.

" Vide Baron. ann. 352.

" Jul. ibid. p. 132.

" Idem or. ii. p. 133, 134.

Ammian. l. xxxi. p. 457.

" Zos. l. ii. p. 700.

" Socrat. l. ii. c. 32. p. 127.

" Cod. Theodof. tit. 5. p. 408.

" Jul. orat. i. ii. p. 73, 74, 137.

" Ammian. l. xv. p. 45.
```

f place shutting their gates against Decentius Cafar, the tyrant's brother, declared for Constantius, and chose one Pemenes to govern them in his name. Magnentius, apprehending his affairs to be now in a desperate condition, dispatched to Constantius a fenator, and after him some bishops, to treat of a peace, offering to resign the fovereignty, upon condition that the emperor would grant him his life, and some honourable employment. But the emperor treated the senator as a spy, and dismissed

The Jewsrewolt; but are leverely punished.

Constantius marries Eusebia.

the bishops, without deigning to return them any answer . Hereupon Magnentius, a perceiving there was no room left for pardon, recruited his army in the best manner he could, and dispatched an affassin into the east to murder Gallus Casar, hoping that his death would oblige the emperor to withdraw his forces from Gaul, and march in person to the desence of the eastern provinces, threatened by the Persians. The affaffin had already gained fome of Gallus's guards; but the plot being discovered before it could be put in execution, they were all seized, and executed as traitors g. Some disturbances however happened this year in the east, raised, in all likelihood, and fomented by the emissaries of Magnentius; for in Palestine the Jews took arms, and cutting the throats of the foldiers in the night, fet up one Patricius for their prince; and over-running all Palestine, and the neighbouring places, committed b every-where dreadful disorders, exerting their cruelty chiefly upon the Samaritans. But Gallus, who was then at Antioch, marching against them upon the first news of their revolt, cut great numbers of them in pieces, without sparing either their women or children, laid waste their country, and burnt several of their cities; among the rest Tiberias, Diospolis, and Diocasarea. The last city he razed to the ground, and put all the Jews he found in it to the fword, because the revolt had begun there h. The Jews committed likewise some disorders in Gaul, where they stabbed a man of great distinction, who, after having governed Egypt, had been sent by Constantius into Gaul, and would, in all likelihood, had he not been thus suddenly taken off, prevailed upon the inhabitants to declare for Constantius. His tomb and epitaph were c discovered many ages after in the village of Peyruis on the Durance i. Towards the close of this, or the beginning of the following year 353. Constantius married Eusebia. a native of Thessalonica, the metropolis of Macedon, and the daughter of a consular, and of a lady who is greatly commended for her chastity, and the extraordinary care she took in educating her children after the death of her husband k. She had two brothers, Eusebius and Hypatius, whom we shall see consuls in 359. The emperor fent for her out of Macedon, married her with great solemnity, loved her to the last more than he had done any of his other wives, (for he had had several) and, to perpetuate the memory of her name, made a new diocese, comprehending Bitbynia, and fome other provinces, to which he gave the name of Pietas, or Piety, the import of d Her character. the Greek word Eusebia 1. She is greatly commended by Ammianus m, Zosimus n, and above all by Julian, who wrote her panegyric about the year 357°. for her beauty, virtue, obliging behaviour, skill in polite learning, prudence, &c. Julian was indebted to her both for his life, and the dignity of Cæsar P. She was no sooner invested with power, than she raised to the first employments all her relations, and the friends of her family 9. On the other hand, Victor the younger charges her with not imitating the example of the empress Plotina, who advited her husband Trajan to prefer the interest of his people to that of the exchequer r. Baronius fpeaks of her as a professed enemy to the catholic church, and a zealous favourer of the Arians, probably induced thereunto by what he had read in Athanasius and Theo- e doret, of whom the former fays in general terms, that the Arians were supported by the credit of women; and the latter, that the empress having sent money to Liberius bishop of Rome, to be distributed among the indigent christians, he could not be prevailed upon to accept it, faying, Let the empress employ as her almoners her Arian bishops, Auxentius and Epistetus. Suidas tells us, that Leontius bishop of Tripoli in Lydia, refusing to wait upon the empress, because she had received other bishops with great haughtiness, she sent for him; but he, instead of complying immediately with her message, acquainted her, that he thought himself obliged to avoid appearing before her, unless she promised to receive him with that respect which was due to his character; that is, to descend from her throne, as soon as he f appeared, to meet him near the door; to receive his blessing in an humble posture; and stand till he had taken his place, and given her leave to sit down. The empress, transported with rage, says the historian, at this answer, and swelled with pride, uttered, in the height of her fury, dreadful menaces against the bishop; and complaining to Constantius of his unreasonable pretensions, endeavoured to inspire him a with her own rage. But the emperor, giving no ear to her complaints, commended the bishop for thus maintaining his facred dignity and character, and defired the empress to retire to her apartment till her anger was allayed a. Both Suidas and Philostorgius w bestow mighty encomiums on Leontius, and paint him as a man of extraordinary merit; but to us he seems to have been, at least, destitute of prudence and difcretion. The prelates of the church ought not to flatter princes with a mean complaifance; but neither are they allowed, in admonishing them of their faults, to be wanting to that respect which is due to their high station. Eusebia proved barren; whence, either out of jealousy, or for some reasons of state unknown to us, she obliged her sister-in-law Helena, whom Julian had, by her interest, obtained in marb riage of Constantius, to take a potion, which made her miscarry as often as she proved with child x. Julian married her about the end of the year 355. and this potion was given her, as Ammianus assures us, at Rome in 357. Before that time she had been delivered in Gaul of a fon, the only child the could yet have; but he was difpatched by the midwife, not without private orders from Eusebia, uneasy at Julian's having any iffue. Eufebia was still living in the year 359, but dead fome time before the end of the year 360 y. We are told, that she died of a distemper occasioned by her barrenness; and that her death was hastened by a remedy with which an unskilful woman pretended to remove it z. Constantius was this year, as appears from the dates of his laws, on the twenty-fixth of February and fifth of March at Sirmium; on the c eighth of April at Sabaria in Pannonia; on the twenty-seventh of the same month, the thirteenth of May, and the twenty-fourth of June, at Sirmium; on the third of November at Milan; and on the first of December again at Sirmium a.

THE following year, when Constantius was conful the fixth time, and Gallus Casar the second, the war against Magnentius was carried on with more vigour than ever, and happily ended by a third battle, fays Julian b, fought by the emperor's generals in the Cottian Alps, that is, in the Higher Dauphine, near a castle called Mons Seleucus, or Mons Seleuci, which stood between Die and Gap, not far from the place where the present borough of Aspres stands. Magnentius's forces being in this battle likewise Magnentius routed and broken, the tyrant took shelter in Lions; but the few soldiers who attended defeased in

- d him, despairing now of any further success, resolved to purchase the emperor's favour Gaul. by delivering up to him his rival, the author of the present calamitous war; and accordingly furrounded the house where he lodged, to prevent his escape. It was probably on this occasion that Magnentius addressing himself to his men, they, instead of listening to him, cried out with one voice, Long live Constantius Augustus. This at least to us seems more probable than what we read in Socrates and Sozomen , viz. that Magnentius, endeavouring in a fet speech to encourage his men, whose spirits began to fink under their ill fortune, they, forced by a superior impulse, instead of Long live Magnentius Augustus, cried out with one voice, Long live Constantius Augustus. From this miracle, add these two authors, Magnentius concluded, that e his rival was favoured by heaven; and therefore, from that time forward, laying all
- other thoughts aside, studied only how to make his escape. The tyrant, well apprised of the intention of his men, and thereupon transported with rage and despair, first flew with his own hand his mother, his brother Defiderius, whom he had created  $C\alpha far$ , and fuch of his relations and friends as were with him; and then, fixing his fword in a wall, threw himself upon it, to avoid by that means a more shameful Helays violent death, which he well deserved, and had just reason to apprehend, if he fell alive bands on biminto the hands of Constantius f. Such was the deserved end of the tyrant and usurper self. Magnentius, the first, say some writers, who brought a scandal upon christianity, of which he made an outward prosession, by the murder of his lawful sovereign. But f we have shewn pretty plain in the reign of the emperor Philip, that he was the first
  - christian who imbrued his hands in the blood of his sovereign. All authors agree, that Magnentius died this year 353. about the middle of August, says Socrates, after he had held the supreme power three years, and near seven months, being, at the time of his death, about fifty years old. His head was, by the emperor's orders, cut off, and carried through most of the provinces of the empire s. His brother

w Philostorg, l. vii. c. 6. p. 504. Suid, ibid. * Ammian, l. xvi. p. 7 20 Chrys. in Philip. hom. 5. p. 144.

* Zonar, p. 20. Chrys. in Philip. hom. 5. p. 144.

* Burdigal, itin. p. 39. Itin. 7. D. 544. <sup>12</sup> Suid. λ. p. 20. ** Cod. Just. l. vi. it. 22. leg. 5. p. 544.

** Sorat. l. ii. c. 32. p. 127.

** Soz. l. iv. c. 7. p. 544.

** Vict. epit.

** Vict. epit. g VICT. epit. p. 544. AMMIAN. l. xxii. p. 227.

Decentius

fir strangles himself.

Constantius's Cyrists;

From whom hifiorians differ,

And give us feveral instances of his cruelty.

a noted informer, sent into Britain.

His cruelty.

Decentius Cafar, who was marching to his assistance, and had already reached Sens, a hearing of his death, and finding himself surrounded on all sides by the enemy's Decentius Cx- forces, chose rather to strangle himself, than to fall alive into the emperor's hands. His death happened on the eighteenth of August. On some of his medals he is styled Augustus; and both on his, and those of Magnentius, mention is made of a victory gained by the two Augusti, and by Casari. This victory is perhaps the advantage they gained over Constantius at Pavia, as we have related above; after which Magnentius probably gave Decentius the title of emperor. Zonaras writes, that Desiderius was not killed by Magnentius, but dangerously wounded; and that, upon clemency extol. his recovery, he yielded himself up to Constantius k. That author does not tell us led by the pane. what reception he met with; but Julian says in general terms, that Constantius, after b the victory, sheathed his sword, and spared those who were suspected of the greatest crimes, the tyrant's favourites and confidents, and fuch as taking upon them to difcharge his embassies, had abused their prince in a most outrageous manner. The writer means, no doubt, Titianus, of whose embassy to Constantius, and insolent behaviour, we have spoken above; as does likewise Themistius, where he tells us, that the emperor having got into his power the person, with whose outrages he had been most affected, he not only forgave him, but requited his invectives with innumerable favours, the sense of which kindness from the hands of a prince whom he had so insolently abused. broke his heart 1. Thus the panegyrists. But historians do not speak so favourably of Constantius; for Zosimus tells us, that, not able to bear his good fortune, he grew c proud, haughty, and imperious m; and Libanius, that those who had served under Magnentius, dreading the feverity of Constantius, and not daring to shew themselves, turned public robbers, and infested the highways, till they were again taken into the fervice by Julian. Ammianus affures us, that the emperor spared none who had, or were suspected to have, rendered the usurper any considerable service; and that many officers, both civil and military, were under that pretence loaded with chains, and dragged to the tribunal of the emperor, who sentenced them to death, or seized their estates, and confined them to desert islands, upon the deposition of their known enemies, or persons altogether unworthy of credit; nay, frequently upon bare suspicions, when no one appeared against them o. Many innocent persons, says the same d writer, were put to death, or banished; among the latter he names one Gerontius, who had been honoured by Magnentius with the title of comes or count, and was therefore first racked, by Constantius's order, in a most inhuman manner, and then sent into exile P. As the emperor gave ear to informations, informers multiplied without number; but the most mischievous of that infamous tribe was one Paulus, a Spaniard, who had the character of fecretary, and was nicknamed Catena; that is, Chain, being remarkable for making accusations arise from one another, and linking them together, Panlus Ca'ena, as it were, in a chain. He was fent into Britain, to bring from thence the tribunes and other officers, who had fided with Magnentius; that is, who had obeyed the usurper, when they were not in a condition to oppose him. He discharged this commission with such cruelty and injustice, that Martinus, a man of known integrity, and at that time vicar of the island, generously interposing in behalf of the innocent, declared, that, unless Paulus altered his measures, he would withdraw from his government, not being able to fee the innocent thus tyrannically oppressed, and confounded with the guilty. This Paulus highly resented, and even threatened to treat him as a traitor, and fend him loaded with chains to the emperor. Hereupon Martinus, drawing his sword, attempted to kill the informer; but he, dexterously avoiding the push, received only a slight wound; and the brave Martinus buried his sword in his own breast 4. Notwithstanding the odium which the death of so deserving a man cast upon the reign of Constantius, all those, whom Paulus brought to him, were f stripped of their estates, and either proscribed, banished, or put to death r. The name of Paulus is frequently mentioned by Ammianus Marcellinus, who relates several instances of his cruelty. Libanius likewise speaks of one Aristophanes, whom that inhuman minister caused to be beaten with balls of lead till he was ready to expire '. The emperor was this year, on the fixth of September, at Lions, as appears from a law bearing that date, which declares void all the public acts of the usurper, and promises indem-

* Vict. ibid. Zos. p. 701. Socrat. p. 128. Zonar. p. 16. 1 Berag. p. 48: 16. 1 Themist. orat. vi. p. 80. 205. l. ii. p. 701. 1 Lie 86. 4 Idem, p. 9, 10. Berg, p. 483-485. k Zon. · Ammian. l. xiv. p. 9. I Idem ibid. * LIBAN. Orat. ix. p. 214.

a nity and pardon to all concerned in his revolt, excepting those who were guilty of five crimes, which the laws punished with death. Gothofredus endeavours to explain this law. By another law of this year, the date of which is much disputed, he granted many valuable privileges and exemptions to the clergy, to their wives, children, and domestics ". From Lions the emperor removed to Arles, where he passed the winter, and folemnized with great pomp and rejoicings the end of the thirtieth year of his reign, reckoning from the time he had been created Cæsar; that is, from the eighth of November 323 w. Some modern writers pretend, that on occasion of this folemnity was erected at Arles the obelifk, which was not long fince discovered there *. But this is a mere conjecture; for we have no positive proof even of its b having been raised in honour of Constantius. Before the emperor lest Arles, he fummoned a council there, and on that occasion gave many instances of his irreconcileable hatred to the orthodox, whom he had already begun to perfecute, and to the Constantius bishops, who stood up in defence of the faith of the council of Nice, especially to the perfectives the great Athanasius, and the holy bishop Paulinus, who was driven from Treves, and orthodox. tent into exile . Gaul was this year miserably ravaged by the barbarians beyond the Rhine, and the dishanded troops of Magnentius. At Rome the populace rose on account of the scarcity of provisions, and committed great disorders. In Asia the Ijaurian robbers over ran Lycaonia and Pamphylia, and even laid siege to Seleucia, a The Isaurians great and populous city, and the capital of Isauria. Count Castricius defended the over-run several provinces. c place with three legions, fays Ammianus; which shews, that the legions were not at this time near so numerous as formerly, but much the same with our regiments. Gallus Cæfar no sooner received news of the siege of Seleucia, than he dispatched Nibridius, count of the east, to the relief of the place, who obliged the Isaurians to abandon the enterprize, and take refuge in their inaccessible mountains 4. At the fame time the Saracens committed dreadful ravages in Mejopotamia; and the Perfians, under the command of Nobadarus, attempted to surprise the city of Batne in the province of Anthemusia on the Euphrates, on occasion of a great fair which was annually held there for the vent of Indian and Chinese commodities. But the eastern provinces were not fo much haraffed by the barbarians as by Gallus himself, who The extravad commanded there with the title of Casar, and governed more like a tyrant and madman, than a prince. His unexpected advancement at the age of twenty-four or twentyfive, his great quality, (for he was the nephew of Constantine, the cousin and brotherin-law of Constantius) some slight advantages obtained over the Jews, Persians and Isaurians, and the flattering panegyrics of Libanius and others, pronounced before him, inspired him with such pride and arrogance, that he became altogether insupportable, and abandoned himself to every act of violence and oppression. He is even faid to have entertained thoughts of revolting from Constantius, and fetting up for himself b. He was naturally inclined to cruelty; and his wife Constantina, instead of foftening his favage temper, took pains to encourage him in his cruelty, and to e exasperate him against such as did not yield to her the most slavish submission, being puffed up beyond measure with the thought that she was the daughter and fifter of an emperor, the widow of a king, and the wife of Cæsar. Ammianus styles her the Megæra or fury of her sex, and adds, that her cruelty was equal to her ambition c. Gallus, being thus egged on by his natural cruelty, and the restless and turbulent spirit of his wife, broke out into all acts of violence imaginable. Some were murdered upon His cruelty and bare suspicions; others deprived of their estates, and banished. The prince enter-suspicions temtained an incredible number of informers and spies, who, infinuating themselves into per. all companies, related to Gallus and his wife, and exaggerated, what they had heard of them; and the persons thus accused were, without so much as being heard, hurf ried to execution, or privately dispatched. Gallus himself, in order to make discoveries, used to walk the streets in the night-time in disguise, and to mix with the populace in public-houses; but he did not long continue so shameful a practice, having been often known, by reason the streets of Antiocb, where he resided, were illuminated the whole night with a great number of lights. His suspicious and cruel temper being once discovered, such as had private enemies laid hold of the prince's foible to gratify their own hatred, nothing being more easy than to destroy the most

```
<sup>t</sup> Cod. Theodof. l. ix. tit. 38. leg. 2, p. 270.
                                                                     " Cod. Theod. tit. 6. p. 34, 35.
                                                        * P. PAGI, p. 353. Y ZONAR. p. 10.

b Idem, p. 31. Socrat. l. ii. c. 34. p. 128. Liban. vit. p. 34.
p. 8, 9. Nor. dec. c. 1. p. 78, 79.
p. 10-15. Idem ibid.
P. 10—1, ...

* AMMIAN. p. 1, 3.

VOL. VI. No. 4. inno
```

Thalasfus's

imprudent

behaviour.

innocent persons, and procure the confiscation of their estates; for under Gallus it 2 was one and the same thing to be accused or suspected, and condemned. By this means all the cities and provinces were filled with blood and slaughter, and no man, fays Ammianus, however free from guilt, was fure to live or enjoy his estate a whole day. Among the many innocent persons, whom Gallus unjustly deprived of their lives, liberty or estates, authors particularly mention one Clematius, a nobleman of Alexandria, who refusing to comply with the lustful desires of his wife's mother, she turning her love into hatred, applied to Constantina, and presenting her with a necklace of great value, obtained a warrant to Honoratus, count of the east, to put him to death, which he did accordingly d. Thalassus, at that time presect of the east, was greatly concerned at the conduct of Gallus; and, had he been a man of b prudence and discretion, might have easily corrected it, and prevented many disorders; but being himself of a haughty and imperious temper, instead of admonishing Gallus of his faults with the respect that was due to his rank, he opposed him with too much heat, and checked him with a great deal of roughness and ill-nature; and not fatisfied with that, he informed the emperor of all his actions, exaggerating every thing to a great degree, not privately, but in public, with a design Gallus should know he had done it; which, instead of reclaiming him, prompted him to still greater excesses, that he might not seem to yield to his inferior c.

Constantius marches against the Alemans.

THE following year, Constantius was consul the seventh time, and Gallus the third. The emperor, having passed the winter at Arles, went early in the spring to Valence, c with a defign to march against Gondomadus and Vadomorus, two brothers, and both kings of the Alemans, who had made frequent inroads into that part of Gaul, which lay next to their territories. The rendezvous of the troops defigned for this expedition was at Challon, on the Sone, where they began to mutiny for want of provisions, the heavy rains that had fallen preventing the arrival of the corn that was expected from Aquitaine. Constantius was inclined to send to the mutinous army Rufinus, prefect of Gaul, with a delign, as was supposed, to expose him to the sury of the incensed soldiery, he being very powerful, and by the mother's side uncle to Gallus, on whose ruin the emperor had already resolved. But Rusinus's friends at court prevailed upon the emperor to change his mind; and Eusebius, Constantius's d great chamberlain, gained over the most mutinous and refractory by distributing money among them underhand. The emperor staid some time at Valence, and there received certain advice of what Gallus had done f; that is, as we conjecture, of the murder of Domitian, of which we shall speak anon. The muting being appealed, and the expected convoys arriving foon after, the army marched chearfully towards Raurucum on the Rhine, a little above the present city of Basle, where the emperor attempted to lay a bridge over that river; but the Germans from the other side of the Rhine plied the workmen so warmly with incessant showers of darts and arrows, that the design was laid aside as altogether impracticable. This reduced the emperor to great streights; but while he was at a loss what course to take, a person well acquainted with the country, shewed him a place where the river was fordable. They e were however prevented from croffing it, by the unexpected arrival of deputies from the enemy's camp to fue for peace; which the emperor, by the advice of his council, Grants a peace and approbation of the army, readily granted, that he might be at leisure to consult to the Alemans. what measures might be taken with respect to his cousin Gallus Casar, of whose extravagant conduct new complaints were daily laid before him. With this view he left Gaul, as foon as the treaty was concluded, and repaired to Milang. He was on the twenty-second of June at Cesena in Romagna, and on the twenty-first of July at Ravenna; whence he went to Milan, the usual place of his residence, and there paffed the winter. We shall now give a succinct account of the affairs of the east, and the strange conduct of Gallus there, which gave just occasion to the complaints f of the people, and induced the emperor to refolve upon his ruin. What happened there the preceding year, we have related above. In the beginning of the present year, great diffurbances were raised at Antioch, on account of the scarcity of provifions. For Gallus commanding the magistrates to lower the prices, and they reprefenting, that this, instead of mitigating, would increase the evil, he caused some of them to be publicly executed, and others to be dragged to prison. But Honoratus,

Attempts in vain to lay a bridge over the Rhine.

Ammian. L xiv. p. 3. # Idem ibid. p. 23-25. f Idem, p. 23. b Cod. Theodof chren. p. 52.

a who was still count of the east, opposed this wild decree, and, in spite of Gailles, fet the prisoners at liberty'. Some time after, Gallus being to set out for Hieragolis, the people of Antioch befeeching him to give orders before his departure for the conveying of corn to their city from other countries, he answered, that if they were not supplied, it was the fault of Theophilus, governor of Syria. This answer the people Theophilus! remembered, and the price of provisions rising, sour or five mean persons threw governor of themselves upon Theophilus in the circus; and the mob immediately rising, they not doned by Gallus only murdered him, but, transported with rage, dragged his body about the streets; to the rage of a treatment which he no-ways deserved, having discharged his employment with the populated great mildness and integrity. They attempted to treat Eubulus, one of the chief b men in the city, and his son, in the same manner; but they sound means to escape the fury of the populace, who nevertheless burnt their houses k. The death of Theophilus, thus abandoned by Gallus to the rage of the multitude, and his protecting one Serenianus, who was univerfally hated by all good men, and had even aspired at the empire, greatly prejudiced Constantius against him. The emperor, however, wrote several obliging letters to him; but at the same time, under various pretences, drew the flower of his troops into the west. About this time Thalassus, prefect of the east, dying, Constantius named in his room one Domitian; and in giving him his instructions at his departure, told him, among other things, he had been informed that Gallus was desirous of coming to Italy, and paying him a visit; adding, If c you think it proper, you may conduct him to my presence; but let it be done with all the duty and respect owing to his birth and station. Domitian understood the emperor's meaning; but as he was the fon of a tradefman, he wanted politeness and address to execute his tacit orders, agreeable to the prince's intention. For on his arrival at Antioch, he went directly to the house where the presects lodged, without paying The improdum his respects to Casar, tho' he passed before his palace; and, under colour of being conduct of the indisposed, kept several days at home, informing himself of the conduct of Gallus, preprint and fending to the emperor an exaggerated account of all he heard. At length Gallus fending him word that he should be glad to see him, he went to court; and coming up to the prince, You must go, said he abruptly, to Italy; for such is the emperor's d will and pleasure; which, if you refuse to comply with, I shall stop the necessary appointments for the maintenance of your boushold. Having thus spoken, he withdrew without uttering a single word more, or waiting the prince's answer, who called him hack and stormed after for the him above could never prove him to appear back, and afterwards often fent for him; but could never prevail upon him to appear again at court. Gallus, highly provoked, and not without reason, at the conduct of the prefect, ordered him to be put under arrest. Montius, or, as others call him, Magnus, then questor, foreseeing the evil consequences that must inevitably attend the execution of this order, thought himself obliged to prevent them, and with great frankness told Gallus, that he ought to pull down the statues of Constantius before he thought of arresting or putting to death a prefect 1. Others say, that e addressing himself to Gallus, he spoke the following words with an air of contempt; The emperor has not thought fit to trust you with the power of creating a single magi-strate, and you talk of putting a present to death ! Gallus, offended at the liberty which the questor had taken, complained of it to his guards, who immediately feizing Montius, and fastening cords to his feet, dragged him to the house of Domitian, whom they threw down stairs, and dragged with Montius though the chief He and Monstreets of Antioch, casting, after many infults, both their bodies into the river ". This tius murdered, bold attempt, in which Constantina is said to have had a great share, was followed by many other cruelties and murders, committed in all the provinces of the east, And many at the instigation of Gallus, and his wife Constantina, whose thirst after blood was others. f as great as that of her husband. The reader will find in Ammianus Marcellinus o a detail of these cruel and inhuman executions. It being discovered, that a purple garment was making privately at Tyre, the two Apollinares, father and son, the former governor of Phanicia, and the latter fon-in-law to the prefect Domitian, were by Gallus's orders arrested, as if they aspired at the sovereignty, and, without any farther inquiry, condemned to banishment. But those who conducted them, at some distance from Antioch, pursuant to their private orders, broke their thighs, and then put them to death P. Ursicinus, general of the horse, was obliged to abandon the desence

1 Ammian. l. xiv. p. 25. Liban. vit.
1 Ammian. l. xiv. p. 16, 17. Zonar. p. 16.
2 Philostorg. l. iii. p. 61.
3 Philostorg. l. iii. p. 61.
3 Pocr. l. ii. c. 34.
4 Ammian. p. 17. Zon. p. 17.
4 Ammian. l. xiv. p. 18—23.
5 Pidem, p. 21, 22.

of Gillus and Urlicinus invited into Italy;

And likewife Conflanting.

Constantina dies on her journey.

of Nisibis, and hasten to Antioch, to preside at the inquiry which the emperor ordered a to be made into this affair; but the other judges being named, and well instructed before-hand by Gallus and Constantina, he could not proceed as he would have otherwise done; for Ammianus Marcellinus, who served under him, speaks every-where of him as a man of an unblemished character. As this commission gave him an opportunity of discovering many things till then not known, he acquainted the emperor with the state of affairs in the east, and pressed him to redress the many evils which afflicted those provinces 4. Besides the informations the emperor received of Gallus accused Gallus's male-administration and cruelties, he was told, that, not satisfied with the of aspiring at dignity of Casar, he aspired at the sovereignty, and harboured evil designs against the sovereignty. the emperor. This charge was believed by Socrates, and is not denied by Ammi-b anus'. But other writers will have these to have been mere inventions of Dynamus and Picentius, two mean and infamous informers. To them Zosimus adds the prefect Lampridius, a man of great ambition, and the eunuchs of the court, who had a great ascendant over the emperor, especially his chief chamberlain Eusebius. Constantius, giving credit to their accusations, whether true or false, resolved upon the ruin and death of Gallus, tho' his cousin-german and brother-in-law; but lest he should openly revolt, he carefully concealed his intention, and wrote a very friendly and obliging letter to Gallus, inviting him to Italy, that he might advise with him on certain affairs of great importance. At the same time he wrote to Ursicinus, at that time magister equitum, or general of the horse in the east, to come with all speed to Milan, in c order to deliberate about the most proper measures that might be taken with respect to the Persians, who were assembling their forces, as was pretended, with a design to invade Syria. This was likewise a pretext, which the emperor made use of to remove Ursicinus, left he should raise disturbances in the east during the absence of Gallus. For the eunuchs and courtiers, dreading the merit and abilities of that worthy man, and great warrior, filled the emperor's mind with fuch fears and jealousies, in order to compass his ruin. One Prosper, a comes or count, was sent to fucceed him, but only with the title and character of his deputy, to remove from him all apprehensions of his being suspected ". Ursicinus, on the receipt of the emperor's letter, fet out immediately, accompanied by Ammianus the historian, and d arrived at Milan much fooner than he was expected, to the great joy of the emperor, who now thought of nothing but getting Gallus into his power. In order to this, besides the above-mentioned letter to Gallus, he wrote several others to Constantina, expressing a great defire to see her, and inviting her to court, with the most tender infinuations imaginable; for he thought that the readiest way to draw Gallus thither. They were both too fensible of their evil conduct not to apprehend the worst from the emperor: however Constantina, who was well acquainted with her brother's temper, hoped by her artful infinuations to difarm his rage; and without any farther deliberation, fet out on her journey, leaving Gallus at Antioch: but she had scarce entered the province of Bithynia, when she was seized with a sever at a place called e Cani Gallicani, of which she died, leaving behind her one daughter, of whom no farther mention is made in history. Her body was carried to Rome, and buried on the Nomentan way, where stood the church of the martyr Agnes, which she had founded w. Her death threw Gallus into the utmost perplexity; as he had now lost his only advocate with the emperor, he despaired of being able to appeale him; and therefore began to think of affuming the title of Augustus, which he had done, had he met with the least encouragement; but most of his friends deserting him on account of his inconstant temper, and the rest hating him for his cruelty, and dreading the power of Constantius, he was obliged to lay aside all thoughts of openly revolting. In the mean time the emperor, with frequent letters, and repeated mel- f fages, importuned him to come with all speed to court. Among the rest, he sent one Scudilo to him, a crafty infinuating man, who by giving him all imaginable Gallus sets out assurances on the emperor's part, prevailed upon him to leave Antioch, and begin from Antioch. his journey to Italy. He stopt some time at Constantinople, where, like a man who apprehended no danger, he exhibited public shews, and diverted himself and the people with the circensian sports. This consident behaviour increased the emperor's fears and jealousies, who thereupon ordered all the garisons to be removed out of a the ciries and towns through which he was to pass, lest he should debauch them; and at the fame time dispatched several officers to him, who, under colour of attending him, were to keep a watchful eye over him; which they did with fuch strictness, Is carefully that, tho' the Thebean legions encamped in Thrace, upon his arrival at Adrianople, matched by the fent deputies to him, affuring him, that they were ready to stand by him, and affist officers of Confidence of the stantius. him to the utmost of their power, yet, during the twelve days he staid in that city, the deputies could never have an opportunity of speaking with him. In the mean time, he received fresh letters from the emperor, requiring him to make what haste he could, and public carriages were provided for his equipage; but the officers sent to him by Constantius advising him to leave his court at Adrianople, he set out with b a small retinue for Milan, where the emperor then was; but upon his arrival at Petavium in Noricum, he was there met by Barbatio, who entering the same evening the house where he lodged with a company of soldiers, stript him of all the ensigns Is arrefled at of his dignity, and dispatched one Apodemus with his purple shoes to the emperor, Petavium, and affuring him, in the mean time, by repeated oaths, that nothing else was intended enligns of his by the emperor against him; but nevertheless, putting him into a close litter, he dignity. hurried him away to Flanona, now Fianone, in Dalmatia, not far from Pola, where Crispus Casar, the son of Constantine, had been put to death twenty-eight years before. Thither the emperor fent his two most inveterate enemies, Eusebius the eunuch, and Pentades his fecretary, to examine him about the death of the prefect Domitian, and c others, and to hear what plea he could make x. Julian y and Libanius z write, that he was condemned without so much as being heard; and truly a prince, who hears only with the ears of his favourites, may be faid not to hear at all. Gallus owned most of the crimes that were laid to his charge; but alledged, that they proceeded chiefly from the instigation and evil counsels of his wife Constantina. The emperor, provoked at this plea, which reflected in fo high a measure on his fifter, and confequently on himfelf, and egged on by the enemies of Gallus, perfuading him, that his fatety depended upon the destruction of so dangerous a rival, resolved to put an end to his own fears, and the other's life, and accordingly figned a warrant for And put to his execution a. Some authors write, that the emperor, foon after, changing his mind, death d countermanded the execution; but that Eusebius, and the other enemies of Gallus, pretended that it came too late b. Be that as it will, it is certain that Gallus was beheaded, and atoned with his own blood for the blood of many innocent persons, which he had shed. Thus fell Gallus Cæsar, in the twenty-ninth year of his age, after having reigned near four years. His death was chiefly owing to his own tyrannical conduct, but in great measure to the malice of Eusebius, Scudilo, and Barbario, his avowed enemics, who charged him with more crimes than he had really committed c. All those who had been any-ways concerned with him in the death of the prefect Domitian, the questor Montius, and his other crimes, felt the weight of the * Ammian l. xxi. p. 178. & l. xiv. p. 27—29.

* Socrat. l. ii. c. 34. p. 128. * Ammjan. l. xiv. 26. w Ammian. l. xiv. p. 27. Philostorg. p. 62. * Ammian. l. xiv. p. 1. * Zos. L ii. p. 701. Ammian, l. xiv. p. 26.

** Julian. ad Athen. p. 500.

** P. 266. * Ammian. l. xiv. p. 29, & 31.

** Idem, p. 30.

** Ammian. l. xiv. p. 31.

L. xiv. p. 18. l. xv. p. 34.

** Julian. ad Athen. p. 501.

** Ammian. l. xv. p. 32, 33.

** VOL. VI. Nº 4.

4 F whom

emperor's displeasure. Multitudes of people of all ranks were brought out of the e east in chains to Aquileia, where they were tried by Eusebius, and one Arbora, men destitute of all mercy and compassion, and on that very account charged by Constantius with that commission. These merciles judges, without making any distinction between the guilty and innocent, sentenced some to the rack, and after that to banishment, others to servile offices in the army, and great numbers to death, sparing none but such as could redeem themselves with large sums. Luscus, the first magistrate of Antioch, was burnt alive. But Gorgonius, Gallus's great chamberlain, the most guilty of all, escaped by bribing his judges, and the eunuchs of the court. Julian, the brother of Gallus, tho' no-ways concerned in his crimes, was kept seven months under close confinement, and would have been put to death, had f he not been faved by the favour of the empress Eusebiad. By the death of Gallus, the Roman empire became united under one prince, after it had continued divided for the space of near seventy years, that is, from the year 285. or 286. when Dioclesian took. Maximian for his collegue; for ever since that time there had been either feveral emperors, or one Cx/ar. Ammianus observes, that Constantius, swelled with pride upon seeing himself sole master of the empire, assumed the title of eternal, styled himself lord of the universe, and gave ear to the flatteries of his ambitious and infinuating courtiers. As for Ursicinus, general of the horse in the east, of whom we have spoken above, he was accused of having put Gallus upon all the a wrong measures he had taken, in order to render him obnoxious to the people, and make the empire fall to his own children. But Ammianus, his faithful friend, and inseparable companion, assures us, that his only crime was the umbrage which the eunuchs, and other courtiers, took at his great power, and extraordinary abilities. However, after the death of Gallus, it was refolved in a council, which was held privately in the emperor's apartment, that the following night he should be conveyed out of the city, and executed without any farther trial. But the emperor changing his mind, Ursicinus escaped, and Constantius was soon after obliged to have recourse to the valour and address of so brave and experienced a commander, as we shall fee anon d.

THE next confuls were Arbetio and Lollianus. During their administration, the emperor enacted two remarkable laws; the one addressed to Volusianus, vicar of Rome, and dated the thirtieth of April, forbidding the marriage of a brother or fifter-in-cruelly tortured upon bare fuspicions.

defeated.

Sylvanus falfly accused of aspiring at the empire.

law, and declaring the children born of such a marriage illegitimate: the other dated the twenty-third of September, and addressed to one Severus, ordaining bishops to be judged by bishops, and not by the civil magistrates c. In the beginning of this year Constantius summoned a council of bishops at Milan, and banished Liberius, bishop of Rome, into Thrace, because he would not consent to the sentence passed by the council against the great Athanasius f. Before the emperor left Milan, Afri-Africanus and canus, governor of Pannonia Secunda, was brought prisoner to that city, with several c feveral others, others, who, after being tortured in a most cruel manner, were thrown into prison, because they had at an entertainment expressed themselves with great freedom on matters of state; whence it was concluded, that they were carrying on some plot, and that Africanus aspired at the sovereignty. A tribune, by name Marinus, who was present at this entertainment, chose rather to lay violent hands on himself at Aquileia, than to endure the torture 8. Ammianus, who relates this, does not tell us in this place what became of Africanus, and the other prisoners; but seems elsewhere to infinuate, that they were all put to death. The emperor foon after left Milan to march against the Germans, who made frequent inroads into the empire towards the Brigantine lake, now the lake of Constance. The emperor himself remained in the plains of the d country now belonging to the Grisons in the neighbourhood of the present city of Coira, and detached Arbetio with the flower of the army against the enemy. Arbetio fell into an ambuscade, and lost great numbers of his men; but this loss was soon retrieved by the valour of Arintheus, who became famous under the emperor Valens, The Germans and of two other officers, who falling upon the Germans, without waiting the orders of their general, put them to flight, and obliged them to abandon the Roman terri-The emperor, satisfied with this, returned to Milan, and there took up his winter-quarters. From Milan, he wrote a long letter to the fenate of Constantinople in commendation of the philosopher Themistius, whom he had created senator of that city. Themistius answered this letter soon after by a panegyric on Constantius, wherein e he endeavours to prove, that he was the greatest philosopher in the whole empire k. The emperor's letter, and the oration of Themislius, are still extant. The tranquillity which Constantius enjoyed at this time was soon interrupted by the apprehension of a pretended conspiracy, which produced a true one. Sylvanus, the son of Bonitus, a leading man among the Franks, commanded in Gaul, and had performed there great exploits against the barbarians. He owed his preferment to the artifices of rival courtiers, especially of Arbetio, the consul of this year, who, jealous of his extraordinary merit, had proposed him to the emperor as the best qualified person in the empire for driving the barbarians out of Gaul, and restoring that province, distressed by their frequent inroads, to its former condition. And truly Sylvanus well deferved f the character which Arbetio gave him; but the conful's main delign in commending him, and extolling his military talents, was to remove him from the emperor's presence, in order to compass his ruin, which he did in the following manner: One Dynames, keeper of the emperor's mules, leaving Gaul, begged of Sylvanus letters of recommendation to his friends at court; which being granted, the traitor erased all but the subscription; and having inserted directions to the friends of Sylvanus for the carrying on of a conspiracy, delivered the letters to the present Lampridius, who

d Idem, I. xiv. p. 26, 33, 34.

p. 37.

f Hilar. or. in Conft.

k Ammian. l. xv. p. 34—36.
l. xv. p. 36, 37.

k Themist. or. Conf. p. 18. & or. ii. p. 24—40. Cod. Theodof l. iii, tit. 12. leg. 2. p. 296. & l. xvi. tit. 2. leg. 12.

Ammian. l. xv. p. 34—36.

h Idem, l. xvi. p. 67.

i Idem, 1 Idem ibid.

a who being privy, as was supposed, to this wicked contrivance, shewed them to the emperor. Hereupon orders were immediately issued for the apprehending of fuch persons as were named in the letters. As there were at that time great numbers of Franks of distinction at court, they all interposed in favour of their countryman; among the rest, Malaricus, their chief, well apprised that the whole was a mere calumny, offered to go into Gaul, and bring the supposed criminal before the emperor; adding, that if persons, whom Sylvanus mistrusted, should be sent for that purpose, he might be prompted by sear to attempt what he was falsy accused of having already attempted. But Constantius, without hearkening to the just and reasonable proposal of Malaricus, was persuaded by Arbetio to name Apodemus, b a declared enemy to all men of probity, to inquire into this affair. He immediately fet out for Gaul; but instead of presenting to Sylvanus as soon as he arived, pursuant to his instructions, the emperor's letter commanding him to repair forthwith to court, he seized on his estate, and caused his friends in Gaul to be apprehended, and put to the torture. This coming to the ears of Sylvanus, who was then at Cologn, and too well acquainted with the emperor's suspicious temper, and the ascendant his enemies at court had over him, to suffer himself to be arrested, he resolved at first to take shelter among the Franks, his countrymen; but being persuaded by his friends not to trust a people so remarkable for their fickleness and treachery, he determined, for his own prefervation, to do what otherwise he would never have thought of; c and accordingly assumed the purple, and caused himself to be proclaimed emperor Is forced to by the troops under his command 1. Some of his coins have reached us, on which assume it in his he bears the title of Augustus, and the prænomen of Flavius, common, fince Constan-own defence. tine's time, to such as had none of their own, especially foreigners ". While these things passed in Gaul, Dynames, to strengthen his accusation against Sylvanus, forged a letter in the name of that general, and of Malaricus, to a tribune, desiring him to get every thing ready, without explaining himself further. The tribune, being at a loss about the meaning of it, sent it to Malaricus, who knowing it to be forged, complained aloud of the treachery, and, with the other Franks, demanded vengeance on those who were by such malicious contrivances endeavouring to prejudice the d emperor against those of their nation. This occasioned an inquiry, and unravelled the whole scene of iniquity. The emperor, well apprised of the innocence of Syl- He is declared vanus, and the malice of his accusers, deposed the presect Lampridius, and even innocent. ordered him, with several other persons of distinction, to be put to the torture, on which some of them owned the whole to be a mere calumny. They were however in the end all absolved, so great was the power of their faction at court; and Dynames was even preferred to the government of Hetruria. As Sylvanus was declared innocent, they were all greatly surprised by the arrival of a messenger from Gaul, dispatched to acquaint the emperor, that Sylvanus had actually assumed the title of emperor. The messenger arrived at Milan about the close of the evening, and the e emperor, thunder-struck at the unexpected tidings, summoned a council the same night, the refult of which was, that Ursicinus, of whom we have spoken above, should be sent forthwith into Gaul, the courtiers, who dreaded Ursicinus no less than Ussicinus sense Sylvanus, hoping by that means to get rid of one whom they hated, and perhaps against him. of both. Ursicinus made what haste he could to reach Cologn, that Sylvanus, suppoling his revolt not to be yet known at court, might the more readily comply with the emperor's injunctions. For Ursicinus was charged with letters from the emperor to Sylvanus, confirming him in his post of general, injoining him to repair to court, and in the mean time deliver up the command of the army to Ursicinus, But Ursicinus, notwithstanding the haste he made, came too late, the news of Sylvaf nus's revolt being known at court having got to Cologn before him; which obliged him to change his measures, and pretend, that he had deserted Constantius, and was come to share with Sylvanus his success or misfortunes, waiting in the mean time a favourable opportunity of dispatching him. This was a dangerous expedient, and altogether unworthy of that greatness of soul which Ammianus so much admires in his hero. Sylvanus received him with extraordinary demonstrations of kindness, freely opened all his thoughts to him, advised with him about the measures that were to be taken for their mutual fecurity, and reposed in him an intire confidence; which gave Ursicinus an opportunity of gaining over some of his guards with large promises, who early one morning forcing unexpectedly the gates of the palace, and entering a fword in hand, met Sylvanus, while he was attempting to make his escape, and take Sylvanus sain fanctuary in a neighbouring church, and cut him in pieces, after he had enjoyed the by the treachery title of emperor only twenty-eight days. Thus fell one of the bravest and most deferving officers of the empire, whom the crafty malice of jealous courtiers, and the credulity of the emperor, had obliged in his own defence to assume the purple. He had ferved under Magnentius; but deferting him with a numerous body of cavalry under his command before the battle of Mursa, had ever after distinguished himself in the wars of Constantius, who, in regard of his eminent services, had raised him to the post of magister peditum, or general of the foot. But no merit or services, however great, are a sufficient antidote against the possonous tongues of artful and b infinuating courtiers, when they have once gained the confidence, and engroffed the favour, of a jealous, weak, and timorous prince. Constantius expressed an extraordinary joy at the news of Sylvanus's death; but tho' he owned, that he had nothing more to fear, yet he proceeded with great rigour against such as had been any-ways concerned in his revolt. Pemenes, who had defended Treves against Decentius, and many other persons of distinction, were condemned and executed. The courtiers were for putting all the friends of Sylvanus to death, without distinction; but were therein opposed by the emperor, alledging, that friendship ought not to be punished as a crime; nay, he ordered the effects and estate of the unhappy Sylvanus to be referved for his fon, who was then very young, and had been left by his father as c an hostage at court, perceiving, when it was too late, that the malice of his enemies, and not his ambition, had prompted, and in a manner forced him to revolt.

The empire in great danger.

THE barbarians, whom the brave Sylvanus had driven out of Gaul, that is, the Franks, Alemans, and Saxons, no fooner heard the news of his death, than they broke into that province with greater fury than ever, and took and pillaged above forty cities, and among the rest Cologn, which they levelled with the ground P. At the same time the Quadi and Sarmatians, entering Pannonia, laid all waste before them 9; and the Persians over-ran without opposition Mesopotamia and Armenia, Prosper, who had succeeded Ursicinus, and the prefect Mausonianus, being more intent upon pillaging than defending the countries committed to their care r. Conflantius, apprifed d of the danger that threatened the empire, but not thinking it adviseable to stir out of Italy himself, after various consultations, resolved in the end to raise his cousin Julian, the brother of Gallus, to the dignity of Casar. This design was opposed by all the fycophants at court, who, extolling the emperor's prudence, conduct and courage, told him, that he was capable of fulfaining the burden of the empire alone, infinuating at the fame time, that it was no-ways fafe for him to raise Julian to that high station. But the empress Eusebia, interposing in favour of Julian, prevailed upon her husband to pursue his intentions. The emperor therefore, being returned to Milan before the thirty-first of Ostober from a short progress, ordered Julian to quit his philosophical cloak, and gave him an apartment in the palace; and on the e fixth of November having affembled the army, he ascended the tribunal, and placing Julian on his right hand, he acquainted the foldiers with his defign of dignifying his cousin with the title and authority of  $C\alpha far$ , and asked their consent. The army with one voice approved of his resolution; whereupon the emperor cloathed him with a purple robe, faluted him with the title of Cafar, and of most loving brother; appointed him governor of Gaul, and, in committing that province to his care, told him, that he placed him over a stout army, not doubting but upon occasion he would fignalize at their head his own courage, and be witness of theirs. This ceremony and speech were followed by loud acclamations, and great encomiums bestowed by the whole army on the emperor and the new Gafar. A few days after \$\xi\$ Constantius gave him his fifter Helena in marriage; and this new favour and mark of distinction was likewise owing to Eusebia, who, besides many other things of great value, presented the young prince on this occasion with a large and well-chosen library'. But at the same time his whole house was changed, the emperor pretending thereby to do him honour; but his real design was to remove all in whom he had any confidence: guards were placed at his apartment, not so much to defend as to watch him; all his letters were opened before they came to his hands, infomuch that Iulian created Cælar.

He marries Helena, the emperor's sister.

AMMIAN. l. xv. p. 38-42. Zonar. p. 17. Ammian p. 44. & Julian or. i. & ii. p. 89, 183, 184.
 Ammian ibid. p. 57.
 Ammian p. 47—49. P Ammian. 1. xv. p. 47. 9 Zos. p. 702. r Ammian. ib Zos. 1. iii. p. 709. Julian. ad Athen, p. 504. Socr. 1. ii. c. 34.

a he thought it adviseable to desire his best friends to sorbear visiting him, lest they His tower should expose themselves or him to danger t. Before he set out for Gaul, the emperor gives the emgave him inftructions under his own hand, regulating his whole conduct, even the peror fealoufy. expences of his table, as if he had been a child, fays Ammianus a, fent to school. At the fame time he greatly restrained and curtailed his authority, injoining the generals who ferved under him, to watch his actions with no less care than those of the enemy, and investing one Marcellus with the command of the army who was fent to succeed Ursicinus, tho' the latter was ordered to continue in Gaul, till the war was ended with the title of general, but without any command, the emperor being still in some degree prejudiced against him w. Julian was, above all, strictly injoined not to give any b largesses to the army; and authors observe, that Constantius himself, contrary to cultom, gave none upon his promotion *. Several writers tell us, that the emperor fent Julian into Gaul on purpose to destroy him y. But what others write seems to us more probable, viz. that he treated him thus on account of his youth, and want of experience, and to deprive him of all means of revolting, and fetting up for himfelf. Julian fet out from Milan on the first of December, the emperor himself accom- He is sens panying him as far as Pavia, from whence he pursued his journey to the Alps, attended into Gaul. only by three hundred and fixty foldiers. On his arrival at Turin, he was first acquainted with the loss of Cologn, which had been kept concealed from the emperor. He arrived at Vienne before the end of the year, and was received by the people e of that city, and the neighbourhood, with extraordinary marks of joy 1. While he was entering the city, an old woman, who had been long blind, cried out, if Ammianus is to be credited, that he would one day restore the temples of the gods a.

THE following year, 356. Constantius took upon him his eighth consulship, and chose Julian for his collegue. The latter passed the winter at Vienne, deliberating about the operations of the enfuing campaign. During his stay there, he received intelligence, that the city of Autun was belieged by the barbarians, but defended Autun belieged with great bravery by the veterans, who had repulsed the enemy when they were riun; who raise already scaling the walls, which had encouraged the other troops to make a vigor-the siege. ous fally. However Julian, having affembled what forces he could, marched to d the relief of the place; but finding the siege raised, from Autum he went in pursuit of the barbarians to Auxerre, croffing with no small danger thick woods, and from Auxerre to Troies. On his march he found himself surrounded on all sides by the enemy, who moved about the country in great bodies; but he put them to flight with a handful of men, killed great numbers of them, and took some prisoners. From Troies he hastened to Rheims, where the main body of the army, commanded by Marcellus, waited his arrival. Leaving Rheims, he took his rout towards Decempagi, now Dieuze, on the Seille in Lorrain, with a delign to fall upon the Germans, who were busied in ravaging that country. But the enemy, taking advantage of a dark and wet night, attacked his rear unexpectedly, and would have cut off two e legions, had not the rest of the army, alarmed at the sudden noise, turned back to their assistance. The Germans themselves were defeated a few days after, tho' not with great loss, in the neighbourhood of Brocromagus, now Brumt, in Alface, between Strasbourg and Haguenaub. This small victory opened him a way to Cologn, which Cologn rehe found abandoned by the enemy, and entered, after it had been ten months in taken by Julian, their hands. The barbarians had neglected to fortify it; but Julian ordered the and rebuilt. ancient fortifications to be with all speed repaired, and the houses rebuilt. Libanius adds, that he re-established another great city in that country, perhaps Tongres or Treves, which had been often attacked by the barbarians, and was reduced to a miserable condition. During his stay at Cologn, one of the kings of the Franks, f dreading his arms, sent deputies to him to sue for a peace; but Julian granted him only a short truce. Having repaired the city and fortifications of Cologn, he removed to Basle to support the emperor, who was making war upon the Germans in Rhatia, and to prevent their escaping from him into Gaul. He continued there till winter, when he retired to the city of Sens, and there took up his quarters. This campaign proved, according to the account which Ammianus gives us of it, very glorious for Julian. But the many advantages which he is faid to have gained, must either Authors difagree about bis first campaign.

* Julian. ad Athen. p. 509. " Ammian. 1. xx. p. 168. w Idem, l. xvi. p. 60. F EUNAP. c. 5. p. 76. Socrat. l. iii. c. 1. Sozom. l. v. c. 2. p. 596. * Ammian. n. or. xii. p. 270. * Ammian. l. xv. p. 50. b Idem, p. 59. Liban. or. ix. p. 237. Ammian. p. 40. Julian. p. 512. d Ammian. p. 61, 72. l. xxii. p. 206. l. xv. p. 50. LIBAN. or. xii. p. 270. AMMIAN. l. xv. & or. xii. p. 271. AMMIAN. p. 40. JULIAN. p. 512. Vol. VI. Nº 4. have

have been less considerable than they are represented by that writer, or counter- a balanced by equal losses, since Julian himself writes, that his first campaign proved unfuccessful, and that during this summer he performed nothing worthy of notice d. Besides, we shall see him the next winter besieged in Sens by the barbarians, and obliged to fly before them, which he himself owns; but Ammianus has passed it over in silence. Libanius says, that the greatest victory he gained this year was over himself, in restraining his courage, and bearing with patience the evil offices of those about him, who, instead of seconding his great designs, made it their whole business to thwart them, in compliance with their private instructions, and to humour the jealous temper of Constantius f. The same writer adds, speaking, we suppose, like an orator, that Julian was allowed not to act, but only to shew himself 8. As b for Constantius, it appears from the dates of several laws, that he did not stir from Milan till after the eleventh of April', and then took a progress into Illyricum. He was returned to Milan on the twenty-ninth of October, as appears from a law bearing that date, which confirms to the clergy of the city of Rome all their privileges 1. He left Milan soon after to make war upon the Germans, who had for their kings the two brothers Gondomadus and Vadomarus. He passed the Rhine, entered their dominions on the fide of Rhætia, and meeting with no opposition, laid waste their country far and wide. This obliged them to fue for peace, which the emperor readily granted, and then returned to Milan, the usual place of his residence. While the emperor was abroad on this expedition, the empress Eusebia visited the city of Rome, and c was received there by the fenate, who went out to meet her, with extraordinary pomp and magnificence. During her stay in that metropolis, she gave great largesses to the people, and upon her departure made rich presents to the heads of the tribes m. The same year Constantius, exerting his zeal for the doctrine of Arius, drove Athanasius from his see at Alexandria; and put Georgius, an Arian, in his room. He likewise banished the orthodox bishops, Hilarius of Poitiers, and Rhodanes of Toulouse. But as for Athanasius, he persecuted him even beyond the limits of the empire, writing letters against him to the princes of Auximus in Ethiopia, where he imagined the perfecuted bishop had taken shelter. The same year the emperor enacted two remarkable laws, the one, dated the twentieth of February, condemning those to death d who should for the future facrifice, or pay any manner of worship to idols n; the other, dated the eighth of March, declaring the effects of condemned persons, except in cases of magic or treason, to belong to their children and relations within the third degree . But this law the emperor himself revoked two years after P.

pain of death, the worshipping of idols.

Conftantius

ooliges the Germans to fue for peace.

THE next confuls were, Constantius the ninth time, and Julian the second. The latter had taken up his winter-quarters at Sens, as we have related above, and had kept with him but a small number of troops, the rest being dispersed about the country for the convenience of their quarters in a province so often ravaged and Julian besieged laid waste. The barbarians, apprised of this, came in great numbers, and laid siege to the place, hoping to take Julian himself prisoner. But he, with the few forces e he had, made fo vigorous a defence, that the enemy, despairing of ever being able to reduce the town, drew off their forces, and retired, after they had lain a whole month before it. All this while Marcellus, the commander in chief, never stirred to rescue Julian, or relieve the place, tho' he was quartered in the neighbourhood q. Ammianus tells us, that for this neglect he was by the emperor deprived of his command, and confined to Sardica, the place of his nativity r. But Julian fays only, that Constantius began to suspect him, and look upon him as unequal to the command with which he was invested. Libanius writes, that he dreaded the barbarians, oppressed the subjects of the empire, treated Julian himself with great haughtiness, thwarted all his designs, and upon his removal repaired to Milan to discredit him f with the emperor. But Julian, well acquainted with the malice of the one, and the jealoufy and credulity of the other, fent the eunuch Eutherius, his great chamberlain, to answer such things as might be alledged against him; which he did so effectually, that the emperor remained fully satisfied with the conduct of Julian'. Ammian bestows great encomiums upon this eunuch. Not long after Constantius declared

Julian

d Julian. 2d Athen. p. 510.

** Idem ibid.

** Liban. or. ix. p. 237.

** Idem, or. xii. p. 271.

** Cod. Theodof. l. xvi. tit. 2. leg. 13. p. 39.

1 Ammian. l. xvi. p. 77, &c.

1 Julian. or. iii. p. 240.

** Mulian. or. iii. p. 240, m Julian. or. iii. p. 240, 241.

** Cod. Theodof. l. xvi. tit. 2. leg. 13. p. 39.

1 Liban. or. iii. p. 240, 241.

** Cod. Theodof. l. xvi. tit. 2. leg. 2. p. 329.

** Ibid. leg. 4. p. 331.

** Ammian. p. 61.

** Ammian. p. 64, 66.

** Julian. p. 511.

** Ammian. p. 64, 65.

•

a Julian commander in chief of all the forces in Gaul, being persuaded to it either by He is created the empress, or the eunuch Eutherius, or probably by both ". At the same time he commander in chief of all the appointed Severus, an officer of great experience, and of a quite different temper forces in Gaui. from Marcellus, to command under him. Upon his arrival in Gaul, Julian, who -received him with great joy, raised new troops, and supplied them with arms, which he luckily found in an old arfenal ". This year Constantius sentenced to death a great many persons convicted of having consulted the magicians, and published a law forbidding, on pain of death, any one to have recourse to the augurs, aruspices, or any other diviners whatsoever *. By another law, dated the fourth of December, he condemned all magicians to be devoured by the wild beafts. This year the emperor b took a progress to Rome, which he had never yet seen, with the empress Eusebia, Constantius and his fifter Helena, the wife of Julian. He entered the metropolis of the empire takes a progress on the twenty-eighth of April, in a gilt chariot, adorned with an incredible number to Rome. of precious stones, being attended by the senate, and the whole nobility, who came out in their robes, and richest apparel, to meet him. The reader will find a very particular account of his triumphal entry in Ammianus, who describes it at length 1. He was wonderfully taken with the grandeur and magnificence of the place, with Is taken with the multitude of the people, with the loftiness of the buildings; but chiefly admired the grandeur the temple of Jupiter Tarpeius, the public baths, the amphitheatre, Pompey's theatre, cence of the and the square of Trajan. He is said to have complained of same, far exceeding city. c truth in other things, but coming short of it in what related to Rome. He harangued both the people and the senate, the former from the rostra, and the latter in the senate-house. He is thought to have celebrated in that great metropolis the thirty-fifth year of his reign, reckoning from 323. when he was created Cæsar; and it was perhaps on occasion of that solemnity that he ordered public sports to be exhibited, not only in Rome, but in all the other cities of Italy . During his stay at Rome, he was presented with golden crowns of an extraordinary weight by several cities, and among the rest by the city of Constantinople, which had appointed Themistius to present it; but he falling fick, the discourse, which he had composed for the occasion, was sent to the emperor, who was so well pleased with it, that he ordered d a statue to be erected in honour of the orator; which prompted him to write a second, discourse or panegyric b. The emperor, desiring to add something of his own to the ornaments of the city, gave orders for the conveying of an obelisk thither, which had been removed by his father Constantine from Heliopolis in Egypt with that defign, and had been carried as far as Alexandria. But that prince dying in the mean time, it still remained there. Constantius therefore ordered it to be brought to Rome, where it was with much difficulty set up in the Circus Maximus about the beginning of the following year c. This is the obelisk which was erected in Rome in the pontificate of Sixtus V d. Constantius would not enter the place, where the senate assembled, till the ancient altar of victory was removed from thence, lest he should defile his e eyes, says St. Ambrose e, with the unhallowed sight of an altar consecrated to the infernal spirits. He was greatly taken with the pleasures and diversions of Rome, fays Ammianus f; but was foon obliged to abandon them, upon intelligence that the Suevians had entered Rhatia, the Quadians, Valeria, and the Sarmatians Lower Pannonia, and Upper Masia. He therefore left Rome on the twenty-ninth of May, after he had been there about a month, and was at Milan, if no mistake has crept into He returns to the code, on the third of June, and likewise on the thirteenth of July 8; whence Milan. we may conclude, that the barbarians withdrew of their own accord. While Constantius was at Milan, he received letters from Mausonianus, prefect of the east, informing him, that Saper, king of Persia, was engaged on the most remote f frontiers of his kingdom in a mighty war with the Chionitæ, and other people; that he had suffered great losses, and consequently would, in all likelihood, hearken to a treaty of peace and amity with the Romans, which Mausonianus had taken care to propose to Tamsapor, the Persian general on the frontiers of Mesopotamia, who had written on that subject to his master. These negotiations came to nothing, as will appear anon. However the emperor sent for Ursicinus, who was still in Gaal, Ursicinus rein order to advise with him about the most proper method of dealing with the Per- called from Gaul, and sont into the east.

* Cod. Theodof. ix. tit. 16. * AMMIAN. ibid. l. iv. p. 119.

Themist. or. iv. p. 53-57.

D. 106.

Ammian. p. 72. Ambros. rel. fym.

sians.

fians. In the mean time Constantius, leaving Milan about the middle of July, went a to Trent, and from thence into Illyricum, visited the frontiers of the empire towards the Danube, and conferred with the chiefs of the Quadians, and other neighbouring nations, who affured him of their friendship. Ursicinus found him at Sirmium, and was, after feveral conferences, fent by him into the east, with the character of general, and the same power with which he had been invested before his difgrace. The emperor was at Milan on the fourth and fixth of December; but returned to Sirmium before the eighteenth of December, and, according to Ammianus, passed the winter

Barbatio fent

The Germans attack Lions by Julian.

deavours to thwart his de-flight by the barbarians.

To return to Gaul: The emperor, refolved by all means to put an end to the dreadful devaltations committed there chiefly by the Alemans, wrote to Julian, to b march with all his forces against them, and at the same time sent Barbatio, who had been created general of the foot in the room of Sylvanus, out of Italy, with a body of twenty-five or thirty thousand men, in order to surprise and inclose the enemy between the two armies. Barbatio was generally esteemed a good officer 1; but all his bravery consisted, according to Ammianus m, only in words. He had betrayed Gallus, under whom he served, and studied how to check the progress of Julian; who no sooner heard of his arrival at Basle, than he took the field, having with him only thirteen thousand men: but the Leti, a German nation, passing between the two armies, advanced as far as Lions, with a defign to furprise and pillage that wealthy city. As are cut in pieces they met with a warmer reception from the inhabitants than they expected, they gave c over all thoughts of taking the place, and contented themselves with ravaging the country all round it. Julian, upon the first notice of what had happened, detached strong parties to guard the passes, through which he knew they must return; by this means they were all cut off, except those who marched near the camp of Barbatio, who was so far from cutting off their retreat, that he complained by a letter to Constantius of some officers for attempting it, who thereupon ordered them to be cashiered. One of these was Valentinian, afterwards emperor n. The other barbarians either fortified themselves in the countries which they had seized, stopping up all the avenues with huge trees, or took shelter in the islands formed by the Rhine. Julian resolved, first to attack the latter, and with this view fent to demand some boats of Barbatio, who, d instead of complying with his just request, immediately burnt all his boats, as he did on another occasion the provisions which had been sent for both armies, after he had plentifully supplied his own. It is uncertain whether he behaved thus out of pique to Julian, or in compliance with private instructions from the emperor to thwart all his enterprizes o. Be that as it will, Julian, not in the least ruffled or difheartened at the unaccountable conduct of Barbatio, perfuaded fome of the most resolute among his men to wade over to one of the islands, where they killed all the, Germans who had taken shelter there; and seizing their boats, pursued the saughter in several other islands, till the enemy, abandoning them all, retired with their wives, and what booty they could carry, to their respective countries P. After this, e Julian rebuilds he undertook the rebuilding of the Tres-taberna, a fort near Strasbourgh in Alface, now known by the name of Saverne, which the enemy had demolished. As it was so fituated as to curb the nations beyond the Rbine, and prevent their irruptions into Gaul, Julian not only repaired the ancient fortifications, but added new works to them, stored the place with provisions for a whole year, and left a numerous garison in it, to keep the neighbouring country in awe q. While Julian was busied in this work, Barbatio was employed in laying a bridge of boats over the Rhine: but the enemy, apprifed of this, threw a great number of huge trees into the river, which, being carried by the stream against the boats, sunk several of them, and parted the Barbatio put to rest. Barbatio, seeing his work ruined, thought it adviseable to retire; but the f enemy falling unexpectedly upon him in his retreat, cut great numbers of his men in pieces, took most of his baggage, laid waste the neighbouring country, and returned in triumph, loaded with booty. Hereupon Barbatio, putting his troops into winterquarters, as if the campaign had been over, tho' it was then but harvest-time, returned to court, to make war there upon Julian with his calumnies and ill offices r. The barbarians, elated with this fuccess, assembled in great numbers, under the banners

> h Ammian, ibid. p. 72. Julian, ad Athen. p. 513. 1 Cod. Theod. p. 57. k Ammian, l. xvii. p. 103. 1 Liban, orat, xii. p. 272. m Ammian, p. 73. 1 Idem ibid. 1 Idem, p. 73, 74. P Idem ibid. 8 Liban, orat, xii. p. 273. 1 Julian, p. 512. Liban, p. 273. 1 Ammian. P. 75.

a of Chnodomarius, a prince of great renown among them, and of fix other kings, and encamped in the neighbourhood of Strasbourgh, Being informed there by a deferter, that Julian had only thirteen thousand men with him, Chnodomarius sent him a haughty and menacing message, commanding him to abandon forthwith the country which the Germans had conquered by their courage and valours. Libanius adds, that the messenger produced to him the letters of Constantius, promising to relinquish to them what countries or cities they should seize in Gaul. By such promises Constantius is supposed to have stirred them up against the tyrant Magnentius. But Julian, paying no regard to them, detained the messenger as a spy, and pursued the works he had begun at Saverne, till he received intelligence, that the enemy were b advanced within twenty miles of his camp. Hereupon, leaving Saverne, he marched Julian marches directly against them. When he was about half way, he halted, with a design to against them. rest his men, and put off the battle to the next day; but both officers and soldiers demanding to be led without delay against the enemy, he pursued his march, and found the Germans, who had been informed of his approach, ready to receive him. They were thirty-five thousand strong, headed by seven kings, ten princes, and many other lords of great distinction. Both armies engaged with great resolution The bastle of Argentorstun and intrepidity, and the victory continued long doubtful; the Roman cavalry even or Strasbourg. gave way, nor could Julian, with all his oratory, prevail upon them to rally, and return to the charge: but the vigorous relistance made by the foot, so disheartened c the enemy, that, after having attempted several times in vain to break them, they began to abate much of their impetuolity; which the Romans perceiving, they made a last effort; and charging the barbarians, already quite spent, put them to slight, The Germans and purfued them with great flaughter. Great numbers of them threw themselves intirely defeat. into the Rhine, which was in their rear, and were drowned. Chnodomarius himself ed. was taken in a wood, and presented to Julian in the sight of the whole army, who thereupon saluted him with the title of Augustus; which he rejected with great indignation, telling his soldiers, That the glory of the action was chiefly owing to Constantius, under whose auspices they had fought ". He lost in the battle only four tribunes, and two hundred and forty-three private men. Of the Germans six, or, d as others will have it, eight thouland men were killed in the field; but a great number of dead bodies were seen floating on the river w. Zosimus writes, that sixty thousand of the enemy were killed on the spot, and an equal number drowned; but he must have been missed by bad memoirs, which makes us question the truth of what he adds, viz. that, after the battle, Juian obliged fix hundred of his horsemen, who had fled, to appear before the whole army in the apparel of women x. battle of Strasbourgh is famous in history. Julian himself styles it a successful action, which restored Gaul to its ancient liberty. Mamertinus says, that, by this single battle, the war was ended, and Germany ruined z. It is at least certain, that the barbarians were intirely driven out of Gaul. This memorable battle was fought in e the plains near Strasbourgh, when the corn was ripe, and the moon in the last quarter. Julian ascribed the whole glory of it to Constantius, and immediately sent his royal captive Chnodomarius to him, whom he had treated with great respect, looking upon him as an instance of the instability of all human grandeur. Constantius sent him to Rome, where he died soon after a natural death b. This victory was greatly lessened by the sycophants at court, and all the other actions of Julian turned into ridicule; which however was less prejudicial to him, than if they had extolled and magnified his exploits to a suspicious, weak and timorous prince. Constantius was Constantius not ashamed to ascribe the whole glory of this great action to himself, as appears from assume to himself as edict published about this time, wherein he speaks of himself as if he had sought glory of this f at the head of his army, without so much as mentioning the name of Julian. Au- action. relius Villor, who wrote about the latter end of his reign, speaks in the same strain d; and Themistius, in magnifying his victories over the Germans, and the valour with which he delivered Gaul from their intoads, and restrained them within their ancient limits, quotes the letters which the emperor himself had sent to the senate of Constantino: le e. Julian's first care, after the battle, was to cause all the dead to be buried, without diffinction of friend or enemy. Having performed this pious office, he p. 237. Julian. ad Athen. p. 512.

* Idem, l. xvi. p. 75, 76.

p. 160.

* Panegyr. xi. p. 223.

* Ammian. l. xvi. p. 78.

l. xvi. p. 86.

* Aur. Vict. p. 528.

* Themist. or. p.

Vol. VI.

N° 4. AMMIAN. p. 84, 85. LIBAN. orat. x. * Zos. l. iii. p. 704. 7 Am B. b Idem, l. xvii. p. 103. * THEMIST. Or. p. 57. returned returned to Saverne, to finish the works begun there, and then advanced with all a his army to Mayence, where he built a bridge over the river, and entered Germany, having with much-ado prevailed upon his army to follow him. The Germans, alarmed at the boldness of the young general, sent deputies to sue for peace, and almost at the same time others to threaten him and his army with immediate destruction, if they did not forthwith retire; but the brave commander, despiting their menaces, continued ravaging their country till after the equinox; and then the fnow preventing him from advancing farther, he began to repair the fort of Trajan, which ome take to be the castle of Cromburgh, about three or sour leagues from Francfort. This undertaking alarmed the enemy to fuch a degree, that they fent new deputies o sue for peace, which they could not obtain upon any terms; but a truce was granted b them for ten months, upon their promising to store with provisions the fort which was building in their country, in order to curb and awe them f. After this, he returned to Gaul with a great number of captives; but being informed on his march, that fome Franks, having ravaged the country about Rheims during his absence, had thut themselves up in two castles on the Meuse, he marched against them, and obliged them to furrender, after they had defended themselves with great bravery for the space of fifty-four days; that is, the greatest part of December, and all February. The prisoners were all fent to the emperor, who incorporated them among his troops. Julian, having thus ended this long and glorious campaign, put his troops into winter-quarters, and took up his own in Paris, which we find about this time first c mentioned in history. It was then only a castle situated on the island formed by the Seyne, which is now but a very small part of that great metropolis 8. This year the some laws of emperor enacted a law, dated the third of July, commanding the effects of those to be confiscated, who should renounce the Christian to embrace the Jewish religion; by another he obliges all senators to reside at Rome, or in the neighbourhood, many of them having retired from that metropolis, and fettled in Achaia, Macedon, and the other provinces of Illyricum, on account of the great expences attending that dignity at Rome. By a third, addressed to Felix bishop of Rome, he exempts all merchandizing ecclefiaftics, their wives, children, and domestics, from every imposition, whether ordinary or extraordinary, supposing the gains they made to be applied by d them to the relief of the poor.

Some Franks to furrender, and fends them to the emperor.

Julian obliges

Constantius.

THE next confuls were Cerealis, uncle to Gallus Cafar on the mother's side, and Datianus, who, though of a mean descent, bore the title of comes in 349. and was afterwards raised to the rank of a patrician h. We have observed above, that the Persian general Tamsapor had been persuaded by Musonianus, presect of the east, to write to his master about renewing the ancient treaties with the Romans; but as Sapor had not only concluded a peace with the Chionita, but entered into an alliance with them before Tamsapor's letters came to his hands, in answer to the proposals trans-Embassies from mitted to him by that general, he wrote a haughty letter to Constantius, which he Sapor to Confent by one Narses, with presents for the emperor. The contents of the letter were, e from Constantius to Sapor. beyond the river Strymon in Macedon; but lest his demands should seem unreasonable, he would be satisfied with Armenia and Mesopotamia, which, with the utmost injustice, had been taken from his grandfather Narses. He added, that, unless they were restored, he was determined to do himself justice, and try whether he could recover them by force of arms. In this letter Safor styled himself king of kings, brother of the fun and moon, &c. Narses, who was charged to deliver it to the emperor, arrived at Antioch about the end of the preceding year, where Themistius faw him; and, after having rested some time there, pursued his journey to Constantino; le, which he entered with great pomp on the twenty-third of February of the prefent year 358. From 1 Constantinople he repaired to Sirmium, where the emperor then was, and, in a public audience, presented to him Sapor's letter, wrapped up in a piece of white silk. Conflantius, without entering into any negotiation with him, wrote back to Sapor, that as he had maintained the Roman dominions in their full extent while he was possessed only of the east, he could not fuffer them to be curtailed now that he was master of the whole empire. He added, that he was ready and defirous to conclude a peace with the Persian monarch, provided it were upon honourable terms. With this letter

f Ammian, p. 88. Liban, orat, xii, p. 277. c. 8. p. 113. Cod. Theod, tit. 4. p. 8. ■ AMMIAN. p. 240. in fol. h PHILOSTORG. I. VIII.

a he dismissed Narses; but a few days after sent a solemn embassy into Persia, with letters and presents for the king, being desirous at least to put off the war till he had fecured the northern provinces against the incursions of the barbarians, that he might employ all the forces of the empire against so powerful and formidable an enemy. The Roman embastadors found Sapor at Ctefiphon; but not being able to prevail upon him to abate any thing of his demands, they returned about the twenty-fourth of August. Count Lucillianus, and Procopius, who usurped the sovereignty in the reign of Valens, were fent to the Persian court soon after, to amuse that warlike prince with new proposals; but he, instead of hearkening to them, kept the embassadors some time under close confinement, threatening to treat them as spies, but in the end b dismissed them unhurt i. While the emperor resided at Sirmium, the Quadi and Sar- The Quadi and matians broke into Pannonia and Masia; and the Juthunges, a German nation, into Sarmatians The latter were defeated and driven back by Barbatio; but the emperor Constantius. marched in person against the former soon after the vernal equinox; and having crossed the Danube on a bridge of boats, laid waste the territories of the Sarmatians, who thereupon came in great numbers, with the Quadi, pretending to fue for peace; but their true design was to surprise the Romans, who, suspecting it, fell upon them sword in hand, and cut them all to a man in pieces. This obliged the rest to sue for peace in good earnest; which they obtained, upon their fetting at liberty the prisoners they had taken, and delivering up hostages k. The emperor then marched against c the Limigantes, that is, those slaves, who, in 334. had driven the Sarmatians out of their country, and seized it for themselves, as we have related elsewhere. They too had made frequent inroads into the Roman territories; but, upon the approach of the army, came in great numbers to meet the emperor, pretending to submit; but prepared to fall upon him unexpectedly, if an opportunity offered. The emperor, observing their surly looks, and distrusting them, ascended his tribunal, attended by the chief officers of the army, and his guards, in order to acquaint them with his pleasure. While he was speaking to them, his troops, pursuant to their private orders, insensibly surrounded them on all sides. When the emperor had done, the Limigantes, diffatisfied with the conditions he had offered them, laid their hands on d their swords; which being observed by the Romans, who watched all their motions, they fell upon them at once, and began the slaughter. The Limigantes, finding it impossible to make their escape, made with great fury towards the tribunal; but were repulfed by the guards forming themfelves into the shape of a wedge, and all to a man cut in pieces, not one of them deigning to ask quarter. After this, the Romans entering their country on one fide, and the Sarmatians, their ancient masters, with the Taifales, on the other, and destroying all with fire and sword, they were obliged in the end to comply with the only condition the emperor offered them, The Limiganwhich was, to quit their country, and remove to a more distant place, that they tes driven out might not be tempted to infest the empire anew. Constantius restored the country to country restored e the Sarmatians, its ancient owners, twenty-four years after they had been driven to the Sarmafrom it; appointed one of their nation, by name Zizais, to rule over them with the tians. title of king, and declared them a free people 1. For these exploits the army faluted Constantius with the surname of Sarmaticus, who soon after, that is, about the end of Ollober, returned to Sirmium, which he entered in triumph, and put his troops into winter-quarters m.

In the mean time Julian, having spent the first months of this year at Paris, in regulating the taxes paid by the province, so as to find the necessary supplies, without laying any new burdens on the people, already quite drained and exhausted, took the field as soon as the season was fit for action, with a design to conquer the Franks, f before the truce which he had granted to the Alemans was expired. The Franks were at this time divided into several tribes or clans; but the most powerful among them was that of the Salii, who being driven by the Saxons, according to Zosimus a, from the lands they possessed in Germany, had settled in Batavia; that is, in the islands formed by the several branches of the Rhine, and in Toxandria, which country began, according to the best modern geographers, about a league from Mastricht, and extended about twenty-five leagues along the Meuse, where stand at present the cities of Boisseduc, Breda, and Antwerp o. Against these Franks Julian marched first,

<sup>1</sup> Ammian l. xvi. p. 68. & l. xvii. p. 94. Themist. orat. iv. p. 57. Zonar- p. 17. Petr. legat. p. 28. Ammian l. xvii. p. 103, 104.

1 Idem, p. 106—112.

1 Idem ibid.

2 Zos. l. iii. p. 707. k Ammian.l. xvii. p. 103, 104. Notit. Gall. p. 558.

Julian over-

He obliges the Alemans to fue for peace.

Nicomedia over: urned by an earthquake.

gurs, &c.

and was already arrived at Tongres, when he met their deputies on their journey to a Paris, where they supposed they should find him. They had been sent to beg he would suffer them to remain as friends in the country which they possessed. Julian, upon some difficulties which he started, sent them back for more particular instructions. They imagined, that he designed to wait their return at Tongres; but they were no fooner gone, than he followed them; and having entered their country, and obliged them to submit, he allotted them lands in Gaul, and incorporated great numbers of them into his cavalry P. He then marched against the Chamavi, another And the Chanation of Franks, who had fettled in Gaul; and having overcome them in battle, and taken many of them prisoners, he obliged them to retire beyond the Rhine; whence they fent deputies to fue for peace, which he granted them upon fuch terms b as he thought fit to prescribe. Having thus reduced the Salii and Chamavi, he rebuilt three forts on the Meule, which the barbarians had demolished; but wanting provifions in a country so often ravaged by the enemy, to store them, to supply his army, and to maintain the many captives, whom he had obliged the enemy to fet at liberty, he ordered six, or eight hundred vessels as we read in Zosimus, to be built in Britain, for the conveying of corn from thence into Gaul. Julian continued in the country of the Chamavi, till the truce he had granted to the Alemans was expired; and then laying a bridge of boats over the Rbine, he entered their country, putting all to fire and sword. Hereupon two of their kings, Suomarius and Hortarius, came in person to him, and obtained a peace, upon their promising to set at liberty all the captives c they had taken, to supply a certain quantity of corn when required, and to furnish wood, iron and carriages for the repairing of the cities which they had ruined. The prisoners, whom he rescued out of the hands of the barbarians during this campaign, amounted to twenty thousand, and upwards 9. The campaign being thus ended, he put his troops into winter-quarters; but we are not told where he took up his own. This year, on the twenty-fourth of August, about six in the morning, a most dreadful earthquake was felt in Asia, Pontus, and Macedon, which greatly damaged an hundred and fifty cities, and utterly ruined that of Nicomedia, where it was fo fudden and violent, that all the houses were overturned at once, and the inhabitants to a man buried in the ruins. This calamity is described at length by Ammianus, d by Gregory of Nyssa', Ephrem of Edessa, who wrote an elegy on that subject, and Libanius, who bemoaned in an oration the destruction of a city, which he styles the fifth of the empire for greatness, and inferior to none in beauty ". When Julian passed that way in 362. he could not refrain his tears, in comparing the condition it was in then, with that in which he had formerly feen it w. Aristenetus, who resided there in quality of vicar; Cecrops bishop of the place, and another bishop, perished with the rest; but not in the church, nor with many bishops, as the pagans gave out, to infult the christians x. The church, which was a magnificent structure, and had been built by Constantine about the year 330. underwent the same fate with the A law against other edifices y. This year the emperor enacted a law, dated the thirteenth of July, e magicians, au- and addressed to Taurus prefect of Italy, declaring all magicians, astrologers, augurs, aruspices, and pretenders to the art of divination, enemies to mankind; and such of them as shall be found in the prince's court, guilty of treason, as giving the world occasion to believe, that he suffers or countenances them. By the same law he orders the latter, whether discovered in his own palace, or in that of Julian, to be put to the rack, if they deny the charge, and specifies the various kinds of tortures which he will have them to undergo, without any regard to their rank or quality 2. Authors think, that, by this law, the emperor meant to drive these impostors from the court of Julian, who was suspected of privately favouring them, and giving credit to their predictions 1. THE following year 359. the two brothers Eusebius and Hypatius were confuls, being raised to that dignity by the empress Eusebia their sister b. Ammianus begins his history of this year with the exploits of Julian in Gaul, where he was busied in erecting magazines, in visiting the cities which had suffered most by the inroads of the barbarians, and giving proper orders for the rebuilding of their walls, and repair-

P AMMIAN. p. 99. JULIAN. ad Athen. p. 514.
9 JUL. ibid. Ammian. p. 102. Liban. orat. xii, p. 280. Zos. p. 70.

F AMMIAN. p. 97.
GREG. Nyss. p. 75.
Marc. chron. p. 66.
Liban. orat. viii. p. 203.
W AMMIAN. l. xxii. p. 219.
Soz. l. iv. c. 16. p. 559.
P Philost. l. viii. p. 204.
Cod. Theod. l. ix. tit. 16. leg. 6. p. 124, 125.
Vide Baron. ad ann. 358. Ammian. l. xviii. p. 113.

a ing their fortifications. After this, he affembled all his forces at Mentz, and passing the Rhine on a bridge of boats, entered Germany, and advanced as far as a place or country called Pallas, where the territories of the Alemans and Burgundians ended, pillaging and laying waste their country far and wide. There he was met by two Julian obliges kings, Macrianus and Hariobaudus, who were brothers, come in person to submit to several Ger-Julian, who granted them a peace, as he did soon after to three other kings, Urias, man nations to Ursicinus, and Vestralpus, upon their promising to deliver up all the prisoners they had taken, and to furnish a certain quantity of corn when required. After this, Julian lest Germany, and, as the season was already far advanced, he put his troops into winter quarters, and retired himself to Paris. To return to Constantius: That prince, b having intercepted a letter to Barbatio from his wife Affyria, giving him some hopes of being raised one day to the sovereignty, ordered them both to be executed. Many Barbatio and innocent persons were involved in their ruin, and put to death, as privy to their several others designs. A tribune, by name Valentine, was several times racked in a most inhuman executed. manner; but, as he constantly denied the charge, the emperor, convinced in the end of his innocence, to make him fome amends, gave him the command of the troops in Illyricum d. Before the end of the winter, the emperor received intelligence, that The treachery the Limigantes, quitting the country in which they had been placed by him the pre- of the Limiceding year, were advancing towards the borders of the empire. Hereupon, leav-gantes. ing Sirmium early in the spring, he hastened to the banks of the Danube, to prevent c them from croffing that river, and invading Pannonia. Upon his arrival he fent deputies to them, desiring to know what had induced them to abandon the country which had been allotted to them. The Limigantes answered in appearance with the greatest submission imaginable, that they were willing to live as true subjects of the empire, in what part soever the emperor should think fit to place them; but that the country which they had abandoned, was altogether uninhabitable, as they were ready to demonstrate, if the emperor would give them leave to cross the river, and lay their complaints before him. Constantius, pleased with their proposal, granted them their request, and received them in the neighbourhood of Acumincum, which most geographers take to be the present town of Kamanez on the Danube, near Peterwaradin, in d the territory of Sirmium. But while he was afcending his tribunal, they unexpectedly fell upon his guards fword in hand, and would have killed the emperor himself, had he not with much-ado saved himself by flight. Several of his guards were slain; but in the mean time the rest of the troops, taking the alarm, flew to arms, surrounded They are all sus the Limigantes, and cut them all to a man in pieces. Constantius then returned to off. Sirmium, where he was on the twenty-second of May, this year the eve of Pentecost; but foon after fet out from thence for Constantinople, for he was on the eighteenth of June at Singidunum in Masia f. He passed the remaining part of this year at Constantinople, ready to march, upon the first advice, against the Persians. During his stay in that metropolis, he distinguished it with a presect or governor; an honour till this e time peculiar to Rome. The first prefect of Constantinople was one Honoratus, invested with that dignity on the eleventh of December, according to Idatius, or of September, as we read in the chronicle of Alexandria. He had before been prefect of Gaul s. This year the emperor dispatched into the east the secretary Paulus Catena, famous for his cruelty, to profecute several persons accused of having consulted the oracle of an idol named Besa in the city of Abydus, on the most distant borders of Egypt. Modestus, then count of the east, and afterwards prefect, was appointed to judge the criminals, Hermogenes, who had succeeded Musonianus in the office of presect, being thought unfit for that commission, on account of his mild and compassionate temper. Medestus established his tribunal at Scythopolis in Palestine, whither persons of both sexes, and f of every rank and condition, were daily dragged in crowds from all parts, and either confined to dungeons, or torn to pieces in a most cruel and barbarous manner on the Several persons rack, or publicly executed. Ammianus gives us a most frightful idea of this, as we may condemned for call it, inquisition; but at the same time owns, that several persons were cleared, and consulting an others punished with far less severity than was expected. Parnasus, who had been governor of Egypt, was condemned to lose his head, for having consulted an astrologer, by means of one Aristophanes; but Modestus softened the rigour of that sentence, and only sent him into banishment; as he did Simplicius the son of Philippus, who had * Ammian. l. xviii. p. 113. & l. xx. p. 154.

* Idem, l. xviii. p. 118.

* Idem ibid.

* Cod. heod. chronol. p. 59.

* Idem ibid.

* Socrat. l. ii. c. 37. p. 139.

* Soz. l. iv. c. 23.

Chron. Alex. Theod. chronol. p. 59. 5 Idem ibid. p. 682. 6 Ammian. l. xix. p. 150, 151. Vol. VI. No 4. been been prefect, and consul in 348. though accused of aspiring at the empire. The latter was only banished from his own country; nor would Modestus suffer him to be racked, though he had positive orders for it from the emperor. As for Aristophanes, he was, by the order of Paulus, whom he had provoked with his freedom of speech, beaten with balls of lead sastened to cords, till he was ready to expire; when Modestus, pitying him, ordered the executioner to forbear, and sent Aristophanes into banishment. Demetrius, surnamed Cythras, a philosopher, stricken in years, being convicted of having sacrificed to the idols, was tortured with great cruelty for many hours; but afterwards suffered by Modestus to return to Alexandria his native city. Parnasus, and the rest, excepting Aristophanes, who had been banished on this occasion, were recalled three years after, and pardoned.

The Perfians begin hofulities.

In the mean while Sapor, king of Persia, was encouraged and pressed to begin hostilities by an officer of Constantius, named Antoninus, who, finding his affairs ruined at home, had fled to the court of Persia, hoping to make his fortune there, and brought with him an exact account of the state of the empire, and all its forces. At the same time Eusebius the eunuch, who had been long contriving the ruin of Ursicinus, as the only person who was independent of him, and scorned his support, persuaded the emperor to remove him, as a person not to be trusted, from the command of the troops in the east, and to appoint in his room Sabinianus, a decrepit old man, possessed of immense wealth, but every way unfit for that employment. This change was no fooner known at the Persian court, than Antoninus, who was well acquainted e with the character of Sabinianus, pressed Sapor anew to begin the war without delay, adviling him to march strait to the Euphrates, without losing time in belieging towns, to cross that river, and enter Syria, which he might easily reduce, while defended by fo unfit a commander. The Persian, approving the scheme, began to assemble his troops from all quarters, in order to put it in execution. This alarmed Constantius. who immediately ordered Ursicinus to hasten back into Syria, with the character of general of the foot, in the room of Barbatio lately beheaded; but without any authority, or even troops under his command. This too was a malicious contrivance of Eusebius, and the other eunuchs, that, if the mighty designs of the Persians were defeated, Sabinianus might have the honour of it; but, if they were attended with d fuccess, Ursicinus might bear the whole blame. That brave commander had no fooner reached Syria, than he was informed, that the enemy's vanguard had already passed the Tigris. Upon this intelligence he hastened into Mesopotamia, to give the necessary orders there, in case the enemy should attack the city of Nisibis. From Nisibis he flew to Amida, another city in the same country; and, though he travelled in the night-time, he narrowly escaped falling into the enemy's hands, whose parties were spread all over the country. From Amida he sent Ammianus Marcellinus, the historian, to reconnoitre the enemy, who, upon his return, informed him, that to him they feemed at least an hundred thousand strong; that they had already passed Nineve in the province of Adiabene, and were arrived at the bridge of the Anzabas, a e river in Assyria. Hereupon Ursicinus dispatched orders to Cossianus, duke of Mesopotamia, and to Euphronius, governor of the province, to warn the inhabitants to withdraw with their effects into places of fafety; to abandon Carrba, which was an open city; and to fet fire to the forage, and likewife to the corn, though already ripe, that the enemy might find no subsistence, either for themselves or their horses, between the Tigris and the Euphrates. At the same time he took care to fortify the banks of the Euphrates with forts and palifades, supplying the former with warlike engines of all kinds. These wise precautions having obliged Sapor to lay aside his defign of marching strait to the Euphrates, he turned to the left, and took his rout, pursuant to the advice of Antoninus, by the foot of the mountains which part Mesogo- f tamia from Armenia, not doubting but he should find there plenty of forage, and the Euphrales fordable nearer its head. Ursicinus, apprised of his design, immediately left Amida, to give the necessary orders on that side likewise; but being surrounded by one of the enemy's parties, he narrowly escaped falling into their hands. Ammianus Marcellinus, the historian, was pursued as far as Amida; which place was invested a few days after by Sapor's whole army, in which ferved feveral princes of different nations, and among the rest the king of Albania, and Grumbates, king of the Chionita, a prince renowned for his valour and conquests. The Persian took on his march to

Un ficinus enters Melopo-

tamia.

Wife precautions taken ly Urlicinus.

a. Amida two Roman forts, Reman and Busan, the foldiers who garifoned them, open- Sapor takes ing the gates to him upon the first summons, though they were both places of great two Roman ftrength, and the inhabitants of the neighbouring country had retired to them with all their effects. In both the forts Sapor found some virgins, consecrated, to use the expression of Ammianus, to the worship of God, according to the discipline of the christians, and was so far from offering them any injury, that, on the contrary, he injoined his foldiers not to interrupt or disturb them in their usual exercises of piety, hoping, by that gentle treatment, to remove the prejudice, which his former cruelties had begotten in the minds of the neighbouring people k. He appeared before Amida, not with a defign to beliege the place, but only to found the disposition of the garison; and, in case they refused to submit, to pursue his march into Syria, b agreeable to the plan suggested by Antoninus. But the Romans having discharged against him, as he approached the walls to shew himself in all his pomp and majesty, a thower of darts, arrows and javelins, one of which pierced his royal robes, and another laid the son of Grumbates, a youth of great expectation, dead at his sather's feet, he was so transported with rage, that, laying aside his former scheme, he resolved at all adventures to revenge the affront offered to himself, and the death of He lays siege to the young prince, with the utter destruction of the city, and a general massacre of all Amida, its inhabitants. The reader will find a very particular and distinct account of this memorable fiege in Amnianus, who was shut up in the town, and an eye-witness of e all that passed both within and without the walls. Never was place assaulted with more fury, nor defended with more vigour, resolution and intrepidity; but in the end most of the garison being killed, and those who survived quite spent with labour and watching, the walls being in feveral places levelled with the ground, and the ditches filled up with dead bodies, the Persians made a last effort, and entered the town Which, after a fword in hand, after having lain seventy-five days before it, and lost, during that time, long and vistority thousand men, and upwards. The city was razed, the chief officers crucified, ance, is taken, and the rest, with the soldiers and inhabitants, either put to the sword, or carried and razed. into captivity, except our historian, and two or three more, who, in the dead of the night, escaped through a postern not observed by the enemy. As for Safor, the d summer being already far spent, and his army greatly satigued, he thought it adviseable to return to his dominions, having but little to brag of this expedition, which cost him the lives of so many men, and prevented him from pursuing the advantageous designs suggested to him by Antoninus 1. Sabinianus was busied, during the whole time of the fiege, in exercifing his men near Edessa m. Ursicinus was continually pressing him to take the field, and harafs, at least, the enemy, by cutting off their parties, and intercepting their convoys; which he might have easily done, and by that means diverted them from pursuing the siege with so much vigour, and perhaps obliged them to raise it. But Sabinianus returned no other answer, than that his instructions were not to expose the army to any danger. He is supposed to have had e likewise private instructions from Eusebius, the favourite eunuch, his patron, to give Ursicinus no opportunity of performing any thing that might redound to his honour ". Thus was that great officer obliged to continue inactive, and fee, with the utmost regret, one of the strongest cities in the east reduced, and so many brave men fall unrevenged. Anmianus, after his escape from Amida, found him at Miletene in the Lesser Armenia, on his way to Antioch, whither he followed him soon after. From Antioch Ursicinus repaired to court, where he was, to his great surprize, charged with the Ursicinus neloss of Amida, and all the wrong steps taken during that unhappy campaign. Arbetio eused at court; and Florentius, two of Eusebius's creatures, were appointed by the emperor to inquire but sound inito his conduct, and examine by whose fault Amida was lost. These two judges, howf ever partial and corrupt, could not lay the blame on Ursicinus; but, on the other hand, not caring, through fear of offending Eusebius, to expose Sabinianus, ended their inquiries, without clearing, as they were in justice bound to do, the former, or condemning the latter. Ursicinus, highly provoked at such proceedings, appealed to the emperor, who, he faid, would not fail to punish with due severity the authors, whoever they were, of the late miscarriages. In the transport of his passion, he let drop the following unguarded expression, viz. That the emperor bimself, though he marched into Mesopotamia the next spring at the head of his army, would not be able to protest that country, so long as he was thus governed by eunuchs. This being carried immediately to the a emperor, as it generally happens in courts, with malicious aggravations, Constantius, He is difgraced, without any further inquiry, ordered that brave and loyal officer to retire to his native country, after having divested him of his employment, and given it to one Agilo a German, who, in 354. had been tribunus stabuli, which answers our master of the horse. Thus was this weak and deluded prince induced to deprive himself, and the empire, which lay at stake, at so critical a conjuncture, of the skill, counsels and experience of the best officer of the age, to gratify the avarice, ambition and revenge of a wicked courtier, facrificing to his private ends the public interest, and the welfare and glory both of his prince and country.

<sup>1</sup> Idem, p. 144-146. · Idem, l. xviii. p. 124-132. n Idem, p. 127. n Idem ibid. &c l. xix. p. 136.

The Perlians make themselves masters of several places in Mesopotamia.

THE following year, Constantius being conful the tenth time, and Julian the third, Sapor, entering Mesopotamia early in the spring, took by assault Singara, a town of confiderable strength, and carried both the garifon and inhabitants into captivity. Then leaving Nifibis, where great part of the Roman army lay encamped, on the left, he took his rout towards Bezabde, called also Phænicia, a strong town on the Tigris, After feveral attacks, in which great numbers fell on both fides, the bishop of the place went out to exhort the king to withdraw, and put an end to so destructive a war; but Sapor, without returning him any answer, pursued the siege, made himself master of the place, put most of the inhabitants to the sword, and reduced the rest, with the bishop, and all his clergy, to slavery. Some suspected the bishop, named, as we are told P, Heliodorus, of secretly favouring the Persians; but Ammia- c nus clears him of this charge 3. Sapor did not demolish Bezabde, as he had done Singara; but repaired the fortifications, and leaving a garifon in it, led his army against Virta, or Birtha, on the most distant borders of Mesopotamia; but not being able to reduce it, after several unsuccessful attacks, he raised the siege, and retired to his own dominions, without engaging in any other enterprize this campaign. While Sapor was thus, by degrees, reducing Mejopotamia, Constantius was still at Constantinople, raising new troops, and soliciting the Goths and other barbarians to join him. At length he left that metropolis, when the spring was already far advanced, and set out for Syria. Upon his arrival at Casarea in Cappadocia, he was met by deputies fent to him by Julian, who had been declared emperor at Paris, as we shall relate d anon. He was thunder-struck with this news, and long in suspense, whether he should march against Julian or Sapor; but was in the end persuaded to pursue his march into the east. Leaving therefore Cappadocia, he advanced to Miletene in the Lesser Armenia, passed the Euphrates at Samosata in Syria, and arrived at Edessa in Mesopotamia, where he was obliged to wait the coming of his troops, and the warlike engines, till after the autumnal equinox, when he pursued his march to Amida, which he could not behold, buried, as it was, in its ruins, without shedding many tears. From Amida he continued his rout to Bezabde, with a design to retake that place; but being in several affaults repulsed by the Persian garison, he resolved to reduce it by famine, which e he might have done, the Persian army being long before dispersed, and, according to custom, returned to their respective homes, had not the heavy rains, and severe weather, obliged him to drop the enterprize, and retire to Antioch, which he did not reach before the end of the year; for, on the seventeenth of December, he was at Hierapolis in Euphratesiana .

The Scots and

Picts break into the Roman

s errisories.

Constantius marches into Meiopotamia.

We shall now return to Julian, whom we lest the preceding year in his quarters at Paris, where he was informed in the beginning of the winter, that the Pills, and Caledonians about this time first distinguished in history by the name of Scoti or Scots, had broken into the Roman province, and committed dreadful ravages there. Upon this intelligence, he fent his lieutenant Lupicinus, who had succeeded Severus in that f post, with some troops into Britain. Lupicinus set sail from Boulogne in the depth of winter, and in a few days reached London, where he landed his forces s. But of this expedition we find no farther account in history: and indeed Lupicinus, tho' he was an officer of great bravery and experience in war, had not time to perform any remarkable exploits, being recalled foon after, as we shall relate anon. In the mean while Constantius, wholly intent upon affembling a mighty army for his intended expedition against the Persians, sent Decentius, one of his secretaries, into Gaul, to sends for pare of bring from thence all the Batavians, and other auxiliaries, with three hundred men

The emberor Iulian's army.

• Idem, p. 144, 145, & l. xiv. p. 24. • Menæa, 9 Apr. p. 76 Cod. Theodol p. 60. Ammian. l. xxi. p. 185. & l. xx. p. 170—177. Menæa, 9 Apr. p. 76. 4 AMMIAN. 1. XX. p. 165. • Idem, h. xx. p. 154.

a chosen out of each corps serving under Julian, that is, the flower of that prince's army. The emperor's orders were not addressed to Julian, to whom he only wrote, warning him not to oppose them; but to his lieutenant Lupicinus, and to Gentinus, or, as others call him, Sintula, his tribunus flabuli, or matter of the horse. Mott writers are of opinion, that the emperor took this resolution, rather with a design to weaken Julian, than to strengthen himself; for he began to be jealous of that prince's glory, and apprehensive of his power. The common report was, that the emperor was induced to take this step by private letters from Florentius, at that time prefect of Gaul, and in his heart a great enemy to Julian'. Be that as it will, Julian found himself reduced by the above-mentioned order, to the unhappy dilemma, either of b falling a facrifice to the refentment of the emperor, if he refused to comply with it; or perishing by the arms of the barbarians, if he obeyed it, being well apprifed that they, unmindful of their promifes and treaties, would be tempted to break into Gaul, as foon as they faw that province destitute of troops to defend it. In this dangerous fituation, he refolved, without hefitating a fingle moment, to obey, but at the same time to abdicate the dignity of  $C\alpha far$ , that he might not be charged with the loss of Gaul. He thought himself however bound to acquaint Decentius, that the auxiliaries raised in Gaul and Germany had entered into the service, upon condition of their not being obliged to pass the Alps; and that the violation of this article, always infifted upon by the people beyond the Rhine, might prevent their c lifting themselves for the suture. But Decentius giving no ear to his just remonstrances, Julian complies he submitted to the emperor's will without reply. As Lupicinus, to whom the empe-with the emperor's orders were addressed, was absent in Britain, Decentius himself chose all the ror's orders. best men out of each corps, not excepting Julian's own guards; which was no fooner done, than Julian wrote to their respective commanders, injoining them to quit their winter-quarters, and begin their march without delay. This order threw all Gaul into the utmost confusion; nothing was heard but complaints, outcries and lamentations, as if the barbarians had already entered the province: several libels against Constantius, and in commendation of Julian, were privately handed about, and dispersed among the soldiery. Ammianus mentions one, in which the soldiers d complained of their being banished to the most remote parts of the earth, while their wives, children and relations were carried into captivity by the barbarians. To obviate this complaint, Julian ordered them to carry their families with them, supplying them with public carriages for that purpose. When the troops were ready to depart, Julian advised Decentius not to suffer them to approach Paris, where he still was in his winter quarters; but Decentius, fearing they might mutiny, if they left Gaul without feeing their general, led them thither to take their leave of him, which proved a very injudicious step. Julian received them in a most obliging manner, and encouraged them chearfully to submit to the emperor's commands, who would not fail to reward their valour. But on the other hand, the people conjured e them not to abandon a country, which they had defended with so much glory; and the foldiers shewed a strong inclination to comply with their request. Hereupon The soldiers Julian, ascending the tribunal, told them, that it was not by any means lawful for unwilling to them to deliberate about a thing already decided by the emperor; and upon that leave him. fubject made a long discourse, which the soldiers heard with attention, and withdrew in silence. After this, Julian invited the chief officers to dinner, entertaining them with no less tenderness than magnificence, and desiring them, when they took leave of him, to let him know in what he could be ferviceable to them. The officers, greatly concerned to part with so obliging a commander, and to quit their country, returned in the utmost affliction to their quarters. However, they continued all f quiet till about fun-set, when the soldiers, stirred up, according to Zosimus", by libels dispersed under-hand among them by their officers, slew all at once to arms, and hastening to the palace, surrounded it, and with a tumultuous noise proclaimed They proclaim Julian emperor w. Julian calls all the gods to witness, that he had not the least him emperor. knowledge of this defign, nor the least suspicion of its being on foot, but was withdrawn with his wife when he first heard himself saluted with the title of Augustus z. Libanius too assures us, that the design was not premeditated, but sudden y. Julian, shewing himself highly dissatisfied with the conduct of the soldiery, ordered all the gates of the palace to be kept shut; insomuch that the soldiers, eager to see him, a were obliged to wait till the next morning. In the mean time, he invoked his gods, intreating them to reveal to him their will by fome prodigy; and they commanded him, as we are told, to comply with the desires of the soldiery. Ammianus writes, that Julian told his friends in confidence, that a spectre appeared to him that very night, representing the genius of the empire, as it was painted in those days, and disappeared, after having uttered these words, I am come to stay with you, but only for a short time. Eunapius assures us, that before he accepted the sovereignty, he performed certain ceremonies in private with a pagan pontiff, whom he had some time before secretly sent for out of Greece 2; which, in the language of that writer, imports, that he had recourse to magic. As soon as day appeared, the soldiery, b breaking down the gates of the palace, obliged Julian to shew himself, and saluted him anew with the title of Augustus, which he continued to reject, reminding them of their duty, and promifing to prevail upon the emperor to countermand the orders which had given occasion to their complaints, mutiny, and revolt. But all was to no purpose; nay, the soldiers, well apprised that Constantius, notwithstanding all his

<sup>1</sup> Idem, p. 157, 158. т Idem, p. 169. Ыван. ог. хії. р. 283. Julian. ad Athen. p. 518, 519. w Амміан. l. хіх. p. 159. Lib. or. хії. p. 284. У Julian. or. хії. р. 284. Zos. l. iii. p. 710. LIBAN. Or. X. p. 241. Vol. VI. Nº 4. gates

Julian rejects

the title.

But is forced

His speech to the foldiery.

promises, would in the end treat them as rebels, threatened Julian with immediate death, if he perfifted any longer in declining the honour they intended to confer upon him. To these menaces he yielded, and was thereupon listed up by the soldiers on fhields, and shewn to the multitude, who, with loud acclamations, proclaimed him emperor, while an officer, by name Maurus, placed upon his head his golden e collar, inriched with precious stones, instead of a diadem. When this ceremony was over, Julian, to animate his foldiers, promifed them five pieces of gold and a pound weight of filver a man b. After this, he shut himself up in the palace, difpleased and uneasy at what had happened; which gave occasion to the report of his having been murdered. This alarmed the foldiery, who immediately flew to the palace, where, to their great satisfaction, they found him, not only safe, but clad in the imperial robes. Libanius writes, that the eunuch, his chamberlain, had in reality been bribed to murder him, and Julian himself, that money had been distributed among the soldiery to debauch them. However that be, the soldiers, imagining he had been in danger, pressed him to put all the friends of Constantius d to death, who had opposed his promotion; but he resolutely declared, that he His generosity, would not by any means suffer the least injury to be offered to them; nay, he generously forgave the eunuch, who had attempted to take away his life. Some troops had already begun their march towards the east, but they were no sooner informed of what had passed at Paris, than they returned with their leader Sintula, and joined Julian, having affembled them all in a neighbouring plain, appeared at their head with all the badges of majesty; and ascending the tribunal, in a very elegant and lively speech commended their valour, put them in mind of the many victories they had gained under his conduct, encouraged them to defend and protect a prince, whom they themselves had raised, and ended with assuring them, that he was determined to rule with justice and moderation, and to prefer such only as were men of e merit, without fuffering himself to be biassed by the recommendations of any person whatfoever 8. Such is the account which Julian himself, and after him Libanius, Ammianus, and Zosimus, his admirers, or rather adorers, give us of his promotion Disagreement to the imperial dignity. But on the other hand, the christian writers, namely Greeamong authors gory of Nazianzush, Philostorgius, Theodoretk, and Sozomen!, seem to have thought about the man- him privy to the design of the soldiery; nay, Zonaras tells us in plain terms, that either prompted by ambition, or apprehending in the end the doom of his brother Gallus, he gained under-hand the officers, who by his private directions stirred up the foldiers to threaten him as they did, that, to the eyes of the world, he might feem to have accepted the fovereignty to fave his life. The former writers betray, f no doubt, a great partiality for Julian, and the latter an equal prejudice against him. We shall therefore, in describing his reign and actions, impartially relate, unbiaffed as we are by any favour or prejudice, what we find in writers of both parties, leaving the reader to judge which of them deserves most credit. All authors

&lt;sup>2</sup> Ammian. p. 162. <sup>8</sup> Eunap. c. 5. p. 76. <sup>b</sup> Ammian. p. 160. Lib. ot. v. p. 179. Zos. p. 711. Zonar. p. 18. <sup>c</sup> Julian. ibid. p. 522. Ammian. p. 160. <sup>d</sup> Liban. ot. xii. p. 285. <sup>e</sup> Julian. ibid. <sup>f</sup> Idem, p. 522. & Lib. p. 285. <sup>g</sup> Ammian. l. xx. p. 161, 162. Julian. Liban. Zos. ibid. <sup>h</sup> Greg. Naz. p. 58, 67. <sup>l</sup> Philostorg. l. vi. c. 5. p. 84. <sup>h</sup> Theodor. l. ii. c. 28. p. 636, <sup>1</sup> Sozomen. p. 18. <sup>m</sup> Zonar. p. 18.

a agree, that Julian was raised to the imperial dignity in the year 360, but as to the day, we are quite at a loss: but as the troops were, at the time of his promotion, still in their winter-quarters, it must have happened in the month of May or April. He had no fooner accepted the imperial title, than Decentius haftened back into the Decentius and east, whither he was soon followed by the prefect Florentius, who, conscious to himself Florentius of his conduct towards Julian, and dreading his refertment, was in such haste to Gaul. get out of Gaul, that he left his whole family behind him; but Julian not only gave them leave to follow him, but ordered them to be supplied for that purpose with public carriages. Lupicinus, Julian's lieutenant, an officer of great experience, courage and address, was capable of imbroiling matters; but as he was still in Britain, b Julian, by ordering all the veffels on the coaft to be ftopped, prevented his receiving intelligence of what had passed; so that upon his landing at Boulogne to execute the emperor's orders, addressed to him, as we have related above, he was arrested Lupicinus by an officer fent thither for that purpose, but treated by Julian with the utmost arrested, but humanity and good-nature ". And now Julian, well apprifed that the emperor would humanity. be alarmed, and highly provoked, at what had happened, in order to appeale his wrath and allay his fears, wrote an obliging letter to him, which he fent by two Julian fends of his chief officers, Pentadius and Eutherius. In the letter he acquainted him with deputies, and writes to the what had happened, begged he would suffer him to enjoy the title which he had emperor. been forced to accept, promifed to obey him, even in that station, with the same c readiness and alacrity as if he were a private person, offered to send him some troops, and even to leave to him the nomination of the prefect; but at the same time he referved to himself the creating of the other officers, and remonstrated with the greatest submission, that Gaul was so far from being able to spare any of its natives, that, on the contrary, it stood in need of assistance from other provinces. Julian not only wrote himself, but persuaded the whole army to write to the emperor, earnestly intreating him to confirm what they had done, and to agree with Julian, who had obliged them to take an oath not to raile any disturbances, if Constantius fuffered him to continue in Gaul with the title of Augustus. Julian, in his letter, contented himself with the title of Casar ; and he himself assures us, that, in writing d to the emperor, he never assumed any other q. But to this public letter, as we may style it, he added a private one, highly injurious and abusive, as we read in Ammianus, who tells us, that tho' it had been communicated to him, yet he should have thought it indecent and unbecoming to infert it in his history. The deputies from Julian met the emperor at Cafarea in Cappadocia, who, upon his first reading the letter, was fo transported with rage, that he drove them from his presence, and was some time in suspense, as we have said, whether he should proceed in his expedition against the Persians, or turn his arms against his new rival; but upon mature deliberation, cooler counfels prevailed, and Constantius, dismissing the deputies without any answer, dispatched Leonas, his questor, into Gaul, with a letter to Julian, acquainting him, e that he could not by any means approve of his usurpation, and exhorting him, as Constantius he tendered his own fafety, and that of his friends, to be fatisfied with the title of acknowledge Cafar, which he still allowed him to enjoy, but disapproved and annulled whatever him emperor. else had been done. Leonas soon reached Paris, where he was kindly received by Julian, to whom he delivered the emperor's letter the day after his arrival. Julian received it fitting on his tribunal, in the presence of the soldiery and people, whom he Julian's conduct had assembled for that purpose, and caused it to be read aloud. When he under-on this occasion. stood, that the emperor would not by any means allow him the title of Augustus, addressing himself to Leonas, he told him, that he was willing to lay down that title, provided the foldiery consented to it; but otherwise could not, without betraying f them, and exposing them to the resentment of Constantius. He had scarce uttered these words, when the whole assembly confirmed to him with repeated acclamations the title they had given him, declaring, that they were determined to stand by him to the last drop of their blood. Julian wrote to the emperor by Leonas, acquainting him with the disposition of the people and soldiery, and telling him, that he could not prevail upon himself to abandon them to his resentment. Several messages and embassies passed between Constantius and Julian; the former insisting upon his abdi-cating the fovereignty, and the latter declining, under various pretences, to relinquish

P. 18. P Zonar. ibid. 4 Julian. ibid. p. 523. O Ammian, L. XX. p. 167. JULIAN, p. 518. ZONAZ. F AMMIAN. ibid. p. 169.

the authority with which he had been invested by the soldiery and people, but at a the same time assuring the emperor of his good intentions and zeal for his service.

In the mean time, the emperor being wholly taken up with the Persian war in the east, Julian, to keep his army in action, and maintain the reputation he had acquired, puffed the Rhine at Tricesima, which some take to be Cleves, others Kellen, in that neighbourhood; and falling suddenly upon the Atthuarii, the inhabitants of the present countries of Cleves and Munster, who had made frequent inroads into Gaul, laid waste their territory, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and obliged the rest to submit to such laws as he thought fit to impose upon them. In this expedition he spent three months, and then repassing the Rhine, he visited all the forts on that river as far as Basle, recovered some places that were still held by the enemy, fortified b them, and, as the year was already far spent, retired by the way of Besançon, which he describes in a letter', to Vienne, where he took up his winter-quarters. About this time died his wife Helena, the fifter of Constantius, and her body was sent to Rome to be there interred near that of her fifter Constantina u. She is styled on most of her medals Flavia Julia Helena, and on some bears the title of singusta w, which we suppose her to have taken after the promotion of her husband. This year, on Monday the twenty eighth of August, happened a great eclipse of the sun, which began at half an hour past four in the morning, and lasted above two hours . Ammianus takes notice of it in his history v.

THE next consuls were, Flavius Taurus, presect of Italy, who had presided the c year before at the famous council of Rimini, and Florentius, prefect of Gaul, who had fled from that province upon the promotion of Julian. This year Julian, finding

His wife Hclena dies.

Julian overcomes the Atthuarii.

Julian's by pocrify.

Alemans; And grants

Constantius would not hearken to any terms, began to prepare for war, being insited to it also by his magicians, who affured him of success, and encouraged by several dreams, in one of which he is faid to have known, that Constantius was near his end, nay, that he was to die about the month of November 1. He still made an outward profession of the christian religion, says Ammianus 2, to gain the christians to his party, tho' he had long fince renounced that in his heart, and embraced the religion of the ancient Romans; nay, the better to impose upon them, on the feast of the Epiphany, which was celebrated with extraordinary folemnity in the church, he d publicly affished at divine service, and offered up with the rest his solemn prayers b; which expression of Ammianus some understand of his receiving the eucharist. Zonaras writes, that this happened on the feast of our Saviour's nativity, which was then celebrated by the Greeks on the fixth of January; and adds, that Julian by this hypocrify hoped to secure the soldiers to his party, who were for the most part christians. When he had made the necessary preparations for war, and was ready to march into Italy, and thence into the east, against Constantius, if he persisted in refuling him the title of emperor, advice was brought him, that the Alemans, and among the rest the subjects of Vadomarius, whose country lay near Basle, had broken into Gaul, on the fide of Rhætia, and committed dreadful ravages there. Vadoma- e rius pretended to have the greatest respect imaginable for Julian, and to be much concerned for the hostilities committed by his countrymen; but, in the mean time, Julian, having intercepted a letter from him to Constantius, filled with bitter invectives against himself, found means to have him arrested at a banquet, and banished him into Spain d. He had already fent Libano, one of his commanders, with a strong detachment against the Alemans; but he being killed, and his men put to the rout near Santio, now Seckingen, in the neighbourhood of Basle, Julian advanced in person He reduces the against them, passed the Rhine, and coming upon them unexpectedly, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and obliged the rest to restore the booty they had taken, and fue for peace; which he granted them upon his own terms. Libanius affures us, f them a peace. that Constantius had, by letters and large sums, transmitted to the heads of the German nations, stirred them up, and encouraged them to invade Gaul, in order to divert Julian from forming other schemes f. This, says Ammian, was the common report s, and Julian pretended to have in his custody the very letters, and to shew both them, and others, which the emperor was supposed to have written to the barbarians

* Idem, p. 170. Lib. or. xii. p. 286. Zon. p. 19.

† Julian. epist. xxxviii. p. 180.

* Ammian. l. xx. p. 172. & l. xxi. p. 178.

w Byzan. famil. p. 41.

* Petav. doctr. temp. l. xi. c. 45. p. 373.

y Ammian. l. 20. p. 155.

Z Liban. ot. xii. p. 286.

Ammian. ibid.

† Liban. ot. v. p. 180.

h Idem, p. 181.

Z Zonar. p. 19.

Ammian. ibid.

Liban. ot. v. p. 180.

* Ammian. ibid.

Liban. ot. v. p. 180.

* Ammian. ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Liban. ot. v. p. 180.

* Ammian. ibid.

* Idem ibid.

* Ammian. ot. v. p. 180.

* Ammian. ot. v. p. 180 y Ammian, I. 20, p. 155. Z LIBAN, b Hem. D. 181. ZONAR, p. 19. f LIBAN. or. v. p. 180. & AMMIAN. ibid.

a in the time of Magnentius, animating them to invade Gaul'; which greatly estranged from him the minds of the people. However, Ammianus does not take upon him to affirm it, but only fays, that it was a flying report'. In the mean time, Confrantius having ordered magazines to be formed at Briancon in Dauphiny, at Bregentz on the lake of Constance, and at several other places on the Alps, Julian concluded from thence, that he was bent upon war; and refolving to be before hand with him, he threw off the mask, and obliged his soldiers to take an oath of allegiance He obliges his to him, which they all did very readily, except Nebridius, who had succeeded Flo-foldiers to take rentius in the prefecture of Gaul. That officer frankly declared, that he would not, an oath of allegiance to upon any consideration whatsoever, take an oath, which obliged him to draw his bimself. b sword against his lawful sovereign. Upon this, Julian suffered him to retire unmolested into Hetruria". The loyal, generous, and disinterested conduct of this officer deserved a better name than that of effeminacy, with which Libanius has been pleased to stigmatize it w. In his room, Julian appointed one Germanicus to discharge the functions of the prefect. As his thus obliging the foldiers to take an oath of allegiance to himself was openly revolting from Constantius, he wrote to several cities, He writes to and among the rest to Athens, Lacedæmon, and Corinth, acquainting them with the several cities. motives that had prompted him to take that step, being well apprifed, says Libanius, that good princes are willing to submit their actions to the judgment of the whole world, whereas tyrants dread the least scrutiny x. Of all these letters, or rather c apologies, only that has reached our times which he wrote to the Athenians, and a few lines of a letter which he wrote to the inhabitants of Corinth, when he was already mafter of great part of the empire. In these he pretends to have been animated by his gods to make war upon Constantius, and by them assured of success. And now Julian, finding he could depend upon the fidelity of his army, and resolved to pursue his designs with vigour, sent part of his forces into Pannonia under the conduct of Nevita, Jovinus and Jovius, ordering them to take different routs, that they might feem the more numerous, and strike the greater terror into the enemy, while he, leaving Basle, marched through woods and by-ways into Illyricum. Nevita, Jovinus, He sets out on and Jovius, had with them about twenty thousand men, but Julian himself only his march. d three thousand. They were all to meet at Sirmium, the place of the general rendezvous. Upon the first news of Julian's march, Taurus, presect of Italy, and Florentius, whom Constantius had lately appointed presect of Illyricum, abandoning their provinces, betook themselves to slight, and hastened to the emperor to acquaint him with the motions of Julian. As they were both consuls this year, Julian ordered them, if Zosimus is to be credited, to be stigmatized in all the public acts with the name of the runaway consuls. By their flight, Julian became master of Italy without striking a blow, and likewise of Sicily, whither he sent some troops, with orders to keep themselves in readiness to pass over into Africa. The different parties, led by Julian and the three above-mentioned commanders, purfued their march with e fuch expedition, that in ten or eleven days time they all arrived in the neighbourhood of Sirmium, which Julian entered in triumph; Lucilianus, who commanded there for Constantius, having been surprised the night before, and taken prisoner by one of Julian's parties. He staid but two days at Sirmium, being eager to make himself master of the important pass of Sucidava, dividing Illyricum from Thrace, which he Makes bimself did without meeting with the least opposition; and having left a strong garison master of there under the command of Nevita, he turned back to Naissus, where he seems to Illyricum; have continued, till news was brought him of the death of Constantius, affembling troops from all quarters, in order to reinforce his army before he entered Thrace. During his stay there, he raised Aurelius Victor, the historian, to the government f of Pannonia Secunda, and wrote to the Roman senate a letter filled with bitter invectives against Constantius, which was ill received by the people, and is highly disapproved of by Ammianus himself . While Julian lay at Naissus, without the least apprehension of an enemy at his back, two of Constantius's legions, and a cohort of archers, who had been ordered into Gaul, surprised on their march the city of Aquileia, and defended it with such vigour and resolution, that Julian could not by any But cannot means reduce it: they were commanded by one Nigrinus, who held out till two reduce Aqui-

Vol. VI. Nº 4.

ja

months after the emperor's death, and was even then with much ado prevailed upon to submit to Julian b.

The emperor

The Perfians resire.

In the mean time, Constantius, being returned from Mesopotamia to Antioch in the latter end of the preceding year, as we have related above, married in that city, with great folemnity, Maxima Faustina, Eusebia being dead fome time before. Of the parentage and qualities of this new empress, no mention is made by the ancients. All we know of her is, that some time after the death of Constantius she was delivered of a daughter, named Flavia Maxima Constantia, who was afterwards married to the emperor Gratian. When the public rejoicings were over, the emperor spent the remaining part of the winter in preparing for his intended expedition against the Persians, being resolved to end that war, or at least to secure the empire on that b side, before he marched into the west against Julian. In the mean time Sapor, having affembled a mighty army, took the field, and advanced to the banks of the Tigris, with a design to cross that river, and pursue his march strait to the Euphrates. This Constantius no sooner understood, than he left Antioch; and crossing the Euphrates, advanced as far as Edessa, whence he sent part of his army, under the command of Arbetio and Agilo, to the banks of the Tigris, with express orders to spare the troops, and not expose them wantonly to dangers. About this time the emperor received certain intelligence, that Julian had already made himself master of Illyricum, and the important pass separating that country from Thrace. He was thunderstruck with this news; but the very next day, an express arrived from his generals on the banks e of the Tigris, affuring him, that Sapor, frightened by unlucky omens, was marched back to his own dominions with his whole army. Constantius, overjoyed at these tidings, immediately left Mesopotamia, and returned to Antioch, with a design to march without delay against Julian, being encouraged thereunto by his army, who declared with one voice, that they were ready to facrifice their lives in so good and honourable a cause. In the mean time, he dispatched Arbetio with a strong detachment to the streights of Sucidava, where Julian was affembling his forces in order to invade Thrace, and followed him in person with the rest of his army about the latter end The emperor marches of the autumn. Upon his arrrival at Tarfus in Cilicia, he was seized with a severish against Julian, distemper, occasioned chiefly by the uneasiness and perplexity of his mind; but d believing he might get the better of it by motion and exercise, he pursued his march Mopfucrene. to Moplucrene, on the borders of Cilicia, at the foot of mount Taurus, where, by the violence of his distemper, which increased daily, he was obliged to stop. In that place, all remedies proving ineffectual, he died on the third of November, being then in the forty-fifth year of his age, and the thirty-eighth of his reign, reckoning from the time he had been created Cæfar, but only the twenty-fifth fince the death of his father d. It was commonly faid, and believed at least by the christians, that Julian had, with the promise of a great reward, seduced one of his courtiers, whom they do not name, to administer him poison, of which he died . Be that as it will, Julian no fooner received the news of his death, than he left Illyricum, and on the eleventh of December arrived at Constantinople, whither he caused the corps of the deceased prince to be brought by Jovian, afterwards emperor, and ordered it to be interred with the usual solemnity in the church of the apostles. Julian himself affifted at the ceremony in his purple robes, but without the other badges of his dignity 8. Gregory Nazianzen writes, that at the point of death Constantius betrayed great concern chiefly for three things; which were, his having murdered his nearest relations, his having raised Julian to the dignity of Casar, and his having persecuted, at the instigation of the Arians, the orthodox christians. On the other hand, Ammianus tells us, that he was said to have named Julian for his successor. We can scarce believe, that he repented his having persecuted the church, though Gregory f Nazianzen, and, after him, Theodoret, affirm it, since Athanasius assures us, that he held the impious tenets of the Arians to his last breath, and received baptism a little before he expired at the hands of the bishop Euzoius, a most obstinate Arian k. Socrates writes, that he was baptized by Euzoius at Antioch before he set out for Cilicia; and truly Euzoius was the Arian bishop of that metropolis! But Philostorgius tells us, the point of death by an Arian bishop.

b Ammian. p. 191—195. Cldem, l. xxi. p. 185. Cange Biz. fam. p. 48. Ammian. p. 196. Zon. p. 19. Socr. l. ii. c. 47. Greg. Naz. of. iii. p. 68. Ammian. l. xxi. p. 205. Socrat. l. iii. c. 1. p. 168. Panegyr. xi. p. 213. Liban. of. xii. p. 289. Greg. Naz. of. xxi. p. 389. Theodor. l. iii. p. 637. Ath. de fyd. p. 907. Socrat. l. ii. c. 47. p. 161.

3

a that he received baptism at Mopsucrene, when he was already at the point of death; wherein he is followed by the chronicle of Alexandria, which adds, that he sent for Euzoius from Antioch. As for his character, all the ancients, whether christians His character. or pagans, paint him as a weak and vain prince: he was intirely governed by the eunuchs of the court, especially by his chamberlain Eusebius, over whom however he had, says Ammianus pleasantly, some small authority". He admitted none to his confidence, but such as were well skilled in the art of flattery; whence he had no true friends about him, but fuch only as, by approving and commending all his measures, studied to gain his favour, and raise themselves. He used to ascribe to himself the whole glory of victories gained by his officers, and speak of them as if b he had fought in person at the head of the victorious army. The christian writers, both Arian and orthodox, complain of his affuming to himself too much in ecclesiastic matters. Under him employments were not given to the most deserving men, but to fuch only as were best able to purchase them of the eunuchs, and other tavourites; whence the unhappy people in the provinces were miserably oppressed by their governors, who made it their chief business to repay themselves, at their expence, the sums which they had disbursed, and to heap up money wherewithal to purchase other more profitable employments. He was so jealous of his authority, and of such a timorous and suspicious temper, that, upon the least appearance of a plot, he put numbers of persons to death, frequently confounding the innocent with the guilty, c tho' accused by persons altogether unworthy of credit. By this means the infamous tribe of informers increased under him to such a degree, that no man of fortune, however innocent, was fafe . As he had no great genius or capacity himfelf, he hated all men of letters, and discountenanced every liberal art and science; whence only freed-men applied themselves to the study of the law, and that of eloquence was intirely neglected: to be a great philosopher was reckoned a crime, Constantius looking upon the philosophers as magicians, against whom he enacted, as we have observed, most rigorous laws P. However, he founded and endowed a library at Constantinople, enriched it with a large collection of choice books, and appointed a person with a handsome salary to take care of it 4. But among so many bad quad lities, he had some good ones. In crimes of treason, real or only suspected, he behaved like a tyrant, says Ammianus; but in other respects was not a bad prince r. He was of very low stature, says the same writer, but enured to all manner of fatigues, and performed the military exercises, especially those of the infantry, with wonderful address. He was satisfied with a frugal diet, slept little, was an utter stranger to luxury, and of such chastity and temperance, as not to be even suspected of those vices which usually reign in courts. He is generally thought to have been the author of the law condemning those to death who were found guilty of crimes against nature ". He sometimes performed the meanest duties of a soldier, but at the same time knew how to maintain the grandeur and majesty of his station w. He · e despised all manner of popularity, which Ammianus ascribes to a greatness of mind worthy of a prince, but perhaps ironically; for elsewhere he derides his affected gravity, telling us, that he appeared in public like a statue, without moving his head or hands, without spitting or blowing his nose, (to these particulars that writer descends) lest he should by such vulgar actions degrade the majesty and grandeur of an emperor'. Tho' he had no genius either for poetry or eloquence, yet he was not quite unacquainted with polite literaturey; but of this his speeches, which we read in Ammianus, are no proof, fince they, as we may well imagine, were composed by that historian. Aurelius Victor and Eutropius commend him for the great respect he always shewed to his father, for his extraordinary modelty, and for rewardf ing, with uncommon generosity, every service done him. Themistius extols his magnificence, and observes, that he enriched all his friends. He finished the walls of Constantinople, begun by his father; repaired, at a great expence, many of the buildings there; and embellished the city with fountains, baths, and other stately edifices b. His panegyrists speak of him as a prince of great moderation, and inclined <sup>1</sup> Philost. 1. vi. c. 6. p. 85.

Chron. Alex. p. 684.

Ammian. 1. xviii, p. 119.
Ammian. 1. xviii, p. 119.
Ammian. 1. xvii. p. 203.
Liban. or. xxviiii. p. 591.
P. Liban. ibid. Eutrop. 1. xv. p. 44.
Themist. or. iii. p. 45.
Ammian. 1. xiv. p. 21, 22.
Idem ibid. p. 203.
Libem ibid. p. 201. & 1. xvi. p. 70.
Themist. or. ii. p. 39.
Vict. epit.
Cod. Theodof. ix. tit. 7. leg. 3. p. 59.
W. Ammian. 1. xxi. p. 200.
Libem, 1. xvi. p. 70.
Ammian. 1. xxi. p. 200.
Libem, 1. xvi. p. 70.
Ammian. 1. xxi. p. 200.
Libem, 1. xvi. p. 70.
Libem ibid. & Eutrop. p. 183.
Themist. or. iv. p. 62.
Libem ibid. p. 58.

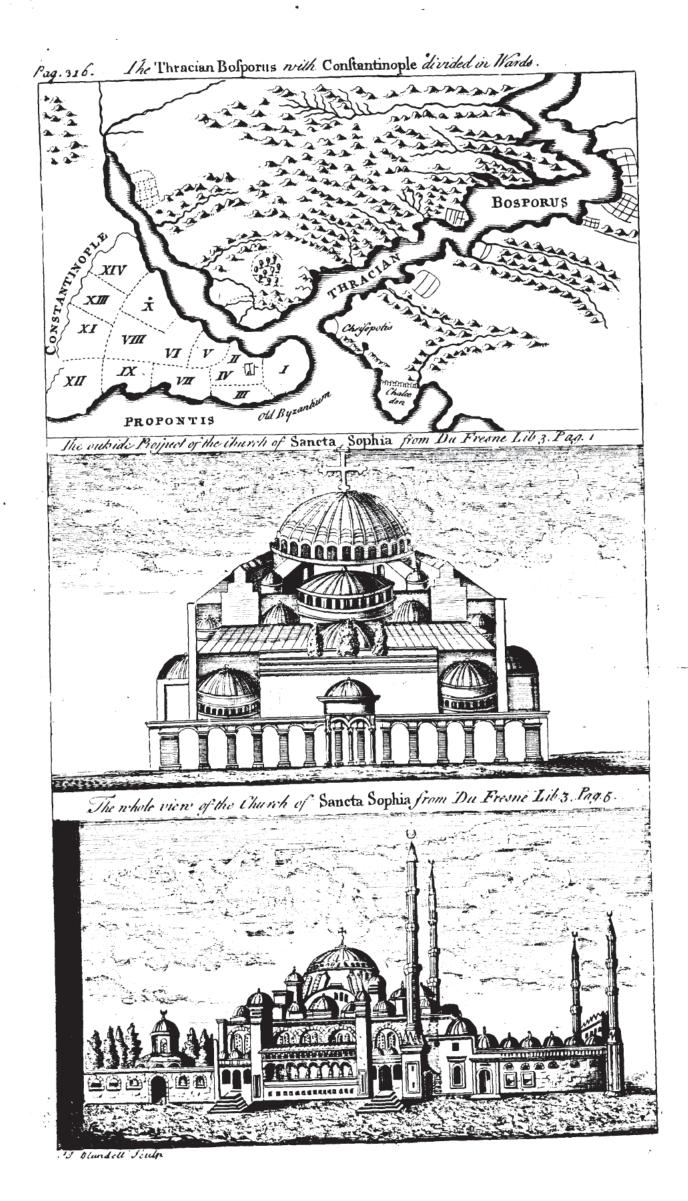

to mercy; but Julian tells us, that he was an utter stranger to all mercy and com- a passion, though he was commonly thought to be possessed of both these virtues. Crimes of treason he punished with the utmost severity, says Libanius 4; but bore with great patience, and was ready to forgive upon the least submission, all other affronts and injuries offered him. To confirm this, he tells us, that the inhabitants of Edessa having pulled down one of his statues, and publicly whipt it, adding, that he who deferved to be thus treated, was not fit to govern, the emperor, when informed of the infult, did not betray the least resentment, nor ever shewed the least ill-will to that city, or the authors of such an outrage, which few princes would have suffered to go unpunished. He was a most zealous promoter of the christian religion, and enacted several laws, of which we have taken notice in the history of his reign, for b the utter suppression of idolatry. He built a great number of churches, and among the rest the samous cathedral of Emesa in Syria, and the great church of Alexandria, called Casarea. As for that of St. Sophia at Constantinople, it was the work of Constantine, tho' commonly ascribed to his son Constantius. He not only built, but endowed and enriched, many churches with great revenues, and shewed, on all occafions, an extraordinary respect and esteem for the clergy, especially the bishops, receiving their bleffing in an humble posture, entertaining them at his table, exempting them from all manner of imposts and taxes, &c 8. But these favours he bestowed on those alone who professed the doctrine of Arius. As for the orthodox bishops, they were driven from their fees, and either banished, or imprisoned; nay, some of c them were, by the authority or connivance of the emperor, put to death. But to give an account of this perfecution is not our province, but that of the ecclefiaftic writers. Of the authors who flourished under Constantius, we shall speak in note (G).

LIBAN, orat. xiv. p. 399. e Idem ibid. p. 400. f Socra efcrip. p. 144, 145. B HILAR. contra Constant. or. p. 113, 1140 E JULIAN. epift. 23. p. 141. p. 94. Cange urb. Constantinop. descrip. p. 144, 145.

(G) Among the men of learning who flourished under Constantius, St. Ferom mentions Gennadius, Petrus, Victorinus, Minervius, Alcimus, Delp'idius, and Donatus (1). All we know of the two first, is, that they were both celebrated lawyers; that the former lived at Rome, and the latter at Saragoja in Spain (2). Ot Victorinus we shall speak hereafter. Tiberius Victor Minervius taught eloquence at Conflantinople, at Rome about the year 353, and at Bour-deaux, the place of his nativity (3). He is highly commended by Aufonius, who is proud of having studied under him (4). Alethius Minervius, his son, was likewise professor of eloquence in the same city; but died when he was yet very young (5). Latinus Alethius Alcimus was a native of the Agenois, or territory of Agen, and is by Aufonius counted among the professors of Bourdeaux (6; but he was likewise a pleader, and is commended by Apollinaris Sidonius for his knowledge of the law, and his extraordinary skill in the Greek and Latin tongues (7). He published some works, in which he commended the emperor Julian, and Salust, who was present of Gaul under that prince (8); but none of them have reached our times. Aufonius, who had a great value for him, commends his modesty, the mildness of his temper, his gravity, and the regularity of his life (9). Atticus Tyro Delphidius, the son of the orator Patera, or Paterius, of whom we have ipoken in our last note, acquired great reputation by his poems (10). As he was by profession a pleader, he accused of extortion before Julian in 358. Numerius governor of Narbonne Gaul; but could not make good the charge (11). He embraced the party of a tyrant, hoping by that means to make his fortune; but, without the tears of his father, he had been utterly undone (12). This tyrant can be no other than Procopius, who revolted from the emperor Valens in 365. Afterwards he taught rhetoric at Bourdeaux with great reputation (13), but in the reign of Valentinian, and not of Constantius, if what Sulpicius Severus writes be true, viz. that dying about the age of forty, he had not the displeasure to see his daughter Procula seduced by the Priscillianists in 380. and his wife Eucrocia, who had embraced the same heresy, beheaded about the year 384 (14). St. Ferom writes, that while he was yet very young, he was famous all over Gaul for his compositions both in verse and prose (15). Ammianus Marcellinus (16) and Apollinaris Sidonius (17) commend his lively and flowing eloquence. Tho we might infer from what we have quoted above out of Sulpicius Severus, that he was a christian, yet St. Jerom, in writing to Hedibia descended from him, speaks of him as a pagan (18). Donatus, under whom St. Jerom studied, taught grammar at Rome with great reputation in 354. Wrote comments on Terence and Virgil, and published several grammatical pieces, often quoted by Cassiodorus, who judged them more proper for children, than any thing written by other grammarians (19). Gregory the great speaks of the rules of Donatus, as generally raught at the end of the fixth century (20). Some grammatical pieces, explaining with great clearness the first principles, have reached us, under the name of Ælius Donatus (21). There are still extant comments on Virgil and Terence, which some

(1) Hier. chron. (2) Idem ibid. (3) Idem ibid. (4) Aufon. ibid. carm. 6. p. 150. (5) Hier. c. (7) Sidon. l. viii. epift. 11. p. 232. (8) Idem ibid. p. 147. (11) Ammian. l. xviii. p. 114. (14) Sulp. Sever. l. ii. p. 173, 177. Prosp. chron. ibid. (17) Apoll. Sid. l. v. ep. 10. p. 140. l. i. c. 4. p. 202. Cassiod. de orthogr. p. 255, 256. gram. c. 622. p. 27. 28. (3) Idem ibid. & Auson. de prosess. Burdigal. carm. 1. p. 137. Hier. chron. p. 254. (6) Auson. ibid. carm. 2. p. 141. dem ibid. (9) Auson. ibid. (10) Idem ibid. carm. 5. (5) Hier. chron. p. 254. (8) Idem ibid. (9) A (12) Auson car. 5. p. 148. (15) Hier. epist. 150. p. 140. (13) Idem ibid. p. 149. (16) Ammian. (19) Hier. in. Ruf. (18) Hier. epift. 150. p. 140. (21) Vide Baillet. (20) Greg. moral, p. 62. gram. c. 622. p. 37, 38.

BEFORE we proceed to the history of Julian's reign, it will not be foreign to our purpose, to give the reader a succinct account of the birth, parentage, education, and studies pretend to be those that St. Ferom ascribes to his master Donatus; but critics of more penetration are of opinion, that the fome observations in the com-ments on Virgil seem worthy of Donatus, yet the whole is altogether unworthy of a man of his parts (22). As for the comments on Terence, they are thought to have been written by one Evanthius, called by some Eugraphus, who died in the first year of Gratian's reign, or in 359 under Conflantius, as we read in the chronicle of St. Jerom, who calls him the most learned among the grammarians (23). He taught the Latin tongue at Constantinople, and, upon his death, Chrestus was sent for out of Africa to succeed him (24). The life of Virgil, ascribed by some to Donatus, is, in the opinion of Vosfius, a very mean performance, done not by Ælius Donatus, which he takes to be the name of the grammarian, under whom St. Ferom studied, but by one Tiberius Claudius Donatus (25). As for the life of Terentius, he takes it to have been written by Suetonius, and not Donatus (26). Nonius Marcellus, another celebrated grammarian, lived, as is supposed, about the time of Constantius, and was, as we gather from the title of his work on the propriety of Latin words, a native of Tivoli, and a Peripatetic philosopher (27). He is quoted and commended by Priscian; which feems very strange to Vossius, who speaks of him with great contempt, and thinks him commendable for no other reason, but because he has conveyed to us several passages out of the ancients, which are to be found no-where else (28). The works of Sex. Pompeius Festus bear a much better character than those of Marcellus. He wrote on the signification of words; but his work, which was only an abridgment of what Verrius Flaccus had written on that fubject in the time of Augustus, was abridged in the time of Charlemagne by Paulus Diaconus; and to this abridgment is owing the loss of the far greater part of that which was done by Festus (29). At what time Festus lived, we are no-where told. Some manuscripts have reached our times on the art of surveying or measuring land, done by one Innocen-tius, probably the surveyor of that name, who, ac-cording to Ammianus Marcellinus, was at the court of Conflantius in 359 (30). To him are likewise ascribed some remarks on the Roman laws, which, in our opinion, were rather the work of Innocentius the questor, who drew up most of the laws of Conflantius, as Eunapius informs us (31), and published several works both in Greek and Latin. The latter was grandfather to Chryfanthus, under whom Ennapins studied, and consequently was more ancient than the surveyor, and superior to him in rank (32). One of Constantins's officers, by name Innocentins, took holy orders, and, retiring from the court, led a folitary life on the Mount of olives (33). Vindanius Anatolius, a native of Berytus, Wrote ten books on agriculture, containing many useful rules, blended with some superstitious and heathenish observations (34). Part of that work has reached our times; but the author is there styled Vindamonius, and not Vindanius. One Anatolius, a pagan, and a native of Berytus, was presect of Illyricum in 349, and 359. (35), and died in 360 (36). He was perhaps the author of the above-mentioned work. One Andronicus was concerned in the affair of Parnasus, governor of Egyps, accused in 350. of having consulted the astrologers, as we related among the other transactions of that year; but Andronicus was absolved, and afterwards became famous, especially on account of his poetical compositions (37). Libanius speaks of a poet, by name Andronicus, who, he says, charmed all Egyps, and was still alive in 378 (38). Themissius, who was contemporary with Libanius, mentions a young Egyptian, who had a particular talent for writing tragedies (39); and Photius takes notice of several theatrical pieces written by one Andronicus, senator of the city of Hermopolis in Egypt, some of which were inscribed to count Phabammon of Cynopolis in the same country (40). Whether all these writers speak of one and the same person, we will not take upon us to determine. Sextus Aurelius Victor may be ranked among the writers who flourished under Constantius, tho' he died long after him, fince, in his reign, he wrote his history of the Roman emperors. He is comhis history of the Roman emperors. monly thought to have been a native of Africa, and to have been born of poor parents in some village of that country (41). He was, at least when he wrote his history, a pagan, as must evidently appear to all who peruse it. It begins with Augustus, and extends to the twenty-third year of Constantius; that is, to the end of the year 359. or the beginning of 360 (42); for he speaks of the victories gained by Julian in Gaul; but takes no notice of his affuming the title of Augustus, which he would not have omitted, had his history reached so far. He ascribes all the conquests of that prince to Constantius, at that time the object of his flattery (43). In the title, the work is faid to extend to the tenth consulship of Constantius, and the third of Julian, which happened in the year 360. This history is but a very concise abridgment. Another abridgment, done by the same writer, has reached our times, comprehending the lives of illustrious men, mostly Romans, from Procas to Julius Casar. This work is, by different writers, ascribed to Cornelius Nepos, to Pliny the younger, to Æmilius Probus, to Tacius, and to Suetonius; but Vossius, and other able critics, adjudge it to Aurelius Victor (44). To these two histories is prefixed a third, on the origin of the Romans, which likewise passes under the name of Sextus Aurelius Victor, and is thought by Andreas Scotus to have really been done by him; but Vossius takes it to be the work of some writer, who flourished after his time (45). Another history of the emperors, extending to the reign of Theodo-fins, goes under the name of one Sexus Anrelins Victor, whom we must distinguish from the author we are now speaking of. Ammianus writes, that Julian, while he was at Sirmium in 361. faw there Victor the historiographer, and foon after created him governor of the Second Pannonia, and honoured him with a statue of brass (46). The same writer adds, that he was generally esteemed on account of his wisdom, and was afterwards raised to the go-

(22) Idem, p. 29, 30. (23) Hier. chron. (24) Idem ibid. & Vost. hist. Lat. p. 743. (25) Id. ibid. p. 743. & orat. l. vi. c. 2. p. 432. (26) Idem ibid. (27) Vide Baillet. c. 620. p. 34. & Salmas. in not. in Spart. p. 241. (28) Vost. ibid. (29) Vide Baillet. p, 30, 35. (30) Ammian. l. xix. p. 149. (31) Eunap. c. 21. p. 144, 145. (32) Idem ibid. (33) Pallad. hist. Lausiat. c. 103. p. 1022. (34) Phot. c. 163. p. 349. (35) Eunap. c. 1. p. 117. (36) Ammian. l. xix. p. 166. & l. xxi. p. 185. (37) Idem, l. xix. p. 152. (38) Liban. vit. p. 158. (39) Vide Ammian. ibid. p. 230. (40) Phot. c. 279. p. 1596. (41) Vost. hist. Lat. p. 196. (42) Aur. Vist. p. 528. & 517. Casaubon. not. in Spart. p. 119. Vost. ibid. (43) Aur. Vist. p. 486. (44) Voss. ibid. (45) Idem ibid. p. 196. (46) Ammian. l. xxi. p. 190.

Rirth, educa- and studies of a prince so much spoken of by the ecclesiastic writers: Julius Constan- a tion and paren- tius, the brother of Constantine the Great, had two wives, viz. Galla, by whom he had vernment of Rome. Vossius and others take this to be the historian of whom we are now speaking; for he had ended his history the year before, as we have observed above (47). One Victor was consul in 369. whom Onuphrius supposes to have been the historian mentioned by Ammianus (48); but, had it been the fame person, Ammianus would, in our opinion, have taken notice of his consulftip, as well as his government. In an inscription of the time of Theodosius, that is, long after the year 369. he is styled governor of Rome, but not conful; which title would not have been omitted, had he ever discharged that office. Besides, it appears from Themistius (49), that Victor, who was contul in 369. was a commander of great prowefs and renown. Gothofredus publified in 1628. an ancient description of the world, as he styles it, done in the time of Constantius, and not of Constantine, as we read in the text, after that prince had finished the port of Seleucia, and after the earthquake which overturned the city of Duras (50). The port of Seleucia was perfected, according to St. ferom, in 346, and the earthquake happened in 345. The author takes no notice of the earthquake that ruined Nicomedia in 358, nor of that which over-turned Berytus in 348, or rather 349, whence Go-thofredus concludes that work to have been done about the year 347. He thinks the author infinuates, that there were then two emperors; and infers from thence, that he wrote after the death of young Constantine in 340, and before that of Constans in 350 (51). Gothofredus, in publishing this work, not only reformed the barbarous and uncouth language of the Latin text, and corrected the many faults he found in it, but added to it a Greek translation, suppoling it to have been written originally in that language (52); which supposition is rejected by Petavins, as falle and groundless. However that be, the author feems to have been better acquainted with the eastern than the western provinces. He was greatly mistaken in supposing Rome and Hetruria to have been comprised in what was at that time called Italy (53). Gothofredus is inclined to believe one Alypius of Antioch, famous in Julian's time, to have been the true author of this work; because that prince commends the geography, which had been fent to him by Alypius, the brother of Cafarius (54). But this geography feems only to have been a map, accompanied with some vertes. The author gives us a tolerable account of feveral cities, tho' for the most part, blended with many fables; which evidently shew him to have been a pagan, though he acknowledged a God the author of mankind (55). The beginning of the work bespeaks it imperfect (56; and besides, it is plain, that he had written several things relating to the Persians, which have not reached us (57); whence Gothofredus concludes this to be only a finall part of a much larger work (58). Vossius was altogether unacquainted with this writer. None of the authors we have hitherto mentioned were christians; but Julius Firmicus Maternus, who flourished at the same time, was not only a christian, but a zealous defender of the religion he protessed; for he addressed a work to the two emperors, Conflantius and Constans, animating them to complete the destruction of idolatry. This work is intituled, the errors and falshood of profane religions (59). The author not only exposes the absurd notions of the pagans, but explains, with great elegance and erudition, several articles of the christian faith. He wrote before the year 350. in which Constans died, and in or after the year 343, for he speaks of his journey to Britain, which happened that year (60). Though the ancients feem to have been quite unacquainted with this work, yet no writer, we know of, has ever questioned its being genuine. The author is diffinguished, in the title of the work, with the epithet of clarissimus, which was peculiar to the senators of Rome, and sufficiently consutes the opinion of Baronius, who will have him to have been bishop of Milan (61). Eight books on judicial astrology were published about the same time by one Julius Firmicus Maternus, who was likewise a Roman senator, and is therefore by some writers confounded with the above-mentioned author (62); but Possevinus maintains them to be two different writers (63): and truly the astrologer is styled, in the title of his work, fulius Firmicus Maternus junior; and the work itself is altogether unworthy of a christian. It is addressed to Mavortius Lollianus, and was begun in the reign of Constantine the Great, but finished in that of his son Confiantius, about the year 355 (64). With the year 354, the seventeenth of Constantius's reign, end two small works, published by Bucherius in 1633. With the paschal cycle of Victorius. Bucherius is of opinion, that they were composed that very year, and by the same author, to whom he afcribes three others contained in the fame manuscript (65). The first of these works is a list of the consists from 205, to 354, with the epacts, bissextile years, and the day of the week with which each year began. There are some missakes in the analysis has the rest is done with great exin the epacts; but the rest is done with great exactness (66). The manuscript which Bucherius made use of, was imperfect; but cardinal Noris having discovered an intire copy in the emperor's library, containing a lift of the confuls, from the two first, Brutus and Collatinus, to those of the year 354. he published it in 1689, with a learned differtation on that work, by him greatly esteemed (67). He is of opinion, that it was composed in 354, the year with which it ends (68). The second work published by Bucherius, is another list of the consuls and governors of Rome, from 254. to 354. From the year 288, to the end, the author not only names the governors, but the day on which each of them entered upon his office (69). The third begins with a short necrology of the bishops of Rome, in which are marked, according to the order of the months, the day on which each of them died, and the place where he was buried. It begins with Lucius, and ends with Julius. In this lift, Sixtus II. and Marcellus are omitted; the latter probably by a mistake of the transcriber, confounding him with his predecessor Marcellinus; and the former perhaps, because he is fet down in the calendar of martyrs annexed to the necrology, and containing the names of several martyrs according to the order of the months, and the time of their martyrdom; but they are all of Rome, ex-

(47) Voss. ibid. p. 196. (48) Onuph. p. 298. (49) Themist. orat. ix. p. 121. (50) Gothofred. vetus orb. descrip. p. 13. & 33. (51) Idem, p. 13, 14. (52) Idem, p. 7. (53) Idem, p. 33. (54) Julian. epist. 30. p. 163. Gothofred. p. 10. 11. (55) Idem, p. 9. (56) Idem, p. 3. (57) Id. p. 9. (58) Idem, p. 3. & 8. (59) Firm. Matern. c. 21. Bibl. patr. tom. 4. p. 99. (60) Du Pin, 10m. 1. p. 578, 579. Possevin. apar. tom. 1. p. 989. Matern. c. 29. p. 107. (61) Baron. ad. ann. 337. (62) Vide Du Pin. p. 577. (63) Possevin. p. 988. (64) Du Pin ibid. (65) Buch. cycl. p. 245, 247. (66) Idem, p. 247—251. (67) Noris fast. consular. (68) Idem, p. 23. (69) Buch. p. 236, 241, 244.

a had Gallus Cæfar, and other children, whose names are not known, and Basilina, descended of an illustrious family, being the daughter of one Julian, who was prefect, and the fifter of another, who was count of the east. The furname of Anicius was common to both, and the Anician family was one of the most illustrious in Rome h. Perhaps Basilina was the daughter of Anicius Julianus, who was consul in 322. and afterwards governor of Rome. She professed the christian religion; but seems to have been tainted with the doctrine of Arius; for she bore great hatred to Eutropius, the famous orthodox bishop of Adrianople k. She was married at Constantinople, and died a few months after she was delivered there of Julian, her only child. He was born in 331. after the month of June; for writing against Albanasius at the end of b 362. he fays, that he was then in the thirty-fecond year of his age, which was not ended on the twenty-fixth of June 363. when he died m. He was named Julian from his grandfather on the mother's fide, and is styled in all ancient inscriptions Julianus Flavius Claudius. He was of low stature, and a disagreeable aspect, which was besides disfigured with a long beard, as he is represented in most of his medals; but at the same time well-shaped, very nimble, active, and of great address at all sorts of exercifes a. As for his mind, he was endowed by nature with an extraordinary capacity, learned with furprifing quickness, and never forgot what he had once knowno; infomuch that those, whose province it was to instruct him, tho' persons eminent in every branch of learning, used to complain, that he too soon exhausted their stock c of knowledge P: hence he is by fome writers equalled, and by others preferred, to the greatest men Greece ever produced q. However, he was far better acquainted with the Greek than the Latin tongue: in the former he came not short of the best writers; but did not excel, according to Eunapius, in the latter. His eloquence was eafy and flowing, and accompanied by a graceful delivery s. In his answers offhand he displayed an uncommon penetration, vivacity, and presence of mind, and, in the greatest dangers, an undaunted courage and intrepidity. But whether the folidity of his judgment was equal to the brightness of his genius, we shall leave the reader to judge from his actions. He was naturally of a mild and sweet temper, had a violent thirst after glory, was greatly attached to his own opinion, which he fred quently preferred to the advice of his ablest counsellors, and strangely addicted to fatire and raillery . He was brought up at Constantinople till the death of his uncle Constantine, which was followed by the massacre of all his relations, in which were involved among the rest the father and elder brother of Julian; but Julian himself was spared on account of his infancy, being then but six or seven years old, as was his brother Gallus, because he happened to be at that time ill of a fever, and thought

** Ammian. l. xiv. p. 31. l. xxv, p. 291. Lib. orat. xii. p. 262.

p. 126. ** Athen. folit. p. 812. ** Julian. ad Athen. p. 502.
orat. xii. p. 262. Julian. mifop. p. 80. 81. & epift. 58. p. 214.
ibid. ** P Eunap. c. 5. p. 68. ** Idem, p. 589. & Vict. epit. p. 545. ** Eunap. ibid. ** Idem ibid. ** Ammian. l. xviii. p. 114. ** Idem, l. xiv. p. 31. Eunap. c. 5. p. 68. Socrat. l. iii. c. 1. p. 169.

cept St. Cyprian, and the famous martyrs of Africa, Perpetua and Felicitas (70). The fourth work for which we are indebted to Bucherius, is another catalogue of the bishops of Rome, which ends with Liberius, who fucceeded Julius, the last in the former list. As the election of Liberius is marked, and not his death, we may suppose this catalogue to have been written in his time. It is exceeding exact from Pontianus to the end; but full of militakes till his time. Anicetus, Eleutherius, and Zephyrinus, are omitted (71). The fourth work begins with the birth-days of the emperors, or the days of their accession to the empire, according to the order of the months. The last emperor mentioned there is Constantius, who is not styled, as the others, divus, but dominus; a convincing proof, that he was still living (72). This work contains likewise some verses, and a calendar of the sports, and other profane, and even idolatrous folemnities; but from the author's marking the dominical letters, we may conclude him to have been a christian. The work is inscribed to one Valentine, and is faid in the title to have been done by Furius Dionysius Filoccalus (73). The months of March, April, May, and June, are winting in the edition of Bucherius; but are to be found in Petavius's uranology, copied by him from Herwari (74). Du Cange will have the first author of the paschal chronicle, or the chronicle of Alexandria, to have ended his work in the year 354 for it is manifest, that this work was done by different writers, the same thing being often repeated, and sometimes related in a quite different manner. In some places the tenets of Arius are preached up, and in others condemned (75). As therefore Holstenius sound a manufcript of this chronicle ending in the year 354. Du Cange ascribes it to the first author, and what was afterwards added, to another, who not only continued the work to the time of Heraclius, but inserted several things into the part which had been done by the other (76). But the task of examining this point, we are willing to leave to others.

past recovery w- Some authors write, that Julian was conveyed away privately by Marcus bishop of Aresbusa in Syria, and concealed in a church is others, that Constantius ordered both him and his brother to be spared y. Julian himself tells us, that the emperor at first ordered him to be murdered with the rest of his relations; but afterwards contented himself with sending him into banishment?. Constantius suffered Gallus to enjoy part of his father's estate, and restored to Julian the estates both of his mother and grandmother, which had been confiscated a. Julian, at seven years old, was put under the tuition of an eunuch formerly belonging to his mother, named Mardonius, who discharged his trust with great care, inspiring him with an utter aversion to all manner of sports and diversions, and teaching him how to conquer his passions, and get the better of his evil inclinations b. The emperor afterwards committed the care of his education to Eusebius bishop of Nicomedia, a leading man among the Arians c, by whom he was brought up, partly at Nicomedia, and partly at an estate in Bithynia left him by his grandmother, where he planted with his own hands a vineyard. He took great delight in this place; but nevertheless gave it afterwards to one of his friends d. At the age of fourteen or fifteen, he was, by the emperor's orders, sent with his brother Gallus, who had been all this time confined to his estate in Ionia, to a castle called Macella, in the neighbourhood of Casarea in Capsadocia. There they had a royal palace for their habitation, a handsome allowance, a noble court, and the best masters to instruct them in all the sciences; but at the same time were furrounded by the eunuchs of the court, and kept in a manner prisoners, no one c being allowed, as Julian complains e, to visit them. In this exile or retreat they continued fix years; that is, till the fifteenth of March 351, when Gallus was created Cefar. The emperor's chief care was to appoint them fuch masters as were capable of inspiring them with sentiments of piety, and instructing them in the duties of the christian religion, which they were taught to practise, by conversing only with persons of religious and exemplary lives. They spent their time, says Sozomen, not in profane diversions, but in reading, meditating, visiting the churches, and the tombs of the holy martyrs f. They were even admitted to the office of readers, and read the holy scriptures in public, appearing no less satisfied with that function, than if they had been discharging the highest office in the states: and truly Gallus acted d therein with fincerity, he being not only a true, but a most pious christian; but Julian only studied, if Gregory Nazianzen is to be credited, to deceive the world with the mask of piety, and conceal his wicked inclinations h. Both that writer and Ammianus Marcellinus assure us, that he was, from his infancy, inclined to the religion of the ancient Romans, that is, to idolatry i; but he himself tells us, that he was a christian till he was twenty k; and Libanius, that when he came first to Nicomedia, which was in 351. or 352. he had an extreme aversion to the Roman gods!. Be that as it will, the different disposition of the heart, with which the two brothers performed the fame actions, was laid open to the eyes of the world, as we are told, by the following miraele, which we cannot omit, but intirely submit to the judgment of the They both undertook to build a church over the tomb of St. Mamas, a e celebrated martyr of Casarea in Cappadocia; but the side that was to be erected by Julian could never be finished; whereas that which Gallus had undertaken, was speedily completed. This miraculous event is not only related by Theodoret m, but by Gregory Nazianzen, who affures us, that he learnt it of those who had been eyewitnesses of it "; and Sozomen, who, in relating it, says the same thing, and adds, that many persons were still living, ready to confirm, as eye-witnesses, the truth of what he relates °. From this retreat Gallus was called to court, and created Casar, in the beginning of the year 351. and foon after the emperor was, with much-ado, prevailed upon to give Julian leave to quit Macella, and pursue his studies at Constantinople, where he saw his brother, as he passed through that city on his journey into the f east, with the title of Casar P. Libanius writes, that he met Gallus at Nicomedia, and obtained leave of the emperor to speak with him 9. At Constantinople Julian studied oratory, under a fophist of no great eloquence, but chosen by Constantius for his pre-

# Julian. ad Athen. p. 497. Socrat. l. iii. c. 1. Liban. orat. xii. p. 262. * Greg. Naz. orat. iii. g. y Idem ibid. p. 58. 2 Julian. ad Athen. p. 498. 1 Idem ibid. p. 502, 532. 5 Jul. iii. orat. p. 498. 2 Julian. ad Athen. p. 498. 4 Julian. epift. 46. p. 199, 200. 5 Julian. iii. orat. v. p. 37. 6 Julian. epift. 51. p. 210. 1 Liban. orat. v. p. 173. 6 Ammian. l. xv. p. 34. p. 9. Y Idem ibid. p. 50.
mifapog. p. 80, 81. C. Ammian. l. xxii. p. 219.
ad Athen. p. 499. F. Sozom. l. v. c. 2. p. 593. F. Theodoret. l. iii.
Naz. p. 58. Ammian. l. xxii. p. 208. K. Julian. epift. 51. p. 210.
Tueodor. p. 637. R. Greg. Naz. p. 59. & 61. Sozom. p. 594.

a ceptor, because he used, in all his declamations, to inveigh against the idolatrous worship of the pagan gods r. Socrates affures us, that this sophist was Ecebolus s, of whom hereafter. Julian's conduct at Constantinople, his application, and obliging behaviour, foon gained him the affections of the inhabitants of that city, though he appeared in the schools like a private person, and, following the directions of the eunuch Mardonius, carefully avoided the least mark of distinction. This no fooner came to the ears of the jealous emperor, than he ordered him to quit Constantinople, and retire to Nicomedia, or what other place in Asia he pleased; but strictly injoining him not to frequent the school of Libanius, a pagan sophist of great reputation, who being driven out of Constantinople, had opened a school at Nicomedia; which city he was likewise obliged to quit soon after, and retire to Antioch, the place of his nati-b vity. The sophist too, under whom Julian studied at Constantinople, prevailed upon him to promise, and solemnly swear, that he would never hear the lectures of Libitnius. Julian observed his oath; but, as he had a great esteem for that orator, he privately read his works, and imitated his style with better success than those who had studied under him ". During his stay at Nicomedia, he became acquainted with one Maximus of Ephesus, a pagan philosopher of great reputation, and much addicted to the fludy of magic, who, flattering him with the hopes of being one day emperor, inspired him with an aversion to the christian religion, which condemns all magical practices w. Libanius writes, that the precepts and instructions of a philosoc pher in Ionia, meaning, no doubt, Maximus, made fuch a deep impression on the mind of Julian, that he immediately renounced the christian religion, and embraced that of the Romans x. However, he was so far from owning his real sentiments, that, on the contrary, he put on the appearance of a fincere and zealous christian, causing his head to be shaved, fays Sozomen, affecting the dress and manners of a monk, and performing the office of a reader in the principal church of Nicomedia, while he at the same time privately adored the heathen deities, and caused himself to be instructed in the abominable mysteries of magic v. Gallus, who resided at Antioch, hearing somewhat of his brother's inclination to idolatry, endeavoured, by several warm and pious epistles, to confirm him in the true religion, and divert him from the idolad trous worship of the pagan gods z. But the sacrilegious curiosity of knowing suture events, fays Gregory Nazianzen, and the defire of reigning, prevailed over all other considerations 2. Upon the ruin of his brother Gallus, he was very near undergoing the same sate, being unjustly charged with several crimes, and suspected by the emperor of aspiring at the sovereignty, who thereupon ordered him to be arrested, and kept him for seven months surrounded by guards, sometimes in one place, and fometimes in another b, but mostly at Milan, where the emperor himself resided; for he tells us, that he was kept fix months in the great city which was the emperor's abode; and that, during the whole time he was detained there, he was but once admitted to see the emperor, and then by the mediation of the empress Eusebia, who e prevailed upon her hufband to hear him, and encouraged him to defend himself with liberty and freedom; which he did, without either justifying, through fear or complaisance, the emperor's proceedings against his brother, or provoking his vengeance, by complaining of the hard usage he himself had met with. Constantius promised him a second audience; which was put off from day to day, under various pretences, by the eunuch Eusebius, the emperor's great chamberlain, who began to apprehend, that Julian might, by degrees, gain not only the prince's favour, but confidence . However, Constantius being in the end convinced of his innocence, by means of the empress, he was allowed to return to his own country; that is, to his mother's estate in Ionia or Bithynia d. But a report being spread, before he set out, f that Africanus had revolted in Illyricum, Constantius would not suffer him to return to Asia; but, at the request of Eusebia, gave him leave to go into Greece, which he preferred to all other places, being desirous, as he pretended, to perfect himself in the sciences; but his true design was to confer with the magicians at Athens, whom he believed more skilled in that art than those in Asia . He arrived at Athens about

F Idem ibid.
SOCRAT. l. iii. p. 197.

EUNAP. C. 14. p. 132.

LIBAN. VII. p. 18. SOCRAT. p. 165.

EUNAP. C. 14. p. 132.

W SOCRAT. l. iii. c. i. p. 165.

SOZ. l. v. c. 2. p. 594.

LIBAN. OFAT. v. p. 175.

LIBAN. ibid.

F SOCRAT. l. iii.

C. i. p. 166.

PHILOST. l. iii. c. 27. p. 59.

LIBAN. OFAT. X. LIB. ibid.

GREG. NAZ. OFAT. ibid.

LIBAN. OFAT. XII. p. 267.

JULIAN. ad Athen. p. 501.

Glem ibid. p. 503, 504.

LIBAN. ibid.

JULIAN. ibid. EUNAP. C. 5. p. 74.

THEMIST p. 479.

VOL. VI. No 5.

the middle of the year 355, and there became acquainted with the two great lumi- a naries of the church, St. Gregory Nazianzen and St. Basil, who were at that time both improving themselves at Athens in the study of eloquence, of which they made afterwards so good an use. With the latter Julian read and studied, not only the prosane authors, but the books of the holy scripture, carefully concealing, through fear of Constantius, his real fentiments f; but he could not, with all his disguises, deceive the former, who, from his wild motions and gestures, which he minutely describes, forefaw, and foretold among his intimate friends, what afterwards happened 1. During his stay at Athens, he became familiar with the most zealous advocates for paganism, and the persons best versed in magic, expressing to them, in con- b fidence, his concern for the downfal of paganism, and his desire and intention of restoring it to its former lustre, as soon as it was in his power so to do h. He had been but a very short time at Athens, when he was recalled, to attend the emperor at Milan, who, it feems, had already determined with himself to raise him to the dignity of Casar 1. Julian left Greece with great regret, resolving not to accept the dignity with which he imagined the emperor designed to invest him, either because he loved a retired life, as Libanius would make us believe k, or rather dreading the fate of his brother, as he himself informs us 1. On his arrival at Milan, he lodged in a house without the city, where he was splendidly entertained by the cunuchs of the empress ... Constantius was not then at Milan; but he returned soon after to that city, and immediately communicated to his friends his defign of raifing Julian, who c did all that lay in their power to divert him from it; but Eusebia, who favoured Julian, prevailed; and the emperor ordered Julian to shave his long beard, to quit his philosophical cloak, and appear in the attire of a military man, and the garb of a courtier of. As he had hitherto led the life of a philosopher, or rather of a monk, his aukwardness in acting a part he had never been accustomed to, afforded for some time no small diversion to the other courtiers. The emperor assigned him an apartment in the palace, which he entered with dread and terror, reflecting, that he was to live among those who had shed the blood of his father and brothers, and massacred When he found the emperor, in spice of his warm remonstrances, his whole family. resolved upon his promotion, he earnestly intreated him to appoint such ministers d and officers to ferve under him, as might supply his want of experience, and to give him in writing directions relating to his whole conduct, that his only business might be to obey P. Constantius encouraged him, and having calmed his fears, gave him leave to wait on the empress, who removed all his apprehensions q. At length, on the fixth of November 355. he was declared Cafar with the usual solemnity, appointed governor of Gaul, and a few days after, by the interest of Eusebia, married to Helena, the empress's fister. We have related above in what manner he was treated, and how narrowly watched after his promotion. His houshold was changed, and of his former domestics only four were left with him, viz. two youths, his physician, and e his librarian. The latter alone was privy to his fentiments touching religion, as he himself informs us ". He lest Milan on the first of December, as we have observed above ", and arrived at Vienne in Gaul about the end of the year. His warlike exploits, already described by us in the reign of Constantius, seem to us altogether surprifing, when we reflect, that they were performed by one who was yet very young; who had been brought up in the country, and among books, and confequently was obliged to learn the first rudiments of war while he was leading the army to battle . During his stay in Gaul, as foon as he had quitted the field, he betook himself to his studies, especially to that of philosophy, but without neglecting the other sciences, in which he made a wonderful progress, being, according to Ammianus, not only an f excellent philosopher, but an eloquent orator, a good poet, well versed in the Roman and other histories, thoroughly acquainted with the Greek tongue, and pretty well with the Latin, in which he expressed himself with great case y. His two elogies on Constantius, his panegyric on the empress Eusebia, and his discourse in commendation of Salust, which have all reached our times, were the fruit of his studies in Gaul;

His conduct in Gaul.

Julian is de .

clared Calar.

f Basil. ep. 207. p. 122.

GREG. NAZ. p. 121, 122.

ad Athen. p. 503. Ammian. l. xv. p. 47. Liban. orat. x. p. 235. b Liban. orat. xii. p. 268. 1 Jul.
k Liban. ibid. 1 Julian. ad Athen. p. 505.

*** LIBAN. orat. xii. p. 268. & Julian. ibid. p. 17. & orat. iii. p. 228.

** Ammian. l. xv. p. 47.

** Ammian. l. xv. p. 49. Chron. Alex. p. 680. Socr. l. ii. c. 34. Julian. orat. iii. p. 230.

** Uide p. 296, 297.

** Julian. ibid. p. 526. LIBAN. orat. ix. p. 236.

** Julian. ibid. p. 509.

** Julian. ibid. p. 180.

** Ammian. l. xvi. p. 62.

a for in the first of these compositions he speaks of his promotion to the dignity of Cajar, and tells us in the second, that he had seen the barbarians on the banks of the Rbine, and the coasts of the ocean, which must have happened in the campaign of the year 358 4. The panegyric on Eusebia was written after that princess had been at Rome, in the latter end of the year 356 2. As Julian took great delight in learning, men of letters flocked to him while he was in Gaul from all parts, especially from Greece, and among the rest the pontiff of Eleusina, with whom he practited in private the abominable mysteries of magic, and consulted the aruspices and augurs; for, tho' he outwardly professed the christian religion, he was a heathen in his heart, and facrificed every morning to Minerva in his closet b. He observed great temperance His frugality. b and sobriety in his diet, remembering, says Ammianus, the saying of Cato the elder, viz. That whoever thinks too much of his table, thinks little of virtue. Having this maxim constantly before his eyes, he would not even suffer his table to be served after the manner prescribed by Constantius, who had given him instructions under his own hand, as we have observed above, which were to be the rules of his conduct, and descended even to his diet, but contented himself with the food of the common soldiers d. As he fed sparingly, he was satisfied with little sleep, reposing on a skin spread on the ground, and awaking when he pleased, which was constantly about midnight: the rest of the night he spent in writing, reading, and visiting before break of day the fentries and guards in their different stations; from this no inclec mency of weather ever diverted him. He never fuffered plays to be exhibited but He hates all on the first day of the year, and then not for his own diversion, (for he hated all storts. forts of sports, even those of the circus) but to comply with an ancient custom, and to humour the populace f. No dancers, comedians, players upon instruments, bustioons, &c. were suffered to appear at his court; nay, when he was emperor, he would not suffer the pagan pontiffs to affist at the infamous sports, as he styles them, of the theatre, nor to contract friendship with stage-players, dancers, drivers of chariots, &c. or even enter their houses: however, he allowed them to be present at certain combats, which he names facred, and at which no women appeared; but as for the combats, in which men entered the lists with wild beasts, he excluded d from them both the priests and their children 8. The grave and severe life he led in Gaul gained him the esteem and affections of the people there, who looked upon him as a prince sent down to them by heaven, the more because he made it his chief study to ease them of the heavy and insupportable burdens with which they were Studies to ease loaded by the emperor's officers especially by Eleventing present of Gayl, who are the people. loaded by the emperor's officers, especially by Florentius, presect of Gaul, who, on that account, conceived an implacable hatred against him, and did him all the evil offices at court that lay in his power. But Julian, preferring the welfare of the people to his own safety, in spite of Florentius, lessened the taxes, and reduced them from twentyfive pieces of gold a head to seven, which he found sufficient to defray all the expences of the war ; whence he was by all the people in Gaul looked upon as the restorer of e their country, and their common father 1. In what he undertook in favour of the people, he was greatly affilted by one Salust, a native of Gaul, in whom he reposed an intire confidence; which raised such jealousy in the other courtiers, that they took great pains to discredit him with the emperor, who was in the end persuaded to remove him, and appoint one Lucianus in his room k. Julian, sensibly affected in feeing himself deprived of the counsels of so trusty a friend, gave vent to his grief in the discourse which he wrote to bid him farewel 1. From that discourse, which is a kind of panegyric on Salust, it appears, that Julian had communicated to him his most secret thoughts; whence some conclude him to have been a pagan, tho' a man of great integrity, and an unblemished character ". The emperor, who was f then in Illyricum, sent him into Thrace; whence he was soon after remanded into Gaul, where Julian lest him in 361. with the character of presect. As Julian was

Julian. or. i. p. 82. & or. ii. p. 103.

**Idem, or. iii. p. 241.

**Dulian. ep. xxxviii. p. 180.

Liban. or. x. p. 140. & xii. p. 279.

Eunap. c. 5. p. 76, 77. Ammian. l. xxi. p. 180, 181.

**Ammian.

l. xxi. & xxv. p. 61. & 292.

**Idem ibid. p. 62.

**Julian. p. 60.

**Liban. or. xii. p. 304.

**Ammian.

Julian. Lib. ibid.

**Ammian. l. xxv. p. 292.

Julian. or. fragment. p. 555.

**Panegyr. xi. p. 223.

Ammian. l. xvi. p. 58.

Julian. ep. xvii. p. 133.

Lib. or. xii. p. 281.

Julian. ep. ad Athen. p. 518.

**Liban. ibid.

Julian. ep. xvii. p. 135.

**Ammian. l. xxi. p. 187.

univerfally esteemed and beloved by the people in Gaul, no wonder that they readily concurred with the foldiery in bestowing upon him the title of emperor in 360. as opened.

After his promotion, he continued for some time to profess a we have related above. outwardly the christian religion, and publicly assisted at the holy ceremonies of the church on the feast of the Exiphany in 361°. but threw off the mask soon after; for we are told by Libanius, that he no fooner faw himself master of Illyricum, than he He causes the opened the temples of the gods, offered facrifices according to the ancient rites, and temples of the exhorted all persons to follow his example, and restore to its former lustre the religion of their ancestors P. This happened before the death of Constantius, who died on the third of November 361. Since Gregory Nazianzen supposes him to have known, that Julian had renounced the true religion 4; and Libanius affures us, that before the emperor's death, the Greeks, especially the Athenians, declaring for Julian, had begun to offer facrifices as formerly, and practife the ceremonies that had been long b neglected, which gave occasion to a sedition raised at Athens among the sacred samilies, as Libanius styles them, meaning, no doubt, the families of the pontiss. The same writer adds, that Julian wrote several letters, exhorting them to peace and concord. We have mentioned above, what passed in Gaul and Illyricum, from the time Julian was declared emperor to the death of Constantius; and shall therefore, without repeating the same events, resume the thread of our history from that period, generally reckoned the beginning of Julian's reign. Constantius being dead, the eunuch Eusebius, and some others, who dreaded the resentment of Julian, and the punishment due to their enormous crimes, were for electing another emperor; but no one falling in with them, Theolaiphus and Aliguldus, both styled counts, were dispatched c Julian acknow- to Julian with the news of the emperor's death, and to assure him, that all the ledged emperor eastern provinces were ready to obey his commands. The two messengers found him apon the death at Naissus in Illyricum, employed chiefly in superstitious inquiries into the entrails of of Constantius. victims, and fometimes promifing himself the best, at other times apprehending the worst events. But the death of Constantius delivered him stom all his doubts and apprehensions, and put him in possession of the empire, without striking a blow'. We are told, that when he received the news of the emperor's death, he burst into tears, appeared the fame day in deep mourning, and betrayed an extraordinary grief > and concern amidst the repeated acclamations of the foldiery, saluting him with the title of Augustus'. He immediately issued orders for a general mourning, and com-

at Constantinopie.

manded all possible honours to be paid to the body of the deceased emperor . Soon after the meffengers, feveral horsemen arrived from Constantinople, affuring him, that the troops in those parts had unanimously acknowledged him emperor w. He there-He is received fore fet out without delay for Constantinople; and being met by almost all the inhawith great joy bitants of that metropolis at Heraclea, he made his public entry on the eleventh of December of this year 361, being attended by the senate in a body, by all the magistrates, and by the nobility in their best apparel, every one testifying with loud shouts of joy the satisfaction they felt in seeing such a promising prince; a prince, who had been born, and some time educated, in their city, who had already performed fuch wonderful exploits, raised to the empire without the least expence of blood e or treasure to the republic x. He was anew declared emperor by the senate of Constantinople; and as foon as that ceremony was over, he caused the obsequies of Confantius to be performed with the greatest pomp and solemnity imaginable. His next care was to form at Chalcedon a court of justice, to inquire into the conduct of court of justice the ministers of the deceased emperor, and to hear the complaints of such as had been to inquire into injured by them. In this court prefided Salustius Secundus, whom Julian had created the conduct of prefided of the cold of the conduct of prefect of the east, in the room of Elpidius, and we must take care not to confound Constantius. with Salust, prefect of Gaul, of whom we have spoken above: to distinguish them, we shall call the former Secundus, following therein Ammianus, and other writers. Julian reposed in both an intire confidence; and the presect of the east, though a f pagan, is highly commended, even by the ecclefiaftic writers, for his prudence, difcretion and compassion towards the christians persecuted by Julian, whose conduct towards them he loudly condemned. With him were joined in commission the two consuls elect Mamertinus and Nevita, the former presect of Illyricum, and the latter an officer in the army, with Arbetio, Agilo, and Jovinus, of whom the latter had been lately created general of the horse in Illyricum, and the two others had served

under

° Zos. l. iii. p. 711. Soz. l. v. c. 1. p. 590. Julian. ad Athen. p. 509. P Lib. of Greg. Naz. or. iii. p. 68, 69. F Lib. of. xii. p. 288. Ammian. l. xxi. p. 200. & Zos. l. iii. p. 713. Lib. of. xii. p. 289. Zos. l. iii. p. 713. * Ammian. l. xxi. p. 205. Socr. l. iii. c. 1. p. 164. Lib. of. xii. p. 289. Zos. p. 713. P Lis. or. xii. p. 288. hen. p. 509.

* Ammian. l. xxi. p. 200. & l. xxii. p. 204.

* 706. l. iii. p. 712. w Idem ibid.

a under Constantius in quality of generals. Arbetio was universally abhorred on account of his haughty and imperious behaviour, and was faid to have occasioned the ruin of feveral innocent persons under the late reign: whence the conduct of Julian seemed to all very strange, in appointing one to judge others, who ought himself to have been arraigned as a criminal; nay, we are told, that the whole authority was lodged in his hands, and that the others were named only for form-fake; which betrayed in Julian, says Ammianus, no small want either of judgment or vigour. Be that as it will, by this court were condemned to be burnt alive the famous Paulus Catena, Several of them and the noted informer Apodemus, as the chief authors of all the cruelties committed condemned and in the late reign. The eunuch Eusebius was likewise condemned and executed. These b executions were by all the world applauded as just and equitable; but the death of Urfula, and Urfula, a man of great merit and known integrity, was a stain upon the reputation demned unof Julian, whom he had supplied with money unknown to the emperor, when he justly. was fent into Gaul with the title of Cæfar, but without the necessary appointments to support that dignity. What prompted Julian to put him to death, we are nowhere told; but all authors agree, that he deserved no such treatment, especially at his hands; and therefore charge him with the blackest ingratitude in procuring the death of a person to whom he owed the greatest obligations. Julian, to palliate his ingratitude, cruelty, and injustice, pretended, that Urfula had been condemned and executed without his knowledge; but Ammianus himself owns this to be but a c lame excuse b. To atone in some degree for this crying injustice, he ordered great part of the cstate of Ursula, which had been confiscated, to be restored to his daughter, his only child c. Florentius, who was this year conful, and had, while prefect of Gaul, highly disobliged Julian, as we related above, was likewise sentenced to death; but he found means to make his escape, and appeared no more d: whence we must distinguish him from another of the same name, who was taken and beheaded with Procopius in 369. Two officers, whom Julian had discharged, offered to discover Florentius, provided they were restored to their rank; but Julian dismissed them, branding them with the name of informers, and adding, that to perfecute an unhappy man, who had been obliged to conceal himfelf, was an action unworthy of a d prince. Taurus, Florentius's collegue in the consulship, and prefect of Italy, was banished to Vercellæ, now Vercelli, in Piedmont, for no other reason but because he had sled when Julian entered Illyricum f. With the same injustice were banished another Florentius, who had been magister officiorum under Constantius, Palladius, who had discharged the fame office in the court of Gallus, and many others 8. Julian, not fatisfied with having punished some of Constantius's ministers, deprived the rest of their employments, without distinction, tho' there were among them several persons of unblemished characters, who had disapproved, and even opposed, most of the late measures. As the vast number of officers was become an intolerable burden to the public, he thought He reforms the himself bound to lessen it; and accordingly discharged all useless persons about court, court. preferring the frugality and modesty of a philosopher, says Ammianus, to the vain magnificence of a prince. He reduced among the rest the officers called agentes in rebus, from ten thousand to seventeen, and discharged thousands of cooks, barbers, and such-like vermin, who devoured the substance of the people, and with their large salaries drained the exchequer . Historians relate of him, that having called for a barber, and one appearing in a dress far above his condition, Julian looking upon him, and betraying great surprize, I called for a barber, said he, and not for a governor or senator. The curiosi, whose office it was to inform the emperor of what passed in the different provinces, were all discharged, and that employment intirely suppressed m. This great reform of officers and offices enabled him to ease f the people of the heavy burdens they groaned under; which he did, abating He enfer the throughout the whole empire the fifth part of all taxes and imposts ". He recalled people by leffenfrom banishment all the orthodox bishops, but with a design, as is observed both by ing the taxes. the pagan and christian writers, to raise disturbances, and sow dissentions in the church.

THE death of Constantius was no sooner known, than deputies were sent from the Deputies sent chief cities of the empire, to present the new prince with crowns of gold, and to from several cities and na-

Ammian. l. xxii. p. 206, 207. # Idem ibid. # Lib. or. xii. p. 298. Ammian. ibid. p. 206, 207. **sulate Julian.

b Idem ibid. # Lib. or. xii. p. 298. # Ammian. ibid. p. 206. # Idem, l. xxvi. p. 328. & l. xxii.

p. 210. # Idem, p. 206. # Idem ibid. h Idem, p. 213. **Lib. or. xii. p. 279. **Ammian.

l. xxii. p. 206, 207. **Idem, l. xxii. p. 213. Zon. p. 21. **Ammian. l. xxii. p. 207, 208. Lib.

Or. xii. p. 302. **P. UMAN. miss. p. 203. p. 210. l. xxii. p. 206, 207.

l. xxii. p. 206, 207.

l. xxii. p. 203.

l. xxii. p. 204.

l. xxii. p. 205.

l. xxii. p. 205.

l. xxii. p. 206.

l. xxii. p.

Vol. VI. Nº 5.

congra-

He invites to court philosophers, magiall parts.

congratulate him on his accession to the empire. Their example was followed by a feveral foreign nations, among which however we find no mention made of the Persians. The deputies of the Goths cavilling about the oaths they were to take, Julian ordered them to return home, and prepare for war; but contented himself with placing strong garisons in the cities of Thrace, and on the banks of the Danuber. Before he left Constantinople, he wrote to the philosopher Maximus, who had first inspired him, as we have observed above, with an aversion to the christian religion, inviting to court both him and another pagan philosopher and magician, named Chrysanthus. The latter, deterred by some bad omens, could not prevail upon cians, &c. from himself to comply with the invitation; but the former readily obeyed, and was received by the emperor at Constantinople with such tokens of friendship and esteem, b as to Ammianus feemed below the dignity of a prince P, tho' highly commended by Libanius 9. The philosopher, puffed up with the reception he met with from Julian, and the respect paid him by others out of complaisance to the prince, grew so proud and haughty, that it was less difficult to have access to the emperor than to him. By him Julian was perfuaded to write a fecond letter to Chryfanthus; nay, he condescended to write privately with his own hand to the philosopher's wife, hoping by her means to draw him to court. But finding him unalterably fixed in his former resolution, he created him high pontiff of Lydia; which office he discharged with great moderation. Forefeeing, without the affistance of magic, what might happen, he did not take upon him, as others did, to rebuild the temples of the gods; but c carefully avoided difobliging the christians, or doing them the least injury: hence the re-establishment of idolatry in that province was scarce perceptibles. The encouragement Maximus met with from Julian, drew to court from all parts swarms of philosophers, magicians, aruspices, and diviners of all denominations, who were kindly received by the emperor, entertained at a great expence, and raised to honourable employments, tho' many of them had in the late reign been branded with infamy for their notorious impostures, and condemned either to languish in prison, or to work in the mines. These were Julian's chief savourites; these the persons in whom he most confided ". But among them Maximus and Priscus bore the chief fway, affuming a port and authority ill fuiting their profession w. Iamblichus d of Apamea was likewise importuned by Julian to come to court; but he chose rather to lead a retired life, as did the great Basil, rejecting with contempt the tender which Julian, who had known him at Athens, made him of his friendship x. The christian writers add, that Julian's court was not only crouded with philosophers and magicians, but with infamous women; a charge not denied by Ammianus himself, who owns, that he was not undefervedly traduced and ridiculed for carrying about with him troops of women 2.

Julian pays great respect to the confuls.

THE next confuls were Claudius Mamertinus and Nevita, or Nevitta, who, on the first day of January, when they entered, according to custom, upon their office, went, before it was light, to wait on the emperor, tearing, fays Mamertinus in the e panegyric he pronounced on this occasion, he should be before-hand with them. Julian no sooner heard they were coming, than he hastened to meet them in the utmost consusion, as if he had been wanting in respect to them, kissed them, received them with the greatest regard imaginable, and would by all means attend them in their chariots, walking before them to the senate mixed with the croud b. His conduct on this occasion is greatly commended by some, and no less blamed by others, among the rest by Ammianus, who looked upon it as too mean, and below the majesty of a prince. It was an usual thing for emperors to accompany the new confuls on that day, but not on foot, it feems, nor blended with the croud. On the third of January, Mamertinus exhibited the circensian sports, when a troop of slaves being brought into the circus, in order to be declared free by the consul, according to custom, Julian, unacquainted with the prerogatives of the several magistrates, declared them free himself; but being told, that he entrenched upon the jurisdiction of the consuls, he begged pardon, and condemned himself to pay a fine of ten pounds weight of gold d. Ammianus observes, that Julian went frequently to a the senate, and spoke in all debates; whereas Constantius used to command the senators to attend him in the palace, and to fignify to them his will and pleafure, without allowing them to fit down in his presence. This year Julian appointed one Prætextatus governor of Achaia, who is mightily commended both by Ammianus f and Zosimus 8; and Photius quotes a discourse of the sophist Himera on his proconfulship, which office he still held in 364. and 365. under the emperor Valentinian h. Before he left Constantinople, he enriched that metropolis, the place of his nativity, He enriches the with many privileges, formed a large harbour to shelter the ships from the fouth city of Confinition to shelter the ships from the fouth city of Confinition to shelter the ships from the fouth city of Confinition to shelter the ships from the fouth city of Confinition to shelter the ships from the ships f wind, built a magnificent porch leading to it, and in another porch a stately library, with many priin which he lodged all his books. At length he left Constantinople in the month vileges. b of May, and fet out for Antioch: he passed through Chalcedon, and from thence went He sets ont to Nicomedia, the ruins of which city, overturned by an earthquake, he could not for Anticche behold without shedding many tears: he ordered considerable sums for the rebuilding of it, and then pursuing his journey by Nice, he turned out of his way on the borders of Galatia, to visit the famous temple of Cybele at Pessinus, which he enriched with offerings of a great value. He pronounced a discourse on that pretended deity, which he composed in one night, appointed Calixenes priestess of the temple, and then continued his rout to Aucyra, where he was met by the pagan priests carrying with them their idols. As foon as he arrived at the palace, he ordered considerable fums to be distributed among them, and the next day exhibited public sports k. c As he purfued his march, he was met in most places by crouds of people come to lay their complaints before him: he heard them with patience, and decided their differences with equity, not fuffering himfelf to be prejudiced in favour of those who complained, or against such as had given them occasion to complain 1. As he entered Cilicia, he was met by the inhabitants of a small village, one of whom accused another of aspiring at the empire, alledging, that he had ordered himself a purple habit, which was actually making. Julian heard the informer with great patience, and then told him, that when the purple habit was done, he might supply, if he pleased, the new prince with purple shoes m. The emperor, passing through Cilicia, arrived at length at Antioch, where he was received with the greatest demond strations of joy imaginable. Soon after his arrival, he went up to the top of mount Casius in the neighbourhood of that city, and there offered a solemn facrifice to Jupiter. On his return, Theodotus, one of the chief citizens of Hierapolis, who, it feems, had formerly done fomething to disoblige him, threw himself at his feet, intreating him to forgive him. Julian did not know him; but without inquiring who he was, or what he had done, embraced him with great tenderness, saying, In what you have disobliged me, I know not, nor do I care to know; but be what it will, you have nothing to fear under a prince, whose greatest ambition is to lessen the number of his enemies, and increase that of his friends a. During his stay at Antioch, he employed himself chiefly in hearing and deciding causes; in protecting the innocent, without He administers e distinction of christian or pagan, says Ammianus o; and punishing the guilty, without justice with forgetting his usual lenity and moderation. In the administration of justice, he readily impartality. hearkened to those who seemed better acquainted with the laws than himself, advising constantly with them before he gave fentence P. But notwithstanding his so much boasted equity and moderation, he sentenced to death Gaudentius, one of the late emperor's fecretaries, and Julian formerly vicar, for no other reason but because they had adhered to Constantius with great steadiness and zeal 4; which a generous prince would have rather thought worthy of reward than punishment. He treated in the same manner the son of Marcellus, accused of aspiring at the empire; but contented himself with only banishing Romanus and Vincentius, two officers of distinf ction, the convicted of the same crimer. Marcellus had highly disobliged Julian, while he commanded under him in Gaul, as we have observed essewhere. The ecclesiastic writers make long descants on the unheard-of cruelties, and innumerable murders, committed by Julian, during his stay at Antioch'. Gregory Nazianzen represents the Orontes, on which stood Antioch, choaked up with the bodies of such as had by his orders been privately murdered, or thrown into that river in the night-time; and adds, that all the ditches, caves, wells, ponds, &c. in the neighbourhood of that city, were filled with the bodies of the young virgins and children a whom he had inhumanly facrificed, hoping to discover future events in their entrails. These abominable practices, and barbarous murders, were kept secret, and carefully concealed, during his life-time, fays Theodoret u; but after his death many chefts were found in the palace, filled with the bones of those he had thus inhumanly sacrificed. It is furprising, that such cruelties should have been known only to the christian writers. Both pagan and christian authors observe, that during the short time Julian reigned, the empire was constantly afflicted by some grievous calamity or other: dreadful earthquakes were felt in every province; most of the cities of Palestine, Libya, Sicily, and Greece, were overturned w. Libanius writes, that not one city was left standing in all Libya, and but one in Greece; that Nice was utterly ruined, and b Constantinople greatly damaged . The temples of Apollo at Rome and Daphne were about the same time consumed by fire. The sea in several places broke in upon the land, and destroyed whole cities with their inhabitants. At Alexandria, the sea retiring during an earthquake, returned afterwards with such violence, that it laid under water feveral towns and villages, and drowned an incredible number of people y. To these calamities was added a general drought, which lasted till the winter was far spent, and produced an universal famine: the famine was followed by a dreadful plague, and both continued till the death of Julian, carrying off great numbers of men and cattle 2. The ecclesiastic writers observe, that the samine followed Julian from place to place; and that, as he continued longer at Antioch, than in any other c city, it raged there with most violence. Julian, to remedy this evil, fixed the prices of corn, and all other provisions, which increased it beyond measure, the merchants conveying privately their corn to other places. By this means that great and populous metropolis was reduced to fuch miseries as can hardly be expressed a. THE following year, 363. Julian entered upon his fourth confulthip, having Salust, the prefect of Gaul, for his collegue; and on that occasion Libanius pronounced the panegyric, which is still extant b. Julian, on the first of January, visited the temple of Jupiter, and there performed the heathenish sacrifices, which had been long omitted, for the safety of the empire. As the inhabitants of Antioch were mostly christians, and besides highly provoked against Julian, to whose impiety in wor-dshipping the idols they ascribed the samine, and the other calamities, with which the whole empire was afflicted, they published several lampoons, reslecting on the desects of his person, and exposing him to ridicule on account of his small stature, his forbidding aspect, his long and rough beard, his port and gestures, which were, it seems, somewhat odd and ridiculous. They styled him butcher, by reason of the many victims he was daily immolating; and rallied him, not without reason, says Ammianus, for taking pride in carrying himself the utenfils for the sacrifices, and acting rather the part of a priest than an emperor. The strange and fantastical figures, which he caused to be engraved on his coins, were, and not undeservedly, one of the topics of ridicule d. Julian, highly provoked with the ralleries of the people of Antioch, and severe satires that were daily published against him, and sung publicly in the streets, wrote an ironical invective against the Antiochians, styled The His Antiochian Antiochian or Misopogon, that is, the beard bater; in which he represents them intirely or Misopogon addicted to their interest, abandoned to luxury, pomp, and lewdness, great admirers of plays, farces, and all forts of diversions. And truly, that his reproaches were not groundless, is manifest from the homilies which the famous Chrysostom preached a few years after in that city. However, Ammianus affures us, that, blinded with passion, he mixed with the truth many things that were quite foreign to it. Elias of Crete, as quoted by Gregory Nazianzen, tells us, that, in composing this piece, Julian was affisted by Libanius f. Maximus too had, in all likelihood, a hand in it; f for to his censure Julian used to submit all his compositions 8. The Misopogon was received by some better, by others, especially the christians, worse than it deserved: it is a continued fatire, not without humour; but in many places flat, low, and insipid. He wrote it seven months after his arrival at Antioch, that is, about the

* Ammian. ibid. p. 210. Lib. or. x. p. 245. P Ammian. l. xxii. p. 210. Lib. or. xii. p. 299. Eunap. c. 5. p. 79. Idem ibid. p. 80, 81. Idem, c. 21. p. 148, 149. Idem, c. 5. p. 80, 81. Ammian. l. xxii. p. 225. W Eunap. ibid. Basil. ep. 206, 207. p. 225, 226. Y Chrys. in gent. p. 676. Greg. Naz. or. iv. p. 221. Ammian. l. xxii. p. 217. Panegyr. xi. p. 222. Idem, c. 5. p. 80, 81. Y Chrys. in gent. P. 226. Ammian. l. xxii. p. 218. Or. xii. p. 299. Idem, c. 5. p. 80, 81. Idem, c. 5. * Ammian. 1. xxii. p. 209. d Idem ibid. p. 224.

The empire afflicted with many calamities.

Julian rallied by the Antio-

chians.

&quot; Тнеорок l. iii с. 22. р. 659. t GREG. NAZ. ibid. w Ammian. l. xxii. p. 226. Soz. l. vi. c. 2. p. 639. CHRYS. & GREG. NAZ. 1bid. * LIB OT. X11. p. 314. 7 AMMIAN. 1. XXIII. p. 240. GREG. NAZ. p. 112. Soz. p. 639. vit. p. 43, 44 & or. x. p. 227. Sock. p. 390. CANGE, Byz. fam. p. 39. ep. xvi. p. 131.

a latter end of January of the present year 363 h. Tho' he had been highly provoked by the fevere reflections, and biting ralleries, of the Antiochians, yet in his Misopogon he folemnly declares, that none of them shall on that score lose their lives, be beaten with rods, arrested, or imprisoned; but threatens to withdraw from a city, which thus requited, with the utmost ingratitude, the innumerable favours he had heaped upon it, and the extraordinary care he had taken in relieving the citizens, when in the utmost distress. His design was to reside at Tarsus, and with this view he He designs to wrote to Memor, governor of Cilicia, one of his intimate friends, injoining him to leave Antioch, and reside at get every thing ready for his reception against his return from the Persian war, Tarfus. which he was then bent upon k. Libanius tells us, that about the time Julian wrote his Misopogon, ten foldiers, incensed against him on account of his attempting to b re-establish the worship of the gods, conspired to murder him while he was exercifing his troops. But the plot being discovered by the conspirators themselves, when they were intoxicated with wine, they were all arrefted, and brought before Julian, who generously forgave them, tho' convicted of the crime laid to their charge!

Julian had, ever fince his accession to the empire, shewed a strong inclination to He prepares for make war upon the Persians, and try whether he could humble that haughty enemy, the Persian war. who had tor many years haraffed the eaftern provinces in a most miserable manner, and defeated all the attempts of his predecessor. Being advised, soon after his arrival at Constantinople, to fall upon the Goths, he answered, that he designed to enter the e lists with a more formidable enemy m. Before he left that metropolis, he had appointed his generals, and named the officers and foldiers who were to ferve under them. Victor was created general of the foot, and Hormisda of the horse. The latter was the elder brother of Sapor, king of Persia; but having been excluded from the crown, and kept some time under confinement, he sound means to make his escape, and took sanctuary in the court of Constantine in 323 ". Julian, during his stay at Antioch, pursued his preparations for the Persian war, drawing together his troops from all quarters, erecting magazines, making new levies, and, above all, confulting the oracles, the aruspices, magicians, &c. The oracles of Delphos, Delos, and Dodona, affured him of victory. But the aruspices, and most of his d courtiers and officers, did all that lay in their power to divert him from his intended expedition P. But the deceitful answers of the oracles, the confidence he reposed in the magicians, and the defire of adding the Persian monarch to the many kings he had already feen humbled at his feet, prevailed over all other confiderations 4. The Persians, according to Theodoret, began hostilities, by making inroads into Mesopotamia. But Libanius tells us, that the king of Persia wrote to Julian, offering to conclude a peace with him upon such terms as he should think just and reasonable; but that Julian, defirous to revenge the many affronts offered to the Romans by that haughty prince, tore the letter, and would hearken to no terms s. Socrates Will bearken to speaks of embassadors sent by Sapor with advantageous proposals, but dismissed by no terms.

e Julian with this answer; that ere it was long he hoped to treat with their master in person. Several nations sent deputies to Julian, offering him their assistance, which he refused, saying, The Romans are to assist their allies, but stand in no need of their assistance u. He likewise rejected, and in a very disobliging manner, the offers He disobliges of the Saracens, answering them, when they complained of his stopping the pension, the Saracens. which was paid to their nation by other emperors, that a warlike prince bad steel, but no gold; which they resenting, joined the Persians, and continued faithful to them to the last w. However, he wrote to Arfaces, king of Armenia, injoining him to keep his troops in readiness to execute the orders he should soon transmit to him. Having made the necessary preparations for so important a war, as soon as the f season was fit for action, he dispatched orders to his troops to pass the Euphrates, with a defign to enter the enemy's country before they had the least notice of his march, placing guards for that purpose on all the roads. Before he left Antioch, he appointed one Alexander, a cruel and passionate man, governor of that city, saying the citizens deserve no better y. He set out from Antioch on the fifth of March, He sets out and reached the same day Litarba, a village in the territory of Chakis, and about a fifteen leagues from Antioch. The magistrates of that great city, who had attended him thither, wishing him a happy journey, and a triumphant return, he told them in a great passion, that he would never visit them again, being resolved to winter at Tarfus'. He had told them before the same thing in the presence of Libanius, who thereupon wrote two speeches, the one, addressed to Julian, in favour of the inhabitants of Antioch, and the other to the inhabitants themselves ". Of these, the first only has reached our times. From Litarba, Julian proceeded to Berea, where he halted a day, and pronounced a speech before the council of the place, exhorting them to adore the gods of their ancestors. He writes himself, that they all heard him with attention, and commended him; but few followed his advice w. At the b The conduct of head of the council was a zealous christian, who had not only difinherited, but turned out of doors, his fon, for renouncing the christian religion. As Julian drew near Berea, the son accosting him, acquainted him with the treatment he had met with from his father, and the motives of his indignation. The emperor, pitying his condition, bid him take courage, and be under no concern: For I will take upon me, added he, to appease your father, and reinstate you in his favour. Mindful of his promise, the fame day he invited the chief citizens of Berea, and, among the rest, both the father and the son, to sup with him. The two latter he placed by him; and in the midst of the banquet, turning to the father, I do not think it reasonable, said he, to use any violence in point of religion. Allow your son to prosess a religion different from yours, c as I allow you to profess one different from mine, tho' I might easily oblige you to renounce it. What! replied the father, are you speaking in favour of an impious wretch abborred by heaven, who has preserved falshood to truth, and renounced the worship of the true God, to fall down before idols? Injuries and investives, replied Julian, interrupting him, are foreign to our purpose, and therefore I beg you would forbear them: then turning to the fon, It is incumbent upon me, faid he, to take care of you, since your father is deaf to my prayers and intreaties in your behalf x. He was better pleased with the inhabitants of Batne, the next city he came to; for they had, before his arrival, restored the public worship of the gods. There he offered sacrifices, and having immolated a great number of victims, he pursued the next day his journey to d Hierapolis, the capital city of the province Euphratesiana, which he reached on the ninth of March. He was met at a great distance by crouds of people; but as he entered the city, fifty foldiers were killed, and a great many more hurt, by the fall of a porchy. At Hierapolis he lodged in the house of one for whom he had a particular esteem and veneration, because he was the fon-in-law of Sopater, the disciple of Iamblichus, and because neither Constantius nor Gallus, who had both lodged in his house, had ever been able to prevail upon him to renounce the worship of his idols 2. From Hierapolis, Julian wrote to Libanius, giving him an account of his journey, and of several things he had done at Hierapolis 3; but takes no notice of the death of the fifty foldiers. He lest Hierapolis on the thirteenth of March; e and having passed the Euphrates on a bridge of boats with his army, he came to Batnæ, a small city of Osrhoene, about ten leagues from Hierapolis, and different from the city of the same name in Syria. There fifty soldiers more were killed by the fall of a stack of strawb. From Batnæ he proceeded to Carrbæ, where, in the famous temple of the moon, he performed some ceremonies with his magicians, to the moon at fays Theodoret, which were not known then, but were discovered after his death; for that writer tells us, that he ordered the gates of the temple to be shut, sealed them with his own fignet, and placed guards round the temple, with orders to let no one enter it till his return. But when the news of his death was brought to Carrbæ, the gates were opened, continues the same writer, when, to the great sur- f prize of the whole city, a woman was feen hanging by her hair, with her arms firetched out, and her belly open c. What Theodores writes is not vouched by any other author; but they all agree, that Julian privately facrificed in the temple of the moon at Carrbæ; which ceremony being over, he delivered, as we read in Ammianus, a purple robe to his kinsman Procopius, the only person whom he had admitted to the facrifice, injoining him to seize on the empire, if news should be a brought him of his death d. This looks as if the omens had not proved favourable. But on the other hand Libanius writes, that the gods revealed to him, that he was not to die till he had humbled the Persians; and bestows great encomiums upon him for having chosen to hasten his death, rather than to deprive himself of the glory he was to acquire in this ware. While he was at Carrba, news being brought him, that a party of the enemy's horse had broke into the Roman territories, he resolved to leave an army in Mesopotamia to guard the frontiers of the empire on that side, while he advanced on the other into the heart of the Persian dominions. This army confifted, according to fome 8, of twenty thousand, according to others, of thirty thousand, chosen troops, and was commanded by Procopius, and Sebastian, a famous b Manichean, who had been governor of Egypt, and had perfecuted there, with the utmost cruelty, the orthodox christians. These two were to join, if possible, Arsaces king of Armenia, to lay waste the fruitful plains of Media, and meet the emperor in Assyria. Julian wrote to Arsaces, acquainting him with his design, but in the most disobliging terms imaginable, treating him as if he had been the meanest of his His conduct toflaves, reviling the memory of Constantius, to whom that prince had been ever wards the king greatly attached, and extolling his own abilities and skill in war. As Arfaces pro- of Armenia. fessed the christian religion, Julian, after having threatened to treat him as a rebel, if he did not, with the utmost punctuality, execute the orders laid upon him, added, And the God you adore will not be able to screen you from my indignation. Thus c Sozomen. There were two roads leading from Carrbe to Persia, the one to the left by Nisibis, and through the province of Adiabene; the other to the right, through Assyria, along the banks of the Euphrates. On both these roads Julian had caused magazines to be erected, but chose the latter; and after having, from an eminence, viewed his army, confifting of fixty-three thousand men, he set out on the twenty- The order of fifth of March for Davana or Dabana in Mejopotamia, and arrived the next day at his march. Callinifus or Callinicum, where he flopt the twenty-seventh to celebrate the feast of the mother of the gods. The day following he proceeded on his march, and encamped the night in the fields near the Euphrales; where he was met by his fleet, confifting of feven hundred gallies, and four hundred ships of burden, commanded by count d Lucillianus, and the tribune Constantianus. From Callinicum he proceeded to Cercufium, called also Circefium, situated at the conflux of the Abora and the Euphrates, and reckoned one of the strongest places in Mesopotamia, having been fortified by Dioclesian, to prevent the sudden irruptions of the Persians, who, in his reign, had even surprised Antioch. At this place Julian passed the Abora with his whole army, and then ordered the bridge to be broken down, that his foldiers might not be tempted to defert, feeing they could not return home. From Cercujum he advanced to Zaitha, where the tomb of the emperor Gordian was still to be seen. On the seventh of April, a soldier, and two horses, were struck dead by a flash of lightning; and a lion of an extraordinary fize, prefenting himself to the army, was dispatched in a moment by the foldiers with a shower of darts. These omens occafioned great disputes between the philosophers and the aruspices, the latter looking upon them as inauspicious, and advising the emperor not to proceed on his intended expedition, and the former refuting their arguments with others more agreeable to Julian's temper 1. The emperor, after having passed the Abora, which parted the He enters the Roman and Persian dominions, encouraged his men with a proper speech to revenge Persian domithe many injuries and affronts, which of late years had been offered by the haughty nions. enemy to the Roman emperors. When he had ended his speech, he ordered large fums to be distributed among them, a hundred and thirty pieces of filver a man, fays Ammianus. He then proceeded on his march with the greatest order and precaution imaginable. Nevitta led the right wing along the Euphrates; Arintheus and Hormisda were in the lest, with some troops of horse; Julian himself commanded in the centre, and the rear was brought up by Dagalaiphus, Vistor and Secundinus: a body of fifteen hundred horse was appointed to scour the country for intelligence, and to prevent any surprize. To strike the greater terror into the enemy, he ordered his ranks to be widened; by which means the army took up about ten miles, and appeared at a diffance far more numerous than it really was ... Having * Lib. pro templ. p. 24.

Berea.

The route of Julian's army.

He sacrifices Carrhæ.

EVAGR. 1. vi. c. 11. p. 452. JULIAN. p. 156. AMMIAN. p. 239. Evagr. l. vi. c. 11. p. 452. Julian. p. 170. Gordon p. 157. * Theod. l. iii. c. 17. p. 655, 656. p. 156. Socr. l. iii. c. 17. p. 190. w Julian. ep. xxvii. p. 157. * Theod. l. iii. c. 17. p. 655, 656. y Julian. ibid. p. 159. Lib. or. xii. p. 311. * Julian. ep. xxvii. p. 159. * Idem ibid. p. 160. b Lib. or. xii. p. 111. Ammian. l. xxiii. p. 239. 240. * Theodor. l. iii. c. 21. p. 658, 659. brought " LIB. vit. p. 44. JULIAN. ep. XXVII.

* Ammian. p. 240.

* Soz l. vi. c. 1. p. 634.

* Ammian. l. xxiii. p. 440.

* Idem ibid. Zos. p. 715. Lib. or. xii. p. 312.

* Daffed d Ammian. p. 240. $ Zos. 1. iii. p. 714. Soz. l. vi. c. 1. p. 634. Zos. l. iii. p. 314. 1 AMMIAN. p. 244-246.

He lays waste Affyria.

He reduces feveral towns

and strong.

bolds.

passed the Abora, he entered Assyria, says Ammianus; but, according to Libanius, 2 he croffed vast deserts before he reached that province, which he found very populous, and abounding with all necessaries of life; but he laid it waste far and near, fetting fire to the magazines, and destroying the provisions which he could not carry with him a. By that means he put it out of his power, which was judged very impolitie, to take the fame rout on his return. Six or feven days after he had paffed the Abora, he came to a fort called Annathan, which capitulated upon the first summons; whereupon Julian preferred the officer who commanded there, by name Puleus, to the rank of a tribune. He ever after ferved the Romans with great fidelity, and was in the end created duke of Egypt. Here was found a Roman foldier, who falling fick when Galerius invaded Persia fixty-fix years before, had been lest in the enemy's country. b Upon his recovery, he lifted himself among the Persian troops, being then in the flower of his age, and had ferved with great reputation. When he was brought to Julian, he affured him, that he had been often forefold, he should live till he was near an hundred years old, and be buried at last in the Roman territories. Ammianus supposes the place to have been by him betrayed to the Romans v. Julian burnt all the places he found abandoned by the inhabitants; but left feveral strong-holds behind him, without attempting to reduce them, upon their promifing to submit, when he had made himself master of the rest of the country?. After the army had repassed the Euphrates, at a place called Baraxmalcha, Hormisda would have fallen into an ambuscade laid for him by the enemy, had he not been luckily prevented by a canal, c which he could not pass, from advancing to the place, where a body of Persians lay in wait for him, under the conduct of Surena r. After this, Julian passed with great difficulty an arm of the Euphrates, which was swelled to an unusual height by the melting of the fnow, and laid fiege to Berfabora or Pyrifabora, next to Ctefifbon the strongest place in Assyria, being fortified with a double wall, and a citadel, and defended by a numerous garifon. But Julian, furmounting all difficulties, reduced it in two days time, in spite of the most vigorous resistance he met with, both from the garifon and the inhabitants, who fought to the last like men in despair. He found in the place great store of provisions, and distributed among his soldiers, who began to mutiny, an hundred pieces of filver a head, having with much-ado pre- d vailed upon them to be fatisfied with that fum s. Having thus pacified the army, and fet fire to the town, he purfued his march, and entered a country, which the enemy, forefeeing he would pass that way, had laid under water; but the soldiers, animated by the example of their leader, waded through it with great resolution, and arriving at Maiozamalcha, a place of great strength, which resused to submit, they drew a double line round it, battering the walls night and day, without intermission; but the besieged obstinately held out, till the Romans, by means of a mine, got into the city, while the Persians were busied in defending the walls. Ammianus, who was at this siege, calls Maiozamalcha a great and populous city; and his authority is of more weight with us than that of Libanius or Zosimus, who suppose it to have been only e a castle near a large and populous city named Besuchis. Julian, incensed against the governor for not furrendering the place at the time agreed on, and for calling Hormisda a traitor, ordered him to be burnt alive, and gave up the city to be plundered by the foldiers. As the army was now within seven miles of Ctesiphon, and Vistor, who had visited all the roads, assured them they had nothing to apprehend, He advances to they advanced to a city, which had been formerly ruined, fays Ammianus, by a Roman emperor, meaning, according to some, Seleucia, ruined by Lucius Verus, and, according to others, Sabata, about three miles from Ctesiphon the great metropolis of the Persian empire ". From this place they advanced to a fort, which was taken by assult, after a short, but vigorous resistance, Julian himself having narrowly f escaped being killed by a shower of arrows discharged against him, as he was viewing the walls too near w. Having razed the fort, he allowed his army some time to refresh themselves; and then, causing the canal to be cleansed, which had been formerly dug by Trajan between the Euphrates and the Tigris, he conveyed by that means his fleet from the former to the latter river. After this, he led his army to Coche, a place of great strength, standing on the Tigris over-against Ctesiphon; but we are not told that he attacked it. All we know is, that he passed the river with no

Cteliphon.

B LIBAN. ibid. p. 313. Soz. l. vi. c. 1. p. 634. Ammian. l. xxiv. p. 263. LIBAN. 0721. xii. p. 312. P Ammian. p. 264. Idem, p. 265. Idem ibid. Zos. p. 715. Manian. ibid. p. 269, 270. 1 Idem, p. 271. LIBAN. p. 316. Zos. p. 721. AMMIAN. Zos. ibid. w Ammian. p. 275.

a less rathness than courage, in spite of the utmost efforts of the enemy, encamped on the opposite bank, whom he obliged to retire, and shelter themselves within the Puts the Perwalls of Ctesiphon. Some of the Romans pursued them to the very gates of the city, fians to sught, which they would have entered with the enemy, had not Vistor prudently restrained and passes the Tigris. them. The Persians lost on this occasion, according to some, two thousand five hundred, according to others, fix thousand men, and the Romans only seventy or seventy five. Only part of the Roman army passed the Tigris that day, and made themselves masters of the Persian camp. The rest followed the next day, and Julian himself, with his guards, three days after . Julian continued some days encamped before Ctefiphon; but not daring to attack it through fear of being repulsed with b shame, as it was very strong, well stored with provisions, and defended by a very numerous garison, he contented himself with sending Arintheus to lay waste the neighbouring country. In the mean time the king of Persia was assembling, on the most distant confines of his kingdom, a formidable army, with a design to fall upon Julian in his retreat. However, he sent deputies to propose terms for an accommodation, being defirous to put an end to so destructive a war. These applied to Hormisda, as their countryman, and their king's brother, who immediately flew to the emperor with the agreeable tidings, as he imagined; but Julian, instead of hearkening to the proposals, ordered Hormifda privately to dismiss the embassadors, He rejects proand give out, that they were only some of his old friends come to see him; for he posals of peace. c apprehended, that both the foldiers and officers would have difapproved of his purfuing so dangerous and troublesome a war, when a peace might have been concluded upon honourable and advantageous terms. The embassadors being dismissed, Julian, contrary to the advice of his officers, resolved to advance farther into Persia; but the army had no fooner fet out on their march, than, changing his mind, he began to think it more adviseable to turn back, not by the way he came, the country without makon that side being laid waste, but to take his rout along the banks of the Tigris; ing any atwhich he did accordingly, without so much as attempting to reduce Ctestiphon, tho' tempt upon he had lain several days before it. He marched some time along the Tigris, which Cteliphon. he had on his left, being conducted by guides well acquainted with the country; but d who in the end betrayed him: for, as they were natives of Persia, they persuaded Deceived by him to quit the river, and take a quite different rout, notwithstanding the remonstrances of Hormisda, and all the officers of the army; who, looking upon the guides burns his fleet. as persons sent by the enemy on purpose to lead them into some snare, did all that lay in their power to divert Julian from sollowing their advice; but he, reposing in them an intire confidence, resolved not only to leave the Tigris, but to burn his fleet, lest the enemy should become masters of it. This resolution alarmed the whole army, but was nevertheless put immediately in execution, only twelve small vessels being spared, which were to be conveyed over land in waggons, to make bridges, if there should be occasion. When the fleet was first set on fire, the army e began to mutiny, and cry out with one voice, That the emperor was betrayed; that the pretended guides were real traitors, sent by the enemy on purpose to lead them to destruction. Julian, to appeale the foldiery, ordered the guides to be put to the rack, when they owned themselves to be what they really were, confessing, that, in adviseing him to burn the fleet, they had no other design but to ruin him and the army. Hereupon great care was taken to extinguish the fire, and fave the ships; but the slames could by no means be overcome, till the whole fleet, except the above-mentioned twelve vessels, was reduced to ashes . After this, Julian pursued his march through a country, fays Ammianus, very fruitful in itself, but ravaged and laid waste by the sometimes in the rear. Julian, not knowing what rout to take in a strange country, Isreduced to and finding his army quite dispirited, summoned a council of all the chief officers of great fireights. the army, when, after many confultations, they refolved to march towards Cordinene, * Ammian. p. 278. Liban. p. 319. Zos. p. 726. 7 AMMIAN. p. 281. * Ammian. I. xxiv. p. 281. LIBAN. p. 301. ZONAR. p. 23.

enemy; insomuch that the Romans were reduced to the last extremity for want of f provisions, and at the same time harasted without intermission by strong parties, who, in a manner furrounding them, attacked them fometimes in the front, and which lay fouth of Armenia, and belonged to the Romans. Pursuant to this resolution, they set forward on the fixteenth of June; but had not marched far, when they discovered at some distance a very numerous army advancing in full march against them.

Vol. VI. Nº 5.

But diftreffed for want of provisions,

His speech before his death.

This was the Persian army, commanded by the king in person, attended a by two of his fons, and all the nobility of the kingdom. The Romans thought it adviseable to return to their camp, where they were, in a manner, besieged the next day by the numerous troops of the enemy. Several skirmishes happened on that and the ten following days, in which the Persians were constantly put to slight. In a sharp encounter on the twenty-second of June, almost the whole Persian army Puts the Per- engaged; but were, after a very vigorous resistance, put to the rout with great tians to flight; flaughter. The Romans remained masters of the field; but found little satisfaction in a victory which could not relieve their wants in a strange country, where no provisions were to be had, the corn, grass, and every thing else, being burnt up by the enemy. Julian himself laboured under the greatest perplexity and uneasiness imagin- b able, finding the Persians were resolved to oppose his march, and attempt all means to distress him, without ever coming to a general engagement. At length, the night preceding the twenty-fixth of June, as he rose, according to his custom, about midnight, and was busied in his tent in reading or writing, he beheld all on a sudden before him, with a countenance full of forrow, the spectre representing the genius of the empire, which had appeared to him, as we have related elsewhere, upon his being declared emperor. He was somewhat terrified at this unexpected fight, and at other omens which happened at the same time, and were looked upon by the aruspices as portending some great misfortune, if he should undertake any thing that day. But Julian, despising, contrary to his custom, the predictions of his soothfayers, as foon as it was day, ordered his army to decamp, being probably no longer And hara sid able to subsist in the same place. On his march he was attacked on all sides by the on his march by enemy, who, after they had discharged their arrows, which never failed doing great army, and mor- execution, retired, without giving him an opportunity of revenging the death of those tally wounded. who fell. In one of these sudden onsets, the emperor hastening, without his armour, to repulse the enemy, was mortally wounded by a dart, which, through his arm' and fide, pierced his very liver. Those who were about him, concluding, from his finking down upon the neck of his horse, that he was wounded, conveyed him with all speed upon a large shield to his tent, where Oribasus, a celebrated physician, and his intimate friend, attempted in vain to fave him, applying the best remedies his art d and skill could suggest. However, as the pain began to abate, he called for his arms and horse, being desirous to animate his men with his presence; but his strength not answering his courage, as he was greatly weakened by the loss of blood, he was forced to continue in his tent, while his men, filled with rage, and breathing revenge, made a dreadful havock of the enemy, till night put an end to the flaughter. Fifty Persian lords of great distinction were killed, and an incredible number of other officers and common foldiers. The Romans lost Anatolius, who was magister officiorum, and generally effeemed an officer of great skill and experience. The prefect Salust was with much-ado faved by his apparitors; but Phosphorius, his vicar, was slain, with many others in the right wing, where the emperor commanded. While the fight continued, Julian lay languishing in his tent; and being apprised that his end approached, he addressed those about him, who seemed greatly dejected and concerned, in the following terms: "I am now, my fellow foldiers, called upon to pay the last debt of nature, which I do with a willing and chearful mind, being taught by philoso-" phy, that the state of the foul is infinitely more happy than that of the body. "Upon this confideration, I embrace death as the greatest bleffing: it exempts me " from the many dangers to which my virtue and reputation were daily exposed. I " have lived, first in a private, and afterwards in an exalted state, and have so behaved in both, as not to be conscious to myself of any action, that gives me at " present the least remorse. I have studied to govern with moderation, and being " well apprifed, that the end of all government is the happiness of the people, I have, both in peace and war, endeavoured, as far as in me lay, to render them happy. I have great reason to thank Divine Providence, for not having suffered me to fall by the hand of conspirators; to languish under a long and troublesome "disease; or to die like a criminal, as many innocent and deserving persons have "done. I submit with joy to the eternal and immutable decrees of the gods, tho" in the bloom of my age, being sensible, that he who is fond of life when he ought to die, is as great a coward, as he who desires to die when he ought to live. As " for my successor, I decline naming any, lest, through ignorance, I should pass by a worthy person, or, by naming one equal to so great a trust, expose him to g a " those dangers, which would inevitably attend his promotion, if it were not uni-46 verfally approved of. I therefore leave the choice to the commonwealth, and, " like a dutiful fon, wish her a worthy governor to succeed me." Having thus spoken, he disposed of his private estate, dividing it amongst his relations and friends; and not seeing Anatolius, inquired after him. Salust the presect told him he was happy, meaning he was dead, according to the expression then in use; which seemed greatly to affect him; but turning immediately to the philosophers Maximus and Priscus, he began to discourse with them concerning the nature of the soul: then, calling for a glass of cold water, he drank it, and having expressed his desire of being interred at Tarsus in Cilicia, he expired on the twenty-fixth of June, a little before Julian dies. b midnight. He died in the thirty-second year of his age, after having reigned seven years, and fix months, from the time he had been created Cafar; about three years fince he had taken the title of Augustus, and only twenty months, not quite complete, fince, by the death of Constantius, he became peaceable possessor of the whole empire. Thus is his death related by Ammianus Marcellinus, who served under him in this very expedition, and was an eye-witness of what he wrote 2. Theodores tells us, that Julian, when he was first wounded, filled his hand with blood issuing from the wound, and threw it up into the air, crying out, Thou hast conquered, O Galilean b. The same thing is related by Sozomen, who is of opinion, that our Saviour, whom he intended to infult and blaspheme with the name of Galilean, appeared to him when he received c his wound. But these, as well as other christian writers, have been led, by their aversion to an apostate from the faith, and a persecutor of the church, to believe and relate many things concerning him, which were unknown to the pagans, and have all the appearance of fables. Libanius writes, that, at the time of his death, a dreadful earthquake happened in Palestine, which intirely ruined several cities d. His body was conveyed by Procopius from Mesopotamia to Tarsus in Cilicia, where it was interred with the usual solemnity :; but afterwards transferred from thence, according to Zonaras and Cedrenus 8, to Constantinople, and deposited, with that of Jovian his fuccessor, in the porch of the church of the Apostles. This translation must have happened after the fifth century, fince Zosimus has not mentioned it. As for the character His character. d of Julian, he was, without all doubt, endowed with extraordinary parts, a great lover of learned men, and himself well versed in most branches of literature. Ammianus greatly extols his moderation, and the mildness of his temper, no less opposite to that of his brother Gallus, than the temper of Titus was to that of Domitian. He could never endure the title of dominus or lord, 'tho' common to all princes ever fince the time of Dioclesian, and had even some thoughts of quiting the diadem, which, for many years, had been looked upon as one of the badges of the fovereign power k. He made it his chief study to ease the people, lessening the taxes throughout the empire, and exacting no more than was absolutely necessary for the defence and support of the state 1. All the cities used, pursuant to an ancient custom, to present e the new prince with crowns of gold, some of which weighed a thousand, and some two thousand ounces, and upwards; but Julian enacted a law, forbidding any city, however rich or populous, to offer a crown weighing above feventy ounces. He would not fuffer his officers or ministers to receive presents from the people, upon any confideration whatfoever; nor the foldiers to injure in the least the subjects or allies of the empire, through whose countries they marched m. Libanius speaks much at length of the extraordinary care he took in regulating the public carriages, in chuling worthy magistrates, in clearing the high-ways of robbers, and in relieving feveral cities, reduced by heavy taxes to a most miserable condition ". His bed, says Mamertinus, was as pure and chaste as that of a vestal virgin "; and Ammianus, f that he was an utter stranger to all unlawful pleasures, and a declared enemy to lewdness and debauchery P. He was generous, adds the same author, valiant, sincere in his friendship, and kind to all, especially to such as were in distress, and most wanted his affiftance q. Prudentius speaks of him as a prince who deserved well of the empire, * Ammian. l. xxv. p. 287—295. b Theodoret. l. iii. c. 20. p. 658. Soz. l. vi. c. 2. p. 638. d Liban. vit. p. 458. & orat. xi. p. 258. Ammian. l. xxv. p. 305. f Zonar. p. 24. E Cedren. p. 78. Vide Cange urb. Constantinop. descrip. l. iv. p. 110. h Vict. epit. p. 545. l Ammian. l. xvi. p. 63. & l. xxii. p. 221. h Liban. orat. xii. p. 305. l Ammian. i. xvi. xvii. xviii. p. 63. 90. 114. m Liban. p. 305. l Idem, p. 296—298. Panegyr. xi. p. 230. P Ammian. l xvi. xviii. p. 63. p. 78. Vide Cange uto. Commun.

l. xvi. p. 63. & l. xxii. p. 221.
90. 114. LIBAN. p. 305.
l. xxv. p. 292. 4 Idem ibid. PRUD. apol. c. 4. p. 163.

both as a general and a law-giver. He was not however, even in the opinion of his admirers, without some faults. Ammianus owns him to have been of a fickle and a changeable temper, ambitious beyond measure of popular applause, elated with the least success, and talkative to such a degree, that his tongue never lay still s. The fame writer accuses him of cruelty and ingratitude, in condemning Ursula, to whom he owed the greatest obligations; and Libanius, tho' highly prejudiced in his favour, cannot help allowing him to have been superstitious to excess, inconsiderate on many occasions, and too much addicted to his own sentiments. Ammianus blames the censorious temper, which he betrayed in a manner unworthy of a philosopher, and below the dignity of a prince, in his misopogon, and his Cæsars, not sparing even the excellent emperor M. Aurelius. The pagan writers themselves, namely Eutropius ", Themistius w, and Ammianus Marcellinus x, own, that his conduct towards the chris- b tians was repugnant to the laws of humanity, and deferved to be buried in oblivion; which is more than a christian writer of our days seems willing to allow. As for the christian writers of ancient times, they represent Julian as one inclined to, and guilty of, the most enormous crimes; but crastily disguising them with a false shew of the opposite virtues. In these colours the reader will find his portrait drawn by Socrates in his ecclesiastic history, and by Gregory Nazianzen in the oration he wrote a few days after Julian's death 2. But whether the pagans were quite unbiassed by favour, and the christians by prejudice, is what we submit to the judgment of the reader. We will not take upon us to question the truth of what the panegyrists and admirers of Julian have written concerning his other virtues; but, as to his chaffity, we are c not fully convinced, that it deserved those mighty encomiums, which Mamertinus, Libanius, and Ammianus Marcellinus, have been pleased to bestow upon it; for on one fide it is certain, that by Helena, his only wife, he had but one son, whom the midwife, bribed by the empress Eusebia, destroyed as soon as born d. On the other side, Julian himself, in a letter which he wrote in 363, that is, three years after the death of Helena, mentions his children, and the person who was charged with the care of their education. Codin likewise, in his antiquities of Constantinople, takes notice of feveral statues erected to Julian, and his children . His bed therefore, to use the expression of Mamertinus 8, was not perhaps quite so pure and undefiled as that of a vestal virgin. The great Chrysostom describes the court of Julian, d while he resided at Constantinople, crouded with aruspices, astrologers, magicians, young debauchees, and public proftitutes. The latter, at least, were not proper attendants for one, who pretended to rival the purity of the vestals. But we will not lay any stress on the testimony of a christian, and consequently, as may be objected, a prejudiced writer, tho' he folemnly declares, that he himself, and all the inhabitants of Constantinople, to whom he appeals, were eye-witnesses of what he advances h. As for Julian's so much boasted moderation, Ammianus himself acknowledges, that it was sometimes owing more to policy, than to the natural mildness of his temper i. Libanius charges him with want of judgment in the choice of ministers, and of due care in watching their conduct; whence some of them, concludes e that writer, brought no small disgrace upon his government k. Libanius writes, that Julian was apprized of, but winked at, their faults, that he might not feem inconstant in his friendship!. Ammianus owns, that his court was not quite free from bribery and corruption m. In what related to the Divinity, says the same writer, he was rather superstitious than religious, sacrificing daily innumerable victims procured at a vast expence; which proved very burdensome to the state, and at the same time highly prejudicial to the military discipline, the soldiers, with whom he seasted on the victims, returning almost every day drunk to their quarters a. Had he returned victorious from his Persian expedition, continues the same writer, he would scarce have left a bullock alive in the whole empire. We need not therefore recur to the f testimony of the christian writers, to shew, that the many virtues ascribed to him by the pagans, were not without the allay of several vices and impersections. In short, he did not perhaps deserve the bitter reproaches with which he was traduced as the * Ammian. l. xxii. p. 206.

** LIBAN. orat. xii. p. 304.

** EUTROP. p. 589.

** Themist. orat. v. p. 69.

** Ammian. l. xxii. p. 222. & l. xxv. p. 294.

** Focat. l. iii. c. 21. p. 193.

** Greg. Naz. orat. iv. p. 138.

** Panegyr. xi. p. 230.

** LIBAN. orat. xii. p. 292.

** Ammian. l. xvi. p. 292.

** Admian. l. xvi. p. 292.

** Codin. antiq. Conft. p. 19.

** Panegyr. xi. p. 231.

** Chrys. in gent. p. 676.

** Ammian. l. xxii. p. 226. 227.

** Eutrop. p. 589.

** LIBAN. p. 307.

** Idem, p. 220.

** Ammian. l. xxv. p. 294.

** Idem, l. xxii. p. 225.

a worst of princes by the christians, nor the mighty encomiums bestowed upon him as the best of princes by the pagans.

THE news of his death was received with inexpressible joy by the christians, and with the deepest concern by the pagans. The messenger who brought it to Carrba, was either stoned to death by the populace w, or with much-ado escaped the fury of the enraged multitude x. Several cities placed the image of the deceased prince amongst those of their gods, and paid it the same honours. Libanius, transported with grief when he first heard of his death, determined to lay violent hands on himself, not caring to outlive him; but, upon fecond thoughts, he changed his mind, and chose to live, that he might have the fatisfaction, as he himself tells us, of compiling his b funeral oration. He wrote two discourses on this occasion, the one to express his own griefy, the other to fet forth the praises of Julian 2. From the latter, which contains the whole history of Julian's life, and from the two orations written much about the same time, and on the same subject, by Gregory Nazianzen, an impartial reader will conclude, that both writers were strangely biassed and prejudiced, the one in his favour, the other against him. Julian not only renounced the christian religion, whence he was furnamed the Apostate, but betrayed a mortal hatred to those who professed it, traducing them with the name of Galileans, as he impiously ftyled our Saviour the Galilean, debarring them from all honours and employments, c both civil and military, and prohibiting them either to teach or learn the sciences, which to Ammianus himself seemed inconsistent with the laws of humanity . But we refer our readers to the ecclefiastic writers for a more particular account of the persecution he raised against the church, and of his wild attempt to restore Judaism, and rebuild the temple of Jerusalem, which is said, by Ammianus and others, to have been miraculously defeated by balls of fire issuing out of the earth, and destroying both the work and the workmen. Of the feveral writers who flourished under Julian, the reader will find a succinct account in note (1).

w Zos. l. iii. p. 733. * Lib. or. xii. р. 330. * Амміан. l. xxii. p. 222. & l. xxv. p. 294.

f Lib. or. xi.

* Idem, or. xii.

(I) Ammianus Marcellinas, in his history of the emperors, gives us a more particular account of Julian's reign, than any other writer. As he was a pagan, he believes great encomiums upon a prince who did all that lay in his power to reflore paganism. However, he was not fo prejudiced in his favour, as not to blame in him what he thought blameworthy. Eunapius, a most zealous stickler for the ancient religion of the Romans, that is, for idolatry, often mentions and highly commends Juthe history of his reign in several books (1); but whether that was a different work from his general history of the emperors, is what we are no-where told. But of Ammianus Marcellinus, and Eunapius, we shall speak at the end of the reign of Valens. Calliflus, one of Julian's officers, wrote in verse, according to Socrates(2), the history of that prince; but his work has not reached our times. Vossias tells us, that Callisus attended Julian in his Persian expedition(3), which must be a conjecture of his own; for we find no such thing in Socrates, the only writer who mentions him. Julian himself deserves to be ranked among the writers of his life; for he wrote the history of his wars in Gaul (4), which has been long fince loft; and gives us an account of the most remarkable passages of his life in his Mispagen, in his letter to the Athenians, (of which two pieces we have spoken above) and in the writings which he published in the year 362, the one upon Cybele, the other against a Cynic philosopher (5). He wrote another discourse against the Cynics, particularly against one Heraclius or Heraclitus (6). From that piece it appears, that he was strangely impor-tuned by those philosophers, and that he entertained no better opinion of them, than of the christian monks, to whom he compares them. His discourse to Themistims is, properly speaking, a letter, in which he answers that philosopher, who had written to him from Conflantinople, magnifying the hopes and expectation of the people, in feeing one raised to the empire, who professed the study of philosophy. Julian tells him in his answer, that when he restects on the duties incumbent on a prince, and the great difficulty of discharging them well, the mighty hopes that the world entertained of him, served rather to dishearten than encourage him (7). This is the whole subject of the letter, which seems to have been written soon after Julian was raised to the dignity of Cafar. In the manuscript copy of this letter are several passages, which seem quite foreign to the purpose, and are thought by some to be fragments of a treatile, containing several instruc-tions, addressed to a pagan pontiss, concerning the duties of his office (8). Petavius is of opinion, that they were addressed to Arjaces, pontiss of Galatia, to whom Julian wrote his forty-ninth letter (9). But the most famous of all Julian's works is that intituled the Casars, which in reality is a satire on all the emperors from Julius Casar to Constantine and his children. It begins with a kind of dialogue (10). From the injurious and abusive manner he speaks of Constantine, we may conclude, that he wrote it after the death of Constantius, or at least after, he had openly declared against him. Socrates ascribes to a vanity unworthy of a prince, his thus ridiculing all his predecessors, without sparing even M. Aurelius (11), whom he had proposed to himself for his pattern (12). Vossius assures us (13), that in the ancient copies this work is styled Saturnalia, and the sophists,

<sup>(1)</sup> Eunap. e. g. p. 76, 77. (2) Socr. l. iii. c. 21. p. 195. (3) Voss. bist. Grac. l. iv. c. 18. p. 486. (4) Lib. or. v. p. 178. (5) Julian. or. vii. p. 382. Suid. p. 1248. (6) Julian. ibid. p. 716—718. (7) Julian. all Themist. p. 490, &c. (8) Idem, frag. p. 528. (9) Julian. ep. xlix. p. 202. (10) Idem, Cast. p. 3—5. (11) Socr. l. iii. c. 1. & 23. p. 169, 198. (12) Julian. ad Themist. p. 467. (13) Voss. Vol. N° 5. 4 R barquet;

banquet; a title which well fuits it; for it was written during the Saturnalia, or the feafts of Saturn, that is, about the end of December, in 361. or 362. and Julian in the work introduces Romulus entertaining the gods at a banquet in the time of the Saturnalia (14). But Suidas supposes the Casars and the Saturnalia to be two different works, and quotes some things out of the latter, which are not to be found in the former (15). Julian himself speaks of his Saturnalia as addressed to Salust (16), which cannot be faid of his Cafars. He quotes the former work in a discourse, which he wrote on the fun, and likewise inscribed to Salust. This piece he composed in three nights, perhaps about the twenty-fifth of December, when the pagans celebrated the feast of the fun; for Julian honoured that luminary as his chief deity (17). Suidas ascribes two other works to him, the one on the three figures, which he does not explain, and the other on the origin of evils; but both these works, as well as that which he wrote against the christians, have been long since loft. He wrote feveral letters, of which fixty-four have reached our times, not counting those which, by reason of their length, have been ranked among his discourses. Libanius, who pretends to have brought the epistolary style to its greatest perfection, shares that glory with fulian, the elegance of whose letters he greatly commends and admires (18). Under Julian flourished Proereses, a christian sophist, highly esteemed for his learning and eloquence. Eunapius, who was his disciple, gives us the following account of him: He was a native of Armenia, descended of a noble family, but reduced to poverty; exceeding weil-shaped, tho' of a gigantic stature, and resembling a colossus (19). He left his native country when very young, and studied first at Antioch, under one Ulpianus, and afterwards at Athens, where he vras disciple to one Julian, who in dying bequeathed him his house. He likewise succeeded Julian in his employment, and taught eloquence with fuch reputation and applause, that the other professors, jealous of his great credit, prevailed upon the proconful to banish him from Athens (20); but he was soon recalled by the emperor's order, and restored to his former employment. All those who came from Pontus, and the other parts of Asia Minor, or from Egypt and Libya, studied under him (21). Among thele we may reckon the great Bafil, and Gregory Nazianzen; for they came from Cappadocia to study eloquence at Athens, while he taught there. He was afterwards invited into Gaul by Constans, who received him with extraordinary marks of esteem, perhaps because he passed for a christian, says Eunapius (22); but St. Jerom assures us, that he was truly a christian (23). Suidas confounded Constantine with Constans, when he wrote, that Constantine paid him great honours (24). The Gauls, says Eunapius, who were no judges of his genius, nor capable of relifi-ing his eloquent speeches, admired his stature and mien, and, above all, his patience in bearing the cold of their country, tho' he used no shoes, and was only defended against the inclemency of that climate by a thin cloak (25). He was afterwards fent by Constans to Rome, where the senate caused a statue to be erected to him, with this inscription; Rome, the queen of cities, to the king of eloquence. When he left Rome, about the year 349 to return to Athens, Conflans bestowed great revenues upon him, with the honorary title of general of the Roman armies. The Romans, upon his departure, begged him to fend one of his disciples to teach eloquence at Rome. He complied with their request, and fent them one Eusebius, a native of Alexandria; a person fit to live at Rome, says Eunapius, because well versed in the art of flattery (26). Julian, who had, no doubt, been acquainted with Proceeses at Ashens, wrote a very kind and obliging letter to him, which is still extant (27). When that prince published the famous edict, forbidding all christians to learn or teach the sciences, he excepted Proereses; but he, scorning to accept the favour, refigned of his own accord his professorship; which greatly provoked fulian, who, out of pique to Proereses, heaped great honours upon Libanius (28). The generous conduct of Procreses on this occasion makes us question the truth of what we read of him in Eunapius; viz. that he had recourse to the pontiff of Eleusine, to know whether fulian was to reign long; and that, being assured his reign would prove short, he took courage, and resolved not to renounce the christian religion (29). Eunapius betrays on all occasions such an inveterate hatred against the christian religion, that we cannot give credit to any thing he writes on that head. After the death of Julian, Proceefes was, it seems, re-instated in his professorship, when Eunapius studied under him for the space of five years, and then returned to Lydia, his native country. He owns, that Proereses instructed him with no less care than if he had been his own fon. Proereses died foon after, perhaps in 368, being then about ninety-two years old; for he was eighty-seven when Eunapius began to study under him, in the end of 363. Which was the first of Jovian's reign (30). He left no works behind him, besides his declamations (31). Oribasus, a samous physician, was a native of Pergamus in Asia, according to Eurapius (32); of Sardis, according to Philostorgius (33) and Suidas (34). He studied physic under Zeno of Cyprus, to whom Julian wrote a letter, inviting him back to Alexandria, whence George, the famous Arian bishop, had caused him to be banished (35). When fulian was created Casar, he took Oribasus with him into Gaul, and reposed such considence in him, fays Eunapius (36), as to make him privy to his greatest secrets, that is, to his idolatry; for Oribasus was himself a pagan. The same author writes, that Oribajus was famous, not only for his skill in phytic, but for his other extraordinary talents, which procured the empire to Julian (37); but explains himself no farther. Oribasus, at the request of Julian, abridged, first, the works of Galen, and afterwards those of all the most able physicians. Both these works were inscribed to Julian, as appears from the prefaces, which have been transmitted to us by Photius (38). Photius prefers the second work to the first; nay, and to all the books of physic which had been published till his time. It contisted of seventy books; but only the first fifteen, with the twenty-fourth and twenty-fitch, printed at Paris in 1555. have reached our times Oribajus himfelf, by a second abridgment, reduced his seventy books to nine, which he addressed to his ion Eustathius (39). The reader will find an abstract of this work in Photius (40), who observes, that they may prove very uteful to those who are already acquainted with physic, by refreshing the memory of what they have learnt; but may lead new beginners into great mistakes (41). Oribasus wrote another abridgment of the same nature in four books, which he inscribed to Eunapius, probably the author of the lives of the (14) Julian. Cef. p. 3-5. (17) Idem, or. iv. p. 291, 292. (15) Suid. p. 1247. (16) Julian. ibid. p. 303. & or. iv. p. 294. (18) Lib. or. v. p. 184. (19) Eunap. c. 1. p. 102. (20) Idem, c. 7. p. 96—101. (21) 14cm, p. 222, 223. (24) Suid. p. 596. (25) Idem, p. 222, 223. (28) Suid. p. 596. (29) Eunap. c. 8. p. 126. (30) Idem ibid. 6. 5. p. 76. & c. 19. p. 139. (33) Philof. l. vii. c. 15. p. 205. ep. xlv. p. 198. (36) Eunap. c. 29. p. 140. (37) Idem ibid. (20) Idem, c. 218. p. 557. (40) Idem, p. 560. (41) Orib (22) Idem, p. 121, 122. p. 96---101. (21) Idem, p. 110, 111. (23) Hier. ad ann. 363. 5. (27) Julian. ep. ii. p. 116.

(31) Suid. p. 596. (32) Eunap. (26) Idem, p. 25. (32) Eunap. (35) Julian. (30) Idem ibid. (34) Suid. p. 329. (35) Julian. (38) Phot. c. 216, 217. p. 556, 557. (41) Oribas. p. 2.

fophists, at whose request he had undertaken it (42). This work is fill extant. To thete Photius adds four other books of physic inscribed to one Eugenius; but so like those addressed to Eunapius, that he suspects them to be a supposititious work (43). Belides the works we have already mentioned, Photius supposes Oribasus to have published seven more same subject (44). He would not have us to mind the style of that writer, because his works, fays he, are abstracts of different authors; and besides, elegancy of style is what we must not expect from a physician (45). Suidas supposes Oribasus to have inscribed to Julian seventy-two books, and to have published, belides four books on the doubts and diffculties of phylicians, a work on royalty, and another on maladies (46). He adds, that Oribasus was created by Julian questor of the city of Constantinople; an employment unknown to other writers. He attended fulian into Persia, and did all that lay in his power to cure his wound, but without fuccess. After the death of that prince, his patron and benefactor, he was stripped of all his wealth, and banished to the countries of the barbarians (47), or abandoned, to use the expression of Eunapius, to the barbarians, who were most noted for their cruelty (48). However, he was greatly respected by them, and honoured by their princes, on account of the art he protessed. At length the Roman emperors recalled him, and restored to him his estate, and all his effects (49). He gave some ease to Chrysanthus in his last malady at Sardes; but could not cure him (50). He was still living when Eunapius wrote the lives of the sophists, that is, about the year 400. Among fulian's letters, there is one to him, written about the year 358 (51). Himeras, a celebrated forhist in fulian's time, was a native of Bithynia, and the son of Aminius, who taught rhetoric at Prusa in the same province (52). Himeras and Proereses, of whom we have spoken above, were at the same time professors of eloquence at Athens, and rivals (53). Photius supposes him to have likewise taught at Corinth (54). Julian invited him afterwards to Con-flantinople, and received him upon his arrival with extraordinary marks of friendship and esteem. He continued in court till the death of that prince, and age, in which he lost his fight, and was besides afflicted with a leprofy. He left behind him several declamations, and other pieces of that nature (56). He was, as plainly appears from his writings, a negan. Furnity commends his style (52), as does pagan. Eunapius commends his style (57), as does likewise Photius, who has transmitted to us abstracts of some of his works (58). In the history of fullian's reign, we have mentioned the philosopher Maximus, who first inclined that prince to idolatry, and the study of magic. He was a native, either of Smyrna, as we read in Eunapius (59); or of Ephelus, as Ammianus will have it (60); and brother to the philosopher Claudianus, who taught at Alexandria, and to the fophist Nymphidianus, professor of rhetoric at Smyrna, and afterward fecretary to Julian. Maximus must have been well versed in polite learning, fince Julian submitted all his compositions to his judgment (61); and Eunapius has placed his life among those of the sophists, tho' he is commonly styled Maximus the philosopher. Julian invited him to court about the beginning of the year 362, where he behaved, as Eunapins himself owns (62), in a manner altogether unworthy of a philosopher. returned to his native country, as appears from 711lian's letters (62) for the recovery of his health; but came again to court, and, together with Prifcus, attended Julian in his Parthian expedition (63). These two were, without all doubt, in the number of those obstinate and ignorant philosophers, who, according to Ammianus, bore great fway at court, and put the emperor upon that wild enterprize, against the sentiments of the officers of the army (64). Hence, when news of Julian's death was brought to Antioch, the people, in the transports of their joy, cried out, Thus are the predictions of the false prophet Maximus fulfilled (65). Eunapius writes, that fovian continued to honour Maximus, and the other philosophers, who had followed Julian (66. Be that as it will, they were treated in a very different manner by Valentinian and Valens, who hated all the friends of Julian; and, above the rest, these two philosophers accused, as they were addicted to the fludy of magic, of having brought upon the princes the maladies with which they were both scized about the beginning of April in 364 (67). Priscus however was cleared; but the foldiery and populace were, with much ado, restrained by Sa-lustius Secundus from tearing Maximus to pieces. Having escaped the rage of the multitude, he was condemned to pay a greater fine than he was able to discharge, and kept a close prisoner till the end of the year 365(68); when, by the mediation of Themistius, who recommended him to Valens, in a fpeech pronounced before that prince, and by the interest of Clearchus, a zealous pagan, he was set at liberty, and not only forgiven the fine, but restored to his estate, and suffered to come to Constantinople, where he was very well received (69). But his harpiness was short-lived; for he was accused, with several other philosophers, as a magician in 371. found guilty of magical practices; and being fentenced to death with the rest, was beheaded at Epbefus the same year (70). Suidas ascribes to Maximus, the master of Julian the apostate, several rhetorical and philosophical pieces, some of which were addressed to Julian himself; but adds, that he was a native of Epirus or Byzantium (71): on the other hand, Socrates warns us not to confound Maximus of Byzantium, the father of Euclid, with Maximus of Ephejus, who induced Julian to embrace the worship of the gods (72). Chrysanthus was a native of Sardes in Lydia, in which city his father was fenator. He studied with Maximus under Edesus of Cappadocia, a Platonic philosopher and magician; and then returned to his native city, where he continued, notwithstanding the repeated and prosling folicitations of Julian and Maximus, inviting him to court. Julian created him pontiff of Lydia, in which employment he had the prudence not to disoblige the christians, as we have observed already; and therefore was fuffered by the christian emperors to live unmolested (73). He lived to the age of eighty (74). After his death, Eunapius, who was his wife's cousin, and had been his disciple, wrote

(42) Phot. c. 219. p. 561. (43) Idem, p. 564. & c. 216. p. 564. (44) Idem ibid. (45) Idem ibid. (46) Suid. p. 329. (47) Philosoper. l. vii. c. 15. p. 105. (48) Eunap. c. 19. p. 140. (49) Idem, p. 141, 142. (50) Idem, c. 21. p. 160. (51) Julian. ep. xix. p. 135. (52) Phot. c. 165. p. 363. Eunap. c. 12. p. 129. (53) Eunap. c. 8. p. 119. (54) Phot. c. 165. p. 352. (55) Eunap. p. 129. (56) Idem, c. 12. p. 129. Suid. p. 1239. (57) Eunap. p. 129. (58) Phot. c. 165. p. 352. (56) Eunap. p. 129. (56) Idem, c. 12. p. 129. Suid. p. 1239. (57) Eunap. p. 129. (58) Phot. c. 165. p. 352. (56) Eunap. p. 1076. 1144. (59) Eunap. c. 5. p. 67. & 16. p. 137. (60) Ammian. l. xxix. p. 390. (61) Julian. ep. xvi. p. 131. (62) Eunap. c. 5. p. 77. 79. (62) Julian. ep. xv. xvi. xxxviii. (63) Eunap. c. 5. p. 81. Ammian. l. xxv. p. 291. (64) Ammian. l. xxiii. p. 245. (65) Theodoret. l. iii. c. 22. p. 659. (66) Eunap. c. 5. p. 82. (67) Zof. l. iv. p. 734. 735. (68) Idem, p. 374. Ammian. l. xxvi. p. 315. Eunap. c. 5. p. 83. Themist. or. viii. p. 100. (69) Themist. ibid. p. 99, 100. Eunap. p. 84—87. (70) Ammian. l. xxix. p. 390. Socr. p. 39. Eunap. p. 87. (71) Suid. p. 92. (72) Socr. l. iii. c. 1. p. 165. (73) Eunap. c. 5. p. 69, 80. & c. 12. p. 144—149. (74) Idem, p. 152.

his life, and frequently mentions him in his history of the sophists, which he had undertaken at his request (75). Suidas likewise speaks of him, but does not inform us whether or no he lest any works behind him (76). Priscus was born in the country of the Molossi, or Thesproti, in Epirus; and studied under Edesus, with Maximus and Chrysanthus. Afterwards he retired to Greece, whence he was invited by Julian to court, and complied with the invitation. He was perhaps more esteemed by that prince than Maximus himself. He attended the emperor to Antioch, and there prevailed upon him to admit Libanius to his presence, and even to receive him in a friendly manner, tho' he was not a little prejudiced against him (77). He followed Julian into Persia, and was accused, with Maximus, of magical practices under Valens; but discharged, and suffered to return to Greece, where he lived to the age of ninety, and upwards (78); and was killed, with many others, by the barbarians (79), that is, we suppose, by the Goths, who, in 395. or 396. ravaged Greece under the conduct of the samous Alaric. Julian, in his letters, bestows great commendations on one George, a receiver of the public revenues; on the philosopher Eugenius, whom some take to be the father of Themissius; and on Ecebolus, under whom he studied rhetoric (80). As the celebrated sophist Libanius lived long after Julian's time, we shall speak of him in a more proper place.

(75) Idem, p. 153. (76) Suid. p. 1155. (77) Eunap. c. 5. p. 69. Lib. vit. p. 42: (78) Eunap. ibid. c. 81. Ammian. l. xxv. p. 291. (79) Eunap. c. 5. p. 75. (80) Julian. ep. viii. p. 121, 314. ep. liv. p. 218. ep. xviii. p. 135. ep. xix. xliii. p. 136, 196.

C H A P. XXVII.

The Roman history, from the death of Julian, to the death of Valens.

THE death of Julian was no sooner known, than the chief officers of the army affembled, and, with one consent, chose Jovian to succeed him b, who was accordingly faluted with the title of fovianus Augustus, the day after Julian's death; that is, the twenty-seventh of June of this year 363. He was the only surviving child of Verronianus, who was a native of Singidunum in Pannonia, or rather in Massia; and had lately refigned the eminent post of comes domesticorum, to lead a private and retired life. He was reckoned one of the best commanders of his time, and the reputation which he had acquired in the army, greatly contributed to the promotion of his fon d. The first thing Jovian did after his election, was to name him for his collegue in the confulfhip against the ensuing year; for Verronianus was said to have been foretold in a dream, that his son should be one day raised to the empire, and he to the consulship; but he died before he had the honour of discharging b that office, or the satisfaction of seeing his son emperor, tho' he had been informed of his promotion. Jovian, or Flavius Claudius Jovianus, as he is styled on an ancient coin, was born about the year 331. and married Carito, the daughter of Lucillianus, a commander of great renown, often mentioned by Ammianus. By her he had, according to Philostorgius f, a fon named Verronianus, who was born about the time Jovian was created emperor, and a daughter, of whom we find no farther mention; nay, Zonaras tells us in express terms, that Verronianus was his only child &. As Jovian was not only a true, but a pious and zealous christian, we shall not copy his character from the christian writers, who may be suspected of partiality, but from the pagans, who cannot be thought to have been biassed in his favour. Among these ¢ Eutropius commends his affable, mild, and generous temper; and adds, that no one could, with justice, accuse him of neglect or imprudence in the discharge of his duty . Ammianus Marcellinus i, and Victor the younger k, describe him as wellshaped in his person, of a majestic air, of a gay and agreeable aspect, of an even, affable and courteous temper, naturally inclined to mercy, and a great encourager of learning, being himself pretty well acquainted with the sciences. From the sew officers he preferred during his short reign, we may judge, adds Ammianus, how careful

b Ammian. l. xxv. p. 226. C Vict. epit, Ammian. ibid. p. 308. Themist. orat. v. p. 65. Ammian. Themist. ibid. Socrat. l. iii. c. 26. p. 205. F Philostorg. l. viii. c. 8. p. 112. Zon. p. 25. Eutrop. p. 589. Ammian. p. 296. Vict. p. 79.

a careful and circumspect he would have been in the distribution of offices, had he lived longer. Themistius bestows upon him still greater encomiums ; but we lay no great ftress upon them, as coming from a panegyrist. On the other hand, Suidas = paints him in quite different colours, following therein, as we imagine, Eunapius, who, by his implacable hatred to the christian religion, was often led into gross mistakes. Ammianus does not forget to mention his vices, as well as his virtues, telling us, that he was naturally timorous, a great eater, and much addicted to wine and women ": The same author observes, that Jovian had a great respect and veneration for the law Jovian's that of the christians o; and truly he had always made an open profession of the christian rader. religion, even in the reign of Julian, despising both his threats and promises P. Sob crates q, Suidas r, and Nice; borus s, tell us, that Julian having ordered all the christian officers in his army, either to renounce their religion, or quit the service, Jovian, at that time tribune, resigned his post without the least hesitation; but Julian would not suffer him to retire, nay, he afterwards employed him in the Persian war; for he was, at the emperor's death, the first among those officers who were styled domeflici. Zosimus writes, that he was raised to the empire by the chief officers, at the request of the whole army "; for Suidas himself owns him to have been an excellent commander, tho', at the time of his election, he was scarce thirty-two years old ... His promotion was no-ways agreeable to the pagans, as appears from the manner in which Ammianus Marcellinus speaks of it. Rufinus x, Socrates y, Sozomen 1, and c Theodoret 2, affure us, that he would not accept the empire, and the command of the army, till all the foldiers had declared themselves christians, and solemnly renounced the impious ceremonies which they had practifed under Julian; on which account he is honoured by Rufinus with the title of confessor. It is not therefore probable, that he paid any regard to the answer of those, who, having consulted, surely without his consent, the entrails of the victims, promised safety, if the army decamped; but inevitable destruction, if they continued in the same place b. The army was, as we have related above, in a strange country, far from home, with a provoked enemy round them, quite destitute of necessaries, and consequently reduced to the necessity of perishing, either with hunger, or by the arms of the incensed Persians. Jovian, d who was obliged to struggle with two such formidable enemies, did not so much dread the latter as the former; nay, he repulsed the Persians with great slaughter as often as they ventured to attack him, as Ammianus tells us in express terms , which is sufficient to refute what Libanius writes of the great advantages gained over Jovian by the Persians d. But the valour and experience of Jovian was no proof against the The army refamine which raged in his camp, and would not have left one man alive in the whole duced to great army, had not heaven unexpectedly declared in his favour, to use the expression of streights. Ammianus, by inclining the enemy to offer conditions of peace at so critical a con-That writer is of opinion, that the Persians, out of mere pity and compassion, set on foot a treaty f; and Libanius cannot conceive what could induce them to think of a peace, when they had reason to promise themselves the greatest advantages from the continuation of the war s. The negotiations lasted four days, which proved more insupportable to the Romans, says Ammianus h, than the greatest torments, by reason of the famine which raged in the camp. Besides the dreadful extremity to which the army was reduced, Jovian was apprehensive, and not without reason, of the designs of Procopius, Julian's kinsman i. No wonder therefore that he submitted to a peace upon terms dishonourable, we own, in themselves, but Jovian obliged absolutely necessary to extricate himself, and so many brave men, out of the difficul- to submit to the ties, into which the temerity and imprudence of Julian had led them. A peace was terms proposed by the Persians. agreed on for thirty, or, as Rufinus will have it k, for twenty-nine years, upon Jof vian's promising to abandon and yield up to the Persians the five provinces on the Tigris, which had been taken from them in the reign of Dioclesian, with several castles, and the cities of Nisibis and Singara. To this article was added another, in itself no less, if not more shameful, which was, not to lend any affistance to Arfaces

k Ruf. p. 177.

king of Armenia against the Persians, tho Arsaces was a faithful friend and ally of the a empire. Jovian however, with much-ado, prevailed upon the king of Persia to fuffer the inhabitants of Nisibis and Singara to withdraw with their effects into the Persians.

articles with great exact-mess.

Jovian not to be blamed for

Roman territories. The loss of Nisibis, which was the bulwark of the empire against the Persians, chiefly affected the Romans; and Ammianus takes great pains to exaggerate that loss, in order to raise the public odium against Jovian, to whom he is favourable on no occasion. Both that writer a and Eutropius o observe, that, from the foundation of Rome, no conful or emperor had ever yielded to the enemy an inch of ground. But therein they are certainly mistaken; for Adrian abandoned to the barbarians a far greater extent of country than Jovian. Aurelian relinquished all the countries conquered by Trajan beyond the Danube; and Dioclesian an immense tract b towards the borders of Egypt and Ætbiopia, as Tiberius had done long before the large provinces, conquered at a vast expence of blood and treasure by the brave Drusus. 'Tis true, that these countries were not given up in virtue of a treaty, but because they could not be kept without an immense charge. However, if it was thought commendable in those princes to abandon them on that score, we ought not eluded with the to join Ammianus and Eutropius in condemning Juvian for abandoning, even by treaty, provinces, which he could not keep, without exposing to certain death or captivity, the flower of the whole forces of the empire, when the enemy would with great case have conquered more than they acquired by the treaty. His giving up by treaty what others had abandoned of their own accord, does not render the action less necessary, c nor consequently less prudent. Ammianus pretends, that Jovian might have reached the province of Corduene belonging to the empire, in the four days which he spent in negotiations P. But between them and that province flowed the Tigris, which, even after the peace, and when opposed by no enemy, they passed with the utmost difficulty, and not without the loss of many persons, who were carried away by the violence of the stream, as Ammianus himself informs us q. Zosimus supposes them to have passed the Tigris before the treaty; but his authority is of no weight when he disagrees with Ammianus, who served in this expedition. Between the Tigris and Corduene lay a desert seventy miles in extent, destitute of all forts of provisions, even of water, which reduced them to the necessity of feeding upon their horses, and con- d fequently of leaving behind them great part of their baggage and arms'. Libanius owns, that most of them returned without either arms or money. What therefore must have become of them, had they at the same time been incessantly harassed by a formidable enemy? Agathias, who lived two hundred years after, writes, that Jovian, impatient to get out of the Persian dominions, betrayed Nisibisu; but Eutropius, who was an eye-witness of what he writes, does not indeed approve of the peace; but owns, that it was necessary w: and Philostorgius, a christian writer, but an Arian, and consequently no-ways favourable to Jovian, tells us, that there was no other means of faving the army, already reduced to the tenth part x. The only thing Eutropius blames in Jovian, is his faithfully observing the articles, to which c necessity alone obliged him to submit, instead of following the example of the ancient Romans, who never ferupled to break a difadvantageous treaty, extorted from them He observes the by force or fear s. But his religiously executing the articles of of a treaty, however disadvantageous, when he was under no other restraint but that of his oath, reslects no less honour on him, than glory on the religion which he professed. He was not acquainted with the maxim, which, to the great difgrace of our religion, prevails now-a-days with the most christian princes, that no treaties, how solemnly soever entered into, are binding, when the least advantage may be reaped from the breach of them; as if perjury were not a crime of as deep a dye in the greatest prince, as in the meanest of the people. We shall now resume the thread of our history.

Jovian, after the conclusion of the treaty, pursued his retreat; and having passed the Tigris, and the above-mentioned desart, without being in the least molested by the enemy, he arrived at Ur, a Persian fortress between the Tigris and the city of Nisibis, where he was met by Cassianus governor of Mesopotamia, and Mauritius a tribune, with fuch provisions as the army commanded by Procopius and Sebastian could spare them; for he had sent the two former officers to acquaint the latter with the 1 Ammian. p. 300. Zos. p. 730. Ruf. p. 177. Greg. Naz. orit. iv. p. 118. Ammian. l. xxv. p. 303. Idem, p. 205. Eutrop. p. 731. Ammian. p. 300. Idem, p. 301, 302. Zos. p. 730. Ammian. ibid. Lib. orat. xii. p. 325. Agath. l. iv. p. 135, w Eutrop. p. 589. Philost. l. viii. c. 1. p. 106. Eutrop. p. 589.

extremity

οf

Ьÿ

οŧ

1 ld

ŋ¢

a extremity to which he was reduced 2. From Ur he dispatched messengers into Illyricum and Gaul, with the news of Julian's death, and his own promotion. At the fame time he appointed Lucilianus his father-in-law commander in chief of the horfe and foot in Illyricum and Italy, and Malericus general of the troops in Gaul, in the room of Jovinus 2. Then, continuing his march, he entered at last the Roman ter- Jovian pursues ritories at a place called Thisalphata, and was there met by Procosius and Sebastian, his march to the Roman who commanded the army which Julian had left in Mesopotamia. The emperor dominions. received them in a very obliging manner, and foon after fent Procopius, who was Julian's kinfinan, to attend the corple of that prince to Tarsus, in the suburbs of which city he was buried, pursuant to the orders he had given a little before he expired. b When the funeral ceremonies were over, Procopius privately withdrew from Tarfus; and, tho' diligent search was made after him in all parts of the empire, he never could be heard of, till he assumed the purple in 365 b. From Thisalphata the emperor advanced to Nisibis; but encamped without the walls, tho' greatly importuned by the inhabitants to lodge in the palace, as his predecessors had always done. He was ashamed, says Ammianus, to enter a city, which he was about to deliver up to the enemy . The next day Bineles, a Persian lord of great distinction, who attended Jovian in the quality of an hostage, demanded the city to be delivered up to him, pursuant to the articles of the treaty. The inhabitants did all that lay in their power to divert the emperor from complying with his demand; they earnestly entreated him c to give them leave to defend the place of their nativity, which they undertook to do, without putting the public to the least charge, telling the emperor, that they were well acquainted with the fatigues of a siege, and knew how to check the Persian pride. But Jovian insisting upon the faith of the treaty, and the obligation of his oath, Bineses was, by his order, admitted into the city, of which he took possession in his Nisibis delimaster's name, by setting up the Persian standard. At the same time the inhabit-persians. ants were ordered to quit their native city, and retire elsewhere, with what estects they could carry with them. This order occasioned the most melancholy fight, says Ammianus, the sun ever beheld . Chrysostom likewise describes their departure in a very affecting manner f. But the emperor, alledging the fanctity of his oath, was d deaf to their cries, entreaties, and lamentations; fo that the city was evacuated in three days time, every one curling, as they departed, a peace, which had proved more fatal to them than the most bloody wars. All the roads were crouded with these forlorn exiles, loaded with what they could carry ; but greatly grieved for the lofs of many valuable things, which, for want of convenient carriages, they had been obliged to leave behind them. Most of them retired to Amida, and were placed by the emperor in the suburbs of that city, which, by this means, repaired all the losses it had fustained in the time of Constantius, and by degrees became the metropolis of what remained to the Romans in Mesopotamia 8. Jovian did not leave Nisibis, according to Ammianus h, till all the inhabitants were retired. Others tell us, that he e marched away in the night-time, after he had been two days encamped before it; two months, we read in Suidas, which must be a mistake of the transcriber. He then continued his march to Antioch, passing through Edessa, where he was on the twentyseventh of September, as appears from the date of one of his laws k. Zosimus writes, that he was no-where received with the demonstrations of joy usual on such occafions 1. However, it is not unlikely that his arrival was agreeable to the people of Antioch, who hated Julian, and consequently must have been pleased to see his successor arrive in their city. During his stay at Antioch, which was not long, he Jovian revokes revoked all the laws that had been enacted by Julian against the christians, and made all the laws it his chief study to restore the christian religion to its former lustre m. Themistius, a against the pagan philosopher, tells us, that he published a law granting to every one full liberty. pagan philosopher, tells us, that he published a law, granting to every one full liberty to hold what religion he pleased; and, after having bestowed great encomiums upon him on that score, he adds, that he suffered the temples to be opened, and the usual facrifices and ceremonies to be performed in them . On the other hand, Sozomen affures us, that, by a law enacted at Antioch, he suppressed all religions, except the christian, ordered the temples to be shut up, and prohibited, under severe penalties,

Ammian. l. xxv. p. 301. Zos. l. iii. p. 730. Ammian. p. 302.

* Idem ibid. Idem ibid. Idem ibid. Gent. tom. 1. p. 696. ibid. Zos. p. 733. Chron. Alex. p. 696. Ammian. p. 305. Suid. p. 1844. chron. p. 67. Zos. p. 733. Ruf. l. xi. c. 1. p. 177. Soz. l. vi. c. 3. p. 640.

the offering of victims, and all manner of idolatrous worship; insomuch that the a Arians.

pagans were obliged, according to Socrates P, to creep into holes and corners, and those who, in Julian's time, had wore the philosophical cloak, to quit it, and to appear in the common attire. What the two latter authors write, is confirmed by the pagan sophist Libanius, who says, that, after the death of Julian, those were heard with applause, who inveighed against the gods; that the pontiffs and philosophers were dragged to the tribunals as criminals; that they were obliged, by the most exquisite torments cruelty itself could invent, to confess what sums they had received of Julian for the worship of their gods, and forced either to restore what they had received, or to languish in dungeons; that the temples were pulled down. and the sophists, who, in Julian's reign, had been entertained with the greatest b respect by the governors of provinces, were now driven away from their gates like criminals and homicides 9. The emperor was even advised to put Libanius to death, for commending Julian; but a Cappadocian, who had a great ascendant over Jovian, advised him to take no notice of such trisles. As for the christians, Jovian wrote to all the governors of provinces, strictly injoining them to take care, that they were not disturbed in their usual assemblies. He restored to the churches, to the ecclefiaftics, to the virgins and widows, all the privileges, immunities, and exemptions, which had been granted to them by Constantine and his children; but lately revoked by Julian. He likewise ordered the yearly allowance of corn, which had been given by Constantine to the churches, for the support of the poor, to be continued to c them; but as the famine still raged, only the third part of Constantine's donation could be spared. Jovian promised them the other two parts as soon as the samine abated: but he dying in the mean time, his successors did not make good his promise; whence the churches thenceforth received only one third of what Constantine had allotted to them. Jovian likewise restored the labarum, or the standard with the cross, and obliged one Magnus, a comes or count, to rebuild at his own expence the church of Berytus, which, by his order, had been burnt; nay, the emperor had commanded his head to be cut off, but was with much-ado prevailed upon by his friends to spare him ". As in Julian's time several sacred virgins had married, some by choice, others by constraint, Jovian, by a law addressed to the present Salustius d Secundus, declares those guilty of death, who shall mention marriage to the facred virgins, or utter a fingle word in their presence repugnant to the rules of modesty w. This law is still extant, and dated from Antioch, the nineteenth of February of the ensuing year 364 x; which is a gross mistake, it being certain, that Jovian was dead before that time, and that he left Antioch before the end of the present year. Jovian He espouses the not only espoused the cause of the christians against the pagans, but that of the orthocause of the or-thodox christidox believers against the Arians; for, by the first law he published after he had ans against the entered the Roman dominions, he commanded the churches to be every-where restored to those, who had inviolably adhered to the faith of the council of Nice, and recalled all the bishops who had been banished on that score, and Athanasius in particular, e to whom he wrote with his own hand a very obliging and friendly letter y, which has reached our times 2. Some time after he wrote a second letter to him, desiring him to draw up and fend him a rule of faith, by which he might regulate his belief in the great variety of opinions that prevailed then in the church. Athanasius readily complied with the emperor's request, and fent him a creed or rule of faith, supposed to be that which still passes under his name, approved of and subscribed by all the bishops of Egypt 2. Jovian soon after invited Athanasius to court, received him, upon his arrival at Antioch, with the greatest demonstrations of esteem and veneration imaginable, often conferred with him touching the articles of religion then in debate, and was by him thoroughly confirmed in the doctrine defined and established by the council of Nice b. After this, Athanasius took his leave of the emperor, and returned to his diocese. Socrates c tells us, that the emperor no sooner entered the Roman dominions upon his return from Persia, than he was met by the leading men among the Arians, Macedonians, Acacians, and other sectaries, all striving to ingra-

> P Socrat. l. iii. c. 25. p. 205. & c. 24. p. 202, 203. LIB. 07. xii.
>
> Soz. l. vi. c. 3. p. 640.
>
> THEODOR. l. i. c. 10. p. 552. & l. iv.
>
> Cod. Theod. l. ix. tit. 25. leg. 2. p. 197. • Soz. l. vi. c. 3. p. 640. p. 327. F. Lib. vit. p. 46. Soz. l. vi. c. 3. p. 640. Theodor. l. i. c. 10. p. 552. & l. iv. p. 664. Idem, l. iv. c. 19. p. 689. W. Soz. p. 640. Cod. Theod. l. ix. tit. 25. leg. 2. p. 197. Theodor. l. iv. c. 2. p. 661. Greg. Naz. p. 394. Socr. p. 202. A7HAN. tom. 2. p. 33, 34. Theodor. p. 661. Ruf. l. xi. c. 1. p. 177. Greg. Naz. p. 394. Theodor. l. iv. c. 3. p. 661—664. Epiphan. c. 10. p. 726. Soz. l. vi. c. 5. p. 642. Socr. l. iii. c. 24. p. 202. & c. 25. p. 205. <sup>2</sup> ATHAN. tom. 2. p. 33, 34

K III.

the a

and

d to

l by were 10-the t

had

What

OWIL.

eatelf b

s like

death,

CTIE,

Wroce

Wite.

eccle-

cions,

voked

been rd to :

ation

mine

pro-

1.186

with

ence

had

i his lome

hiin d

icred

ſŋΥ.

of the dead 7.168

tho-

had ored

lled

ular, ¢

rhich

fring

be let

24 oled the

him,

113-

en in thed !

, and

ł the men

g[2•

. III . 197-

ni.

i i

a tiate themselves with the new prince, and preposses him in their favour; but that he received them coldly, telling them, that he was an enemy to contention, and should etteem and countenance those only who promoted unity and concord. However, as Jovian himself openly prosested the faith of the council of Nice, that doctrine was embraced by many, who, till that time, had been very fanguine in opposing it, and was foon after folemnly confirmed in a council held at Antioch this year d. Jovian, after a short stay at Antioch, set out for Constantinople, tho' the winter was already He fets out for far advanced, to prevent the disturbances, which he had reason to apprehend in the Constantiwest. As he passed through Tarjus in Cilicia, he ordered some ornaments to be added nopie. to the tomb of Julian; on which account he is blamed by some christian writers . b From Tarsus he proceeded to Tyana in Cappadocia, where he was informed, that

Malaricus, whom he had appointed general of the troops in Gaul, having declined that post, Lucillianus, the emperor's father-in-law, and general of the troops in Illyricum and Italy, had hastened into Gaul; and taking upon him there, when matters were not yet fettled, to examine the accounts of some officers, one of them, conscious of his frauds, had fled for protection to the Batavians who served in the Roman army; and by perfuading them that Julian was still alive, had so incensed them against Lucillianus as a traitor, that in a tumult they killed him, and a tribune, by Atumult in name Seniauchus, whom he had brought with him into Gaul. Valentinian, after-Gaui. wards emperor, but then only tribune, and one of the attendants of Lucillianus, c narrowly escaped undergoing the same sate. This tumult, which happened at Rheims, did not prevent the troops in Gaul, nor their general Jovinus, from declaring for Jovian, and proclaiming him emperor. They even fent deputies to him, to congratulate him upon his promotion, and acquaint him, that they were ready to obey his commands. The deputies met the new emperor at Affona in Galatia, who received them in a very obliging manner, and continued Jovinus in the post of general, charging him not to suffer the death of Lucillianus to go unrevenged. From Aspona Jovian purfued his journey to Ancyra, the metropolis of Galatia, where he took upon him his first consulship. We have observed above, that he had named his father for his Jovian enters collegue; but he dying in the mean time, he took in his room his own fon, whom, upon but fit confulfing. d tho' then only an infant, he distinguished with the title of nobilifimus, or most noble f.

The discourse which Themistius is said to have pronounced on occasion of the emperor's confulship, has reached our times 8; but Socrates assures us, that he pronounced it fix weeks after at Dadastana, and a second time at Constantinople 1. Jovian, hastening to reach the latter city, left Ancyra, and continued his journey, tho' the cold was then so severe and intense, that some of his retinue died on the road. Upon his arrival at Dadastana, a town on the borders of Galatia and Bithynia, but belonging to the latter province, he was met by Themistius, and other persons of distinction, sent by the senate of Constantinople to attend him. But before he left that place, he was He dies at found dead in his bed, on the fixteenth or feventeenth of February of this year 364.

e after he had lived thirty-three years, and reigned feven months, and twenty days i. His sudden death gave occasion to various reports; some ascribe it to the dampness of his chamber, which had been newly plaistered; others say, he was stifled with the vapours of charcoal placed in the room to dry it. Some write, that he died of a furfeit; others, that his death was owing to bad and poisonous mushrooms. Socrates tays, he was carried off by an obstruction; and Chrysostom, that he was either poitoned or murdered by his guards. Ammianus likewise seems to have believed, that he died a violent death; for he compares his end with that of Scipio Æmilianus, who was strangled in his bed; and adds, that no inquiry was made after the death of either of them k. But Jovian had not yet disobliged any man, nor does it appear, that he f had any enemies, except perhaps Procopius, who took no advantage of his death, nor even shewed himself on that occasion. The body of the deceased emperor was carried to Constantinople, and there interred with the usual solemnity in the church of the Apostles, where his tomb was to be seen many years after 1. His wife was coming to meet him, according to Zonaras m, with her fon Verronianus, and a retinue worthy of an empress, when she received the news of his death. Cedrenus likewise tells us, f Ammian 1. xxv. p. 306, 307. MIST. OF. V. p. 71. h SOCRAT. d Idem ibid.

e Idem, l. iii. c. 26. p. 205. Baron. ad ann. 364. f Ammian l. xxv. p. 306, 307. Socrat. l. iii. c. 26. p. 205. Zos. p. 733. Zonar. p. 25. f Themist. or. v. p. 71. h Socrat. ibid. p. 205. f Ammian. p. 308. Socrat. ibid. Zos. ibid. Zonar. ibid. k Ammian. p. 308. l Philost. l. viii. p. 113. Zonar. ibid. Du Cange urb. Constant. descript. l. iv. p. 110. m Zonar.

that the never faw him after his promotion ; but Themistius writes, that the fon, and a consequently, in all likelihood, the mother too, was with the emperor at Dadastana; and adds, that by his crying and struggling when he was to be carried, according to custom, in the consular chariot, he seemed to portend what happened soon after, that is, the death of his father. The empress was still living in 380 P, and was buried after her death by her husband 4. Of her son we shall speak hereaster. Jovian is greatly commended by all the ecclefiaftic writers, among whom Theodoret fays, that heaven raised him to the sovereignty to reward, even in this life, his virtue;

but that the world did not deserve to enjoy long so great a blessing r. Jovian being dead, the chief officers, both civil and military, affembled in order to chuse a new emperor, when some proposed Equitius, tribune of the first company b of the shield-men of the emperor's guard; and others Januarius, a kinsman of the deceased emperor, at that time commander of the troops in Illyricum: but the former was rejected on account of his furly and rustic temper, and the latter because he was at too great a distance. Zosimus, ever savourable to the pagans, tells us, that the electors, with one voice, named to the empire Salustius Secundus, presect of the east; a man, fays he, of great worth and long experience in war, by religion a pagan, but no great enemy to the christians. He adds, that Salust, excusing himself on account of his old age and infirmities, they were for naming his fon; but that the father opposed his election, alledging, that he was too young, and consequently not equal to fo great a charge '. At length, after an inter-regnum of nine or ten days, c Valentinian is Valentinian was, by universal confent, chosen emperor; which unanimity Ammianus chosen emperor. ascribes to a particular inspiration from heaven ". The presect Salustius Secundus, Arintheus, one of the generals of the army, Dagalaiphus, general of the horse, and Datianus, a patrician, who had been consul in 358. are said to have been the chief authors of his election w. The latter had been left by Jovian on account of his old age, and the feverity of the winter, in Galatia; whence he wrote to the army, advising ployments, &c.

them to chuse Valentinian, as a man well qualified for that high station x. This election was made at Nice, the metropolis of Bithynia, whither the army that attended His parentage, Jovian had, after his death, removed from Dadastanay. Valentinian was the son of education, em-Gratianus, a native of Cibale in Pannonia: his ancestors were no-ways conspicuous; d but Gratianus himself being admitted into the army on account of his extraordinary strength, and great address at all manner of exercises, raised himself by degrees to the dignity of count of Africa; of which honourable employment he was afterwards deprived, upon a suspicion of his having embezzled the public money. However, he was many years after appointed commander of the troops in Britain; in which office he acquitted himself with great reputation. On his return from thence, he withdrew to his estate in the country, leading there a retired life, till it was confifcated by Constantius, incensed against him for having entertained Magnentius as he passed that way, with a design to usurp the empire. But he continued, notwithstanding his disgrace, to be greatly beloved and esteemed by the army z; and the esteem and affection they all had for the father did not a little contribute to the promotion of e the fon?. The senate of Constantinople decreed him a statue in the beginning of the reign of Valens b. We do not find, that he had any other children besides Valentinian and Valens, who are supposed to have been both born in the city of Cibale, the birth-place of their father. The former is styled on some medals e Flavius, which prænomen became common to all those who, after Constantius's time, were raised to the empire. Valentinian had by his first wife, named Valeria Severa, the emperor Gratian, born in the year 359. Of his second wife, Justina, the mother of Valentinian II. and of three daughters, we shall speak hereaster. Valentinian was baptized, as we read in St. Ambrojed, and held the doctrine of the council of Nice, tho' that of Arius generally prevailed in Pannonia. He is faid by most writers f to have been altogether illiterate; and Themistius seems to infinuate, that neither he, nor his brother Valens, had any knowledge of the Greek tongue f. But Ausonius allows him some erudition 8. He bettok himself early to the profession of arms, and

R CEDREN. p. 309.

THEMIST. OT. V. p. 71.

P CHRYS. ad vid. junior. tom. iv. p. 463.

ZONAR. p. 25.

THEODORET. l. iv. c. 4. p. 664, 665.

AMMIAN. l. XXVI. p. 310.

P CHRYS. ad vid. junior. tom. iv. p. 463.

AMMIAN. l. XXVI. p. 310.

TOS. l. iii.

AMMIAN. l. XXVI. p. 310.

THEODORET. p. 171.

THEMIST. OT. VI. p. 81.

BIRAG. p. 501, 505.

AMBROS. ep. xiii. p. 204.

SOCR. l. iv. c. 1. p. 210.

THEMIST. OT. VI. p. 71.

AUSON. idyll. XXVIII. p. 339.

0 K [][

, and a ana;

rding

after,

was

70:4n

lays,

litue;

ार्यस mpany }

of the former

he was

hat the

ne eaft;

pigm,

ielt oa

iat the

aly not idays, c

glight.

esibi,

and,

chief s old

ling

elecaded

ion of ws; d diary

rees co

widi

verci,

which

e, he

n£fs he ding

n and ion of e

of the 10

Mil. , Z.,

ricic

, the

it of

5 435

Na.

writers t

er he,

17:35

, and

i, ibid EXIST:

2. 112.

a on several occasions gave remarkable proofs of his courage, prudence, and experience h. In Gaul he commanded a body of horse, in quality of tribune; but that command was taken from him by Constantius, as we have related in the reign of that prince, upon a false charge brought against him by Barbelio. Philostorgius writes, that while he was in Gaul, it was conjectured from some omens, that he should attain one day to the empire; which induced Constantius to send him into Mesopotamia, to serve there against the Persians. Under Julian he was tribune of one of the bands of the guards, called Joviani, who constantly attended the emperor k. We are told, that being one day obliged, as tribune of the guard, to attend the emperor His steadiness in into a temple, and the minister of the idols sprinkling those who entered with water, the christian which was supposed to purify them. Volentinian who was a zealous christian freiigien, and b which was supposed to purify them, Valentinian, who was a zealous christian, seeing aversion to idea drop of it upon his habit, not only reviled and upbraided the pontiff as an impostor, latry. but struck him, and in the presence of Julian cut out that part of his habit on which it had fallen, and threw it contemptuously on the ground. This provoked Julian to fuch a degree, that he immediately ordered Valentinian either to facrifice to the gods, or lay down his employment: he chose, without hesitation, the latter; but Julian, not fatisfied therewith, confined him, according to Philostorgius, to Thebes in Egypt; according to Sozomen, to Melitene in Armenia, charging him with some neglect of duty, to deprive him of the glory which he was apprifed would accrue to him from suffering on account of his religion 1. If what these authors write be true, c Julian must have recalled him soon after, perhaps to employ him in the Persian war; for he is supposed to have been banished in 362, and on the other hand it is plain from Ammianus Marcellinus m, that, at the death of Julian, he served in the army in quality of tribune. Upon the promotion of Jovian, Lucillianus, father-in-law to that prince, took him with him into Gaul, as one capable of establishing, by his prudence and known abilities, the authority of the new emperor in that province. Lucillianus was killed, as we have related above, in a tumult at Rheims; and Valentinian narrowly escaped undergoing the same sate. Upon his return into the east, Jovian preferred him to the command of the second company of the scutarii, or shield-men of the guard; and left him at Ancyra, when he set out from thence on d his march to Constantinople, with orders to follow him some time after ". Valentinian was still at Ancyra, when Jovian died at Dadastana; and he was chosen, in the manner we have related above, to succeed him. Upon his election, messengers were immediately dispatched to acquaint him with it; and in the mean time, Equitius and Leo ordered to prevent disturbances or tumults in the army. Valentinian, foon after the arrival of the messengers, set out from Ancyra, and reached Nice, where the army then was, on the twenty-fourth of February; but did not appear abroad till the twenty-fixth, perhaps because he was in suspense, whether he should accept the empire or no, as we read in Victor the younger. This, at least, seems more probable to us than the conjecture of Ammianus Marcellinus P, viz. that out of e superstition he avoided transacting any thing on the twenty-fifth, that being the biffextile, and consequently an unlucky day. Be that as it will, orders were given in the evening, by the advice of the prefect Salustius Secundus, that no person, who might, on account of his post or quality, be supposed to aspire at the empire, should, on pain of death, be seen abroad the next morning. As soon as it was light, the whole army was drawn up in a plain near the city of Nice; and Valentinian, appearing at their head, was defired to afcend the tribunal; which he had no fooner done, than he was, with loud shouts, saluted Valentinianus Augustus, and adorned, in the He is saluted fight of the whole army, with all the enfigns of fovereignty, that is, with a purple by the army robe and a diadem q. When this ceremony was over, the new emperor was preparing with the title f to harangue the army, according to custom, and had already stretched out his hand to begin his speech, when he was stopped by a seditious noise of the soldiery, requiring him to take that instant a collegue in the sovereignty, that the empire might not for the future remain, as it had happened twice in a few months, without a head. Valentinian, tho' a man of great resolution and intrepidity, was at first somewhat alarmed; but soon resuming his usual courage, he first reproved, with an air of His summess authority, those who appeared the most forward and seditious; and then, without and intreptdity tumult in she

h Zos. p. 734.

PHILOST. l. vii. c. 7. p. 93.

K THEODOR. 1. iii. c. 12.

POROS. l. vii. c. 6.

P. 644. PHILOSTORG. p. 93. THEODORET. p. 650. Zos. l. iv. p. 725. OROS. l. vii. c. 32. Ruf. l. ii. c. 2.

P. 178.

M AMMIAN. l. xxv. p. 302.

I Idem ibid.

VICT. epit. p 545.

P AMMIAN. p. 312.

P AMMIAN. p. 312. 1 Soz. l. vi. c. 6. army. p. 170. 1 Idem ibid. Z.os. l. iii. p. 734.

any interruption, addressed himself to the army in the following terms: " It was a " in your power a few days ago to chuse for your emperor whom you pleased; " but fince you have raifed me to that high station, I must tell you, that power " is no longer in your hands: you are not to prescribe laws to your sovereign; it " is my province to command, and yours to obey: I am to judge, and not you, " what may be useful and conducive to the public welfare. However, I do not " fay, that I will not take a collegue; but in an affair of fuch importance, I must " proceed with the utmost care and precaution imaginable, lest both you and I may hereafter have occasion to repent of our rashness." This resolute speech, uttered with all the authority of a fovereign, stopped the mouths of the mutineers; and no one daring to oppose a man, who seemed born to command, he was again, b with a general acclamation, faluted with the title of Augustus, and conducted, or, as Philostorgius will have it, carried on a large shield, to the imperial palacer.

his collegue in the empire.

Valentinian being thus declared emperor at Nice on the twenty-fixth of February of this year 364. left that city on the twenty-eighth of the same month, and set out for Conflantinople. His march was very expeditious; for he made his public entry into Nicomedia on the first of March, and there created his brother Valens prafectus stabuli, that is, according to the modern phrase, master of the horse, with the title of tribune; He declares his and, after his arrival at Constantinople, declared him his collegue in the empire on the brother Valens twenty-eighth of March, according to the most probable opinion. This ceremony was performed at a place called Hebdomon or the feventh, because it was seven miles e diffant from Constantinople. In this place, which was a village, with an imperial palace, and feveral churches, the emperors who fucceeded Valens were commonly crowned, and that prince embellished it with several edifices, and with a stately tribunal or throne; whence it took the name of the tribunals. Ammianus tells us, that Valentinian having summoned a council at Nice, as soon as he was declared emperor, to deliberate about a collegue; and the other officers being all filent, through fear of disobliging the emperor, Dagalaiphus addressing him with great liberty, If you are partial, faid he, to your own family, you will make choice of your brother; but if you love your people, you will prefer some other. Ammianus adds, that when he named Valens, his choice was univerfally applauded, because no one dared to disapprove or d oppose it; which shews, that no great advantages to the state were expected from Va'ens. However, Ammianus, who neither condemns him as a bad prince, nor thinks him worthy of a place among the good ones a, observes to his praise, that he ever kept up a good understanding with his brother; that he undertook nothing without his advice; and obeyed him, not only as his elder brother, but as his fovereign w. Some time after, both princes were feized with a violent fever, which was by some ascribed to the magical practices of Julian's friends, especially of the philosophers Maximus and Priscus, who thereupon were apprehended, with many others, and carried in chains to Constantinople. Priscus was soon discharged; but Maximus, who was univerfally hated, and supposed to have stirred up Julian against e some of Julian's Valentinian, on account of his zeal for the christian religion, was condemned to pay a heavy fine, and to lie in prison till he had paid it. Many eminent persons were accused on this occasion; but the prefect Salustius Secundus, with his usual address, prudence, and good-nature, stissed such accusations, and put a stop to all further inquiries x. The two emperors were no sooner recovered, than they lest Constantinople; and passing through Adrianople, where they were on the twenty-ninth of April v, arrived at Philippopolis; whence they proceeded to Sardica, and from that city to Naissus in Dacia, where they were on the third of June, and seem to have continued till about the eighteenth of the same month, partly at Naissus, partly at a castle named Mediana, about three miles from that city 2. As the empire was f threatened with a general invalion from the barbarous nations that furrounded it, He divides the Valentinian, the better to make head against them, thought it adviseable to divide empire with his the provinces between himself and his brother; and accordingly made this famous partition at Mediana, committing to the government of Valens the east, that is, all Asia, with Egypt and Thrace, and reserving to himself Illyricum, Italy, Gaul, Spain,

He punishes

friends.

urb. Const. descript. l. ii. p. 140. * Zos. l.iv. p. 735.

Britain, and Africa, that is, all the west. After this partition, both princes repaired a to Sirmium, where they parted, Valentinian for Milan, and Valens for Constantinople:

OK III.

It was a leafed i

power

gn; it

r you.

do not

l muft

u and [ e Ipeech,

utinters;

as again, 5

ed, or, 15

drusm of

tt out for entry into

2: 15024

anbune:

ire on the ceremony

ven miles ¢

imperial

mmenly

itely tri-

cs, that

r:peror,

gh fear

, If you

r; 921 i ne named octove or &

ted from

ince, nor

aile, that nothing

ur as his , which of the many

d; but against :

d to P17

076 WETE

addtels,

further

Constant. ninth of

on that

10 have

eally at pire was f

nded il,

o divide

fattious is, all

Spain,

epaired

n Cangl

n. | . 1111

Throte

In the mean time, the barbarians broke into the empire from all quarters, the Germans into Gaul and Rbætia, the Sarmatians and Quadians into Pannonia, the Pids, Saxons, Scots, and Attacotti into Britain, and the Austurians, with other Moorish nations, into Africa. But the latter province was not so much harassed by the barbarians as by Romanus, who had been fent by Jovian to protect it; for the Austurians had in his reign made frequent inroads into Libya Tripolitana, and the neigh-Libya Tripolibouring countries. Romanus surpassed the barbarians themselves in oppressing and tana harraffed pillaging that unhappy province, and even refused to march assists the pillaging that unhappy province, and even refused to march against the enemy, ans and oppreswho, roving up and down the country, committed every-where dreadful ravages, fed by Romab because the inhabitants would not comply with his exorbitant demands; for he nus. required, besides immense sums, no sewer than four thousand camels, without which, he said, he could not take the field. The Africans, finding they could have no protection from Romanus, charged the deputies, whom they fent with the usual prefents to Valentinian upon his accession to the empire, to lay before the new emperor Romanus acthe miserable state of their affairs; which they did accordingly, offering to prove cused, but conthe particulars contained in the memorial, which they presented to the emperor; but command, Remigius, who was then magister officiorum, and shared with Romanus, his kinsman and confident, the spoils of the province, by representing things in a quite different light, managed his friend's cause with so much cunning and address, that the emperor, c not knowing whom to believe, referred the matter to a further inquiry; which Remigius got easily put off from time to time, as there was then a great hurry of business at court. However, they prevailed upon the emperor to give the command of the troops to Ruricius, governor of Libya Tripolitana; but, by the interest of Remigius, it was foon after restored to Romanus. In the mean while the Austurians came down in greater numbers than ever, laid waste the fruitful territories of Leptis and Oea; from which cities, and that of Sebrata, the province is faid to have been named Tripolis, that word importing three cities. As Romanus continued the whole time unconcerned and inactive, the barbarians scoured the country without meeting with the least opposition, ravaged it in a most miserable manner, put many persons d of all ranks to the fword, took an incredible number of prisoners, and had even the confidence to lay fiege to Leptis, a strong and populous city, but were not able to reduce it. The noise of these devastations reaching the emperor's ears, he dispatched Palladius to pay the troops their arrears, and bring him a true account of Palladius fent the state of the province. Romanus, being immediately acquainted by his friend to inquire into Remigius with the errand on which Palladius was fent, persuaded the principal officers province. of the army, with whom he maintained a good understanding, to present Palladius, whom he represented as a man of great authority at court, with a great share of the money which he had brought to pay them. Palladius accepted the present, and proceeded to Leptis, where he heard the complaints of the inhabitants, and was by e them conducted to view the country, that he might be an eye-witness of the miserable condition to which it was reduced, and of the dreadful havock the barbarians had made, without being in the leaft curbed or restrained. Palladius, at that fight, could not help exclaiming against Romanus, telling him in plain terms, that he would not fail to acquaint the emperor with his unaccountable conduct, and upbraiding him with his cruelty and avarice. But Romanus foon stopt his mouth, by upbraiding He is gained him in his turn with converting to his private use the money with which he was to over by Ropay the foldiers, and threatening to let the emperor know he had betrayed his truft. manus. This put Palladius into such a fright, that he agreed with Romanus to conceal the whole from the emperor, whom accordingly he affured on his return, that the city f of Leptis, and the Tripolitan province, complained without reason; which was believed, Palladius being generally esteemed a man of great integrity, and above all bribery and corruption. Nay, the emperor was by him so missed, and shamefully imposed upon, that he fent him back into Africa to try and punish the authors of the supposed calumnies and false informations brought against Romanus. In the discharge of this scandalous office, he tampered so cunningly with the inhabitants of Leptis, that they disowned the complaints which Jovinus, one of their deputies, had laid before the emperor in their name, maintaining, that they had given him no fuch commission. Jovinus himself, to gain the favour of Palladius and Romanus, and by

His accusers punished, that means avoid the danger that threatened him, owned he had made a false report a to the emperor, who thereupon ordered him to be put to death, with some of the chief citizens of Leptis, and the governor Ruricius, who had confirmed the truth of the informations brought against Romanus. The latter was executed at Stepbæ in Mauritania, and the others at Utica. Erectbius and Aristomenes, two other citizens of Leptis, who had complained of Romanus, were condemned to have their tongues cut out; but they found means to make their escape, and lay concealed till the reign of Gratian, when this scene of iniquity was brought to light b.

THE following year, 365. both princes entered upon their first consulship, the one at Milan, the other at Constantinople. Valentinian seems to have continued at break into Gaul;

But retire at the approach

Milan till the month of August, and then to have visited several cities of Italy, viz. b Verona, Aquileia, and Luceria . From Italy he passed into Gaul, and was either at or near Paris in his way to that city in the latter end of October, when he received The Germans certain intelligence, that the Germans had made an irruption into that province; and that Procopius had revolted in the east. Of the latter we shall speak in the reign of Valens. As for the Germans, they had fent embassadors to congratulate Valentinian upon his accession to the empire; but Ursacius, then magister officiorum, having received them in a very disobliging manner, and sent them back with far less presents than were usually given them, they had thrown them away with scorn and indignation; and upon their return, stirred up their nation to take arms, and revenge the affront that had been offered them. They broke therefore into Gaul, c and laid waste the country bordering on the Rhine. Valentinian dispatched Dagalaipbus against them, and advanced in person as far as Rheims to support him. But the Germans retiring at his approach, he returned to Paris, and there took up his winter-quarters d. He was for returning into Illyricum to make head there against of the emperor. the rebel Procopius; but his friends, and the deputies that were fent to him from all the cities in Gaul, earnestly intreating him not to leave that province exposed to the inroads of the Germans, he complied with their request, considering, says Ammianus, that Procopius was only an enemy to his family, whereas the Germans were declared enemies to the whole Roman empire. Being therefore refolved not to stir out of Gaul, he dispatched Neotherius, at that time only a notary, but after- d wards, that is, in 390. conful, into Africa, to prevent Procopius from making himfelf master of that province; and at the same time injoined Equitius to cover Illyricum, and watch the motions of the usurper on that side f. St. Jerom writes, that Equitius abused his authority in oppressing and plundering the people whom he was fent to protect 8. Equitius was already comes or count, to which dignity the emperor added on this occasion that of magister or general h.

> believe, that he was by birth a barbarian. As for his collegue, he was the fon of the emperor Valentinian, and then an infant; whence in the dates of the laws enacted e this year he is marked thus NB. P. that is, Nobilifimus Puer. The Germans, who had made an irruption into Gaul the preceding year, and retired at the approach of the emperor, as we have observed above, returned this year, 366. and having passed the Rhine on the ice, defeated the Romans in a pitched battle, took the standards of the Batavians and Heruli, and killed the two counts Charietto and Severianus, fays Zosimus, who commanded the Roman forces. That the Romans were defeated, and Severianus killed, is owned by Ammianus k; but Charietto must have escaped, since we find a law dated the seventeenth of May addressed to him; whereas this battle was fought in the depth of winter, when the Rhine was frozen over m. Zosimus adds, that Valentinian, who, according to him, was present at this battle, highly pro- f voked against the Batavians for having given ground the first, ordered them to be cashiered and sold for slaves, but suspended the execution of his orders, upon their promising to retrieve their reputation by some signal enterprize; which they did

THE next consuls were Gratian and Dagalaiphus; the latter was general of the horse, and had been comes domesticorum under Julian: his name gives us room to

The Romans defeated by the Germans.

accordingly, attacking the enemy's camp in the dead of the night, and committing there a dreadful flaughter ". What Zosimus writes touching the Batavians may be true; but as for Valentinian, it is plain from Ammianus, that when this battle was

b Ammian. l. xxvi. p. 316. & 1 xxvii. p. 347-380. Cod. Theodof. chron. p. 75. 1. xxvi. p. 315—317.

* Idem, l. xxvii. p. 334.

* Idem ibid.

* Ammian. ibid.

* Zos. l. iv. p. 740.

* Ammian. l. xxvii. p. 334.

keg. 1. p. 440.

* Ammian. & Zos. ibid.

* Zos. ibid. f Idem ibid. # HIER. ad. ann. 373. 1 Cod. Theodof. l. v. tit. 5.

a fought, he was at Paris; whence he immediately dispatched Dagalaiphus, to prevent the evil consequences that were likely to attend the defeat of the other generals. Dagalaiphus, pretending he had not sufficient strength to engage the enemy, who were roving about the country in feveral great bodies, did not so much as offer to restrain them. Hereupon he was recalled, and Jovinus, general of the troops in Gaul, was fent in his room; who having carefully informed himself of the motions of the barbarians, fell upon one of their parties at a place called Scarponna, between Toul and Jovinus gains Melz, and cut them all off, without losing one man. Being attended with the like a complete victory over the fuccess against another party, which he surprised, he advanced with incredible expe-Germans. dition against the main body of their army, attacked them, tho' far superior to him b in number, and, after a long and bloody contest, put them to flight. The fight continued the whole day, and the Romans were once in great danger of being utterly defeated, the sudden slight of a tribune, named Balchobaudes, who was a great boaster, and consequently, as it generally happens, a downright coward, having disanimated the troops under his command. However, Jovinus, inspiring them, more by his example than by words, with fresh courage, led them on to the charge, while they were ready to turn their backs; and, preffing with great refolution and intrepidity upon the enemy, obliged them to give ground, and betake themselves to a disorderly flight. On the enemy's side, six thousand were killed upon the spot, and four thousand wounded; and of the Romans only two hundred killed, and as many c wounded o. The enemy withdrew in the night-time, but were intercepted in their retreat by several parties sent out by Jovinus for that purpose, insomuch that sew of them had the good luck to escape. Jovinus followed them the next morning with the whole army; but finding he could not overtake them without haraffing his troops, he returned to his camp, where he was informed, that their king, who had been taken by a party fent to plunder their camp, had been hanged in his absence. Being greatly provoked at so base an action, he resolved to punish with death the tribune, who commanded the party; but he found upon examination, that the foldiers had done it in the height of their rage, which the tribune had in vain attempted to restrain P. Valentinian had advanced as sar as Rheims to support Jovinus, as we d conjecture from feveral laws enacted this year in that city, and dated the feventh of April, the feventeenth of May, and the fourteenth of June 1: but he must have returned to Paris before the end of the campaign; for Jovinus marching back to Paris with his victorious army, the emperor, to do him honour, went out to meet him, and for his eminent services named him consul for the ensuing year r. The public joy for the happy successes of this glorious campaign, was greatly heightened by the arrival of messengers from Valens, with the head of Procopius, killed in Asia on the twenty-feventh of May, as we shall relate hereafter. Valentinian was returned to Rheims on the twenty-seventh of Novembers, and seems to have continued there all winter t. He made it his chief study to fortify the banks of the Rhine, causing a Valentinian e great number of forts to be erected on the German, as well as on the Roman fide fortifies the of that river; by which means, and by augmenting his forces, he prevented the Rhine. barbarians, says Zosimus, from ever breaking into the Roman territories during the nine remaining years of his reign. But that writer must be understood of the Alemans; for we shall have soon occasion to speak of the irruptions of Franks and Saxons into Gaul.

THE next confuls were Lupicinus and Jovinus, both generals, the former under Valens in Syria, and the latter under Valentinian in Gaul. Jovinus is by the ablest critics thought to be the same person with Valens Jovinus, general of the horse, who was succeeded in that employment by Theodosius in 370. as we read in Ammianus w. f He was sent this very year into Britain, and attended Valentinian in his expedition against the Germans in 368. Flodard, in his history of the church of Rheims, produces the epitaph of one Jovinus, who had been twice general of the Roman horse and toot, and yet was more illustrious for his piety than his employments y. He was baptized and buried at Rheims, in the church of St. Agricola, now the abbey of St. Nicasius, or St. Nicasie, as the natives call it. The stately tomb, still to be seen there, is thought to have been his? The epitath seems to infinuate, that he was

g

<sup>9</sup> Cod. Theodof. chron. p. 77. r. Ammian. ibid. E. Zos. l. iv. p. 742. w. Ammian. l. xxviii. p. 369. O AMMIAN. p. 334, 335. P Zos. ibid. Q Cod. Theodof. chron. p. 77. AMMIAN. ibid. Zos. l. iv. p. 742. W AMMIAN. l. xxviii. p. 369. Liem, l. xxviii. p. 346. Y FLODARD Remenf. ecclef. hift. l. i. c. 6. p. 33. MARLOT. metropol. Remenf. hift. l. i. c. 28. p. 101.

the founder of that church, which, in the last will of the holy bishop Rhemigius, is a flyled the Jovinian church 2. Most authors take this Jovinus to be the consul of this year, which we can hardly believe, since in the epitaph no notice is taken of the confulfhip, a dignity far superior to the others mentioned in it. Besides, we are

Valentinian falls til,

But recovers, fon Gratian emperor.

He divorces Severa, and marries Justina.

no-where told, that Jovinus, the conful of this year, was a christian; nay, from Julian's preferring him to the first employments both civil and military, we may well conclude, that he did not profess the christian religion, at least in that prince's reign. All the laws of this year to the third of June are dated from Rheims b; a plain proof, that the emperor continued there till that time: one dated the fixth of August was enacted at Nemæsia, said to have been a place in the neighbourhood of Rheims c. From Nemæsia the emperor removed to Amiens, as appears from a law b dated the eighteenth of August, and addressed to Prætextatus, presect of Rome d. He was probably kept so long at Rheims by a violent distemper, with which he was seized this year. As his recovery was despaired of, the great officers of the court began to form cabals, and to think of naming him a successor. The chief candidates for the imperial dignity were Rusticus Julianus and Severus, both dreaded on account of their feverity and rigour, but the former much more than the latter: he afterwards betrayed a most cruel and savage temper, when he was proconful of Africa in 371. and 372. Symmachus is thought to have addressed to him the first fifteen letters of his third book. As for Severus, he was, in the judgment of Ammianus, in every respect preserable to Julianus. But the emperor's unexpected recovery put an end c and creates his to the hopes and intrigues of the courtiers; for he, being probably informed of what had been transacted, resolved to prevent any farther disputes, by raising his son Gratian to the empire. Having therefore before-hand gained the foldiery, he affembled them in the neighbourhood of Amiens; and, with their confent and approbation, declared him his collegue in the empire, vesting him with the purple, and other ensigns of sovereignty, amidit the loud acclamations of the multitude t. Thus was Gratian created emperor on the twenty-fourth of August, 367. at the city of Amiens, for which he is faid to have ever shewed a very particular regard: he was then about eight years old, having been born in 359. on the eighteenth of April, or, as others will have it, on the twenty-third of May. Every one was surprised, says Ammianus, at d the emperor's raising him at once to the sovereignty, instead of creating him first Casar, pursuant to the custom, which had prevailed till that time 8. Victor writes, that he was induced thereunto by his mother-in-law and his wife. Of the former, we find no farther mention in history. As to the latter, she was, without all doubt, the mother of Gratian, Valentinian's first wife, called by Socrates, Severah, and styled on some medals Valeria Severa Augustai. That princess was then certainly at court, and in favour; but feems to have been foon after difgraced. We read in the chronicle of Alexandria, that the empress Severa having purchased an estate at a very low rate, the emperor, suspecting some foul dealing, was so provoked, that, not fatisfied with obliging her to restore the estate to the former owner, he drove her e out of the city k. Be that as it will, it is certain, that Valentinian divorced her, and married Justina, a native of Sicily, and the daughter, as is supposed, of one Justus, whom Constantius ordered to be put to death, while he was governor of Picenum, because he had bragged, giving credit to some omens, that he should one day be the father of an emperor. Zosimus writes, that she had been married before to Magnentius, killed in 352 m. She favoured the doctrine of Arius, but crastily concealed her sentiments in the emperor's life-time". She had two brothers, viz. Constantianus, who was raised to the dignity of tribunus stabuli, but killed by a band of robbers in 369. and Cerealis, on whom the emperor conferred the same dignity after the death of his brother o. By Justina the emperor had four children, viz. Valen- f tinian II. Justa, Grata, and Galla, of whom the latter was married to the emperor Theodosius P. Socrates writes, that the empress Severa having taken Justina, upon the death of her father, under her protection, and brought her up at court, the emperor was fo taken with her charms, that he resolved to marry her; but on the other hand, being unwilling to divorce his wife Severa, he caused a law to be pub-

F Cod. Theodof. chron. p. 78, 79. C Idem ibid. Idem ibid. Idem ibid. F Idem ibid. Socr. l. iv. c. 11. p. 219. iv. c. 21. p. 249. GOLTZ. p. 132. R Chron. Alex. p. 702, 704. R RIEIN. l. ii. c. 15. p. 184. * FLODARD. p. 32, 33.

* AMMIAN. I XXVII. p. 342.

* AMMIAN. ibid.

* Socr. l. iv. c. 31. p. 249.

* Goltz. p. 132

* Socr. p. 249.

* Idem ibid. Jorn. p. 652.

* Socr. p. 150.

* Socr. p. 150.

n Rufin. l. ii. c. 15. p. 184.

ſέ

į.

17

10

0-

of

ŗľ 7- f

Οľ

Ŋ1

ď.

þ

j)

:19

ĺψ

hd

a lished in all the cities of the empire, allowing his subjects to have two wives at a time: he adds, that Valentinian himself being the first who made use of his own licence, married Justina without dismissing Severa 9. Thus Socrates. But as neither Ammianus Marcellinus, who is no-ways tavourable to Valentinian, nor Zosimus, an avowed enemy to all the christian princes, take any notice of such a remarkable law; we cannot help looking upon the account of Socrates as an arrant fable. Jornandes indeed relates the same thing; but he copied it from Socrates, whom, for the most part, he follows. About the close of this year, the city of Mentz was unexpectedly The city of attacked, taken, and plundered, by Rhando, one of the princes of the Alemans, Mentz taken while the emperor, favs Ammianus, was employed in some other expedition as the hard plundered while the emperor, says Ammianus, was employed in some other expedition ; but by the Alemans. b in what expedition, we are no-where told. The same writer observes, that Rhando furprised the place, while the inhabitants, for the most part christians, were celebrating The Romans, to revenge this infult, had recourse to treachery, The treachery a solemn sestival. and caused Vithicabius, a prince of the same nation, to be affassinated by one of his of the Romans. own people, whom they had gained over by their emissaries. Vithicabius was the fon of Vadomarius, king of the Alemans, of whom we have had frequent occasion to speak in the reign of Constantius. The death of Vithicabius, who was a prince of great address, intrepidity, and resolution, put a stop for some time to the incursions of the Alemans. Valentinian, soon after the promotion of Gratian, left Amiens, and repaired to Treves, in which city he passed the winter, as appears from the dates c of several laws of this and the following year v. Before he reached that place, he was alarmed with dismal tidings from Britain, viz. that the PiEls, Scots, and other The PiEls and northern nations, had broke into the Roman territories; and having killed Nestaridus, Scots break count of the maritime tract, and Fullofaudes, who is distinguished with the title of man territodux or duke, had committed every-where dreadful ravages, and reduced the province ries. to a most deplorable condition. Hereupon the emperor immediately dispatched into Britain Severus, at that time comes domesticorum; but receiving still worse news of the state of affairs in that island, he soon after recalled him, and sent Jovinus in his room, who having acquainted the emperor with the miserable condition to which the island was reduced, and the still greater evils with which it was threatened, if d a powerful reinforcement both of horse and foot were not sent with all possible expedition to its relief, Valentinian made choice of Theodosius, father to the emperor of the fame name, and committed to him the whole management of this troublesome war. Theodosius, who was an officer of great experience, and known abilities, hastened to Boulogne, and embarquing there, landed at Rutupiæ; whence, as foon as his forces arrived from the continent, he marched to Lundonium or London, which Ammianus styles an ancient city; and there dividing his troops into several parties, he advanced against the enemy, who were roving up and down the country, cut great numbers But are to of them in pieces, obliged them to quit the booty and prisoners they had taken, pulled by and recovered an intire province, which they had seized and held as their own. To e this province, which comprised the southern parts of Scotland, the emperor gave the name of Valentia, perhaps from his brother Valens. Thus was the number of the provinces in this island increased, Valentia being added to the four former, which were Britannia Prima, Britannia Secunda, Maxima Casariensis, and Flavia Casariensis w. Theodofius, at the same time, crushed in its very beginning the revolt of Valentine or Valentinian, who, being banished into Britain, prevailed upon some of the inhabitants to proclaim him emperor; which Theodofius no fooner understood, than he marched against the usurper, and having got him and some of his confederates into The revole of his power, he delivered them up to the civil magistrates; but would not suffer them Valentine in to be examined concerning their accomplices, lest that should give occasion to new f troubles x. The same year the Franks and Saxons broke into Gaul, but were repulsed with great saughter by Theodosius on his return from Britain 1: it was probably on account of the advantages gained on this occasion that Valentinian assumed the title of the conqueror of the Franks, which is given him in an inscription of the year 369 2. Ammianus, among the other transactions of this year 367. relates several instances of the excessive severity and injustice of Valentinian, who had hitherto with great Inflantes of care concealed the cruelty of his temper. He condemned Diocles, who had been Valentinian's

F JORNAND. reg. c. 40. p. 652. AMMIAN. l. XXVII. p. 349. Idem ibid.
1. p. 81. WAMMIAN. l. XXVII. p. 346. & l. XXVIII. p. 368. USHER. Britannicat.

7 Idem, l. XXVII. p. 346. Socr. l. iv. c. 32. F JORNAND. reg. c. 4. R. Socr. l. iv. c. 32. W AMMIAN. l. xxviii. p. 340. O. 1. a. Socrala-Gar. antiq. p. 588. X AMMIAN. l. xxviii. p. 368. Zos. l. iv. p. 742. ecclesiar. antiq. p. 588. * .

VALES. rer. Fran. l. i. p. 46.

VOL. VI. Nº 5.

comes

comes largitionum in Illyricum, to be burnt alive for very inconfiderable faults; and a ordered Diodorus, who had been agens in rebus, to be put to death, with three apparitors of the vicar of Italy, for no other reason but because Diodorus had commenced a fuit against a count, who was going to court, and the apparitors had, pursuant to their office, summoned him to appear. The memory of Diodorus, and the three apparitors, is still honoured, says Ammianus, by the christians at Milan, who call the place where they were buried the innocents. To this probably the questor Eupbraxius alluded, when, upon the emperor's commanding another person to be put to death for causing the sentence of a lawful judge to be executed, he told him, that the christian religion honoured those as martyrs whom he condemned as guilty b. St. Jerom tells us, that this year, in the country of the Atrebates, now the Artois, b wool fell from heaven mixed with rain c. Orofius adds, that it was true woold; and Bucherius, that some of it is still to be seen at Arras, where it is called manna.

Several laws enacted by Valentinian.

Alemans,

ritories of the

Whom he defeats with great slaugh ter.

THE following year the two emperors, Valentinian and Valens, were consuls for e second time. The former enacted this year several excellent laws; and among the fecond time. the rest one commanding all pleaders, or lawyers, to forbear, in pleading, abusive terms, invectives and injuries, and to content themselves with such sees as their clients shall be pleased to give them, without making any bargain or agreement beforehand: as for fuch lawyers as have been honoured with any public employment, he will have them to be fatisfied with the glory of protecting the innocent, without debasing themselves to accept of any other reward f. By another law, he establishes c a physician in each of the fourteen quarters, into which the city of Rome was divided, who was to take care of the poor, and be maintained at the public expence. By this law the physician is allowed to accept what his patient shall think fit to give him, when intirely recovered, but not what he had promised during his illness 8. By a third law, he commands fome foldiers to remove from a fynagogue, where they were quartered, that being contrary to the respect due to a place set apart for the worship of God . Valentinian, having spent the winter at Treves in making vast Valentinian preparations, with a design to attack the Alemans in their own country, took enters the ter- the field on the seventeenth of June; and having assembled all his troops, crossed the Rhine, attended by his fon Gratian, by the two generals Jovinus and Severus, and d by count Sebastian, a man notorious in the ecclesiastic history for his cruelty to the orthodox christians in Egypt, while he was governor of that province. The emperor was, as appears from the date of one of his laws, at Worms on the thirty-first of July i. From thence he advanced into the enemy's country, and marched some days without meeting with the least opposition, though he committed every-where most dreadful ravages. At length he came to a place called Solicinium, where the Alemans had posted themselves on a high and steep mountain, which seemed inaccessible on every side, except that which looked to the north; and thither he sent Sebastian to intercept them in their flight, if he should have the good luck to dislodge them from any other quarter. As he advanced to view their situation, he narrowly escaped falling into an ambuscade; but being with much difficulty got safe to the main body of his army, he led them on to the attack. The Romans on this occasion behaved with fuch courage and resolution, as can hardly be expressed: they were several times repulsed, the Alemans defending themselves with equal courage and bravery. But the Romans, notwithstanding the disadvantage of the place, and the despair of the enemy, gained at length the top of the mountain, and put all to the sword who opposed them. Some of the Alemans made their escape by the favour of the night; but the far greater part were cut in pieces, either in the fight or the pursuit, Sebastian having cut off their retreat k. This memorable battle was fought, as we have hinted above, at Solicinium, which the modern geographers take to be the city of Sultz on the Neckar, at a small distance from the head of that river, in the dutchy of Vir- t temberg. As the season was already far advanced, after this victory, the soldiers were fent into winter-quarters, and the emperor returned with his fon Gratian to Treves, which he entered in a kind of triumph ". Bucherius describes at length the rout which he supposes the emperor to have taken on his return from Germany 1.

&lt;sup>a</sup> Ammian. l. xxvii. p. 345. b Idem ibid. c Hier chron. ad ann. 367. d Oros. l. vii. c. 32. p. 218. c Buch. Belg. p. 349. c Cod. Theodof. l ii. tit. 10. leg. 2. p. 140. & cod. Just. l. ii. tit. 6. leg. 6. p. 187. c Cod. Theodof. l xiii. tit. 3. leg. 8. p. 34. b Cod Just. l. i. tit. 9. leg. 4. p. 101. C Cod. Theodof. l xiii. tit. 6. leg. 3. p. 94. k Ammian. p. 250—242. l Baud. p. 209. m Idem. n Buca. Belg. p. 351—353. l. vii. p. 352.

a We find no laws dated from Treves till the first or the second of December; but one published at Cologne the thirtieth of September o; whence we conjecture Valentinian, on his return from Germany, to have marched against the Franks, who had broken into Gaul, as we have observed above.

Valentinian seems to have spent the greater part of the following year, when Valen- He fortifies the tinian the son of Valens, and Victor, one of that prince's generals, were consuls, in banks of the fortifying the banks of the Rhine with an incredible number of forts, towers and Rhine. castles, from the mouth of that river quite to Rhætia, where it rises P. He even built some castles on the other side of that river in the enemy's country, and one among the rest at the conflux of the Rbine and the Neckar, where the present city of Manb beim stands 1. He likewise ordered a fort to be built on a hill called by our historian Piri ; which Bucherius takes to be the hill of Heidelberg. But the Germans, after having by their deputies intreated the emperor in vain to forbear that undertaking, fell upon the foldiers who were employed in the work, and cut them in pieces, with the two dukes, Arator and Hermogenes, who commanded them. Syagrus, a notary or secretary, the only person who escaped the general slaughter, brought the news of it to the emperor, and was on that account difgraced'; but soon after taken again, it feems, into favour; for we shall fee him conful in 381. The emperor, to animate with his presence the soldiers in carrying on the above-mentioned works for the desence of the Rhine, and the safety of Gaul, passed great part of the present year on c the banks of that river, as appears from several laws of different dates enacted at Marciaticum, which most geographers take to be Manheim; at Altrip between Manheim and Spire, and at Brisac:. This year the emperor caused several senators, gover-several pernors of provinces, judges, and other officers, to be put to death for receiving bribes, sons put to and oppressing the people committed to their care, and among the rest the eunuch death by the Rhodanus, his chief chamberlain, whom, upon the complaint of a widow named ders. Berenice, whose estate the eunuch had seized unjustly, he caused to be immediately apprehended, and to be burnt alive in the circus, where the people were assembled to behold the sports ". The next consuls were the two emperors Valentinian and Valens, both the third time. The former continued all this present year 370. as d appears from the dates of several laws, partly at Treves, partly at Alteia, which is supposed to have been an imperial palace or country-seat near that city. In an inscription of this year, which is still to be seen at Vienna in Austria, we read, that Equitius, general of the troops in Illyricum, erected by the emperor's orders a fort in that country; and from another inscription of the following year found near Strigonium or Gran, in Lower Hungary, it appears, that another fort was built by his orders in that neighbourhood, for protecting the trade carried on by the subjects of the empire in those parts ". The emperor caused likewise a bridge to be built this year over the Tiber at Rome, which was then called the bridge of Gratian, afterwards the bridge Cestius, and is by the present inhabitants styled Ponto di S. Bartolomeo, or the bridge of e St. Bartholomew, being near the porch of St. Bartholomew's church z. In the inscription it is faid to have been built in the seventh year of the tribuneship, that is, of the reign, of Valentinian and Valens, and the third of Gratian, which was the present year: nevertheless the two former princes are marked there consuls the second time; whereas it is certain, that, in the feventh year of their reign, and the third of Gratian's, they were both in their third consulship. Valentinian and Valens are, in the same inscription, styled emperors for the seventh time, and Gratian for the second, and are all three honoured with the title of conquerors of the Germans, Alemans, Franks, and Goths; which shews, that each of them shared with his collegues the glory of his victories and conquests. Their victories, or rather the victories of Valentinian, over f the Franks, must have been very inconsiderable, since Ammianus takes no notice of

This year is remarkable in history for an irruption of the Saxons, who dwell- The Saxons ing on the coalts of the ocean amongst inaccessible marshes, left their country in great break into the numbers, and landing on the Roman territories, committed there dreadful ravages. empire. Count Nauneinus, who commanded in those parts, endeavouring to make head against them, was dangerously wounded, and put to flight. Hereupon the emperor dispatched Severus against them, who, as he was an officer of great experience and address, so distressed and harassed them, that they were forced to sue for peace;

á

jį

,

0

;

iñ ed

00 rs

ķĈ

Cod. Theod. chron. p. 89. p. 766, 767. Idem ibid. p. 700. Sulb. p. 706, 707.

P Ammian. l. xxviii, p. 966.

God. Theod. chron. p. 85, 86.

Cod. Theod. chron. p. 85, 86.

GRUTER. p. 160. Baron. ann. 312. w Cod. Theod. tit. 5. p. 291.

which was granted them, with leave to return unmolested into their own country, a

An army of 80,000 Burgundians on the banks of the Rhine.

after the Romans had picked out their best men to serve among their troops. But as they were returning, without the least apprehension of any danger, the Romans, fallroufly cut off by ing upon them unexpectedly, cut them all to a man in pieces. Though the Saxons were no-ways on their guard, yet they fought with incredible bravery, and fuch prefence of mind and resolution, that victory for some time inclined to their side x. Ammianus Marcellinus is not ashamed to style this black piece of treachery a successful attempt. But for fuch breaches of the public faith, and violations of the right of nations, practifed by the Romans more frequently under the christian than the pagan princes, we shall see them abandoned by heaven to those very barbarians, whom b they thus treacherously endeavoured to crush, and utterly suppress. The Saxons were thus flaughtered, according to St. Jerom y and Orofius z, on the territories of the Franks, at Deusona, says the former, which was a castle on the other side the Rbine, over-against Cologne, and is now known by the name of Tuits or Duits. The same year the Burgundians, to the number of eighty thousand fighting men, appeared on the banks of the Rhine, being invited thither by Valentinian, who maintained a private intelligence with their kings, and had promifed to pass the Rbine, and, in conjunction with them, fall upon the Alemans, with whom they were then at variance on account of fome falt-pits. But the emperor being thus busied in building the above-mentioned forts, and not caring to interrupt that work, and join them, as he had promised to do, they put to the sword all the prisoners they had taken, and c returned to their own country, highly enraged against the emperor, by whom they had been thus disappointed and deluded a. However, Theodosius, general of the horse, to which post he had been raised for his gallant and prudent conduct in Britain, taking advantage of the consternation the Alemans were in, made an irruption into their country, and returned with a confiderable number of captives, to whom the emperor allotted lands and fettlements on the banks of the Pob. Ammianus, in speaking of the Burgundians, informs us of several particulars relating to their government and religion. He seems not to doubt but they were descended from the Romans; and Orosius speaks of them as the descendants of those Romans, who were left by Tiberius and Drusus, the adopted sons of Augustus, in the castles and boroughs of d Germany; nay, he supposes them to have been named Burgundiones, from the Latin word burgus, fignifying a borough c. But from the word burgus they ought perhaps to have been called Burgiones, as Valefius observes d. Pliny the elder takes them to be originally a German nation, sprung from the Vindili; that is, as is generally supposed, of the Vandals. Valesius distinguishes the Burgundiones of Germany from those of the same name, who dwelt more to the east on the banks of the Danube f. The great cru- Ammianus gives us a pathetic account of the horrible cruelties practifed this year at elties of Maxi- Rome by Maximinus, or, as others style him, Maximus, a man of a most inhuman minus at and savage temper. He was brother-in law to Valentine or Valentinian, who attempted c to usurp the sovereignty in Britain; but nevertheless of a mean descent, and by birth a barbarian. However, he raised himself by degrees to the first employments in the state. He was made first governor of Corfica and Sardinia, and afterwards of Tuscia or Tuscany. From the latter government he was preferred to the honourable employment of præsecus annonæ at Rome, whose province it was to supply the city with provisions; which he did at first with great prudence and moderation, but in the end betrayed a most cruel, inhuman and revengeful temper, which he began to do on the following occasion: One Chilo, who had been vicar to the prefects, and his wife Maxima, having accused Sericus, Asbolius, and Campensis, three persons of mean condition, before Olybrius, prefect or governor of the city, for having, by magical prac- t tices and inchantments, endeavoured to take away their lives, Olybrius began to inquire into this matter; but he falling fick, the complainants, impatient of delay, petitioned and obtained, that the cause might be referred to the presectus annona, who readily undertook it, being glad of any opportunity that offered to satisfy his cruel temper, no more capable of pity or moderation, says Ammianus, than that of a wild beaft let loose upon the prey. He had scarce begun his examinations, when he wrote to the emperor, that innumerable persons were guilty of magical practices, but could not be convicted without racks and tortures. Hereupon the emperor,

Rome.

Z Oros. p. 219. a Idem. d Vales. rer. Francic. p. 48.

a who was himself naturally inclined to cruelty, appointed Maximinus vicar to the prefects in the room of Aginacius, and impowered him by an edict to put such persons, if thought necessary, to the rack, as had been by other princes exempted from it on account of their rank, or only subjected to it in cases of treason. With Maximinus he joined in commission one Leo, at that time only a notary, but afterwards raised to the dignity of magister officiorum. He was by birth a Pannonian, of mean parentage, but no less blood-thirsty, according to Ammianus, than his collegue Maximinus #. These two implacable judges executed their commission with that cruelty which every one may imagine: persons of all ranks and ages were dragged to their tribunal, tor- persons of all tured without mercy, and either executed like public malefactors, or stript of their rank vortured b estates, and sent into banishment. Among the former were Marinus, a samous and executed. pleader, Cethegus, Paphius, and Cornelius, all three senators, and many other eminent persons of both sexes. Alypius, a young nobleman of great distinction, was, for a very small fault, sent into exile. Lollianus, the son of Lampadius, who had been governor of Rome in 366. and prasectus pratorio under Constantius, being accused of having copied, when he was yet very young, a book of magic, his father, finding Maximinus inclined to condemn him to banishment, advised nim to appeal to the emperor; which he did accordingly: but Valentinian having reterred the cause to Phalangus governor of Batica, who surpassed Maximinus himself in cruelty, the youth was by him fentenced to death, and publicly beheaded. As c Maximinus continued raging without distinction of fex, age or condition, the fenate dispatched deputies to the emperor, earnestly intreating him, as he tendered the lives of his innocent subjects, to revoke the power he had given to Maximinus. Valentinian complied with their request, which put an end for the present to those bloody executions. Miximinus was called to court, and received with great marks of esteem and affection by the emperor, who two years after created him presect of Gaul, in which office he continued at least three years (for he was still prefect in 376.);

but foon after put to death by Gratian, with fome of the ministers of his cruelty h. THE following year, when Gratian and Sex. Petronius Probus were confuls, the Laws enacted emperor enacted several remarkable laws, and among the rest one dated the eleventh by Valentinian. d of February, and addressed to Viventius prefect of Gaul, enacting, that such players and comedians as should have received at the point of death the sacrament of baptism, should not be obliged, if they should recover, to act again on the stage '. From this law it appears, that the profession of a player, always deemed infamous among the Romans, was, under the christian princes, thought inconsistent with christianity; and likewife, that it was not free and voluntary, but fervile, and hereditary in certain families. By another law, dated the feventh of September, the emperor declares, that the daughters of players shall not be obliged to follow the profession of their mothers, if they have behaved in any other calling fo as to deferve a good character 1. By a third law, dated the twenty-ninth of May, and addressed to the senate, he e allows the free exercise of the pagan religion; and by a fourth, dated the twentyeighth of June, several privileges are granted or restored to the pagan pontiffs, and the same honour and respect is ordered to be paid to them as to the comites or counts 1. It is surprising that an emperor, who is said to have been not only an orthodox, but a zealous christian, should have thus favoured the pagan pontiffs and religion. By a law dated the seventeenth of May, he exempts from all civil offices such as had been admitted among the clergy before his time; but obliges the rest to discharge them, notwithstanding the privileges and immunities granted by other princes to all ecclesiastics. All the laws enacted this year before the twenty-eighth of June, are dated from Treves, whence he removed to Cantionacum, a place unknown to geograf phers, but which must have been but at a small distance from Treves, since the emperor was in that city on the twenty-eighth of June, and the very next day at Cantionacum, where he staid till the sisteenth of August. On the fixth of September he was at Meniz, probably on his march into the country of the Alemans; for this year he undertook an expedition against them, hoping to surprise Macrianus their king, He attempts to a brave and resolute prince; but he, having received timely notice of his approach, surprise the faved himself by flight; and the emperor, greatly concerned for his disappointment, Alemans. returned to Treves, after having laid waste the country round Mentz belonging to Ammian, l. xxviii. p. 358—360. h Idem ibid. p. 363. leg. 1. p. 301.

h Idem, p. 361-366.
1 Idem ibid.

<sup>1</sup> Cod. Theod. l. xv. tit. 7.

accomplices of strangle them-

Romanus,

the Alemans called Bucinobantes, to whom he gave one of their own nation, by name a Fraomarius, for king, who foon after exchanged his new dignity for the command of fome of his countrymen then quartered in Britain. Valentinian was returned to Treves, with his two generals, Severus and Theodofius, on the fixth of December 11. Other instances Ammianus Marcellinus "and St. Jerom observe, among the transactions of this year, of his severity. that Ostavianus, who had been proconsul of Africa under Julian, having concealed himself, while he was pursued by the officers of justice, in the house of an ecclesiastic, the magistrates commanded the ecclesiattic to deliver him up; which he refusing to do, was by the emperor's orders beheaded at Sirmium. The same year Hymecius, who had been vicar of Rome under Julian, and raised by Valentinian to the proconfulfhip of Africa, being accused of evil practices, (our historian explains himself no b farther) was brought to Ocricolum, about thirty miles from Rome, to be tried there by Ampelius governor of that city, and his vicar Maximinus. A letter was produced against him, written with his own hand to a pagan priest, named Amantius, desiring him to offer facrifices to the gods, that the cruel and avaricious emperor might in the end be reconciled to him; for part of his estate had been already confiscated for some real, or, as Ammianus believed, supposed crime. When this letter was produced, Hymecius, well apprised of the cruelty of Maximinus, appealed to the emperor, who referred the whole affair to the senate, by whom Hymecius was banished to the island of Boas on the coast of Dalmatia. The emperor was highly distatished with the fenate for not fentencing him to death; but did not think it adviseable to make the c least alteration in their decree P. The next confuls were Modestus and Arintheus, during whose administration nothing happened in the west, which authors have thought worthy of transmitting to posterity. From the dates of several laws it appears, that the emperor passed the whole year, partly at Treves, and partly at Nazonacum, which stood at a small distance from that city 4.

> year Maximinus was created prefect of Gaul; and the first against whom he exerted his new authority, was a person guilty of no less enormous crimes than himself, viz. Remigius, who, being magister officiorum, had screened his kinsman Romanus from the punishment due to the many cruelties, murders and extortions which he had com- d mitted in Africa, as we have related above. Leo, upon his return from Rome, where he had been joined in commission with Maximinus, being raised to the post of magister officiorum, Remigius, who held it before him, retired to his estate in the neighbourhood of Mentz, his native city, to lead there a retired life. But Maximinus, despising him now that he was out of power, seized and put to the rack one of his domestics, by name Cæsarius, in order to make him discover the evil practices of his

THE next consuls were Valentinian and Valens, both for the fourth time. This master, and what sums he had received of Romanus to defend and support him at Remigius and court. This Remigius no sooner understood, than, overcome by sear, he strangled himself, to avoid a public and more ignominious death . Palladius, who was no less guilty than Remigius, had been, it feems, disgraced before, for some other misdemeanour, tho' he ascribed his missortune chiesly to his having imposed upon the emperor in an affair of fuch importance. Of this Valentinian had fome fuspicion, and therefore ordered him to be arrested; but while the foldiers who guarded him were passing the night (no doubt the eve of some sestival) in a church, he ended his life in the same manner as Remigius had done his. Romanus himself was then under arrest, for having, by his unaccountable conduct, driven Firmus, a Moorish prince, to revolt. Theodofius, who was fent to suppress the rebellion, had seized Romanus, with all his domestics and papers, among which were found some relating to the affair of Leptis. Upon this Palladius had been arrested; but both he and Remigius having laid violent hands on themselves, Romanus was some time after set f at liberty, and the matter dropped for the present, but resumed under Gratian, when Romanus was convicted of high misdemeanours; but nevertheless, by the interest of Merahaudus, allowed to come to court to plead his own cause before the emperor :. What we she issue of this affair, we are no-where told. Firmus, whom we have mentioned above, was the son of Nubel, the most powerful of all the Moorish princes, who looked upon him, though subject to the Romans, as their king and sovereign.

m Ammian. l xxix. p. 397. & l. xxx. p. 398. Cod. Theod. p. 89. l. xxix. p. 396.
Mier. chron.
Ammian. l. xxviii. p. 359. 4 Cod. Theod. chron. Idem, l. xxviii. p. 381. & l. xxix. p. 399.

He

a He left feveral fons behind him, and among the rest Firmus and Zamma. The latter being privately murdered by his brother Firmus, Romanus, with whom Zamma lived in great intimacy, to revenge the death of his friend, did all that lay in his power to incense the emperor against Firmus, being backed therein by his kinsman Remigius, then magister officiorum. Hereupon Firmus, apprised of the danger that threatened him, and no longer able to bear the haughty and infolent behaviour of Romanus, and the officers of the army, resolved to revolt in his own desence; and accordingly, having animated the other Moorish nations to shake off the yoke, under which they had long groaned, he affumed the purple, and the other enligns of royalty, with the Firmus revolts title of king, a Roman tribune, who had taken part with him, laying his collar upon in Africa. b the head of the new king, instead of a diadem x. Some antiquaries will have this to be the Firmus, who, on an ancient medal, bears the title of Augustus y; but their opinion is rejected by others. Firmus, finding himself in a short time at the head of a confiderable body of Moors, who flocked to him from all quarters, ravaged the provinces of Africa and Mauritania without opposition, and even made himself master of Cæsarea, now Alger, the metropolis of Mauritania Cæsariensis, where he found a con-Takes Cæsarea, fiderable sum belonging to the exchequer, but lest in the hands of the magistrates of places. that city. The officers of the treasury sued the magistrates for the money which had been left with them in trust; but were ordered by the emperor to drop the prosecution, Clemens, bishop of the place, having prevailed upon him to iffue that order, c and by that means faved his country from certain ruin 2. The famous Symmachus, of whom hereafter, wrote on this occasion to Titianus, then vicar of Africa, pretting him to cause the order which the bishop had obtained to be put in execution i. Firmus took likewise the city of rucata, betrayed to him, as was believed, by the bishop of the Donatists, upon his promising not to molest any of that sect b. The Donatifis looked upon Firmus, not as an ulurper, but a lawful prince; whence they were in those parts styled Firmianic. The emperor was no sooner informed of the revolt of Firmus, than he dispatched against him Theodosius, the best general of his Theodosius is time, with the troops that were quartered in Pannonia and Upper Mæsia, and a detach-sent against ment out of those that attended the court, and were thence called comitatenses. Theo-him. d dosius embarqued at Arles in the latter end of the year 372. or the beginning of 373. and having had a favourable paffage, landed foon after at a place called Igilgitanum in Mauritania Sitifensis. His first care, upon his arrival, was to arrest Romanus, who, by his haughty and arbitrary conduct, had, as it were, forced the Moors to revolt. Firmus in the mean time, hearing that so renowned a commander Firmus prewas sent against him, began to despair of success; and thereupon dispatched deputies tends to submit. to Theodosius, declaring, that he had been, in a manner, forced to revolt; that he did not pretend to justify what he had done, but, on the contrary, was ready to submit, and quit the enfigns of royalty, provided the emperor would forget his past conduct. Theodofius, thinking it adviseable to admit of his submission and excuse, affured him of his pardon, upon his delivering up to him fome of the chief men among the Moors, by way of hostages. This Firmus promised to do; but as he put off from day to day the execution of his promise, Theodosius, suspecting his sincerity, marched from Panchariana, the place of the general rendezvous, to Tubusuptius, in the neighbourhood of mount Ferratus, where Mascezel, brother to Firmus, lay encamped with a confiderable body of Moors. He was there met by a fecond embaffy from Firmus; but as the deputies brought no hostages along with them, he would not so much as admit them to his presence, but fell unexpectedly upon the Tyndenses Theodosius and Majimffenjes, two Moorish nations, commanded by Mascezel; and having defeated defeats some them with great flaughter, he laid waste the country, razed the castle of Petra, liance with f which had been lately built, and made himself master of another strong-hold, which Firmus. he made choice of for a magazine, storing it with all forts of provisions, that they might be nearer at hand, in case he should think fit to penetrate farther into the country. In the mean time Mascezel, having rallied his broken forces, ventured a second engagement, in which he was attended with no better success than in the former, great numbers of his troops being cut off, and he himself narrowly escaping. Hereupon Firmus sent at last the promised hostages, and with them some bishops to Firmus preintercede with Theodosius in his behalf. The Roman general received them with the fends anew to

'n

d

0

(- e

I

t.

ď

j.TC

CS,

(5)

* Idem, l. xxx. p. 429. Oros. l. vii. c. 33. Zos. l. iv. p. 744. У Spanh. l. vii. p. 599. Сод. Theod. tit. 6. p. 389. Symmach. l. i. epift. 58. p. 39. Sym. ibid. Аидият. ер. 164. p. 286. Idem in par. l. i. c. 10, 11.

utmost civility and respect, and upon their promising in the name of Firmus, that 2

But prepares for war.

Theodosius gains great auvantages over his confederates.

Firmus abandons his army. and flies to the Itatlenfes,

the booty and prisoners he had taken should be restored, and the Roman army supplied with provisions, he granted a general pardon to him and all his followers; which so encouraged the Moor, that he came in person to wait on Theodosius; and bewailing his folly and rashness, promised to make amends for both by his suture conduct and fidelity. Theodosius received him in a most obliging manner, gave him all the encouragement he expected or defired, and dismissed him, extremely pleased with his reception. Firmus, at his departure, left some of his relations behind him for hostages; and two days after delivered up to the Romans a place called Icosium, with the prisoners, military enfigns, and the booty he had taken. From thence Theodosius advanced to Tipasa, where he was met by the embassadors of the Mazices, a nation inhabiting the eaftern parts of Mauritania Casariensis, who had joined Firmus in his revolt. They came to submit in the name of the whole nation, and to beg pardon for their revolt; but Theodosius returned them no other answer, than that their perfidy deserved to be punished with the utmost severity. From Tipasa he proceeded to Cafarea, now Alger, which Firmus had taken in the beginning of the rebellion, and delivered up to be plundered by his foldiers. There he received certain intelligence, that Firmus was preparing under-hand for war; that he had never had any real intention of concluding a peace with the Romans; and that he only watched an opportunity of falling upon them at the best advantage. Hereupon Theodofius, leaving at  $C\alpha$  area the first and second legions, who were to repair the  $\epsilon$ fortifications, and fecure it in the best manner they could against any farther attempts of the enemy, marched to Sugabarri, a town of Mauritania Cafarienjis, where he furprised a Roman cohort, who had joined the rebels. Their tribunes he put to death; but contented himself with condemning the common soldiers to the meanest offices in the army. From thence he advanced farther into the country; and having made himself master of Gaionatis and Tingitanum, two places of great strength, he passed the mountain Ancorarius, and entering the country of the Mazices, gained a fignal victory over them. They made at first a vigorous resistance; but were at length utterly defeated, and almost all put to the sword. But, notwithstanding this victory, the Moors poured down upon him from all quarters in such multitudes, that d he thought it adviseable to retire, rather than to penetrate farther into the country, his army being only three thousand five hundred strong. But the enemy, apprised of his design, not only harasted him incessantly on his march, but, by stopping up all the passes, cut off his retreat; infomuch that the whole army must inevitably have perished, had not the Moors unexpectedly betaken themselves to flight, and left the passes open, at the fight of a great body of their own countrymen, whom they mistook, observing some Roman deserters at their head, for a reinforcement coming to relieve Theodosius. The Romans, having thus, by a happy mistake, escaped death or flavery, retired in good order to Muzucanum, and from thence to Tipata; where, Theodosius, reslecting on the posture of his affairs, resolved to manage the war after e another manner, and to try, whether he could, by menaces or promises, prevail upon the nations in alliance with Firmus to make a separate peace, and deliver him up to the Romans. With this view he dispatched embassadors to the several nations that had joined him; which Firmus, who was well acquainted with the fickle temper of the Moors, no fooner understood, than, dreading the iffue of fuch negotiations, he abandoned his army; and taking the advantage of a dark night, retired privately to the mountains called Caprarienses, which, by reason of the rocks and precipices, were deemed inaccessible. The multitude, struck with amazement at his unexpected flight, and now without a head, foon dispersed; and Theodosius, seizing their camp, made himself master of the neighbouring countries without the least opposi- f tion, placing fuch governors over them, as had given him evident proofs of their fidelity. He then marched without delay in pursuit of Firmus, who, as he was informed, had taken fanctuary in the country of the Isastenses. That warlike nation refusing to deliver him up, several battles were sought, in one of which Mazaca, Firmus's brother, was taken prisoner; but died the same day of the wounds he had received. Evalus, a person of great authority among the Ijastenses, and his son Florus, sell likewise into the hands of the Romans; and as they had been remarkably zealous in the cause of Firmus, they were both, by Theodosius's orders, burnt alive. The Ro-Who are defeat- mans, overpowered with numbers, were often reduced to great streights; but haved by Theodo- ing in the end utterly defeated the enemy in a battle which lasted from morning to g night,

UK III.

lup-

ers :

and ture

him

aled.

mili

tike wa, i

Fir.

nd to

, ili

11

of de dia

näver

i iciy

apr.

120 :т.рв

re he

ut to useA

ing

, he ed a

ne at

g : 15

s, dat !

CU<sub>h</sub>

pridi

34

11201

น เป็

dey

a ng

icith

-72,

alitt t

prevail

er all

131213 imper

111005

172

13.13 ......

is their orpoid i of their

he #33

iii(M :, Fir-

eived.

i, fell

1005 17 he Rir

Jt 128.

sing to B

a night, some nations, that had joined the Isastenses, began to be weary of the war, and defert them. Hereupon Igmazen, prince of the country, finding himself abandoned by his allies, and no-ways in a condition to make head against the Romans with his own forces alone, privately agreed with Theodosius to betray Firmus into his hands, and accordingly ordered him to be secured, while he was preparing to make his escape. But Firmus, to avoid the disgrace of the punishment, which he apprehended from the Romans, strangled himself while his guards were asleep, to the great Firmus grief of Igmazen, who had proposed to ingratiate himself with the Romans, by car-strangles himrying him alive to their camp. However, he immediately fent the body to Theo-felf. dosius, who received it with great joy, and soon after returned to Sitisfis, which city b he entered in a kind of triumph. The several Moorish nations, that had sided with Firmus, sent deputies to sue for peace; which Theodosius readily granted them, upon their delivering up to him some of their leading men, whom he caused to be put to death q. In this war Gildo, one of Firmus's brothers, took party with the Romans, and gave fignal proofs of his fidelity; but afterwards revolted under Honorius, and was attended with no better success than his brother. When the war was ended, Theodosius wrote to Symmachus; but in his letter he spoke only in general terms of his victory, referring him to public fame for a more particular account of it. Symmachus, in his answer, commends his modesty, which to him feemed the more worthy of praise, as Theodosius was no less qualified for writing than fighting r.

THE following year, when Gratian was conful the third time with Equitius, many eminent persons of both sexes were cruelly racked and put to death by Simplicius, Cruelties exervicar of Rome, who being raised to that employment by the interest of Maximinus, cife at Rome put, under various pretences, all those to death to whom his patron bore the least grudge, and among the rest Aginacius, a patrician of an illustrious and ancient family, who had been confular or governor of Byzacene under Julian, and vicar of Rome in the present reign. He was accused of adultery; and tho' the informer could not make good the charge, yet he was fentenced to death, and executed with Anepsia, a lady of great distinction, who being accused of the same crime, had impeached Aginacius, hoping by that means to ingratiate herself with Simplicius, and escape the d danger that threatened her'. As for the emperor, he passed the winter at Milan, as appears from the dates of several laws, but was again at Treves on the twentyfirst of May, and the twentieth of June'. From thence he marched into Germany; and after having ravaged the country bordering on the Rhine, returned to Basle, in the neighbourhood of which city he ordered a fort to be built named Robur: from this fort we find a law dated the tenth of July ". While the emperor was encamped there, news was brought, that the Quadi had with great violence broken into Illyri- The Quadi and cum, upon the following provocation: Valentinian, perhaps over-careful in fortifying break into the borders of the empire, had ordered some forts to be built beyond the Danube, Illyricum, in the territories of the Quadi, who, alarmed thereat, prevailed upon Equitius, then

e general of the troops in Illyricum, to suspend the work till he received further orders from the emperor, to whom they had fent some of the chief men of their nation to complain of that violence. But in the mean time, Maximinus, presect of Gaul, upbraiding Equitius with cowardice and irrefolution, bragged that, in spite of the Quadi, the forts should be soon finished, provided his son Marcellianus, tho' yet very young, was but created duke of Valeria, a province of Illyricum. Marcellianus being accordingly advanced to that dignity, upon his arrival in Illyricum, ordered the work, which had been for fome time discontinued, to be carried on anew, without taking the least notice of the complaints of the Quadi. Hereupon Gabinius, their king, came in person to wait upon him, intreating him, with the greatest modesty f and respect imaginable, not to give any motives of jealousy or misunderstanding between his people and the subjects of the empire. Marcellianus received him in a Gabinius, king very obliging manner; and pretending to hearken to his just remonstrances, invited of the Quadi, murdered by him to a banquet, during which he caused him, without any regard to the facred the Romans. laws of hospitality, or the right of the nations, to be inhumanly murdered. This black piece of treachery alarmed and incensed both the Quadi, and their neighbours the Sarmatians, who flying to arms, passed the Danube in the utmost rage; and falling upon the reapers, it being then harvest-time, cut most of them in pieces, laid 9 Ammian. 1. xxix. p. 398—408. Zos. 1. iv. p. 744. xxviii. p. 363—366. t Cod. Theodos. chron. p. 93, 94. F Sym. 1. x. epift. 1. p. 389. B Idem ibid. l. xxviii. p. 363-366.

The Ouadi invade Pannonia, and commit dreadful ravages.

waste the country to a great distance, and returned loaded with an immense booty. a In this confusion, Constantia, the daughter of Constantius, who was then passing through Illyricum, in order to be married to Gratian, had fallen into their hands, had not Messala, governor of the province, who attended her, put her into a chariot in great haste, and conveyed her with all possible speed to Sirmium w. Constantia was born after the death of her father, and therefore was at that time in the thirteenth or fourteenth year of her age x. She is styled on the ancient coins Flavia Maxima Constantia. Probus, the prefect of Illyricum, resided then at Sirmium; but as he was a man of no courage, tho' descended of an illustrious family, he was so alarmed at the report of the many murders and unheard-of cruelties committed by the incenfed enemy, that he had already provided himself with swift horses to make his escape; b but being with much-ado prevailed upon to ftay, more out of regard to his own fafety, than the public good, he took all imaginable care to put the city in a condition to withfland the efforts of the barbarians; who thereupon, inflead of laying fiege to it, refolved to pursue Equitius, whom they looked upon as the chief author of the murder of their king. He had fled into Valeria, and thither they followed him, committing dreadful ravages in the countries through which they passed. In their way they met two legions, the Pannonian and the Masian, who had been sent to oppose them, and were of fufficient strength to restrain their fury, had they not fallen into an unfeafonable contention about precedency, each of them claiming the honour of charging the first. The barbarians, apprised of their disagreement, without waiting c for the fignal of battle, fell first with great fury upon the Masian legion, before they They defeat two had time to put themselves in a posture of defence; and having cut most of them in Roman legions pieces, attacked, and in like manner put to the fword, the other legion, only a small number of them by flight escaping death or captivity y. Thus all the open country was abandoned to the barbarians, the Romans remaining masters only of the fortified places, where they committed, fays Zosimus 2, as great diforders as the barbarians themselves in the other parts. But the Sarmatians, having entered Upper Masia, were The Sarmatians repulsed with incredible flaughter by Theodosius, afterwards emperor, but at that time very young, and only duke of Massia. The barbarians, who were infinitely fuperior to him in number, thought to have overpowered him; but he, with a cou-d rage and conduct far above his years, made fuch a dreadful havock of them, as to fatiate with the bodies of the flain, to use the expression of Ammianus, the birds of prey, and the most ravenous among the wild beasts a. The Sarmatians, despairing of fuccess against so brave a leader, sent deputies to sue for peace; which they obtained, and for some time observed, being kept in awe by some troops, which Valentinian had fent into Illyricum upon the first notice of the irruption of the barbarians into that province. He was for leaving Gaul, and marching in person against them; but as the autumn was already far spent, and Macrianus king of the Alemans, with other princes, feemed ready to break into Gaul upon the departure of the emperor, he was with much-ado prevailed upon to put off his march to a more convenient feafon. However, as he was determined to leave Gaul early in the spring, and march into Illyricum, he invited Macrianus, whose valour he chiefly dreaded, to an interview in the neighbourhood of Mentz. Macrianus complied with his invitation, and tho' at first he betrayed a great deal of pride in seeing his friendship thus courted by the Roman emperor, yet in the end he accepted the advantageous terms that were offered him, and continued to his death a faithful friend to the Romans b. He was in the end killed by Merobandes king of the Franks, whose dominions he had invaded . Valentinian, having thus concluded a peace with the brave king of the Alemans, returned to Treves, where he passed the winter d; and the following spring set out from thence for Illyricum, attended by his wife Justina, and Valentinian her eldest fon. f into Illyricum. Gratian was left at Treves, with a numerous body of troops, to keep the German nations in awe. The present year 375. is marked in the fasti thus; the year after the third consulship of Gratian, and his collegue Equitius. St. Jerom writes, that no confuls were named this year, on account of the disturbances raised in Pannonia by the Sarmatians c. The emperor was still at Treves on the ninth of April f; but left that city foon after 8. He was met on his march by embassadors from the Sarmatians,

The emperor concludes a peace with the Alemans, defeated by Theodofius.

And marches

W Ammian. l. xxix. p. 408, 409. Zos. l. iv. p. 745. Chrys. at Mian. & Zos. ibid. Zos. p. 745. Ammian. p. 410, 411. Cod. Theod. chron. p. 64. Hier. chron. * Chrys. ad vid. junior. p. 463. 7 Am-410, 411. b Idem, l. xxx. p. 417, 418. f Cod. Theod. chron. p. 94-8 Ammian. l. xxx. p. 418.

a who throwing themselves at his feet, earnestly intreated him not to give credit to the

K []],

ioty. 1

wgh

not reat

n100

h or

Con-

W15 1

ed a

(පැසි cape; b

later,

ion to t to it,

CET.

, OTir var

espek

to 1000

our of facing (

e they

en in النحا

atry

thed

17:3D$

, Well

e tha

friely

3.00

n, 25 D

ords of paring is they

with barba•

gaiast

Mari

tupe

vezieni f

march

n, itil

zed by

Tere

e WZS

led.

7,181

(er 011)

175.18

n lot

COU-

y the thai

1.17

7 14

j, #18.

护种

eft ion. I

reports that had been spread abroad concerning the ravages and cruelties said to have been committed by those of their nation; they assured him, that, upon examination; he would not find them guilty of the crimes that were by their enemies urged against The emperor answered, that he would determine nothing for the present; but suspend his judgment till his arrival in those parts which had most suffered by their late irruption. Having thus dismissed the embassadors, he pursued his march; and arriving in Illyricum, took up his quarters at Carnuntum, once a flourishing city, but then in decay. Most geographers take it to be the city of Hainburg on the Danube in Austria, about thirty-three miles east of Vienna. The emperor chose it, as b being most conveniently situated for the defence of the country, and continued there three months, making the necessary preparations for his intended expedition against the Quadi and Sarmatians. He was still at Carnuntum on the twelfth of August. Ammianus blames him for not inquiring how Gabinius king of the Quadi came to be murdered, nor punishing those, who, through treachery or cowardice, had abandoned the defence of the frontiers; both which things were expected from a prince of his exactness and severity k. Probus the prefect was the only person against whom he shewed any resentment; for he, to satisfy the avarice of the emperor, had, according to Ammianus, oppressed the people committed to his care in a manner hardly to The prople of be expressed, putting to death, banishing, or condemning to dungeons, the most Illyricum opc wealthy among them, that he might feize their estates; insomuch that all the perfons of rank in the country, dreading the avarice and unheard-of cruelties of their governor, had privately disposed of their effects, and abandoned their country. All this the emperor learnt of a philosopher, by name Iphicles, who had been sent by the Epirots his countrymen, to thank Probus for his prudent and mild administration. The emperor, informed of the errand on which he was fent, asked him, whether his countrymen were really satisfied with their governor? and whether their thanks and commendations were fincere? They thank and commend him, answered frankly the philosopher; but with tears in their eyes, and fore against their will. Hereupon Valentinian made a strict inquiry into his conduct, and finding him guilty of most d enormous extortions, and unheard-of barbarities, resolved to depose him; but was prevented by death from putting his defign in execution 1. Thus Ammianus. But St. Jerom writes, that Illyricum was plundered, and tyrannically oppressed, by Equitius, without so much as mentioning Probus m; and Ammianus himself owns, that Leo, then magister officiorum, exasperated the emperor against Probus, hoping to be made prefect in his room ". Probus was descended from one of the most illustrious An account of families in Rome, and reckoned amongst his ancestors the emperor Marcus Aurelius. the family of The families of the Probi, of the Anicii, and of the Olybrii, were, according to St. Jerom O, Ausonius P, and Prudentius 4, the most conspicuous in Rome. Probus, who had embraced the christian religion, with his whole family , lived in great intimacy e with St. Ambrose, the celebrated bishop of Milan. When the latter was by the emperor appointed governor of Liguria and Æmilia, Probus, in taking his leave of him, gave him the following memorable advice: Acquit your self in your office, not like a governor, but like a bishops. St. Ambrose was then by profession a pleader or advocate. Probus was first proconsul of Africa in 358. afterwards sour times presect of Italy or Gaul, and in 371. Gratian's collegue in the confulship. He was no less famous for his wealth, than his birth and employments; for he is faid to have owned immense possessions in all the provinces of the empire . Paulinus Diaconus tells us, that two Persian lords of great distinction, being come to Milan to visit St. Ambrose, went from thence to Rome, on purpose to behold the grandeur and pomp in which f Probus lived . He died, as appears from Claudian, before the end of the year 394. being then in the fixtieth year of his age w, after having received the facrament of baptism; and was buried in a magnificent monument near the church of St. Peter at Rome, of which monument some remains were still to be seen in the time of pope Nicolas V x. Several letters written to him by Symmachus have reached our times y, and a poem addressed to him by Ausonius in 372. Ammianus commends him in h Idem ibid. k Ammian. p. 425. 1 Cod. Theod. chron. p. 94. 1 Idem ibid. m HIER. n Ammian. l. xxx. p. 424, 425. ym. l. i. p. 221. r Idem ibid. • Hier. ep. 8. p. 63. • Ambrof. vit. p. 79. P Auson. ep. 3. p. 422. 9 PRUD. in Sym. l. i. p. 221. AMMIAN. I. XXVII. Ambrof. vit. p. 83. * Baron. ad F. 352. w Claud, de consulat. Olyb. & Prob. p. a. ann. 395. y Sym. l. iii. epitt. 50-55. p. 36.

feveral places of his history, but more frequently taxes him with great vices, perhaps a because he professed the christian religion 2. Claudian, tho a pagan as well as Ammianus, highly commends him; but it is in a panegyric on his children 2. Both writers agree in extolling his generosity. His wise Proba, named in the ancient inscriptions Anicia Faltonia Proba, was no less esteemed on account of her birth and extraordinary qualities, than her husband, being adorned with every virtue becoming her sex, and descended from the Anician samily, equalled by Cassiodorus 3, St. Austin 4, St. Jerom 4, and St. Ambrose 4, to the imperial samilies. Some of her ancestors bore the first employments in the times of the republic; and one of them is said to have been honoured with a triumph for reducing Illyricum 5. Ammianus 8 and Zosimus 4 take notice of their immense wealth; and St. Jerom, writing to Demetrias b the grand-daughter of Probus, says, that it was the peculiar prerogative of her family to possess in the first Roman senator that embraced the christian religion 1. Ammianus observes, that, in the reign of Constantius, the Anicians bore the chief sway in Rome m.

Faustinus exe-

Valentinian ravages the country of the Quadi.

He dies suddenly.

Several omens preceding Valentinian's death.

in Rome m. But to resume the thread of our history: Valentinian, during his stay at Carnuntum, caused Faustinus, nephew to Viventius, a few years before prefect of Gaul, to be first inhumanly racked, and afterwards publicly executed, being accused of magical practices, and of having answered one Nigrinus, desiring him in jest to make him a notary, Make me first emperor. They were joking; but the joke cost both of them c their lives. From Carnuntum the emperor dispatched Merobandes and count Sebastian, with a party of foot, to lay waste the enemy's country, while he, with the main body of the army, advanced to Acincum, now Gran, or, as others will have it, Buda in Lower Hungary. There he passed the Danube, and having ravaged the enemy's country far and near, destroying all with fire and sword, he returned to Acincum, when the autumn was already far advanced. Being desirous to find out some convenient winter-quarters in that frozen climate, he proceeded from thence to Sabaria, now Servar; but that place not answering his expectation, he pursued his march along the Danube to Bregetio, which some take to be a village now called Bregnitz, and others a place in the isle of Schut, where the present city of Komare stands, or a d little below that of Markelbaz o. There he gave audience to the embassadors of the Quadi, come to fue for peace; but while he was speaking to them with great warmth, and threatening to extirpate their whole nation, he all on a fudden fell to the ground, as if his life and voice had failed him at once. He was conveyed into his chamber by those who attended him, where he was seized with convulsion fits, and violent contorsions of all his limbs, in the agonies of which he expired on the seventeenth of November of this year 375. in the fifty-fifth year of his age, after having reigned twelve years, wanting an hundred days P. Villor writes, that he died of a furfeit 9. St. Jerom ascribes his death to a violent vomiting of blood r. Socrates tells us, that being affronted at the meanness and beggarly appearance of the embassadors of the Quadi, he asked them, If their country afforded men of no better quality to appear e before him? They answered, That the first men in the nation were in his presence. Hereupon he fell into a great passion, upbraiding their whole nat on with arrogance, for presuming to insult the majesty of the Roman emperor and people. He delivered this with fo much heat and violence, that, his veins bursting, he was instantly suffocated in his own blood s. The reader will find in Socrates part of the speech which he made, or is supposed to have made, to the embassadors. His death was prefaged, according to Ammianus, by feveral omens: A blazing star, which, in the opinion of that writer, ever forebodes the death of some great personage, had appeared a few days before: at Sirmium the palace, court and forum were confumed by lightning: the night before he died, he saw, or imagined to see, his wife, then absent, f fitting by him in a melancholy posture, and in a mourning dress, with her hair dishevelled. This Ammianus takes to have been his genius for saking him ". On the

<sup>**</sup> Ammian. l. xxvii. p. 352, 353. l. xxviii. p. 362. l. xxxii. p. 423, 424. ** Claud. ibid. ** Cassiod. l. x. ep. 12. p. 162. ** August.ep. 179. p. 305. ** Hier. ep. 11. p. 162. ** Amber. 33. p. 263. ** Auson. p. 422. ** Ammian. l. xvi. p. 68. ** Zos. l. vi. p. 828. ** Hier. ep. 8. p. 68. ** Sym. p. 299. ** Prud. in Sym. l. i. p. 221. ** Ammian. l. xvi. p. 68. ** Vide Baudr. p. 55. ** Vide Sans. & Baudr. p. 129, 130. ** Ammian. l. xxx. p. 427. Vict. epit. Philost. l. ix. c. 16. p. 130. ** Vict. epit. ** Hier. ep. 3. p. 26. ** Sogr. p. 248, 249. ** Idem ibid. ** Ammian. p. 426.

a day he died, his horfe, while he was about to mount, rearing with great fury, his firster or equery, firwing to place the emperor in the faddle, happened to give him a blow; which he refenting with his usual brutality, ordered the equerry's hand to be cut off; but Carealis, tribunus stabuli, or master of the horse, put off the execution of to cruel and unjust an order at the peril of his own life w. The year before, the Tites overflowed its banks, and laid all the lower parts of Rome under water, the inhabitants being obliged to fave themselves upon the hills, where they had perished with banger, had not Claudius, prefect of the city, fent them a feafonable supply of penvisions in bosts. These overflowings of the Tiber were generally looked upon as the forerunaers of some public disaster. The body of the deceased emperor was emb balmed, and fent to Constantinople, to be interred there amongst the other christian princes. It arrived in that city on the twenty-eighth of December of the enfuing year 376. but was not buried till the twenty-first of February of the year 382. when Theodofius paid it that last duty . Some pretended in 1174. to have discovered his body at Anderseach on the Rhine; but it is evident from history, that he was buried at Constantisople. As to his character, Ammianus taxes him with several vices. He was, accord- His character. ing to that writer, naturally inclined to cruelcy, punishing even the smallest faults with the atmost fewericy, and fuffering his ministers, or rather encouraging them, to exercise unheard-of crueities. He was coverous to a great degree, using all posfible merhods to raise money; which however some excuse in him, as he found, on bis accession to the empire, the exchequer quite exhausted by his predecessors, especially by Julian, who had spont immense sums in the Persian Aar. He had a mighty opinion of his own accomplishments and abilities, and therefore hated all who were eminent for learning, valour, skill in the military art, or any other prerogative; nay, even such as had a genteel fancy in dress. He pretended to be a great enemy to cowards, and nevertheless, on several occasions, betrayed more fear than was becoming a man, who, from his infancy, had borne arms; infomuch that his ministers, who were well acquainted with his temper, when he was in a passion, and they could by no other means appeals him, used to pretend certain intelligence from the frontiers, that the barbarians were up in arms, and ready to break into the empire; d which never failed to allay his wrath, and make him appear, to use the expression of Ammianus, as mild as ever was Antoninus Pius v. He suffered himself to be firangely imposed upon by his ministers, reposing an intire considence in those who described it the least; whence the provinces were often oppressed, and the people reduced to beggary, while he, mifled and deceived by those about him, believed they enjoyed an intire happiness z. Had he not been deceived in the choice of his ministers, fays Vistor, he would have reigned with great glory, and been ranked after his death amongst the best princes. And truly he was, even according to Ammiamany excellent qualities; well acquainted with the military art, and no less with the art of governing; careful in protecting the subjects of the empire against the incursions of the barbarians; an exact observer of the military discipline; enured from his intancy to hardships, and no-ways biaffed by favour in disposing of the great offices. Tho' he had many relations, who, upon his advancement, expected great preferments, yet he employed none of them, except his brother Valens, whom he affumed for his collegue, and with whom he reigned in perfect concord. In his entertainments he was splendid, but not profuse; in his person comely, and well-shaped; in his conversation agreeable; of an extraordinary memory, and ready elocution, knowing well how to accommodate himself to all times and occasions b. He suffered no places to be bought or fold during the whole time of his reign; and tho' he was t' often mittaken in the choice of his officers and ministers, yet his intention was to prefer only the most deserving, and for that reason he neglected his own relations. He abated the taxes, and eased his people, as far as the state of his affairs would allow, of the heavy burdens laid upon them by his predecessors. He was an utter tranger to debauchery and unlawful pleasures, which he endeavoured to restrain by several excellent laws 4. As to his religion, in the great variety of opinions, which at that time divided the world, he inviolably adhered to the orthodox faith; but, avoiding all disputes, he allowed to the rest of his subjects, even to the pagans, an * Idem, р. 433. Макс. ehrop.

* Амміан. l. ххх. р. 431, 432.
ibid.

* Амміан. р. 433.

* Idem, р. 423.

* Vict. p. 651. P. 349. a Idem ibid.

intire liberty of conscience. He is blamed by the ecclesiastic writers, for suffering a his brother Valens to persecute the orthodox christians; but some alledge in his defence. that the condition of his affairs would not allow him in prudence openly to oppose Valens, fince that perhaps might have kindled a civil war, which, at that time, would have proved fatal to the empire. To conclude, he was endowed, according to Ammianus, with such excellent qualities, that had they not been allayed with the mixture of the above-mentioned vices, especially with that of cruelty, he had been no-ways inferior to the excellent emperors Trajan and M. Aurelius. Amongst his other laws he enacted one addressed to Maximus vicar of Rome, relating to the stature or fize of fuch as were to be admitted into the army, which was not to be under fix foot feven inches d.

WE shall now proceed to the history of the reign of Valens in the east, which, to

The reign of Valens in the east.

avoid confusion, we have thought proper to deliver separately, there being no other connection, but that of time, between the reigns and transactions of the two princes. After the division of the provinces made at Mediana in the neighbourhood of Naissus in Dacia in 364. Valens returned to Constantinople, where he enacted a law dated the twenty-fixth of December, forbidding the messengers of good news to exact, according to the abuse which then prevailed, or even to accept any thing of the people; but allows them to receive what persons of rank and fortune shall think proper to offer them of their own accord. The following year 365. Valens was still at Constantinople on the nineteenth of March ; but soon after set out for Syria, the Persians e being in motion, with a defign, as was apprehended, to break the peace which they had lately concluded with Jovian. Being informed, as he entered Bitbynia, that the Goths were ready to invade Thrace, he dispatched messengers to his officers in those parts, warning them to be upon their guard, and pursued his march to Casarea in Cappadocia, where he was on the fourth of July, and continued there till the latter end of the summer 8. During his stay in that city, a dreadful earthquake happened, which was felt in most provinces of the empire, and overturned several cities in Sicily, Palestine, and above all in the island of Crete, where the shock was most violent h. When Valens was upon the point of departing from Casarea, news was brought him of the revolt of Procopius, who, after having paid the last duty to the d body of his kinsman Julian, had privately withdrawn, through fear of Jovian, into Cherfonesus Taurica; but not trusting those barbarians, and finding himself destitute even of the necessaries of life, he left that inhospitable country, and returning in disguise into the territories of the empire, he reached undiscovered the city of Chalcedon, where he was received by one Strategius, his trufty friend, and by him carefully concealed at his country-house. From thence he went frequently in a mean dress to Constantinople; and finding that the people there were generally dissatisfied with the present government, on account of the cruelties practised by Petronius, whose daughter, Albia Dominica, the emperor had married, he resolved to improve that diffatisfaction to his own advantage. Having therefore gained over an eunuch e of great wealth, by name Eugenius, lately difgraced by Valens, and some of the officers who commanded the troops that had been fent into Thrace against the Goths, and were then quartered at Constantinople, he boldly ventured to discover himself, and lay before the people and foldiery the title he had to the empire, as being nearly And is acknow- related to Julian. Hereupon the officers, whom he had gained before-hand, proclaimed him emperor; and the rest, following their example, saluted him with the title of Augustus, and carried him in triumph to the imperial palace, whither he was attended only by the dregs of the people. However, the next and the following days several persons of distinction joined him, and at length the whole city of Constantinople. The news of this revolt struck Valens with such terror and dismay, that f he was for quitting the imperial purple, and refigning the empire; but being, with powerful arguments, persuaded by his friends not to part with the imperial dignity, he detached some troops against his new rival, hoping to crush him before he was in a condition to make any refissance. This detachment met Procopius at Mygdus in Phrygia, attended by a promiscuous multitude of fugitive slaves, deserters, and perfons of desperate fortunes, who, upon the approach of the emperor's forces, put ledged by the city of Constantinople.

themselves in a posture of defence. But Procopius, distrusting their courage, while d Cod. Theod. l. iii. de tyrnonib. Cod. Theod. l. viii. tit. 11. leg. 1. both . 2

ŕ

25

N

텧

r.1

;[1

K.

618

ψ

a both parties were ready to engage, stept boldly forward, as if he designed to challenge one of the adverse party to a single combat; and taking Vitalianus, one of the officers, by the hand, mildly upbraided him and his fellow-foldiers, for fiding with a Pannonian robber against one allied to the samily of Constantine the Great. His fpeech made such a deep impression upon them, that they immediately passed over He is joined by to his party, and with loud acclamations saluting him emperor, carried him in a party of the . triumph to the imperial pavilion k. This defection brought a very feafonable accession from of strength to Procopius, who thereupon detached a strong party, under the conduct of Rumitalea a tribune, to feize on Nice; which they did accordingly, without the loss of a single man 1. Valens, alarmed at the usurper's unexpected prob gress, dispatched Vadomarius, formerly king of the Alemans, to recover that important place, while he went in person to lay siege to Chalcedon, from which city one of his laws is dated the first of December "; but he met with so vigorous a resistance, that he was obliged to give over the enterprize, the besieged insulting him from the Valens obliged walls as he retired, and reviling him with the nickname of Sabaiarius, that is, Beer-fiege of Chaldrinker, sabaia being a kind of small drink made of barley, and common in Panno-cedon. nia, where Valens was born. Rumitalca, who commanded in Nice, being informed of his retreat, fallied out with great boldness, and bearing all down before him, had utterly defeated the emperor, had not Valens, upon timely notice of his approach, taken a quite different rout by the lake Sunona, and the windings of the river Gallus ". • Thus was the emperor obliged to abandon Bitbynia to the enemy, and retire with all expedition to Ancyra, where he continued waiting the arrival of the troops which Lupicinus was leading out of the east to his affistance. In the mean time Arintheus, one of his chief commanders, an officer of great prowess and renown, meeting a party of the rebels, commanded by one Hyperechius, formerly an apparitor, and scorning to enter the lists with such a contemptible enemy, commanded, with an air of authority, Hyperechius's own men to bring to him in chains their vile and despicable leader; which they did accordingly, struck with the awful and majestic mien of that renowned commander. But in the mean time Procopius, being informed, that the money Procopius fei-allotted for the pay of the foldiers who ferved in the east, was lodged in the city of zes on Cyzid Cyzicus, hastened thither, laid siege to the place, and in the end reduced it, though cus, and the defended with great resolution and intrepidity by Seronianus, at that time comes treasure lodged domesticorum, who found means to make his escape, as Zosimus informs us P; but there. was afterwards taken in Lydia, carried prisoner to Nice, and there by Marcellus, governor of the place, put to death. Procopius being, by the reduction of this place, become master of the Hellespont, he appointed Ilormisda governor of that province, with the title of proconsul. He was the son of Hormisda, brother to Sapor king of Persia, who, as we have related elsewhere, had, in the year 323. taken refuge in the court of Constantine the Great, and ever after served the Romans with great fidelity. Procopius spent the best part of the winter in endeavouring to draw e over to his party the cities of Afia; but his deligns were in great measure defeated by Clearchus vicar of that province, and more by his own conduct; for having hitherto behaved with great moderation and humanity, he all on a fudden grew He grows 19. proud, haughty, and tyrannical, loading the provinces that had submitted to him ramical. with exorbitant taxes, tho' he knew, that their aversion to Valens was chiefly owing to that prince's avarice. But nothing more prejudiced the people against him, than his commanding the house of Arbetio to be stripped of the moveables of inestimable value, and of the immense riches, which that ancient and brave commander had amassed under Constantius. He gave him this unseasonable proof of his indignation, tho' he had formerly lived in great friendship with him, upon his declining to wait f upon him, on account of his great age, and the infirmities attending it q. The following year 366. Valens, upon the arrival of the troops from the east under the command of Lupicinus, left Galatia, whither he had retired from before Chalcedon, and marched into Lycia, with a defign to put the whole to the issue of a battle. As the foldiers of Procopius were greatly animated by the presence of Faustina, Constantius's widow, and her little daughter Constantina, whom Procopius carried about with k Ammian. l. xxvi. p. 322, 324. 1 Idem, p. 32 mian. ibid. Socrat. l. iv. c. 8. p. 216. 2 Amm Eunap. c. 5. p. 84. Themist. orat. vii. p. 92—99. 1 Idem, p. 315. m 16. • Ammian. ibid. m Cod. Theod. chron. p. 75, 76. Am-id. P Zos. p. 328, Ammian. p. 327.

him, and often exposed to the view of the army, Valens, to defeat that artifice, prevailed upon Arbetio, who had commanded the forces under Constantius, and was beloved

Procopius abandoned by Some of his chief officers.

Defeated, taken, and put to death.

beloved by the foldiery, to join him, not doubting but the prefence and interest of a one of that prince's chief commanders, would draw great numbers of the rebels over to his party. He was not therein deceived; for the presence of Arbetio, and the high opinion they all entertained of him, quite turned the hearts of Procepius's men; which Gomoarius, one of his chief commanders, being well apprised of, thought it adviseable to abandon the tyrant, and submit to Valens r. This happened, according to Zosimus, in the neighbourhood of Thyatira in Lydia, in the heat of a battle, while Valens was in imminent danger of being utterly defeated by the courageous behaviour and prudent conduct of young Hormi/da'. We question whether this can be reconciled with what we read in Ammianus. After this, Valens advanced to Sardes, and from thence to Nicolia, a city of Phrygia, where he gave the rebels battle, the iffue b whereof continued doubtful, till Agilo, by nation a German, one of Procopius's chief commanders, with many others, went over to Valens; which so disheartened Procopius, that, quitting his horse, he sled into an adjoining wood, attended by Florentius, and Barchalbas a tribune. There they wandered about, till the moon shining out with great brightness, they began to apprehend they might be discovered. Hereupon Procopius's two companions, seizing him to save themselves, carried him bound to the emperor, who immediately ordered his head to be struck off, and sent it to Valentinian, then in Gaul. Florentius and Barchalbas were likewise put to death by the emperor's orders; but, in the opinion of Ammianus, contrary to the rules of justice and equity: for had they betrayed, says that writer, a lawful prince, their e treason had deserved to be punished with death; but as he was a rebel and usurper, they had great reason to expect another fort of reward for their scasonable service v. Philostorgius writes, that the army cauf d Florentius to be burnt alive, for his cruekies to those of their party at Nice w, he having been appointed by Procopius governor & that city; but from Ammianus it is evident, that Marcelus, of whom anon, and not Florentius, was governor of that city. What Socrates writes * of the cruel death to which the emperor condemned Procoj ius, and likewife his two generals, Agilo and Gomoarius, tho' they had abandoned him before his defeat, deserves no credit, since Ammianus, who never spares Valens, in displaying with great minuteness his other cruelties, takes no notice of this; nay, he tells us in express terms, that Aranes, d father-in-law to Agilo, by his interest obtained his pardon, tho' he had been prasecus pratorio to Procopius y. Such was the end of this usurper, in the forty-second year of his age, after he had borne the title of emperor for the space of about eight months. He was put to death, according to Idatius and Socrates, on the twenty-feventh of May; but on the twentieth of June, according to the chronicle of Alexandria. He His birth, pre- was born of an illustrious family in Cilicia, and nearly related to the emperor Julian. He was, tho' a pagan, employed by Constantius on account of his integrity, and raised by Julian to great employments, and diffinguished with the title of count. When that prince fet out on his memorable expedition against the Persians, he invested him and count Sebastian with the command of a body of thirty thousand chosen men, who were to remain in Mesopotamia, and cover the empire on that side against any sudden irruption of the enemy z. Zosimus writes, that he delivered up to Jovian the purple robe, which Julian was faid, as we have related above, to have given him, charging him to assume it, if he should happen to die before his return from Persia. That writer adds, that thereupon Jovian gave him leave to retire with his family to Casarea in Cappadocia, and lead there a retired life. Be that as it will, it is certain from Annianus, that he was fent by Jovian to attend the corps of Julian to Tarfus; and afterwards withdrawing, he kept himself concealed, till he assumed the title of emperor, which occasioned his ruin. He was, according to Ammianus, a man of few words, close and reserved; of no mean presence, tho' he went somewhat stooping, with his eyes ever fixed on the ground, which proceeded from his gloomy and melancholy temper; yet he was always averse to the shedding of blood, which, in the opinion of Ammianus, was a thing to be wondered at, considering the moroseness of his disposition b. Marcellus, governor of Nice, and kinsman to Procepius, hearing of his death, ordered Serenianus, who was kept close prisoner in the place, to be immediately dispatched, saving, by the death of one man, the lives of many, says Ammianus; for as he was noted for his cruelty, and had a great afcendant over Valens, ferments, and character.

* Zos. Liv. p. 739.

L xxvi. p. 329.

** Puilost. p. 123.

Zos. l. w. p. 736. # AMMIAN, p. 927, 328. t Ammian. p. 329. Peneost. l. vii. c. 9. p. 123. * Амміан. l. exvii. p. 335. & l. xxvl. p. 329. * Амміан. l. xxvi. p. 329.
* Idem ibid. * SUCRAT. I. iv. c. 5. p. 214. MMIAN ibid.

a whose countryman he was, it was feared, had he outlived the defeat of Procopius's party, he would have induced the emperor, too much inclined of himself, to revenge, and occasioned the destruction of many persons, innocent as well as guilty. After this bold execution, Marcellus being informed, that a body of Goths was marching to the affiftance of Procopius, and not doubting but he should be able to draw them over to his own party, feized on the city of Chalcedon; and being affifted by fome, whom poverty and despair had driven into rebellion, he assumed the purple, and Marcellus re. caused himself to be proclaimed emperor. But Valens, upon the first notice of his volts; revolt, dispatched without delay a party of chosen men against him, who coming upon him unexpectedly, seized him, and having loaded him with chains, dragged But it taken, b him to the public prison; whence he was taken out the next day, and, together with and tortured to his accomplices, tortured to death d. Themistius, in his panegyric upon Valens, written a few months after the death of Procopius, tells us, that he used his victory with great moderation, punishing only the chief authors of the revolt. But Ammianus f and Zosimus 8 assure us, that he proceeded with the utmost severity against fuch as were but barely suspected of having favoured the rebels. His ears were open to all complaints and informations; and few who had the misfortune to be accused, were so happy as to escape death, banishment, or confiscations, till the emperor had glutted himself with blood, and filled his own coffers, and those of his friends likewise. He ordered the city of Chalcedon to be difmantled, pursuant to an oath he had taken; but the inhabitants of Nice, Nicomedia, and Constantinople, interceding in behalf of a city, of which the walls were its chief beauty and ornament, to comply at the fame time with their request, and his own oath, he caused only part of the walls to be demolished, which he immediately rebuilt with smaller stones, ordering the others to be conveyed to Constantinople, where they were made use of to build a public bath, called the Thermæ, or Hot baths of Constantius, if Socrates is not mistaken ; for it is certain, that Valens built at Constantinople a public bath, bearing the name of his daughter Carosa, which were ended in 375. This year the empress Albia Dominica was, on the eighteenth of January, delivered of a son, named Valentinian, and surnamed Galata, no doubt because he was born in Galatia, where Valens passed the first

d months of this year, as we have observed.

THE following year 367. Valens, hearing that a body of three thousand Golbs, Valens resolves who were come to the affiftance of Procopius, and had marched back upon the news to make war of his death, had not yet passed the Danube, sent a strong detachment against them, "pon the Goths. who, cutting off their retreat, obliged them, notwithstanding the vigorous resistance they made, to lay down their arms, and yield themselves prisoners k. Hereupon Athanaric, at that time king, or rather judge of the Goths, named Thervingi, (for he seems to have declined the royal title) dispatched embassadors to Valens, earnestly intreating him to set the prisoners at liberty, and suffer them to return to their own country, fince they had been fent by their prince, a friend and ally of the e Romans, to the affiftance of a Roman emperor. The embaffadors, after having delivered this message, produced a letter from Procopius to their master, wherein he affured him, that the empire belonged to him as the kinfman of Constantius, and the heir of the great Constantine's family. Valens returned, it seems, no answer to the embassadors; but sent Victor, then magister equitum, or general of the horse, to complain in his name of Athanaric, for affitting a rebel against his lawful fovereign. The Goths answered, that they had looked upon Procopius as the kinsman of Constantine, and the heir of his family, adding, that it was not their business to examine whether he was, or was not, a lawful prince; and that, if they were therein deceived, the emperor ought to forgive them, fince their counsels had been influenced by what f appeared to them just and equitable. They could not however obtain the deliverance of their prisoners, Valens, who had no other enemy at that time to divert him, being desirous to humble that powerful nation 1. Ammianus thinks he had justice on his fide m; but Eunafius will not take upon him to decide whether he had or no n. This war was likely to prove very dangerous, the Goths being then very powerful, and besides, elated with the great advantages they had gained over the neighbouring nations, if Jornandes is to be credited o, who feems to have been but indifferently

* Idem, l. xxvi. p. 325. d Idem, p. 326, 327. *THEMIST. OF TAL. VII. p. 84. F AMMIAN. p. 330.

* Zos. l. iv. p. 739. b Socr. l. iv. c. 8. p. 216. AMMIAN. p. 614. Chron. Alex p. 704.

* Zos. l. iv. p. 740. Eunap. de legation. p. 18. AMMIAN. l. xxvii. p. 340. Eunap. p. 18. 7.0s.

p. 748. Jorn. fer. Goth. c. 23. p. 643. Mamian. p. 338. Eunap. p. 18. Jorn. ibid. C. 3. D. 642, 643. Vol. VI. Nº 5.

'n¢

i

ń r,

ď

ı d

17 150

性

34

til. g þe

11 1

125

02

5 B

acquainted

